Ver. 11. If the burnt sacrifice for his offering to the Lord be of fowls,] It is well observed by Maimonides, in his More Novochim, par. iii. cap. 46, that when a man was not able to go to the charge of a sheep or a goat (much less of a bullock), God was so plentiful as to accept of him only his prescribings of what sort they should be. Nay, he that was not able to be at this expense, was accepted if he offered bread, however prepared, whether in an oven or a pan, according to the custom of those times. And he to whom this was too great a burden, might worship God, by bringing only fine flour, as will appear in the next chapter.

Turtle-doves, or of young pigeons.] The same author observes, that there was a vast plenty of these birds in the land of Canaan; and consequently they were so cheap, that it would put the poorest sort to no great charge to bring this oblation. These were also very anciently sacrificed (Gen. xv. 9), and of a gentle nature (as Piscopius and others obser'ved), and pigeons being best what they are young, and turtles when full grown, accordingly they are appointed to bring them, when they were most esteemed. These are but seldom mentioned in the sacrifices among the gentiles, who offered cocks to Bacchus, and geese to Isis, as we read in several of their authors.

Ver. 15. Wring off his head.] Pinch it off with his nail (as the Jews say) at one of the corners or horns of the altar: viz. the whole burnt-offering at the south-east corner, and the sin-offering at the north-west, as and wrung off his head, and burn it on the altar; and the blood thereof be wrung out at the side of the altar: 16 And he shall pluck away his crop with his feathers, and cast it beside the altar on the east part, by the place of the ashes:

Maimonides saith in his treatise called Korbanoth, cap. 5. But their heads were so to be wrung or pinched as not to be separated quite from the body, but to be left still hanging to it. For so it is ordered in that sacrifice mentioned v. 8, and therefore they suppose it was so in all. The blood thereof shall be wrung out! This is the reason that the priest alone might kill the bird (though others might kill the beast, see ver. 5), because the sprinkling of the blood, which none might do but the priest, was immediately conjunct with the wringing off its head.

Ver. 16. Pluck away his crop! Or the stomach; that the sacrifice might be clean, and free from all filth.

With his feathers.] Which were no more to be offered, than the skin of the beasts (ver. 6). Cast it beside the altar on the east! As far as might be from the most holy place, which was in the west. By the place of the ashes:] See iv. 12.

Ver. 17. And he shall cleave it with the wings thereof, but shall not divide it asunder:] The wings were to be so cloven, as not to be quite separated from the body, but still to remain hanging to it: and so salt being sprinkled upon the whole body, it was thrown into the fire. So Maimonides observes in the forenamed treatise; where he takes notice, also, that it was otherwise in fowls offered for sin; of which nothing but the blood belonged to the altar; the flesh of them being eaten by the priests and their sons. Whence it was, that no sin-offering of birds was accepted, unless it were accompanied with a whole burnt-offering; that the altar might not be without a feast, when they that ministered there were entertained. Thus it is required in several cases, mentioned v. 7, xii. 6, 8, xiv. 22, xv. 16, 30, and Numb. vi. 11. The same Maimonides likewise observes, that this sacrifice of birds was one of the most difficult works in the sanctuary; whereby the mind of the priest was kept as intent upon the poorest sacrifice, as upon the most splendid.

The priest shall burn it upon the altar.] This was in part said before, but here repeated more distinctly, to show there was no difference to be made between the sacrifices of the meanest and of the greatest. It is a burnt sacrifice, &c.] The same is said of this, as of all other holocausts (ver. 9, 15), to show that whether the oblation was of the greater animals or of the less, or only of birds, it made no difference in its acceptance with God: who graciously ordered these various sorts of offerings, that the poor as well as the rich might be capable to express their devotion to him, and be confident to find favour with him.

CHAPTER II.

1 The meat-offering of flour with oil and incense, 4 either baken in the oven, 5 or on a plate, 7 or in a frying-pan, 12 or of the firstfruits in the ear. 13 The salt of the meat offering.

1 And when any will offer a meat offering unto the Lord, his offering shall be of fine flour; and he shall pour oil upon it, and put frankincense thereon:

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. When any will offer a meat offering!] Here is a merciful provision for those, who were neither able to offer beasts of any sort, nor birds, whom God ordered to bring meal (as was observed before on the first chapter, ver. 14), which was called in the Hebrew language mincha, and by us translated a meat-offering; for it was a korban, or gift, as well as the foregoing, though of a lower sort. And R. Levi Barzolinita thinks this sort of mean present (as we may call it) had the name of mincha, because such offerings were very often merely voluntary; from whence whatsoever is not due among men from another is called mincha, a gift. Some of which were constant and stated, and also of a determinate quantity; being an appendix to the daily burnt-sacrifice, morning and evening, as we read, Exod. xxix. 38, 39, &c. But these here spoken of were voluntary, when any man's devotion inclined him to acknowledge God, and implore His Divine blessing. And no certain quantity was prescribed; only the Jews say, not less than an ephah was accepted, but as much more as they pleased. See Dr. Outram in his excellent book de Sacrificiis, p. 90.

His offering shall be of fine flour:] viz. Of wheat flour. For all the offerings of this kind, whether for the whole congregation, or particular men, were of pure wheat flour, as sifted from the bran; except only the omer of first-fruits of their harvest (xxiii. 13, 14), and that which was called the mincha of jealousy (Numb. v. 15), which were of barley. Of these voluntary offerings there were five sorts, as appears by this chapter: for they were either of raw meal (mentioned in this verse), or meal made into cakes, baked in an oven (which was of two sorts, ver. 4), or baked in a pan (ver. 5), or in a frying-pan (ver. 7). The first of which was the most ancient, as appears from Gen. iv. 3, and from what the heathen say of it; particularly Plato, lib. vi. de Legibus, and Pliny, lib. xxx. Nat. Hist. cap. 5, where he saith Numa ordered the Romans Deos fruge solvere, &c. And Pausanias, in his Attica, tells us, in the porch of the most high Jupiter there was an altar, where they did not offer the sacrifice of beasts, but only of fine flour. The same he repeats in his Arcadia, and says this was ordained by Cecrops, that they should sacrifice only πῦνα τύπωρα, which the Athenians in his time called πῦαοι. And accordingly Triptolemus, another of their most ancient lawgivers, enacted this as one of his principal laws, that they should worship their gods "with the fruits of the earth." For the three laws of his, Porphyry saith, were preserved to his days, Ἄνοιξι τῶν ἔργων, θεοὶ παρασύργων ἄγγελοι, ζωὰ μὴ
2 And he shall bring it to Aaron's sons the priests: and he shall take thereout his handfull of the flour thereof, and of the oil thereof, with all the frankincense thereof; and the priest shall burn the memorial of it upon the altar, to be an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord:

3 And the remnant of the meat offering shall be Aaron's and his sons': it is a thing most holy of the offerings of the Lord made by fire.

Ver. 3. The remnant—shall be Aaron's and his sons':] To be eaten by them. But that meat-offering which was offered for the priests themselves, was to be wholly burnt, and no part eaten (vi. 22, 23).

It is a thing most holy: Nothing is more known than the distinction which the Jews make between things most holy and the lighter holy things (as their phrase is). Their priests took nothing less than holy meat: but what was most holy was such, as none whatsoever might eat of; or none but the priests, and the sons of priests; and that only in the sanctuary, and nowhere else (see vi. 16, 26); such were all whole burnt-offerings, all the sin-offerings, and all the peace-offerings for the whole congregation. The lighter holy things were such as might be eaten by those who were not priests, in any place within the city of Jerusalem (to which their camp now answered), and such were all the peace-offerings of particular persons, the paschal lamb, the tenth, and the firstlings of cattle.

Ver. 4. If thou bring an oblation—baken in the oven: This is the first sort of baked minchons, for the preparing of which there was an oven in the court of the Tabernacle of the congregation, in the court of the temple (1 Chron. xxiii. 28, 29; Ezek. xlv. 20). It shall be unleavened cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, &c.] If the cakes were thick, then the oil was kneaded together with them; but if they were thin (like a wafer), then it was only spread upon it, before it was baked (see Exod. xxix. 2) or, as some will have it, after it came out of the ovens. Concerning cakes of unleavened wafers, see below, ver. 11.
5. "And if thy oblation be a meat offering baken in a pan, it shall be of fine flour unleavened, mingled with oil."
6. Thou shalt part it in pieces, and pour oil thereon: it is a meat offering.
7. "And if thy oblation be a meat offering baken in the fryingpan, it shall be made of fine flour with oil."
8. And thou shalt bring the meat offering that is made of these things unto the Lord: and when it is presented unto the priest, he shall bring it unto the altar.

It shall be of fine flour unleavened, mingled with oil.]
This sort of cake seems to have been both kneaded with oil, and to have had oil also poured upon it, after it was baked, as well as upon the plate.
Ver. 6. Thou shalt part it in pieces, &c.] This, according to Ababrinel, was done as it lay baking upon the plate. Or, if this division was made after it was taken off, the reason was the same; because part of it was to be given to God, and the rest to the priests.

Pour oil thereon.] Upon the pieces; that they might by this new addition of fresh oil be made more savoury. It is a meat offering.] And therefore to be eaten with oil (ver. 1).

Ver. 7. Fryingpan.] This vessel was not flat, but deep (as Ababrinel observes, see ver. 5), because that which was baked in it was moist and fluid.
It shall be made of fine flour with oil.] The oil was not mixed with the sort of minchr, but put into the pan, so that it mixed with the flour; which might be shaken and moved up and down, as things are which are baken in Jordan. So Ababrinel's words are in his preface to this book.

Ver. 8.] This relates to all the baked meat-offerings before mentioned, which were to be brought to the Lord at his house, and there presented to the priest, who was to bring them to the altar, when they were prepared as before directed (see ver. 1, 2). And this variety of minchar was allowed, that the table of the Lord (i.e. the altar) might be furnished, and his ministers that waited on him entertained with all sorts of provisions.

Ver. 9. A memorial thereof.] A part of the cake (of which we have just spoken) was separated from the rest of the Lord's portion; to whom it was offered as an acknowledgment of his supreme dominion over them, and in commemoration of his goodness to them.

Burn it upon the altar.] Before the other parts were eaten by the priests; as was directed before about the fine flour (ver. 2).

It is an offering made by fire.] See ver. 2.

Ver. 10.] All this verse has been explained, ver. 3.

Ver. 11.] These words (which ye shall bring unto the Lord) seem to have a peculiar emphasis in this place; importing, that no meat-offering, part of which was offered upon God's altar, should be leavened.
For no part of that leavened bread which was offered in eucharistical sacrifices (vii. 13), nor the two leaves offered in the feast of Pentecost (which some mis-was the difference between macabath (which is the Hebrew word in this place) and marchesheth, that the former was a pan or plate without any rim about it; and the other had one, as our frying-pan have. And so Ababrinel, in his preface to this book, observes out of Jarchi, that there was a vessel in the temple, which was only flat and broad, but had no rising on the sides of it; so that the oil being poured upon it, when it was set on the fire, ran down and increased the flame, and made the cake hard.

And the priest shall take from the meat offering a memorial thereof, and shall burn it upon the altar: it is an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.

And that which is left of the meat offering shall be Aaron's and his sons': it is a thing most holy of the offerings of the Lord made by fire.

No meat offering, which ye shall bring unto the Lord, shall be made with leaven; for ye shall burn no leaven, nor any honey, in any of the offerings of the Lord made by fire.

Take for an exception to this precept), were offered upon the altar, but given entirely to the priests, as their portion.

Made with leaven.] There are many moral reasons given, both by Jewish and Christian writers, why none of the cakes before mentioned, who had many of ven in them, which I shall not here set down.
There is some probability in their opinion, who think this was ordered to refresh their memory, by putting them in mind of their deliverance out of Egypt.
But Maimonides seems to me to have given the best account of this, in his More Nevovchin (par. iii. cap.
46), where he says, God prohibited this to root out the idolatrous customs in those days, as he found in the books of the Zabii, who offered to their gods no bread but leavened." Next to this, the account which Ababrinel gives of it is not to be disregarded, who which means, because it would have made delay, if they had waited at the tabernacle till the fermentation was perfected.

It shall burn no leaven, &c.] Neither mixed with bread, nor alone by themselves. For honey was a kind of leaven, and it is certain was used by the heathen in their religious rites: as appears not only from Maimonides (who tells us in the place forenamed, that they chose sweet things for their offerings, and annointed their sacrifices with honey), but from a great number of ancient authors, particularly Plato, who saith (in his de Legibus, vi), that ancient men did not sacrifice living creatures, but only fine flour, και μείχταν παρακλητικά, "and fruits moistened with honey." And so Phyllachus tells us (in Athenaeus's Deipnosoph. lib. xv.), that the Greeks sacrificed honey to the sun (which was the great god among the gentiles), but poured no wine upon his altars. Which Polemon (in his Ἑλληνικά, i. 4), calls τρυφόν του Θεοῦ, a sober sacrifice? for there was no wine in it, but honey and water mixed together. Nay, there was scarce any god among the heathen to whom honey was not offered, as Bochartus has shewn at large in his Hieroeleon, par. ii. lib. iv.
cap. 12. But one testimony may serve for all, which is from Pausanius (in his Elinae), where he saith, that, on his ascension up to the heavenly altar at the temple of Jupiter Olympus unto several deities, and some of them common to them all, he saith, they sacrificed every one of them once a month, after ancient manner (ὑφαπαλίν τω τρυφω), "frankincense and wheat mingled with honey." Which being so common and ancient a thing among the gentiles in their idolatrous worship, was the reason, it is likely, that God forbade it to be used in his sacrifices. And under the name of honey, the Jews think figs and dates, and all other sweet fruits, are comprehended. For the famous composition among the Egyptians called ΣΗΡΟ, which was burnt every day, morning and evening, on their altars, consisted of such things, as well as of myrrh, calamus, and cardamum. So Plu-tarch tells us (in his book de Iside et Osiris), and LEVITICUS.

12 ¶ As for the oblation of the firstfruits, ye shall offer them unto the LORD: but they shall not be burnt on the altar for a sweet savour.

13 And every oblation of thy meat offering shalt thou season with salt; neither shalt thou suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat offering: with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt.

14 And if thou offer a meat offering of the firstfruits unto the LORD, thou shalt offer for mentioned honey in the first place, with wine and raisins: To μιν κίτρινα μυρμη, &c. μιλέτος και οίνοι και στομαδιος, &c.

Ver. 12. Oblation of the firstfruits.] There were several sorts of first-fruits (as I observed Exod. xxiii. 19). That which is here spoken of was of the corn unground, only a little parched at the fire, which was to be presented unto God; but not burnt on the altar, because they belonged unto the priests.

Ver. 13. Every oblation—shalt thou season with salt? All the forementioned minchahs, which were korbanas (as they are often here called), were to be thus seasoned, because salt was a thing never wanting at any table; and all meat is unsavoury without it.

The salt of the covenant] It is called the salt of the covenant of God, as some think, because required by this law, which they covenanted with God to observe, as much as to offer sacrifices; which were not acceptable without salt, as appears from the repetition of it three times in one verse. But there is a plain reason, that is, which, that the sacrifices being God's feasts, and that they did partake of them being his guests, who did in a manner eat and drink with him at his table, the salt that was cast upon all sacrifices (as appears by the words following) is called the salt of the covenant, to signify, that as men were wont to make covenants by eating and drinking together, so in this manner was this salt used, as a necessary appendix at every feast; so God by these sacrifices, and the feasts upon them, did ratify and confirm his covenant with those that did partake of them. For salt, as is commonly observed, being a constant concomitant of all feasts, and covenants being made by eating and drinking at the same table, where salt was ever used, there salt itself was counted by the ancients to be the symbol of friendship, and proverbially used among the Greeks to express it. By which other places may be explained, about which some have bestowed vain labour, Numb. xxiii. 19; 2 Chron. xiii. 5, where the same words are used, but inverted; it being called a covenant of salt (instead of the salt of the covenant), because covenants, as I said, were established by eating together, where salt is never wanting.

With all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt.] Not only with the minchahs, or meat-offerings, mentioned in this chapter, but with all other sacrifices whatsoever. Which is so solemnly enjoined (as Malmonides says in the place before named), because the heathen did not use any salt in their sacrifices; and the heathen, since honey (with which salt doth not well agree) was in such constant use among them. And therefore, saith he, "God prohibited us to offer leaven or honey, and commanded us, with great seriousness, to use salt in all our sacrifices." That is, as R. Levi of Barcelona explains it (Precept. cxxv.), the flesh of all sacrifices was to be salted; and the meal of all minchahs. For which he gives these two reasons: because nothing is grateful to the palate without salt; which also preserves things from corruption, as the sacrifices did their souls from perishing. Abarbinel saith the same. And therefore, whatsoever the custom might be in ancient time among the heathen, in after ages they learned from Moses to use it in all their sacrifices: as appears from Pliny and Ovid (and many other authors), the first of which says, the salt was so necessary, that no sacrifices were offered sine nula salas: which every one knows the Greeks called σωλας και σωλακτας. And, among the Jews, this salt was not brought by him that offered the sacrifice, but was provided at the public charge; there being a chamber in the court of the temple (for we read in Middoth, cap. 5, sect. 2) called the chamber of salt. Which was one of the three rooms on the north side of the court (as there were three others on the south side, for other uses), where the flesh of the sacrifices was powdered, as the minchahs were seasoned at the very altar. And this was so necessary, that though a sacrifice was not looked upon as null, if the parts selected to salt; yet the want of it in the minchahs (as the Hebrew doctors say) made them void; because it is here so expressly required in this verse, "Thou shalt not suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking in thy meat-offering." And whoever offered any sacrifice without salt, or with honey or leaven, was beaten, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. c. 26. Symeons.

Ver. 14. If thou offer a meat offering of the firstfruits, &c.] This is very different from the oblation of first-fruits mentioned ver. 12. For there they are called resith, which signifies the first-fruits at harvest time: but here bieburtim, which properly imports the first ripe fruits, before the rest were ready. And therefore the manner of the former is different from the latter. And the salt, which follows in the conclusion of this verse. And first he describes what he means by the first-fruits, which he calls akib, i.e. full ears of corn, but as yet green and moist, which he saith therefore in the next place must be dried by the fire; and then bruised and beaten in a mallet, or with a mill: and they were to be brought out of the richest part of the field, not being a mere offering to signify, gereshe Carmel (which we translate corn beaten out of full ears), for Carmel sometimes signifies a fruitful field (Isa. xxxiii. 15), and therefore may very well be thought in this place to import, the largest ears of tender corn. And the intention of its context seems to have been, that it might be reduced into flour; as it might afterwards be dried by the fire. And then according to this that meat-offering mentioned ver. 1 only in this; that the former was flour of old corn, this of new: and that was fine flour sifted from the bran; this had nothing taken out of it, but remained as it came from the mortar or the mill. And so the LXX. seem to have understood it. There are these, indeed, who think it was only threshed out of the husk, and so offered, and fancy also that from this word gereshe the goddess called Cirēs had her name among the gentiles. Which last conceit is the stranger, since they endeavour to have it thought that the Jews derived this custom of offering first-fruits from the gentiles; and not the gentiles from the Jews. Whereas the gentiles had no such custom, that I can find, as this first offer of the first-fruits of their harvest, which they called novas fruges: of which the Romans thought it unlawful to taste, ante quem sacerdotes primitis libassent, "before the priest had offered the first-fruits," as Pliny tells us, lib. xviii. cap. 2, and Censorinus saith the same, cap. 1, de Die Natali. Or if they did offer any first-fruits at all, then only in a pot, but did not roast them in the fire, as is here directed. For so Hesychius seems to say that in the the meat offering of the first fruits of green ears of corn dried by the fire, even corn beaten out of full ears.

15 And thou shalt put oil upon it, and lay frankincense thereon: it is a meat offering.

feast called θυσία (which was in the month that answers to our April), they offered τάς αποχάζεις των φασινιωμάτων, και περισθειμένων, “the first-fruits that appeared out of the ground, which they carried about.”

τ. δ. in part, as other authors tell us. And Hesychius himself saith, that θυσίας signified “a pot full of sacred dejection.”

Ver. 15. Pour oil upon it, &c.] See ver. 1.

CHAPTER III.

1 The meat offering of the herd, 6 of the flock, 7 either a lamb, 12 or a goat.

2 And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering, and kill it at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aaron’s sons the priests shall sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about.

3 And he shall offer of the sacrifice of the male or female.] A whole burnt-offering was to be only of a male, for being wholly God’s, and offered purely for his honour, it was to be of the very best (i. 3). But peace-offerings, being also for the profit of him that offered them, who had the greatest share of them; it was at his liberty whether he would offer a male or a female. Directly contrary to the Egyptian customs, if they were the same now that they were in the time of Herodotus, who saith expressly, τρυπώς οί οἱ Εθνοί προσήλυται, “it was not lawful among them to sacrifice females” (ib. ii. cap. 41).

He shall offer it without blemish, &c.] See i. 3.

Ver. 2. He shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering.] The man who brought the offering was to lay his hand upon the head of it; as was ordered in the whole burnt-offering and sin-offering (see ch. i. ver. 4). It might not be done by a deputy, unless he was heir to one that had vowed this sacrifice, and died before he had performed it; in which case the heir was to do what the man himself should have done, if he had been alive, as Maimonides observes. In this sacrifice, laying on of hands seems to have been done, not only with prayer to God, that he would accept the oblation (which the Jews say always accompanied this action), but with acknowledgment of those mercies which were the occasion of it. So Com. Pellican us well glosses upon i. 4 (which may be best applied to the use of this rite in peace-offerings): “Laying on of hands signifies devotion and faith, with acknowledgment of the Divine benefits; for which we cannot offer any thing of our own, but rather return and restore to him what we have received; that we may understand giving of thanks to be the greatest of our sacrifices.”

And kill it] See chap. i. ver. 5.

At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.] These being the lesser holy things, as the Jews call them, were not offered as the whole burnt-offerings and sin-offerings were, on the north side of the altar (see chap. i. ver. 11), but anywhere else near to the entrance of the tabernacle; which was in the east, where the ashes were thrown out, and therefore a less holy place. Only in laying on of hands, every man was bound, wheresoever the sacrifice was killed, to turn his face westward, towards the sanctuary;
peace offering an offering made by fire unto the Lord; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards,

4 And the two kidneys, and the fat that is on them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away.

5 And Aaron's sons shall burn it on the altar upon the burnt sacrifice, which is upon the wood that is on the fire: it is an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.

6 ¶ And if his offering for a sacrifice of peace offering unto the Lord be of the flock, male or female, he shall offer it without blemish.

7 If he offer a lamb for his offering, then shall he offer it before the Lord.

because then, as I said, he made certain prayers and acknowledgments to the Divine Majesty, which was always to be done in that posture.

Sprinkle the blood. See chap. i. ver. 5.

Ver. 3. He shall offer.] One of the priests then in waiting at the altar.

Of the sacrifice of the peace offering.] After the sacrifices were flayed and cut up, as is directed i. 6.

The fat that covereth the inwards,] That is, the udder, as the Latins call it, which hath much fat in it (see Exod. xxix. 12).

All the fat which adhereth to the mesentery, and other entrails.

Ver. 4. The two kidneys, and the fat that is on them,] The kidneys are noted by Aristotle to have more fat about them than any of the other bowels: ’Εχοντο δ’ αι νεφροι μύετα των σπερματικων μυετων (lib. iii. de Animal. cap. 9), being so covered with it, that, in dividing fat from bone, the kidneys, at first sight, are not to be perceived, as anatomists observe; particularly our own countryman, Dr. Highmore.

Which is by the flanks.] The Hebrew word cesilim signifies the loins (as Bochart hath demonstrated in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45), which have collaps of fat upon them, as Eliphaz speaks (Job xv. 27), and thence are easily inflamed (Ps. xxxviii. 7). But the fat that is above the liver. The Hebrew word yahdoth signifies the greater lobe of the liver (see Exod. xxix. 13).

It shall he take away.] Separate from the rest of the flesh, to be offered on the altar. For all the fat here mentioned was God's portion of the sacrifice; the priest had the breast and the right shoulder; and he that brought the offering had the rest; as will appear more fully, vii. 15, &c. 31, 32, &c.

Ver. 5. Aaron's sons.] Some of those that minister that day.

Burnt sacrifice.] By the burnt-sacrifice seems here to be meant the daily sacrifice which was burnt every morning: after which this was to be offered, but not before it.

Which is upon the wood that is on the fire.] The same wood, upon which the burnt-sacrifice had been offered, would serve to burn this fat. Which being entirely consumed, as the holocausts were, it is called in the following words, "an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord?" (see chap. i. ver. 9).

That is, God was pleased graciously to accept their pious acknowledgments; the offerings of these inwards being, as if he that brought them had said, I will pour out my soul before the Lord in thanks and praise for the benefits he had received. So Abarbinel explains in his preface to this book.

Ver. 6. If his offering, &c. be of the flock;] I. e. Of sheep or goats, which are both comprehended under the word flock (as was noted before, ch. i. ver. 9).

Male or female.] See ver. 1, where I observed a difference between these sacrifices and whole burnt-offerings, in this respect; that whereas those were accepted for peace-offerings, but male alone for the other. To which may be added, that birds were allowed for whole burnt-offerings (i. 14, 15, &c.), but not for peace-offerings; which were only of the herd or flock: I. e. of bullocks, sheep, or goats. The reason seems to be plain: because peace-offerings being to be divided between God, the priest, and him that brought them, the portion of each would have been so small that it would have made the feast upon it so very meager and jejunum, that it would have been contemptible.

Without blemish.] It was at his choice whether he would bring it from the herd or the flock: but in its kind it was to be perfect (see ch. i. 5, 9).

Ver. 7. If he offer a lamb.] Though a bird was not accepted for a peace-offering, yet a lamb was; though not of such value as a fat sheep, or a goat.

Offer it before the Lord.] This seems to be meant of the man's presenting it to be offered at the altar.

Ver. 8. This whole verse is only a direction to do with a peace-offering of a lamb or sheep, as they were to do with that of a bullock (ch. i. 5). Though a bird was not accepted for a peace-offering, yet a lamb was; though not of such value as a fat sheep, or a goat.

Ver. 9. Offering made by fire.] As was directed in the offering of a bullock (ver. 3).

The fat thereof, and the whole rump.] The whole fat being to be offered (as was ordered also before) he enumerates the particulars; because in this was more fat than in other sacrifices of this kind. For the whole rump of a sheep was to be offered to God, though of a bullock, nor a goat. And the reason was because in those countries the tails of their sheep are so vastly big, that (as Golius and others assure us) the least of them weigh ten or twelve pounds; and some exceed forty pounds weight: and they are so very fat that they melt the fat and keep it to butter their rice, and for other uses, as Bochart observes in his Hierozoicon, par. 1. lib. i. cap. 41.

Backbone.] The Hebrew word atzaloth, which we translate the backbone, denotes that part which is next to the tail or rump; and therefore must signify that which Galen calls ossacrum: consisting of three cartilaginous parts, as he describes it.

Ver. 10. This verse is explained above (ver. 4).

Ver. 11. The priest shall burn it upon the altar.] As he did the fat of the bullock (ver. 5).

It is the food of the offering made by fire unto the Lord.] That which was offered upon the altar was accounted God's mess, as appears from Mal. i. 13, it is the food of the offering made by fire unto the Lord.

12 And if his offering be a goat, then he shall offer it before the Lord.

13 And he shall lay his hand upon the head of it, and kill it before the tabernacle of the congregation: and the sons of Aaron shall sprinkle the blood thereof upon the altar round about.

14 And he shall offer thereof his offering, even an offering made by fire unto the Lord; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards, where the altar is called his table, and the sacrifice upon it his meat: as here it is called his bread of food; to represent in a lively manner to them, that God dwelt, and (as we say) kept house among them; and that they who partook of these sacrifices, feasted with them upon his provision (see upon Exod. xxv. 8, 30).

Ver. 12. If his offering be a goat, &c.] The law concerning this sacrifice is the very same with the former (of things); it is ordered about the range of sheep; and this and the following verses (12—15), need no further explanation.

Ver. 16.] See before, ver. 11. All the fat is the Lord's.] That is, all the fat before mentioned: which may more properly be translated the suet. For that fat which was a part of the flesh might be eaten (as appears from many places, particularly Deut. xxxii. 14), but not that which only lay upon it, and might be separated from it; which was burnt upon the altar, when they sacrificed either a bullock, sheep, or goat. And when they killed any of these, or other clean creatures, for their food at home, still they were to forbear to eat the suet; partly out of reverence to God, whose portion it was at the altar; and partly because it was heavy and too strong a food, as Maimonides takes it (More Nevechin, par. iii. cap. 48). And it seems therefore to have been offered upon the altar, because it was so unctuous, that it would easily burn, and make the flesh also consume the sooner. But from its being God's part, it came thence to signify, the very best and most excellent of anything, as the best of the tithe is called the "fat of the tithe," Num. xviii. 17, and the best corn is called the "fat of the wheat," Ps. lxxi. 16, and rich and powerful men are called the "fat of the 15 And the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away.

16 And the priest shall burn them upon the altar: it is the food of the offering made by fire for a sweet savour: all the fat is the Lord's.

17 It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood.

The offering of ignorance, 3 for the priest, 13 for the congregation, 23 for the ruler, 27 for any of the people.

And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

If a soul shall sin through ignorance against any of the commandments of the Lord concerning things which ought not to be done, and shall do against any of them:

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1.] Having directed him about whole burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings (which constantly attended some of them), and peace-offerings, which supposed men to be in a state of favour with God; he now proceeds to give order about the expiation of their sins, when they had offended him, by doing contrary to his commands; which he continues to the fourteenth verse of the fifth chapter. And this law about sin-offerings, seems to have been delivered to Moses at a different time from the former; being about a different matter; but by a voice speaking to him out of the tabernacle, as before (chap. i. 1).

Ver. 2. If a soul shall sin through ignorance, &c.] There are three conditions expressed in this verse, of the sin for which the following sacrifice was admitted. First, It was to be committed ignorantly; not willingly and presumptuously. Secondly, It was for sin against a negative precept (as the Jews call them), i.e. such a commandment as forbade something to be done. So it is said here expressly, concerning things which ought not to be done. As for the omission of such things as were commanded to be done, they 3 If the priest that is anointed do sin according to the sin of the people; then let him bring for his sin, which he hath sinned, a young bullock without blemish unto the Lord for a sin offering.

4 And he shall bring the bullock unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord; and shall lay his hand upon the bullock's head, and kill the bullock before the Lord.

5 And the priest that is anointed shall take of the bullock's blood, and bring it to the tabernacle of the congregation:

6 And the priest shall dip his finger in the blood, and sprinkle of the blood seven times upon the mercy seat that is over the testimony, for it shall atone for it; and shall cleanse it from sin.

I take it, was to be done by himself; who was to present the sacrifice to the Divine Majesty, and desire it might be accepted for the purpose to which it was to be offered.

Lay his hand upon the bullock's head.] As every one that brought other offerings was bound to do (see chap. i. 4, iii. 2, &c.), but here for another purpose; viz. to confine their sins unto the Lord, and beseech him to forgive them (see v. 5). There is a good gloss upon this, in a very bad book called Nitzzaen, not long ago published by the learned Wagensen: where that author saith (p. 11), "When a man sacrificed a beast, he was to think in his mind, I am more a beast than this here present. For I have sinned, and for the sins I have committed, I offer this: but I have more justly that he who hath sinned should suffer death, than this beast (which hath not offended): therefore thus a man, by the help of this sacrifice, began to repent."

Kill the bullock!] This seems to have been done by him that laid his hand on the head of the bullock, that is, by the hand of the high-priest himself. For the greatest men, in old time, did not think such work below them; but rather esteemed every thing that served to the worship of God, to be noble and honourable. So Homer represents king Agamemnon as killing the lambs himself; by the blood of which he was to seal the treaty he made with the Trojans (IIiad. 5); yet in this case, it is likely, the high-priest, or one of his assistants, performed the sacrifice, and the other priests that then ministered. For he that did this seems to be distinguished, by the next words (ver. 5), from the priest that is anointed, i.e. the high-priest. Nor was this sacrifice killed in the ordinary place where sin-offerings were killed (see 21), being an extraordinary sort of offering, as that which follows also was.

Ver. 5. The priest that is anointed!] Whoever killed the sacrifice, the high-priest himself, for whom it was offered, did what follows.

Shall take of the bullock's blood,] In a basin. Bring it to the tabernacle] Into the very sanctuary; where, as it follows, he was to dip his finger in the blood, and sprinkle it seven times before the Lord.

Ver. 6. The priest shall dip his finger in the blood.] Or rather, dip it into the blood.

Sprinkle of the blood seven times!] This was peculiar to his sacrifice for sin, and done in no other but that for the whole congregation. To signify, perhaps, that their offences were more heinous, and could not be so easily expiated, as in other manner. The number seven, every one knows, was of great account, and thought most powerful in religious actions, even among the heathen. For as Elisha bade Naaman go and wash seven times in Jordan, to cure him of his leprosy; so Apuleius, in the beginning of the eleventh book of his Metamorphosis, speaks of dipping the head seven times in the sea for purification, and gives the reason for it: Quod eum numerum, precum religiion apptissimum divinum ille Pythagoras prodidit; "because the Divine Pythagoras (as he calls him) taught this number to be above all other most proper in religion." Which, in all probability, Pythagoras learnt from the truly Divine Moses: to before the Lord, before the vail of the sanctuary.

7 And the priest shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar of sweet incense before the Lord, which is in the tabernacle of the congregation; and shall pour all the blood of the bullock at the bottom of the altar of the burnt offering, which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

8 And he shall take off from it all the fat of the bullock for the sin offering; that fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards.

9 And the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, shall he take away,

10 As it was taken off from the bullock of the sacrifice of peace offerings: and the priest shall burn them upon the altar of the burnt offering.

12 Even the whole bullock shall he carry forth without the camp unto a clean place, where the ashes are poured out, and burn him on the wood with fire: where the ashes are poured out shall he be burnt.

whom God revealed the creation of the world, in six days, and his consecrating the seventh day, on which he rested; which made the number seven so much used in sacred matters. For not only in this sacrifice, but in making the water of separation by burning a red heifer, this rite was used (Num. xix. 4), and in purging a leper (Lev. xiv. 7), in dedicating the altar (Exod. xxix. 27), when the oil was sprinkled on it seven times (Lev. viii. 11), and at the consecration of the priests (Exod. xxix. 35); and, to say no more, as every seventh day of the week was holy, so every seventh year the land rested; and after seven times seven there was a jubilee (Lev. xxv.). They that would see more of this number, and of its sacraments, as St. Jerome speaks, may read him upon Amos v. 3, and Drusius on this place, and on Josh. vi. 4, and Wolfius upon Nchemnii viii.

Before the vail of the sanctuary,] Which parted the holy place from the most holy. For that is peculiarly called by the name of porothet, which is the word here used (xxvi. 31, 33, 35; Lev. xvi. 2, &c.), as the other vail which was before the door of the tabernacle, is constantly called maodoch (Exod. xxvi. 36, 37).

Ver. 7.] This also was peculiar to his sacrifice; and to that for the whole congregation (ver. 17).

Pour all the blood of the bullock] That is, all the rest of the blood which remained after the sprinkling before the mercy-seat; and the tipping of the horns of the bullock.

At the bottom of the altar] Where, after the building of the temple, there were two holes; one on the west side of the altar, the other on the south (as the Jews tell us in Middoth, cap. 3, sect. 2), by which it is conveyed into a canal under ground, through which it ran into the brook Kidron. And there was only this difference (they say) about these two holes, that the blood of the sin-offering (any part of which was carried into the most holy place) was poured out only into that on the west side of the foundation of the altar. And, if we may believe the Jews, the gardeners bought this blood of those that were the treasurerers of the temple, to enrich their ground with it, as Constantine L’Empereur there observes. And while they were in the wilderness, and all the time they had only movable tabernacle, it is most likely there were receptacles made under ground, with conveyances to some distant place, where it sank into the earth, or was covered with dust, as other blood is commanded to be (xxvii. 13).

For Maimonides thinks the pouring out the blood (so that it might not remain in one place) which is constantly and strictly required by the law, was in opposition to an idolatrous custom of the old Zabili who made a collection of the blood in a vessel, or in a little pit, about which they sat, and ate the flesh, imagining their gods feasted upon the blood; as I noted before out of Maimonides (More Nevech, par. iii. cap. 46).

Which is at the door] For there was the place of it, as hath been observed, Exod. xi. 6.

Ver. 8.] All that follows in this and the two next verses (ver. 9, 10), is the same that was ordered to be done about peace-offerings, as appears from ver. 10. See therefore the foregoing chapter, ver. 2—5.

Ver. 11.] This sacrifice was so laborious, to work in them a greater detestation of sin; which was aggravated by the quality of the person that committed it. And Nachmanides hath an observation, which (in some parts of it, at least) is very remarkable; "That all a man doth being performed in words, in works, or thoughts, God commanded them, when they brought an offering for sin, that they should lay their hands on it, which had respect to the works they had done; and make confession over it, which had respect to their words; and burn the inwards and kidneys, which are the organs of thoughts and desires; the legs, also, had a respect to a man’s hands and feet, by which he doth all his work; and the blood that was sprinkled on the altar signified his own blood. So that while a man did all these things, he was put in mind how he had sinned against God, both in soul and body, and deserved to have his blood shed, and his body burnt; unless the mercy of the Creator had accepted a price of redemption for him, viz. a sacrifice; whose blood was for his blood, and his blood for the life; and the legs, also, had a respect to the members of the sacrifice, for the members of his body. By which it appears, that the best sort of Jews had a sense, that the sacrifices for sin were offered to God in their stead, as a ransom for them. And so we Christians are to understand the sacrifice which Christ made of himself, who “gave himself a ransom for us all,” as the apostle speaks, 1 Tim. ii. 6, and our Lord saith the same, Matt. xx. 28, Mark x. 45. Such sacrifices the heathens themselves had, which they called Lustratio, from the word lustrare, which signifies to expiate among the Romans; and that by paying a price. For the ancient poet Ennius (as our excellent Mr. Thorndike hath observed), translating into Latin a Greek tragedy called ‘Exeratoerpa (being taken out of Homer, where he describes the ransom of Hector the captive from Achilles), entitled Hectoris lustra (which shows this is the Latin of λυσταρία, ransom or redemption; and that δόξαντας signifies in the New Testament to deliver by paying a ransom, see his Epilogue, book ii. chap. 27.

Ver. 12. (Carry forth without the camp.) It was not dissected, as the peace-offerings were, because nobody was to partake of any part of it; being a sacrifice for the priest’s own sin. And therefore it was to be carried (though not by himself, but some other person) to be burnt without the camp, to express the abominableness of the sin. This rite, and the carrying the blood within the tabernacle, to be sprinkled before the Lord, were used only in these two cases; of the sin of the high-priest, and of all the people. For of other sin-offerings, the priest might eat (vi. 26), but of this, being for himself, he was not to taste at all, because he was in a state of guilt.
And if the whole congregation of Israel sin through ignorance, and the thing be hid from the eyes of the assembly, and they have done somewhat against any of the commandments of the Lord concerning things which should not be done, and are guilty:

11 When the sin, which they have sinned against it, is known, then the congregation shall offer a young bullock for the sin, and bring him before the tabernacle of the congregation.

Unto a clean place, where the ashes are poured out.]

On the east part of the tabernacle there was a place for the ashes to be thrown into, when they were taken from the altar; which afterward were carried into a clean place, without the camp. And so they were carried out after the temple was built at Jerusalem, at the east gate of the city, into a valley which lay between Jerusalem and Mount Olivet.

Burn him on the wood. Not upon an altar, but in the camp, and upon the ground, to show the odiousness of the sin, as Malchimotes thinks. For as the whole burnt-sacrifices were burnt on the altar, because they were an offering of sweet-smelling savour unto God; so this was burnt without the camp upon the ground, to show that the odour of it was ungrateful and abominable: More Novochim, par. iii. cap. 46, where he also observes, that the beast was entirely burnt, being the destruction of it, so that nothing of it remained, it signified, in like manner, the utter detention of sin, so that it should be remembered no more.

And the bullock being burnt without the camp, I take it to denote, that the people should not suffer for the sin of the priest, which was abolished together with his sacrifice.

The same Malchimotes hath another observation upon the title Zechariah, that there were three places constituted for the burning of holy things. The first was in the sanctuary, as every one knows; the second was in the east of the house (as they called the place round about the court of the sanctuary), where, if any blemish happened to a bullock or a goat, they were brought out of the sanctuary, and burnt in a place called Bira; the third was in this place of the ashes, without the city.

Where the ashes are poured out. This is repeated, that none might presume to take the liberty to burn the bullock in any other place.

Ver. 13. If the whole congregation. The Jews generally understood by the whole congregation, the great Sanhedrim, who represent all the people of Israel. So Malchimotes, in his More Novochim, par. iii. cap. 41, and in his treatise of Sacrifices; and R. Levi, of Barcelana, Peccept. xviii. For they sometimes erred in judgment, and thereby misleading the people, they were bound, when they found their error, to offer this sacrifice. Yet the Talmudists have raised many disputes upon this point, and made various cases; in some of which the house of judgment was bound to offer the sacrifice here appointed, and not they who followed their sentence; and others there were, in which they who followed their sentence were bound, and not the judges themselves. But, if Moses's words be well considered, it will appear, that he speaks of a sin committed by all the people, in doing something which God had forbidden; by making wrong constructions of the law, or by common false opinions, or popular customs. For the whole congregation is here plainly distinguished from the elders of the people (ver. 15), which is certainly the name for their judges and governors. It was Mr. Selden's intention to have treated largely of the sense and notion of this law, as appears by what he saith of it, lib. ii. de Synedriis, cap. 14, n. 4, where he refers his reader to the third book on that subject, for an account of this place. In the beginning of which (cap. i. n. 1) he signifies his intention to explain what the office of the Sanhedrin was, in offering expiatory sacrifices for the whole congregation. Which he repeats again (cap. 10, n. 1), with this addition, that they made this sacrifice in the name of all the people whom they offended as a community. But he did not live to pursue his intentions, being diverted by long digressions about other matters: yet he shows sufficiently his opinion was, that the sacrifice was not offered for the Sanhedrin, but by them for the people.

And the thing be hid from the assembly. They are not sensible of their mistake for the present; but afterward discover it, either by themselves or by their rulers.

And they have done somewhat against any of the commandments. Have offended against some of the negative precepts (as the Jews speak) which forbid such things to be done (see ver. 2).

And are guilty. Are sensible of their guilt.

Ver. 14. When the sin is known. When they have discovered what precept they have violated.

Offer a young bullock. Without blemish, as was required for the sin of the high-priest (ver. 3).

Bring him before the tabernacle. I. e. Cause the bullock to be brought thither, by some of his people, in the name of all the rest.

Ver. 15. And the elders of the congregation shall lay their hands on the bullock before the Lord; and the bullock shall be killed before the Lord:

And the priest that is appointed shall bring of the bullock's blood to the tabernacle of the congregation:

And the priest shall dip his finger in some of the blood, and sprinkle it seven times before the Lord, even before the vail.

Ver. 16. And the priest that is appointed. That is, the high-priest (see ver. 5): All the rest that follows, ver. 16, 17, 18, is exactly the same that is prescribed in the foregoing offering, for the high-priest himself. Only R. Solomon Jarchi hath a nice observation on the next verse, that it is not said in this case (as it is in the former) he shall sprinkle the blood seven times before the vail of the sanctuary, but only before the vail, without the addition of hokkōdet, of the sanctuary, as it is ver. 6. Because, saith he, if the high-priest only sin, the holiness doth not depart; but if all the congregation sin, then it doth depart. As, if a province rebel against a prince, his family stands; but if there be a general defection, he must fall. He hath the like observation upon ver. 22, 23, but it seems too subtle: for in the eighteenth verse Moses only saith, he shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar, without adding of sweet in-18 And he shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar which is before the Lord, that is in the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall pour out all the blood at the bottom of the altar of the burnt offering, which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.
19 And he shall take all his fat from him, and burn it upon the altar.
20 And he shall do with the bullock as he did with the bullock for a sin offering, so shall he do with this: and the priest shall make an atonement for them, and they shall be forgiven them.
21 And he shall carry forth the bullock without the camp, and burn him as he burned the first bullock: it is a sin offering for the congregation.
22 ¶ When a ruler hath sinned, and done somewhat through ignorance against any of the commandments of the Lord his God concerning things which should not be done, and is guilty;

23 Or if his sin, wherein he hath sinned, come to his knowledge; he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a male without blemish:
24 And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the goat, and kill it in the place where they kill the burnt offering before the Lord: it is a sin offering.
25 And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin offering with his finger, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, and shall pour out his blood at the bottom of the altar of burnt offering.
26 And he shall burn all his fat upon the altar, as the fat of the sacrifice of peace offerings: and the priest shall make an atonement for him as concerning his sin, and it shall be forgiven him.
27 ¶ And if any one of the common people

Male without blemish:] It was to be the best of this kind: though not equal to the sacrifice for the high-priest and the whole congregation (see ver. 28).
24. Lay his hand] Of this see ver. 4. Kill it in the place where they kill the burnt offering] Where that was, see chap. i. ver. 11. Neither of the two for mentioned offerings (for the high-priest, or the whole congregation) are ordered to be killed here; but only before the Lord (ver. 14, 15), that is, in any part of the court but that which was proper to the burnt-offering, and the common sin-offering, as it here follows.
It is a sin offering.] And therefore was to be killed where the burnt-offering was; for so it is ordained (vi. 25) that all sin-offerings should be there slain. Which doth not imply that the two former were not sin-offerings, but that they were not of the common sort; as appears by the carrying of their blood into the sanctuary, and burning their flesh without the camp, which are not ordered either in this or in the following sacrifices.
25. The priest shall take of the blood] By dipping his finger into it (ver. 6, 17). Put it upon the horns of the altar] Whereas the blood of the two former was put upon the horns of the golden altar in the sanctuary (ver. 7, 15).
Pour out his blood] See ver. 18.
26. Burn all his fat upon the altar, &c.] See chap. iii. 9. It is not here said what should be done with the flesh; which in the two foregoing offerings is ordered to be burnt without the camp (ver. 12, 21). But in chap. vi. 26, and Num. xviii. 9, 10, the law of the sin-offering is set down to be this, that the priest and his sons should eat it, in the sanctuary, and nowhere else; provided also that they were free from uncleanness (xxii. 4).
The priest shall make an atonement for him.] By this sacrifice his guilt was expiated; which must be understood to be the effect of the sacrifice for the high-priest, though it be not expressed, as it is in that for the whole congregation (ver. 29). It shall be forgiven him.] So that he should not be liable to the punishment of cutting off, as the Jews understand it; who fancy such sins to which that is threatened are here spoken of (see ver. 1). Rather, he was restored to communion with the people of God, from which he was separated while he remained in a known guilt.

and the priest shall make an atonement for him, and it shall be forgiven him.

22 If he bring a lamb for a sin offering, he shall bring it a female without blemish.

23 And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the sin offering, and slay it for a sin offering in the place where they kill the burnt offering.

24 And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin offering with his finger, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, and shall pour out all the blood thereof at the bottom of the altar:

25 And he shall take away all the fat thereof, as the fat is taken away from off the sacrifice of peace offerings; and the priest shall burn it upon the altar for a sweet savour unto the Lord;

If his sin—come to his knowledge:] See how this ought to be translated, ver. 22, 23.

He shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a female without blemish.] Being a common person, less was required of him than of a prince; who was to offer a male (ver. 23), which in all creatures was of greater value than a female, as Maimonides observes; who reckons up three-and-forty offences of this sort, that might be committed imprudently (in his treatise called Schegadeth), in one of which, viz. worshipping an idol ignorantly, the sacrifice was the same for a private man as for the king, or the high-priest, or the priest anointed for war: but in all the other forty-two a female goat or lamb sufficient for a private man (cap. 1, sect. 4). And this sacrifice they call stated, or fixed, because no man offered more nor less, whether rich or poor, man or woman; except only those who ate holy things, or entered into the sanctuary; whose sacrifices were higher or lower, as they speak. And there were three things, if we may believe them, which, though committed by error, were expiated by no sacrifice, viz. blasphemy, neglect of circumcision, and not keeping the passover (so R. Levi of Barcelona, Precept. exix.). Which seems to be an unreasonable opinion, since idolatry committed ignorantly, they say, was comprehended within this law.

Ver. 29.] This verse and the following, with the beginning of ver. 31, contain nothing but what was ordered about the foregoing sacrifice (ver. 24—26).

Ver. 31. For a sweet savour] This is a phrase used concerning burnt-offerings (i. 9, 13), and peace-offerings (iii. 5, 16), but it is not said of any of the foregoing sin-offerings, that the burning of them, or their fat, was for a sweet savour unto the Lord. The reason of which I am not able to give, unless it were to comfort the lowest sort of people with hope of God's mercy, though their offering was mean, in comparison of those offered by others. Abraham gives this reason for it; because a sin of ignorance being a less fault in a common man, it was a sign of great probity in him to bring a sacrifice for the expiation of it: but for the high-priest, or senate, or ruler of the people, to be ignorant of the law, was such a high crime, that it was no commendation to them to bring a sacrifice for their porgy:

Ver. 32. If he bring a lamb, &c.] For which reason God was pleased to accept a lamb, and that a female, of those who were not able to bring a young kid.

Ver. 33.] This and the next verse differ not from the foregoing, and therefore need no explication.

Ver. 35. According to the offerings] Or rather upon the offerings, or after the burnt-offering (see iii. 14).

The priest shall make an atonement.] And if by the same error he had committed several sins, there was a distinct atonement to be made for every one of them: so that if he had committed ignorantly the forty-three offences before mentioned, though it were by one and the same error, he was bound to offer as many expiatory sacrifices (as Maimonides resolves in his foreign treatise Schegadeth, cap. 4). This, and such like things, made this law "a yoke which they were not able to bear," as St. Peter speaks, Acts xvi. 10.

1 He that sinneth in concealing his knowledge, 2 in touching an unclean thing, 4 or in making an oath. 6 His trespass offering, of the flesh, 7 of fowls, 11 or of flour. 14 The trespass offering in sacrifice, and in sins of ignorance.

1 And if a soul sin, and hear the voice of swearing, and is a witness, whether he hath
2 Or if a soul touch any unclean thing, whether it be a carcase of an unclean beast, or a carcase of unclean cattle, or the carcase of unclean creeping things, and if it be hidden from him; he also shall be unclean, and guilty.

3 If he touch the uncleanness of man, whatsoever uncleanness it be that a man shall pronounce with an oath, and it be hid from him; when he knoweth of it, then he shall be guilty.

4 Or if a soul swear, pronouncing with his lips to do evil, or to do good, whatsoever it be.

And Micah's mother sees by her own authority to have adjured her family, as they dreaded the vengeance of the Divine Majesty, to discover if they knew any thing of the eleven hundred shekels of silver, which had been stolen from her (Judg. xvii. 2). In all which cases, men were bound to answer, as much as if they had taken a solemn oath so to do. Insomuch, that our blessed Lord himself, being thus adjured, made an answer to the court of judgment, though before he had stood silent.

Whether he has seen or known of it? Whether he can answer of the matter question; either from his own knowledge, or from the information of credible persons. And if he do not utter it, Declare what he knows, being thus adjured.

Then he shall bear his iniquity. Let him not think it is no offence to suppress the truth, when he is so solemnly admonished to declare it; but offer such a sacrifice for his sin, as is prescribed ver. 1, which belongs to all the following cases. The Jews make four sorts of oaths in their courts, or commerce one with another; as Mr. Selden hath observed out of their writers (lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 11, n. 8), which are rash oaths, vain oaths, (of which they also make four sorts), oaths about trusts (mentioned vi. 2, 3), and this, which they call the oath of testimony, which they say every man was bound to give before the Sanhedrin when he was required. With this distinction about capital and pecuniary causes, that in the latter a man was not bound to come and testify, unless he was cited by the plaintiff, or by the court; but in capital causes, and in such things as the law prohibited (as if a man saw another smite his neighbour), he was bound even on this case and next, without any summons, and give his testimony in court. Yet in this they make some difference, as may be seen in R. Levi Barzelonita, Precept. exx. They who would see more of these several sorts of oaths among the Jews, may find them considered in Sam. Petibus Var. Lectiones, cap. 16. And such a law as this there was ancienly in other countries, that he who saw a crime committed, if he could not hinder it, should be bound, at least, to prosecute the malefactor. So the Egyptian lawgiver stithn concerning theft, which a man saw committed, προστάτικα γε πάντων ἕτος τός ἐκτάσεως, καὶ ἱεράν ταῦτα παροικίας, "to prosecute the law against this crime." So Plato uses the same word ἱεράν, lib. iv. de Legibus, saying that he who knew of such a crime, and was not a τρυπητος, i.e. a person who "and doth not prosecute the person that did it," i.e. αὐτός ἵνα τὸν ἄνθρωπον, "let him be liable to the same punishment." (see Hen. Stephanus's Prefat. ad Fontes Juris Civilis).

Vcr. 2. If a soul touch any unclean thing, &c. The Hebrew doctors expound this of such persons as having touched any of the unclean things, which are mentioned in the next, came into the sanctuary, or did eat of the holy things. Which they gather out of vii. 20, 21, and Numb. xix. 20, where cutting off is threatened to those, who knowingly were so guilty. For otherwise, it was sufficient for a man's expiation, who touched any unclean thing, to wash himself; and his uncleanness lasted only till the evening (see chap. xi. and Numb. xix.). But why may it not be meant of those who neglected to wash themselves, who were to expiate that neglect by a sacrifice.

He also shall be unclean, Obliged to offer the sacrifice prescribed (ver. 6) for eating that which is holy (saiith Rashi) or coming into the sanctuary.

Ver. 3. Or he touch the uncleanness of man. Such uncleanneesses as are mentioned in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth chapters of this book.

And it be hid from him; when he knoweth of it. The words may be translated, "Whether he did it ignorantly, or had some knowledge of it," and yet offended, he shall be obliged to offer the sacrifice mentioned, ver. 6.

Ver. 4. If a soul swear. This the Hebrew doctors expound of that sort of oath which they call futile, or rash; when a man saith he hath done, or will do, or not do, a thing that is in his power to do.

Pronouncing with his lips It was to be uttered in words, and not merely thought in his mind.

To do evil, or to do good. That he hath done a thing, or not done it, of whatsoever kind it be; or that he will, or will not do it. For these four kinds of oaths, of this sort, the Hebrew doctors make, two about things past, and two about things to come (see Selden de Synedr. lib. ii. cap. 11, n. 8). As if he swear that he did eat, or he did not eat of such a meat; did talk, or did not talk with Reuben or Simeon, &c. Rashi thinks by doing good is meant something he shall do; and in his own advantage case, they frequently, by doing evil, we are to understand afflicting himself, or punishing his servant, &c. But it may as well be understood generally of all things whatsoever, which are comprehended under the name of good and evil.

It be hid from him. He did not rightly understand, or consider the thing about which he swore; whether it was in his power, for instance, to do what he swore he would do; or, whether he could lawfully do it; or if through forgetfulness he omitted to do what he might have done. Some interpret these and the following words, as those of the foregoing verse.

He shall be guilty in one of these. Obliged to offer a sacrifice (as it follows, ver. 6), if he have sworn rashly in any of the foregoing instances.

Ver. 5. When it be said, ye shall confess When he laid his hand upon the head of his sacrifice, this confession of his offence, it is likely, was made; without which his sacrifice would have been of no avail: so all the Hebrew doctors understand it; particularly Abarbanel, upon the sixteenth chapter of this book, saith, that "confession was necessary to be added to every sacrifice for sin." For what is more commanded, the same belongs to all sin-offerings, and trespass-offerings also. And, indeed, it was a notion among the heathen them-7 And if he be not able to bring a lamb, then he shall bring for his trespass which he hath committed, two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, unto the Lord; one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering.

8 And he shall bring them unto the priest, who shall offer that which is for the sin offering first, and wring off his head from his neck, but shall not divide it asunder:

9 And he shall sprinkle of the blood of the sin offering upon the side of the altar; and the rest of the blood shall be wrung out at the bottom of the altar: it is a sin offering.

10 And he shall offer the second for a burnt offering, according to the manner: and the priest shall make an atonement for him for his sin which he hath sinned, and it shall be forgiven him.

11 ¶ But if he be not able to bring two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, then he that sinned shall bring for his offering the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour for a sin offering; he shall

Ver. 8. Wring off his head] Or rather, nip it off with his nail (as the Jews explain it, see i. 15), so as not quite to separate it from the body. For that had been to make the sacrifice contemptible (as R. Levi, of Barcelona, gives the reason of it, Precept. exxviii.), the bird looking more handsome with its neck still joined to the body, than without it. And it was fit the sacrifice, even of a poor man, should be as decent as possible; it being sufficient be thus suffered, without increasing his affliction by the mean and abject form of his sacrifice.

Ver. 9. He shall sprinkle of the blood] Some of the blood, which ran out of itself, as the priest held it by the neck, where he nipped it, he was to sprinkle upon the side of the altar. And then he was to press out the rest of the blood (when as much was run out as would of itself, by that nip) at the bottom of the altar; where they were wont to pour out the blood of the sin-offering (iv. 7, 18, 25, 34).

It is a sin offering.] Therefore the blood was there pressed out: whereas, in burnt-offerings of a bird, we read only of pressing or squeezing out the blood at the side of the altar (i. 15). But it was not to be done with the flesh; but it is plain, from vi. 26, that the priest was to have it; the blood only being offered to God.

Ver. 10. He shall offer the second for a burnt offering.] Prescribed in the first chapter, ver. 15.

The priest shall make an atonement for him] Some gather from hence, that the burnt-offering was also an expiatory. But it is not so evident from it, that these words seem to me to relate only to the foregoing offering (ver. 8, 9). Though this may be concluded from hence: that the sin-offering was not accepted for his expiation; unless this burnt-offering followed as a thankful acknowledgment made to God for his goodness.

Ver. 11. But if he be not able, &c.] This was still a more merciful provision for the poor; who were not so able of offering a beast or a bird, as not to content themselves with offering the smallest thing that God would accept. So R. Levi, of Barcelona, observes, that God having such compassion on men's poverty, it did not become them to strain themselves to offer more than they were able; for so they might have been it were the like of that latter, if, after a man had set aside a little money to buy this quantity of fine flour, his estate was bettered, he was then bound (as Maimonides saith, in the treatise called Scheggagot) to add so much to it, as would buy the birds before prescribed. And in like manner, if he had designed to buy birds, and on a sudden grew richer, he was to procure a lamb or a kid. On the contrary, if a man had set apart money to buy a bullock for his sin-offering, and unexpectedly grew poor, he might buy two turtles, or young pigeons, and by them redeem his money so consecrated, &c. (cap. 10).

The tenth part of an ephah of fine flour] Neither more nor less; which was but a small quantity (see Exod. xvi. 30), because God would not have frankincense thereon: for it is a sin offering.

his creature oppressed, as the same author observes
(Ps. cxvii. xxxix.)

He shall put no oil upon it, neither shall be put any frankincense. In commination of his poverty, God required only a little flour, which every one might easily get, to offer without any oil to it, which was more costly; and also had something of magnificence in it (kings and priests being appointed) and therefore not becoming the meanness, or the grief and humility, of the person that brought this offering. For which reason frankincense was also omitted, being a pleasant thing; and not fit to be added to an offering for sin:

which was offensive to God. To this purpose the same also by the heathen; for Pliny saith, in his preface to Vespasian before his Natural History, Mola tantum

Ver. 12. Bring it to the priest.] Confessing his sin to him (as is ordered, ver. 5), for which he desired this offering might be accepted.

Shall take his handful of it.] For an acknowledgment of his fault, and as a caution to him hereafter.

Ver. 13. The priest shall make an atonement for him]
With one of these three forementioned sacrificial meats, either with a lamb, or with two turtles or young pigeons, or with fine flour. For as Rasi hath observed there are three sorts of men; rich, poor, and very poor:
and so three sorts of offerings are prescribed in this chapter, suitable to each of their abilities.

The remnant shall be the priest's, as a meat offering.] See chapter the second, ver. 2, 3, where the whole meat-offering (except one handful) is given to the priest; who had nothing at all of some of the sin-offerings, mentioned in the foregoing chapter (ver. 12, 21), which were entirely consumed.

Ver. 14.] Here begin the orders which were given to Moses about another sort of sacrifice, near of kin to the former; but delivered, it is likely, at some other time; after he had written down the foregoing laws about sacrifices in general (chaps. 1-11).

Ver. 15. If a soul confess a trespass.] In the Hebrew this is a different phrase from what had been hitherto used, signifying another sort of guilt.

And sin through ignorance, in the holy things of the Lord.] By applying to his own private use any thing that was dedicated to God (as Maimonides expounds it in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 48), which might be committed in the payment of tithes, and in first-fruits, and the first-born of cattle, or meddling with that part of the sacrifice which belonged to the priest alone. Which things he that committed presumptuously, was to be cut off (Numb. xv. 30), but if ignorantly, he was to do as here is directed in this verse. But these words seem to be particularly restrinted to the last of these things now mentioned (eating any part of the sacrifice which belonged to the priest alone, xiii. 11), and the end of this law (R. Levi Barzelonita speaks, Precept. cxxi.) was to excite fear and reverence in all those who approached unto holy things.

He shall bring for his trespass—a ram without blemish] As a sheep was a more noble species among the Greeks than a goat: so a ram was of a greater value among sheep than a female: and therefore this sacrifice was more costly than the sin-offering mentioned ver. 6.

13 And the priest shall make an atonement for him as touching his sin that he hath sinned in one of these, and it shall be forgiven him: and the remnant shall be the priest's, as a meat offering.
14 And the Loaves spake unto Moses, saying, 15 If a soul commit a trespass, and sin through

With thy estimation.] Besides his sacrifice, he was to make satisfaction in money, according as the priest should esteem the damage. For that is the meaning of with thy estimation; according to the value thou shalt set upon the thing, which he applied to his own use.

By shekels of silver.] At least two shekels, as the Jewish doctors resolve.

After the shekels of the sanctuary.] See Exod. xxx.
13. The Jews were thus confined to these rises, and such as are mentioned ver. 8, 9, in the rest of these prescriptions, that there might be no room for idolarous ceremonies; nor might men among themselves be left at liberty to invent impious or frivolous ways of worship; and that the obedience of good men might be also exercised in these minute matters; and the attempt of wicked people be the more apparent in refusing to comply with these known laws of God.

For a trespass offering.] The Hebrew word asham, which we translate trespass-offering, is so near of kin to chattah, which we translate sin-offering, that one of them is sometimes used for the other, as I observed upon ver. 6, yet there is a real difference between them; though it be not easy to determine wherein it consists. For the greatest men differ in their opinion about the quality of the offences, for which these two kinds of sacrifices were to be offered:
some saying that the offences for which asham was offered, were inferior to those for which chattah was offered; which is the opinion of Maimonides in his More Nevochim (par. iii. cap. 46). Others, on the contrary, think, that the offences which were expiated by asham, were more grievous than those expiated by chattah; which is the opinion of no less a man than the deservedly admired Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 33). Where he adds that the former sort of sins were committed knowingly; the other only ignorantly. For so the LXX. translate chattah by ἀδικία, which seems to denote a fault committed by accident, and ἀσάμηνα, ἀπορήσαντα, πολυμούσα, which carries in it the notion of something premeditated and designed. But this is directly cor-
be offered by the law, but for such offences as were so committed against God, that their neighbours also were injured by them. As in the case of those who did offer a trespass offering (vii. 2), such was here done: the priests were damaged; and of those mentioned vi. 2—4, and such as lay with a bond-woman betrothed to another (xix. 20, 21), which are all the cases belonging to this matter; excepting that of the Nazarite defiled by the dead (Numb. vi. 17), and of the leper (iv. 12), who were to be purged with a sin-offering, as well as with a trespass-offering, and therefore not to be considered in this manner. See Dr. Outram, lib. i. de Sacrificiis, cap. 13, n. 8, and Samuel Petitius's Variae Lectiones, cap. 22, who hath said the same, but not so fully and distinctly. If this do not satisfy, yet it is plain the sacrifices which go by this name of trespass-offerings, and the rites also about them, were so different, that they are sufficient to distinguish them from the sin-offerings. For though lambs were admitted for trespass-offerings, which were not used at all in any sin-offerings. And the blood of the sin-offerings was put upon the altar (as was noted in the foregoing chapter, ver. 7, 18, 25), but that of the trespass-offerings was sprinkled round about upon the altar (vii. 2). Sin-offerings also were offered for the whole congregation of Israel (iv. 13), but trespass-offerings only for the guilty persons, which made Bonfrerei (I suppose) after a long discussion of this matter, to conclude that the difference between sin and trespass consisted only in the sacrifices which were offered for them. See him upon the fourth chapter of this book, ver. 1.

Ver. 16. And shall add the fifth part thereto, &c.] Besides the compensation mentioned in the foregoing verse, for the damage that was done, according to the valuation made by the priest, there was a fifth part more to be added thereunto, and given to the priest who had suffered the damage.

And the priest shall make an atonement for him.] The atonement was not made, nor forgiveness obtained, till full satisfaction for the wrong had been made.

Ver. 17. If a soul sin, and commit any of these things, &c.] Did eat any of the holy things before mentioned, which God forbade any but the priests to eat.

Though he wist it not.] i. e. Be not certain whether they were holy or no. For the Hebrews generally call this asham talui, a dubious trespass-offering: being in a matter about which a man was in suspense, whether he sinned or not. For persons in such cases were not in the congregation, and had no officiate; for his compensation mentioned in the foregoing verse, for the damage that was done, according to the valuation made by the priest, there was a fifth part more to be added thereunto, and given to the priest who had suffered the damage.

Yet he is guilty.] He shall be obliged to offer this sort of sacrifice. Which was ordained (saith R. Levi Barzelen, Precept, cxxxiii.) to make men cautious and fear to sin; and to attend diligently in all their actions, that they transgressed not the laws of God.

Ver. 18. He shall bring a ram without blemish, &c.] The offering before appointed (ver. 15, &c.) with this difference only, that no fifth part was in this case to be added, because it was not certain whether he had transgressed or no.

Concerning his ignorance wherein he erred and wist it not.] Did not know whether he had offended or not; which distinguishes this from the sin of ignorance, mentioned ver. 15.

It shall be forgiven him.] But if he afterward came to have a certain knowledge of his offence, he was not excused by this dubious offering (as Rasi observes), but must offer the same sacrifice, as in the case of trespass.

Ver. 19. It is a trespass offering.] In this case a sacrifice shall be offered, as well as in a certain trespass.

He hath certainly trespassed against the Lord.] The words in the Hebrew are, asham asham hajlova; which I think, should be translated, "a trespass-offering certainly unto the Lord." That is, in this doubtful case, let him take a sure course, by offering the sacrifice here prescribed. For though neither of these sacrifices, nor sin-offerings were to be voluntary (which was proper only to whole burnt-offerings and peace-offerings), yet the very suspicion of a guilt required a sacrifice. As for all those offences which might be committed by men who had no sense of guilt or suspicion of them, they were expiated by the sacrifices which were offered for the whole congregation, at certain stated times: but no particular person was to offer either sin-offering or trespass-offering of his own accord, unless he knew or feared he had contracted some guilt.

I cannot think fit to conclude this chapter, without taking notice how Jonathan paraphrases these last words of it, who instance in a passage of the Targum (which hath only Jehovah (or the Lord): for which I can see no reason at all, if there had not been a notion among them of more persons than one who was Jehovah. It doth not always, indeed, carry this significiation in it; but there are very many places where, by the Word of the Lord, cannot be meant a word spoken by the Lord, or any thing done by any person, speaking or acting, &c. who is the Lord. There is a famous instance of it in Gen. xxviii. 20, 21, where Jacob's vow is thus translated by Onkelos: "Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If the Word of the Lord will be with me, and keep me, &c., then shall the Word of the Lord be my God." Where the Word of the Lord is so plainly made the object of his adoration, that it evidently shows they had a notion in those days when Onkelos lived (which was about our Saviour's time), of more persons than one who was the Lord. The Jerusalem Targum also speaks this so clearly, that one cannot but be something amazed to meet with such expressions in it, as these upon Gen. iii. 22, "The Word of the Lord said, Behold, Adam whom I have created, is my only 18 And he shall bring a ram without blemish out of the flock, with thy estimation, for a trespass-offering, unto the priest: and the priest shall make an atonement for him concerning his begotten in this world; as I am the only-begotten in the heavens above." Which may fairly induce a belief that St. John used a known language of those times, when he declared our blessed Saviour's Godhead under the name of the Word, "who was in the beginning with God, and was God" (John i. 1).
CHAPTER VI.

CHAPTER VI.

1 The trespass offering for sins done wilfully. 8 The law of the burnt offering, and of the meat offering. 19 The offering at the consecration of a priest. 24 The law of the sin offering.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
2 If a soul sin, and commit a trespass against the Lord, and lie unto his neighbour in that which was delivered him to keep, or in fellowship, or in a thing taken away by violence, or hath deceived his neighbour;
3 Or have found that which was lost, and lieth concerning it, and sweareth falsely; in any of these that a man doeth, sinning therein:

Ver. 1.] What here follows belonging unto the same with that which went before, it is likely, was spoken at the same time. And these words signify, that the Lord further spake unto Moses, what concerned trespass-offerings.

Ver. 2. If a soul sin, and commit a trespass] The same sort of expression is used in the beginning of this law, concerning the trespass-offering, ver. 15. Which some translate privativa, or act insincerely.

Against the Lord.] The Sovereign of the world; who was peculiarly affronted by the following sins; especially by swearing falsely, which was calling him to bear witness to a lie.

Lie unto his neighbour.] Deny the trust which was committed to him: and that when he was brought upon his oath to deliver the truth, as appears by the next verse. For this is the instance of that sort of oath, which the Jews call the oath about a thing deposited (see v. 1). For there being no witness of what was done between two friends or neighbours, who trusted one another in such matters, but God alone; they appealed unto him, from whom nothing could be hid. And this oath, the Jews say, was governed by another, which they call the oath of the testimony: which a man was not bound to give, unless he was advised to it by the court of judgment: and so it was in the oath about the things deposited; he was not guilty who was advised by private persons, and denied it; but he that denied it before the court. So they resolve in Halich Olam, par. iv. cap. 2.

Or in fellowship.] To carry on a common trade, in joint stock; or (as others understand it) in any thing for which he gave his hand unto another: for so the Hebrew words are, putting of the hand, as contracts are oft times made; which if a man afterward denied, he fell under the guilt here mentioned. And there is some reason to think, that this is much of the same nature with the former; because, when he speaks of restitution (ver. 4), this is not repeated. And therefore it seems to be included in that which was deposited with another: whether it were money, called here pikehon; or any other goods, called tesumath jat. They that would see more opinions about these words, putting of the hand, may consult Const. L'Empereur, in his annotations on Baba kama, cap. 9, sect. 7.

Vol. 1. p. 147.
5 Or all that about which he hath sworn falsely; he shall even restore it in the principal, and shall add the fifth part more thereto, and give it unto him to whom it appertaineth, in the day of his trespass offering.

6 And he shall bring his trespass offering unto the Lord, a ram without blemish out of the flock, with his estimation, for a trespass offering, unto the priest:

7 And the priest shall make an atonement for him before the Lord: and it shall be forgiven him for any thing of all that he hath done in trespassing therein.

8 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

9 Command Aaron and his sons, saying, This is the law of the burnt offering: It is the burnt offering, because of the burning upon the altar all night unto the morning, and the fire of the altar shall be burning in it.

10 And the priest shall put on his linen gar-make such great restitution: but here of such as, touched with a sense of their sin came voluntarily and acknowledged their theft, or other crime, of which nobody convicted them, or at least confessed it freely when they were adjured; and therefore were condemned to suffer a lesser punishment, and to expiate their guilt by a sacrifice. See L'Empecur on Bava kama, cap. 7, sect. 1, and cap. 9, sect. 1, 5, 7, where he observes very judiciously, that this interpretation is confirmed by Num. v. 7, where the first words may be translated, "If they shall confess their sin that they have done," and this seems to be more reasonable that the account which Maimonides gives of this matter in his More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 41, where, expounding these words, which he took violently, of an open robber, he gives these reasons why he was not punished so much as a thief, but restored only the principal, with a fifth part; because rapine happens seldom, but theft often; for it cannot be committed so easily as theft; and is done openly and manifestly, whereas theft is committed more secretly: so that a man may be aware (he imagines) of a robber, and defend his goods against him, better than against a secret thief. Yet this is better than the account of R. Johannes f. Zachel (mentioned by J. Coch upon the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 7, p. 371), that a mere thief feares more men than God; but a robber fears both alike.

Ver. 5. He shall even restore it in the principal.] The same numerical thing which he took away, if it still remains in his possession unaltered; or else the just price of it: as R. Levi Barzelonita expounds it, Preecept. cxxv. And the Jews pretend to such scrupulosity in this matter, that they say a man, who was to have shared in his father's estate, from whom he had taken something by robbery, was to restore it before the division was made, and not by determining it to make his share greater than it ought to be (see Bava kama, cap. 9, sect. 9).

Shall add the fifth part more] The Jews have many subtleties about this, as may be seen there, sect. 6, 7. The plain sense is, that he should compensate the loss which the right owner might have sustained (by wanting the use of his goods so long as the other had detained them in his hand), by adding a full fifth part of the principal, as an amends for the wrong. Yet, if he had really forgotten that he had found such a thing as he was charged withal, at the time he denied it upon oath, he was not bound to pay the fifth part more, nor to offer the expiatory sacrifice, though he really was possessed of the thing: as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Synedr. cap. 11, p. 506.

Give it unto him to whom it appertaineth.] If he hath stolen from a man the smallest piece of money, which the Jews call peruta, and had forsworn it, they fancy he was bound to restore it to the owner himself, though he lived as far off as Media; and it would not suffice to give it to his son or his attorney, whom he had left to act for him. Yet they are something humoursome in these absurdities; for they do not tie a man to go so far to pay the fifth part, though in a case where it was more than a peruta (see Bava kama, cap. 9, sect. 5, 6).

In the day of his trespass offering.] Or, in the day of his trespass; that is, as soon as he acknowledged his guilt, as this word I showed, ver. 4, is to be interpreted. And this agrees with what our blessed Saviour requires (Matt. v. 23).

Ver. 6. A ram without blemish] This the Hebrews call an offering for a certain guilt; as that, v. 15, was for a dubious.

With thy estimation, &c.] R. Levi, of Barcelona, interprets it, a ram worth two shekels (Precept. cxxviv).

Ver. 7. The priest shall make an atonement for him] The offender was not to think he was cleared by making restitution, and adding the fifth part, whereby his neighbour might well be satisfied: but whithal, this sacrifice was necessary for his expiation, without which no satisfaction was made to the Divine Majesty. The Jews themselves also think that this was prescribed, to make them more sensible of their sin, and to render it more odious unto them; as the same author observes.

Ver. 8.] Here the Hebrews begin a new section of the law, as well as a new chapter (as we call it); for the first seven verses plainly belong to the matter of the foregoing chapter. And it is reasonable to think, that the following precepts were given at a distinct time from the former (see iv. 1), being about a different matter. For having declared what offerings the people should bring to the Lord, he now gives instructions to the priests, how they should manage the several offerings that were brought.

Ver. 9. Command Aaron and his sons.] As before he bids Moses speak unto the children of Israel (Lev. i. 2, iv. 2), because the law he then gave concerned them: so now he bids him command Aaron and his sons what to do; and acquaints them with the laws, that is, the rites they should observe in offering the several sacrifices before directed to be made.

This is the law of the burnt offering.] He mentions that first, which was first delivered, and was the principal offering, being purely in honour of God; whereas the other was occasioned by men's sins, or the benefits he had bestowed on them.

It is the burnt offering.] He explains what burnt-offering he chiefly means, viz. the daily sacrifice; which was the principal burnt-offering, according to which all other offerings of that kind were to be regulated.

Because of the burning upon the altar all night unto the morning.] Or, for the burning upon the altar, &c. This was the reason of its name, because it was burning on the altar from the evening (at which the Jews began this day) till the morning. For which purpose the priests watched all night, and put the sacrifice upon the altar piece by piece, that it might be consumed by a slow and gentle fire. As for the morning sacrifice, it is not here mentioned, because it was consumed by a quicker fire; that there might be room for other sacrifices that were commonly offered ment, and his linen breeches shall he put upon his flesh, and take up the ashes which the fire hath consumed with the burnt offering on the altar, and he shall put them beside the altar.

11 And he shall put off his garments, and put on other garments, and carry forth the ashes without the camp unto a clean place.

after it (as appears from ver. 12), and were only offered in the morning, not at night. But if there were no other sacrifices to succeed it in the morning, then, it is very likely, that it was also kept burning till the evening sacrifice; that God's altar might always have meat upon it.

And the fire of the altar shall be burning in it.] Or, For the fire of the altar, &c. So it should be translated: unless we translate the last word not in it, but by it. And the fire of the altar shall be burning (i.e. be fed or maintained) by it.

Ver. 10. Linen garments.] Mentioned Exod. xxviii. 40.

His linen breeches shall he put upon his flesh.] To cover his secret parts, as appears from Exod. xxviii. 42. Thus the fire hath consumed with the burnt offering on the altar. For the word asher, which we here translate which, signifies also when; and is so translated by us, iv, 22. Or else the sense must be, The ashes into which the fire hath consumed the burnt-offering. Or, to make good our present translation, a few words must be added, in this manner: The ashes (of the wood) which the fire hath consumed with the burnt-offering.

He shall put them beside the altar.] On the east part of it, as far as might be from the most holy place (see i. 16). For this was most suitable to the glory of the house of God (saith R. Levi, of Barcelona), and the fire would burn better when the altar was cleared from the ashes.

Ver. 11. He shall put off his garments.] Those before named, and put on other garments. It is a question among the Jews, whether he mean his common raiment, or some other garments, not holy, and yet not quite common, but of middle nature. It is most likely that the carrying the ashes out of the tabernacle, being not a holy action, as they were not performed for the burnt-offering, which the fire had consumed; wherein they took them from the altar; so they did it in the common habit, which they wore when they did not minister. Yet Rasi thinks this was not absolutely necessary, but only fitting and seemly: it being indecent to do this work in the same garments wherein they served at the altar. And the ashes having been upon the altar, there are those (as I said) who fancy this was not a work fit to be performed in their common garments; and therefore have devised a habit of less dignity than those garments wherein they ministered, which they used when they carried out the ashes. Thus Maimonides himself, and others, mentioned by Mr. Selden, lib. iii. de Synod, cap. 11, n. 6; where he likewise observes, that Chisdani is of opinion, that such of the family of the priests as were both excluded from their ministry in the sanctuary and from wearing the holy garments, by reason of some defect in their bodies, were permitted to perform this office of carrying away the ashes.

Carry forth the ashes without the camp.] See iv. 12. The forementioned Rasi will have it, that they needed not to take away all the ashes every day; but only a showful, which they laid beside the altar. And when the hollow place of the altar was so full that there was no room to lay on the wood, they were bound to empty it, and carry all the ashes away.

12 And the fire upon the altar shall be burning in it; it shall not be put out: and the priest shall burn wood on it every morning, and lay the burnt offering in order upon it; and he shall burn thereon the fat of the peace offerings.

13 The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar; it shall never go out.

Ver. 12. The fire upon the altar shall be burning in it; it shall not be put out.) This precept is repeated again in the next verse; as it was mentioned once before (ver. 9). For which there is a just reason, as Abarbinel makes account. For in the ninth verse he requires, that the wood for the evening sacrifice should be so ordered and attended, that the fire might be kept in till the morning. And then, here, in this verse, he requires there should such care be used in taking away the ashes, that the fire might still remain, and not be extinguished. After which, speaking of the morning sacrifice, in the latter part of this verse, he requires in the next (ver. 13), that such a quantity of wood should be laid on the altar, when they offered it, that the fire might be kept in till the evening sacrifice; or rather, that so much wood as the burnt-offering brought beside the daily burn-offering, the priests should still add more wood, that the fire might not be put out by that means, but be able to devour them.

The priest shall burn wood on it] The Hebrew word for wood being in the plural number, R. Levi of Barcelona concludes there were more bundles than one brought in every day. And from this place (and i. 7) he gathers there were three. The first of which he calls the great heap; with which the daily sacrifice, and the rest for which there was occasion, were offered: of which he thinks Moses speaks in the ninth verse of this chapter. The second was lesser, which was laid at the side of the other, that they might have coals for the burning incense: and this he thinks intended here. And the third was merely to keep in the fire perpetually; of which he thinks Moses speaks in the next verse. The Misne also tells us, that there being seven gates to the great court of the sanctuary, three on the north, and as many on the south, and one at the east; the first on the south was called the gate of burning, because at that gate they brought in the wood which was burnt daily, and actually on the altar (see Codex Middoth, cap. i. sect. 4).

Burn thereon the fat of the peace offerings.] This fat of the peace-offerings was to be burnt together with the burnt-offering, and not separate from it: by which means the burnt-offering was the sooner consumed, and more room was made for other occasional sacrifices.

Ver. 13. The fire shall ever be burning.] This fire was not kindled by the priests, but by God himself; who sent it from heaven to consume the first sacrifice that was offered by Aaron (ix. ult.) From which time they were bound to take care, that it never went out; that so their sacrifices might be constantly offered by celestial fire: because it was the continuation of that fire which was sent from heaven, by a continual addition of fuel, whereby it was preserved. And so it continued, as the Jews affirm, till the captivity of Babylon; and after it, as some of them would have us believe (who fancy it was preserved in a pit, by the care of some religious priests, till their return), though against the common tradition among them, which is, that there was no sacred fire in the second temple; for they reckon this among the five things which were wanting there, and had been in the first. And as for the constant continuance of this fire, there was care taken that wood should be laid up in the 14 ¶ And this is the law of the meat offering: the sons of Aaron shall offer it before the Lord, before the altar.

15 And he shall take of it his handful, of the flour of the meat offering, and of the oil thereof, and all the frankincense which is upon the meat offering, and shall burn it upon the altar for a sweet savour, even the memorial of it, unto the Lord.

16 And the remainder thereof shall Aaron and his sons eat: with unleavened bread shall it be eaten in the holy place; in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation they shall eat it.

17 It shall not be baken with leaven. I have given it unto them for their portion of my offerings made by fire; it is most holy, as is the sin offering, and as the trespass offering.

18 All the males among the children of Aaron shall eat of it. It shall be a statute for ever in your generations concerning the offerings of the Lord made by fire: every one that toucheth them shall be holy.

sons eat.] If they had no pollution upon them, xxii. 6 (see chap. ii. 5). The reason of the precept was (as R. Levi Barzel, observes, Precept. cxxxiii.), that it preserved the dignity of the sacrifice to have it eaten only by the priests; and by them (I may add, only in the holy place, and not carried out from thence, as it here follows.

With unleavened bread] There is nothing in the Hebrew text to answer unto the word with, which makes the sense unaccountable, that otherwise is easy and natural, if we translate it as the Hebrew words plainly signify, unleavened it shall be eaten, see x. 13. In the holy place.] There was a room in the court of the priests, where they ate these holy things, as Kuchenberg, and the learned Huetius, have observed. Which may be confirmed out of Numb. xviii. 10, where the most holy place can signify nothing but the court of the priests, as L'Empereur rightly understands it in his Annot. upon Middoth. cap. 2, sect. 6.

In the court—they shall eat it.] As the priests did eat it in their own court, so their male children had place in the court of the Israelites wherein to eat it (x. 12, 13). And this is, as I have observed, the reason the Lord, because this was a part of the tabernacle: as was also the court of the women, where there was a place for the priests' daughters to eat, as well as their sons, of the firstlings that were offered to the Lord (Numb. xviii. 19).

Ver. 17. It shall not be baken with leaven.] There were two little rooms at the east gate of the court of the temple, called the gate of Nicander; one of which was a vestry for the priests to put on their garments when they went to minister; and the other was for baking this flour, and that mentioned ver. 21. So they tell us in Middoth, cap. 1, sect. 4. And therefore it is ordered to be baked without leaven, because it was a part of the Lord's sacrifice, and being offered unleavened (chapter second, ver. 11), the remainder must needs be unleavened also, because the whole was God's; and the priests could have it no other ways than it was offered unto him.

I have given it unto them for their portion.] That is, of the meat-offerings before mentioned.

It is most holy, &c.] This is the reason why it was not to be leavened, to be eaten out of the holy place (see ch. ii. ver. 10).

As is the sin offering.] See ver. 26, and vii. 6.

Ver. 18. All the males among the children of Aaron shall eat of it.] And none but they, because it was a thing most holy.

It shall be a statute for ever.] That is, as long as the law about sacrifices shall last. Every one that toucheth them shall be holy.] According to this translation of these words, the meaning is, that it was not sufficient to be descended of priests, and to be males, but they were also to be free from any legal defilement, who were admitted to eat of this offering (xxii. 6). But these very words, which we here translate every one, in the twenty-seventh verse we translate whatsoever; and then the
CHAPTER VI.

19 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

20 This is the offering of Aaron and of his sons, which they shall offer unto the Lord in the day when he is anointed; the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour for a meat offering perpetual, half of it in the morning, and half thereof at night.

21 In a pan it shall be made with oil; and when it is baken, thou shalt bring it in: and the baken pieces of the meat offering shalt thou offer for a sweet savour unto the Lord.

meaning is, “Every thing that toucheth them shall be made holy by them.” That is, the very dishes into which such holy things were put, or the spoons, or knives, wherewith they were eaten, were never to be employed to any other use (see Exod. xxix. 37).

Ver. 19.] At the same time the Lord gave direction about another offering, near of kin to the former; but not yet mentioned.

Ver. 20. This is the offering of Aaron and of his sons. The Jews call this a minchah of intiation; which every high-priest, and every other priest (as they understand it), were bound to offer, when they were consecrated; and the high-priest to continue every day of his life, as he lived. So Abarbinel, in his preface to this book (sect. 2), reckoning the various sorts of meat-offerings, makes this the fourth kind; which the high-priest offered every day, and every other priest once in his life, viz. when he first was admitted to minister at the altar, at the age of twenty years. For both these meat-offerings, saith he, are comprehended in this verse. But it may as well be understood only of Aaron, and his successors in the priesthood, of whom the following words seem to speak, and not of the common priests.

In the day when he is anointed. The Hebrew word before may be translated from the day; and so the Jews understand it, that he was to make this oblation, not only upon the day of his consecration, but ever after (as I said), every day, as long as he continued in the priesthood. And so the next words seem to explain it.

The tenth part of an ephah of fine flour for a meat offering perpetual. The high-priest, saith Josephus (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10), sacrificed twice every day at his own charges; and then he describes this very offering, which was distinct from that which attended the oblation every day (which see in the next verse, &c.). As also the manner of this meat-offering, and by the manner of ordering it. For that seems to have been raw flour, mixed with oil; but this baken, as it follows in the next verse (see Exod. xxix. 40, 41). The reason why it is here mentioned, is, because it was a minchah (or meat-offering), of whose rites Moses is treating; and this is an exception from that rule.

Ver. 21. In a pan shall it be made with oil. With three logs of oil; as the Jews determine. When it is baken. See ver. 17.

Thou shalt bring it in. Unto the altar. And the baken pieces—shall thou offer, &c. If it was a meat-offering of the high-priest, it was divided into twelve pieces (as Maimonides saith); if of a common priest (for they shall have both to be included in this law) then into ten pieces; which were so exactly divided, that half of them were offered in the morning, and the other half in the evening. And the handful of frankincense (which they say was offered with them) was in like manner divided, and burnt on the altar (Muze Korban, cap. 13).

Ver. 22. The priests of his sons—shall offer it. What he had said of Aaron and his sons in general (ver. 20), he now particularly requires of every son of his, that should succeed him in his office. For which there was the greater necessity, because (as R. Levi of Barcelona understands it, Priscept. cxxxiv.) the high-priest was an ambassador between the Israelites and their heavenly Father (by whom their prayers were offered to God, and who made reconciliation for them), and therefore should be bound, in all reason, to offer a perpetual sacrifice twice every day, for the constant needs of the congregation; and to apply his mind to this (as he speaks), that he and they might be the better for it.

It shall be wholly burnt. In which it differed from other meat-offerings, as will appear in the next verse.

Ver. 23. For every meat offering for the priest. Or of the priest. This may seem to relate to every common priest; who were not all bound to offer this sacrifice every day, but only he who did it in the name of all the rest, viz. the priest who offered the daily burnt-sacrifice. He may be well thought to have been obliged to this by which means this meat-offering was offered to God every day, by one or other of them, and never omitted. But Abarbinel (as I noted before, ver. 20) thinks, that only the high-priest was bound to offer this meat-offering every day; and every other priest once in his life, viz. when he began his ministry.

Shall be wholly burnt: it shall not be eaten. The priests had all the meat-offerings which were brought by the people, except one handful which was offered to the Lord (see chapter second, ver. 2, 3). But of their own meat-offerings they were not to taste, but wholly burnt them on the altar. For it had not been seemly for him, both to offer unto God, and to eat of it as if it were his own; as Maimonides speaks (par. ii. More Nathan). But R. Levi Barzilai does give the reason (Priscept, exli). the scope of the sacrifice being to raise the mind of him that offered it unto God, it was not fit he should think of eating any part of his own offering; which would have taken his mind off from God.

Ver. 24.] He added further several things concerning other offerings; which perhaps were delivered at the same time with the foregoing; being still concerning the priests (see ver. 8, 9). And therefore the next verse begins thus, “Speak unto Aaron and his sons, saying.”

Ver. 25. This is the law of the sin offering. That is, for particular persons; that for the priests themselves being governed by another law. For it is plain, that, in the fourth chapter, he distinguishes the two kinds: one, whose blood was carried into the sanctuary, and the flesh of it burnt entirely without the camp (ver. 7, 8, &c. and here ver. 30), and another, whose blood was not carried into the sanctuary; the flesh of which the priests were to eat, as is here directed.

Where the burnt offering is killed. See iv. 24, 29, 31. It is most holy. This is the reason of what follows. offering be killed before the Lord: it is most holy.

26 The priest that offereth it for sin shall eat it: in the holy place shall it be eaten, in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation.

27 Whosoever shall touch the flesh thereof shall be holy: and when there is sprinkled of the blood thereof upon any garment, thou shalt wash that whereon it was sprinkled in the holy place.

that none might eat of it but those who were holy to the Lord.

Ver. 26. The priest that offereth it for sin, shall eat it.] The flesh of this sin-offering fell to the share of him who offered the sacrifice that day; and to his male children: though he might invite any other priests, and their sons, to partake with him, if he pleased; as appears from ver. 29. I need not add, that the imnimur, as the Hebrews call them, were excepted: that is, the fat, &c., mentioned iii. 9, 10, iv. 26, which were to be wholly burned upon the altar.

In the holy place shall it be eaten, &c.] See ver. 16. For it being most holy (as the words are in the conclusion of the foregoing verse), it was to be eaten in the holy place; and that the same day and night when it was offered; and none of it to be kept till the morning. Whereas some of the peace-offerings (which they called the lighter holy things) might be eaten the next day (vii. 16). See Maimonides, Mere Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46. This seems to have been imitated by the heathen, who required that their most holy sacrifices should not be carried out of the temple; as the scholarian upon Aristophanes's Equites observes, concerning the sacrifices offered to Ceres and Proserpina: ονε ἐξην τὰ θυσίαν Δημήτριου καὶ Περσεπήν Ιείω θείων.

And when there is sprinkled of the blood thereof upon any garment,] This is commonly understood of the priest's garment, who alone sprinkled the blood. But his garments being holy, the blood that might chance to fall upon them was not thereby all dishonoured: and therefore (if this be the meaning) we are to understand, that the garments would appear less venerable, when they were spotted with blood; and upon that account were to be washed. If we take it for the garment of him that brought the sacrifice, which when it was killed, the blood might chance to spirt upon his clothes; then the washing of them was out of reverence to the blood; which, being holy, was not to remain upon a common garment. Which way soever it be interpreted, the intention, it is manifest, was to preserve in their minds an awful regard to God, and to whatsoever belonged unto his service.

Thou shalt wash that whereon it was sprinkled in the holy place.] Where there was a room (after the temple was built) which was called mishah hagullath, the chamber of the spring, or well, out of which water was drawn for the use of the court of the sanctuary. And there it is probable, these garments were washed (see Codex Middoth, cap. 5, sect. 3).

Ver. 28. But the earthen vessel wherein it is sodden shall be broken: and if it be sodden in a brazen pot, it shall be both scoured, and rinsed in water.

29 All the males among the priests shall eat thereof: it is most holy.

30 And no sin offering, whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile within the holy place, shall be eaten: it shall be burnt in the fire.

If it be sodden in a brazen pot, it shall be both scoured, and rinsed in water.] Nothing could so easily sink into this, being a solid metal: but whatsoever stuck to it might be rubbed out and cleansed by washing. From this verse compared with other places, it seems apparent, that nothing was roasted in the sanctuary, but only boiled. So we find the peace-offerings (mentioned 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14, 15), were constantly scoured; and all other holy offerings, except the paschal lamb (which they roasted at home), 2 Chron. xxxv. 15. And after their return from the captivity of Babylon, the same is intimated in the last verse of the prophecy of Zechariah.

Ver. 29.] See ver. 16, and 26.

Ver. 30. And no sin offering.] Or rather, but no sin offering.

Whereof any of the blood is brought—to reconcile within the holy place, shall be eaten, &c.] Such were those sin-offerings for the high-priest (iv. 3), and for the whole congregation, upon particular occasions (iv. 13, &c.). Or upon the day of general sanctification (xvi. 27). No part of these was to be eaten, but entirely burnt in the fire; as it here follows in the end of this verse. There is no necessity of Maimonides's observation upon these words; that no man whatsoever might eat of these sacrifices: for if the priest might not, they were certainly prohibited to all other persons.
CHAPTER VII.

1. The law of the trespass offering. 11 And of the peace offerings, 12 whether it be for a thanksgiving, 16 or a vow, or a freewill offering. 22 The fat, 26 and the blood, are forbidden. 23 The priests' portion in the peace offerings.

1 Likewise this is the law of the trespass offering: it is most holy.

2 In the place where they kill the burnt offering shall they kill the trespass offering: and the blood thereof shall he sprinkle round about upon the altar.

3 And he shall offer of all the fat thereof; the rump, and the fat that covereth the inwards, and the two kidneys, and the fat that is on them, which is by the flanks, and the caul that is above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away:

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. Trespass offering.] The people were directed before in what cases they should bring this sort of offering; and I have noted the difference between them and sin-offerings (v. 15); but now the priests are directed in their office about trespass-offerings.

The blood thereof shall be sprinkled round about upon the altar. This is a different rite from that which was observed in the sin-offerings; whose blood was put upon the horns of the altar (iv. 29, 31), and the blood of such sin-offerings as were made for the high-priest, or the whole congregation, was also to be sprinkled seven times before the vail of the sanctuary (iv. 6, 17). But this was to be sprinkled round about the altar of burnt-offering; according to the manner used in the whole burnt-offerings (i. 11), and in the peace-offerings (iii. 3, 5), only with this difference, that there being a scarlet thread, or line, which went round about the altar exactly in the middle, the blood of the whole burnt-offerings was sprinkled round about above the line, and the blood of the trespass-offerings, and the peace-offerings, round about below the line (see Codex Middoth, cap. 3, sect. 1, and L'Empereur, Annot. 12).

Ver. 3. He shall offer.] This was the work of the priest, first to offer unto God his part of the sacrifice.

The rump.] All the fat belonging unto God; this is particularly mentioned in the first place, as the principal fat. For the tails of their sheep in those countries (and no other creature but a ram was allowed for a trespass-offering, as was before noted) were of a precious value amongst the ancients; as hath been noted by many; particularly by the famous Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45), and lately by another excellent person, Jobus Ludolphus, in his Ethiopic History (lib. i. cap. 10, n. 16), and in his commentaries on it (num. 76). And therefore it is called, both here and in other places, by the peculiar name of alia; whereas the tail or rump of other creatures, is called xanah (see what I have noted upon lii. 9).

The fat.] This, and all that follows in the next verse, hath been explained before (iii. 3, 4, 8, 9).

5 And the priest shall burn them upon the altar for an offering made by fire unto the Lord: it is a trespass offering.

6 Every male among the priests shall eat thereof: it shall be eaten in the holy place: it is most holy.

7 As the sin offering is, so is the trespass offering: there is one law for them: the priest that maketh atonement therewith shall have it.

8 And the priest that offereth any man's burnt offering, even the priest shall have to himself the skin of the burnt offering which he hath offered.

Ver. 5. The priest shall burn them, &c.] As he did the fat of the sin-offerings and peace-offerings (iv. 26, 31).

Ver. 6. Every male among the priests shall eat thereof, &c.] All the fat being offered to God, the flesh became the portion of the priest; who, with his male children, but not females, were to eat it: but not in any place out of the sanctuary; as it here follows (see vi. 18, 26, 29).

Ver. 7. As the sin offering is, so is the trespass offering.] In this matter (though in other things they differed), for the same rule is given here about the trespass-offering, that is given in the chapter foregoing (ver. 26), about the sin-offering.

The priest that maketh atonement therewith shall have it.] Who might invite other priests, if he pleased, to eat with him, and with his sons: but he was not bound to it: for the flesh of this sacrifice was entirely his own.

Ver. 8. The priest that offereth any man's burnt offering, even the priest.] Or, that priest who offered it.

Shall have to himself the skin of the burnt offering.] All the flesh of the burnt-offerings being wholly consumed, as well as the fat, upon the altar (ch. i. ver. 8), there was nothing that could fall to the share of the priest, but only the skins which is here given him for his pains. I observed upon Gen. iii. 21, that it is probable that Adam himself offered the first sacrifice; and had the skin given him by God, to make garments for him and for his wife. In conformity to which the priests ever after had the skins of the whole burnt-offerings for their portion. Which was a custom among the gentiles (as well as the Jews), who gave the skins of their sacrifices to their priests, when they were not burnt with the sacrifices, as in some sin-offerings they were among the Jews (iv. 11). Who employed them to a superstitious use, by lying upon them in their temples, in hope to have future things revealed to them in their dreams. This Dillherrus hath observed, out of these words of Viegli:

"Hac doma Sacerdos Quum tulit, et casumur vivum sub nocte silenti Pellibus incubat stratis, somnoque petivit, Multa noxie simulacra videt variantis moris, Et varias audit voces, fruiturque Deorum Colloquent."
9 And all the meat offering that is baked in the oven, and all that is dressed in the fryingpan, and in the pan, shall be the priest's that offereth it.
10 And every meat offering, mingled with oil, and dry, shall all the sons of Aaron have, one as much as another.
11 And this is the law of the sacrifice of peace offerings, which he shall offer unto the Lord.
12 If he offer it for a thanksgiving, then he shall offer with the sacrifice of thanksgiving unleavened cakes mingled with oil, and un — Ver. 9.] See concerning these various sorts of meat-offerings in the second chapter, ver. 4, 5, 7.

Shall be the priest's?] All but the memorial of it, which was burnt upon the altar.

That offereth it?] That particular priest who offered it was to have the remainder for his portion.

Ver. 10. Every meat offering.] Or, but every meat offering: for here is an exception to the foregoing rule.

Mingled with oil, and dry.] The foregoing verse speaks of such meat-offerings as were any ways baked; but this of those that were raw: which were of two sorts; either of flour mingled with oil, as all voluntary offerings of this sort were (ii. 1), or dry without any oil, as some sin-offerings were (v. 11), and the offering of jealousy (Numb. v. 15).

Shall all the sons of Aaron have.] All the priests who attended on that day were to have an equal share in this kind of meat-offerings; though he alone who ministered at the altar had the baked meat-offerings. There are some, indeed, who can see no reason for this difference (though this last sort, others think, was more easily divided, and therefore shared among them all), and consequently take these words to signify the same with those in the foregoing verse: "Every one, in the course of his attendance, 9, 10." But here are reasons for the last place, in his directions he gives to the priests about them; because as there were several sorts of them, so there were various rites to be observed about them. Which rites, as I observed before, are called here the law of such sacrifices.

Ver. 11. This is the law—of peace offerings, &c.] This is the only sort of offerings remaining to be spoken of; which, when he required them of the people, are mentioned in the third place, after the burnt-offerings and meat-offerings; before the sin-offerings and trespass-offerings. But here are reasons why this was placed for the last place, in his directions he gives to the priests about them; because as there were several sorts of them, so there were various rites to be observed about them. Which rites, as I observed before, are called here the law of such sacrifices.

Ver. 12. If he offer it for a thanksgiving.] In this, and in the sixteenth verse, we have an account of three sorts of peace-offerings. This, which was the principal, for benefits received from God's bounty; the other two, for the obtaining such blessings as they desired to receive. And this of thanksgiving, was either general for the whole congregation (of which there was but one only, at one time of the year, in the feast of Pentecost, xxiii. 19, which was accounted naturally, particularly for private persons, as occasion offered, which were accounted less holy. And they are these here mentioned; which might be either of the flock, or of the herd (but no birds), and either greater or smaller of those kinds; that is, of the herd from the first year to the third, and of the flock from the first to the second year complete. If they were older, they were not fit for sacrifice. All this, R. Levi Barzelonita (Precept. cxxxviii.), explains at large.

He shall offer with the sacrifice of thanksgiving.] The same R. Levi observes, that some peace-offerings were offered without any bread; viz. such as they called hagigah and shinmah, sacrifices of festivity and rejoicing; i.e. at their great solemn festivals. But these here mentioned were all offered with bread; and the reason is, that they did not belong to a distinct sort of sacrifices, such as those mentioned in the hundred-and-seventh Psalm; from tempests at sea, or dangerous travels through the wilderness, and the like. Aben Ezra also seems to have been of the same opinion with him, that men being delivered out of straits and distresses, gave thanks to God by this oblation. But I can find no ground for this limitation; it being far more likely, that this sacrifice was offered by all devout persons, for any mercy whatsoever that God bestowed upon them.

Unleavened cakes.] For none of God's bread was to be leavened (see ch. ii. 11).

Ver. 13. Besides the cakes.] Before mentioned; which were to be unleavened.

He shall offer—leavened bread?] Not upon the altar (for that was absolutely forbidden in the forenamed chapter of this book), but he was to give it to the priest who waited at the altar, and was to partake of this sacrifice, and to rejoice together with him that offered it. Which is the reason that such different sorts of cakes are ordered in the foregoing verse, all unleavened (of which the priest was to have his share), and also others leavened, which are prescribed in this verse; that God's family (his servants the priests) might want no variety of bread, at their feasts and in their families; and that God might common friendship with those who offered the sacrifice, by accepting the same bread at his own table, which they were wont to use at theirs.

Ver. 14. He shall offer one out of the whole oblation, &c.] One of the cakes before mentioned (ver. 12), was to be presented to God for a heave-offering; concerning which, see Exod. xxix. 24, 25.

It shall be the priest's.] Having offered one cake out of the whole, all that remained was the portion of the priest who sprinkled the blood of the peace-offerings on the altar.

Ver. 15. The reason of this, which was observed in most of their sacred feasts (particularly in the paschal lamb, Exod. xxii. 20, and in the manna itself, xvi. 19, to 21, was on of the opinion and propriety of the sacrifices; that they might not be in danger to be corrupted, or turned to any profane use, or gratify men's covetousness. For, as Philo observes (in his book of Sacrifice), "It was not fit that these holy things should be put into their cup-boards, but immediately set before those who are in need, for they were no longer holy the moment they were offered: who, being himself most liberal and bountiful, would have guests invited to his table to partake with those who offered the sacrifice. Whom he would not have to look upon themselves as masters of the feast, εὐτροφοῦν γὰρ ἐνώπιον τοιοῦτος ὁ ἱερεὺς ζώος ὁ θεός.
day that it is offered; he shall not leave any of it until the morning.

16 But if the sacrifice of his offering be a vow, or a voluntary offering, it shall be eaten the same day that he offereth his sacrifice: and on the morrow also the remainder of it shall be eaten:

17 But the remainder of the flesh of the sacrifice on the third day shall be burnt with fire.

18 And if any of the flesh of the sacrifice of his peace offerings be eaten at all on the third day, it shall not be accepted, neither shall it be imputed unto him that offereth it: it shall be an abomination, and the soul that eateth of it shall bear his iniquity.

19 And the flesh that toucheth any unclean thing shall not be eaten; it shall be burnt with fire: and as for the flesh, all that be clean shall eat thereof.

CHAPTER VII.

As not to call poor enough to eat all in two days' time, they were to have no further benefit of the flesh of this sacrifice; but what remained of it on the third day was to be burnt. Which was to preserve the dignity of the sacrifice, as the Jews speak, in preventing its stinking. And there was no nobler way of consuming it than by fire, which consumed the sacrifice on the altar. So R. Levi Barzel. observes, Præcept. cxxxviii. where he also adds, that God taught them hereby not to be solicitous for the future, nor careful to hoard up more than needed; when they saw him command the holy flesh to be destroyed, after the time allotted for its use, as the Targum says. The heathens also themselves thought this a decent rite; for there was a sacrifice at Rome, which they called Proterea (as Bochart observes out of Macrobius, lib. ii. Saturnal. cap. 2), in which the custom was, ut si quid ex epulis superfusisset, igne consumetur; "that if any thing of the feast remained, it was consumed in the fire" (see Hiziezoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50).

Ver. 18. If any of the flesh—be eaten at all on the third day, it shall not be accepted, &c. He lost the fruit of his sacrifice which he had offered to God by this profanation; which destroyed the grace and favour which it had procured him with God.

Neither shall it be imputed to him that offereth it.] He shall not be thought to have made any offering at all.

It shall be an abomination,] And, more than that, it rendered him abominable; being abominable itself: and made him liable to be scourged, as the Jews here understand the last words of this verse, he shall bear his iniquity. Which, I think, also signifies, that he should lie under a great guilt, till it was purchased by a trespass-offering mentioned ver. 12. None of which was to be kept longer than two days at the most.

There is no place here assigned, when these sacrifices should be eaten, at the sanctuary; as there is for the other, vi. 16, 26, and here in this chapter, ver. 6. The reason is, because there was such a multitude of them, that it might have made too great a crowd in the court of the Israelites, if they had been confined to it. Where they might eat them anywhere in the camp; which was pitched round about the tabernacle; only it was to be in a clean place, where the priests might eat them as well as the people (x. 14).

Ver. 17.] If there were such plenty, or they and their friends were so few, or they were so niggardly
LEVITICUS.

20 But the soul that eateth of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, that pertain unto the Lord, having his uncleanness upon him, even that soul shall be cut off from his people.

21 Moreover, the soul that shall touch any unclean thing, as the uncleanness of man, or any unclean beast, or any abominable unclean thing, and eat of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, that pertain unto the Lord, even that soul shall be cut off from his people.

23 Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Ye shall eat no manner of fat, of ox, or of sheep, or of goat.

and by Samuel, when he entertained Saul (1 Sam. ix. 13, 24). And when the kingdom was renewed to Saul at Gilgal, there was a public feast made on these offerings, with great rejoicing (1 Sam. xi. 15). And the feast was made for Jesse and his sons (xxi. 2, 5). And by David, when he entertained the people (1 Chron. xvi. 3). And by Solomon, at the dedication of the temple (1 Kings vii. 53). And all the children of Israel made such a feast, at their return from Babylon (Neh. vii. 19). There are many examples also of the like feasts among the heathens; particularly in Homer, where Agamemnon (IIiad. i.) offered a beast before a feast upon it. And Nestor (Odiss. iii.) offered a sacrifice of eighty-two oxen, and made the like entertainment.

Ver. 20. Pertain unto the Lord.] By these last words it appears, that the whole offering was the Lord's, whose bounty entertained him and his friends, to whom he gave the greatest part of it.

Having his uncleanness upon him.] In this verse and in the next, any one that had any legal defilement upon him is prohibited, under a severe penalty, to eat of the peace-offerings.

And they might be made unclean, either by impurity in their own body, or by the contact of unclean things; of the former of which he speaks in this verse; and of the latter in the next. Both were to be punished with cutting off, which is an explanation elsewhere (Gen. xvii. 14). From whence it was that the Jews were so very careful, not to go into the judgment-hall when our Saviour was condemned, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the passover (John xvi. 28), at which feast, peace-offerings were offered together with the passchal lamb (see more of this, xxii. 2—9).

Ver. 21. All these several sorts of uncleanness, contracted by touching things unclean, we shall find in the following chapters, xi. &c.

And eat the flesh of the sacrifices, &c.] The intention of such precepts was, that the greater reverence (as Maimonides speaks, par. iii. More Nevoch, cap. 41) might be maintained towards the sacrifices which were offered unto God. Upon which account, Julian highly commends Moses, who, he saith (as St. Cyril quotes his words, lib. ix. contra Julian.), was εὐ♭ολος καὶ ὑπάρχων τῆς ῥητῆς ἑλληνικῆς, "truly religious about the eating of holy things;" which he proves from these very words of Moses. But his conclusion from thence was very frigid, as St. Cyril calls it, that Christians were therefore to blame, because they would not partake of such sacrifices: for we abstain not from them, saith that father, as unclean things, but ἵππα δὲ μολομοῦ ὡς ἐκ τῶν ἓμων ἑλληνικῶν, "we rather make a progress, as from types, unto the truth."

24 And the fat of the beast that dieth of itself, and the fat of that which is torn with beasts, may be used in any other use: but ye shall in no wise eat of it.

25 For whosoever eateth the fat of the beast, of which men offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord, even the soul that eateth it shall be cut off from his people.

26 Moreover ye shall eat no manner of blood, whether it be of fowl or of beast, in any of your dwellings.

27 Whosoever soul it be that eateth any manner of blood, even that soul shall be cut off from his people.

Ver. 22.] At the same time that all these precepts were ordered to be delivered to the priests, he takes occasion to repeat several precepts he had before given, which concern all the people; because it was of great moment to have them observed.

Ver. 23. Ye shall eat no manner of fat.] Because this was God's part, and therefore not to be eaten by any one, but burnt upon his altar (see iii. 16, 17). And the reason Maimonides gives, why it was reserved for him alone, was, because it was very delicious to the taste (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 41).

Of ox, or of sheep, or of goat.] The Jews restrain this precept to these three sorts of creatures (which were the only beasts that were offered on the altar), taking the fat of all other beasts to be lawful (so R. Levi, before mentioned, Precept. cxlviii.).

Ver. 21. The fat of the beast.] Of one of the forenamed beasts, which alone were allowed in sacrifices.

That dieth of itself, &c.] Though the flesh of such beasts was unclean, yet they might apply the fat, when separated from the body, to any use: only they might not eat it.

Ver. 25.] This seems to justify the opinion of those Jews who restrain the eating of fat only to the three sorts of creatures mentioned ver. 23, as was there observed.

Even the soul that eateth it, shall be cut off.] If he did in presumption eat it, but if through inadvertence, he was to be scourged, as the Jewish doctors affirm. Yet, if he did it a second time, scourging did not suffice; but they shut him up in a little cave, where he could not stand upright, nor had room to sit down; and there fed him with the bread and water of affliction, till his bowels were sorely pinched, &c., as Maimonides describes this punishment (see Schikkard's Mischpat Hammenelek, and Carpovius's annot. on him, cap. 2, Theor. vii.).

Ver. 26. Ye shall eat no manner of blood.] See iii. 17. Men were very prone to this in those times (as Maimonides thinks), whereby they ran into idolatrous worship. Which was the reason God restrained them from it, by threatening cutting off (ver. 27) to those who were guilty of it (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 41).

In any of your dwellings.] This is added to signify, that they might no more eat of the blood of those beasts which they killed at home, than of those slain at the altar.

Ver. 27. Whosoever soul it be that eateth any manner of blood, &c.] The reason of it is given, xvii. 10, 11. But the Jews here distinguish (particularly R. Levi Barzelenota, Precept. cxviii.) between the blood of the soul, or the life (as they speak), and the blood of a member. The former, which ran out freely when the beast was killed, in which was the life of the beast, 29 Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, He that offereth the sacrifice of his peace offerings unto the Lord shall bring his oblation unto the Lord of the sacrifice of his peace offerings.

30 His own hands shall bring the offerings of the Lord made by fire, the fat with the breast, it shall he bring, that the breast may be waved for a wave offering before the Lord.

31 And the priest shall burn the fat upon the altar: but the breast shall be Aaron's and his sons'.

32 And the right shoulder shall ye give unto the priest for an heave offering of the sacrifices of your peace offerings.

33 He among the sons of Aaron, that offereth the blood of the peace offerings, and the fat, shall have the right shoulder for his part.

34 For the wave breast and the heave shoul-is that which is here meant, as Moses more fully explains it, in the place before mentioned. The other, which remained in the several parts of the beast, they looked upon as belonging to the flesh, and therefore might be eaten with it.

Ver. 28.] He delivered at the same time some other rules to be observed by the people in these matters (see ver. 22).

Ver. 29. That offereth the sacrifice of his peace offerings] The meaning may be no more than this, that before he and his friends feasted together, as is directed ver. 15, &c. he was to take care to bring his oblation unto the Lord, that is, to see that God had his part of the peace-offering; for till that was offered, none could meddle with the rest. But if the import of the Hebrew words be well observed, they seem to have a further meaning; which is, that whenever any man brought the sacrifice (which in the Hebrew is here called zebach) of his peace-offerings, he should also bring his oblation (which, in distinction from the other, is called korban), that is, a mincha, or meat-offering together with it; that the feast which was to be made, might be completely furnished with bread and wine, as well as the flesh of the sacrifice.

Ver. 30. His own hands shall bring the offerings] The sacrifice being slain and divided, the priest was to put what belonged unto the Lord into the man's own hands (viz. the fat, with the breast and the shoulder), that he might present it himself unto the Divine Majesty.

That the breast may be waved This is the manner wherein it was to be presented; the man was to lift it up over his head, and wave it to and fro; his hands being supported and guided by the priest (see Exod. xxxix. 24, and Num. vi. 19, 20). Maimonides describes the order of it in this manner: first, the priest put into the man's hands the fat; and then laid upon it the breast and the shoulder; and after that, one of the priests of the cakes for the meat-offering upon them; all which he waved about.

Ver. 31.] When that part which belonged to God's altar (viz. the fat) had been burnt there, the priests had the breast and the shoulder to their own use; as servants have what comes from their master's table. For it was all offered unto God (ver. 29, 30), who, taking only the fat for himself, bade them take the rest, viz. the breast and the shoulder: which had been presented unto God by waving them to and fro, as a sacrifice to the Lord of the world; but by him bestowed upon his ministers for their maintenance in his service. This is more fully expressed in the three next verses; in which there is no difficulty, and therefore I shall but lightly touch them.

Ver. 32.] This is only a more particular declaration what belonged to the priest; who was to have not only the breast before mentioned, but also the right shoulder.

Ver. 33.] This is still a more special direction, providing for the encouragement of that priest, who, on that day, ministered at the altar; unto whom the right shoulder was appropriated, as a reward of his pains in offering the sacrifice.

Ver. 34.] This doth not contradict what I observed just before; for when he saith, he hath given these to Aaron the priest and his sons, the meaning must be, to those of his sons, who, at the time when these were offered, sprinkled the blood and burnt the fat.

Ver. 35. This is the portion of the anointing.] In the Hebrew the words are, This is the anointing of Aaron, &c., that is, this they have in right of their vocation to the priest's office; which entitles them to all before mentioned.

In the day.] The Hebrew word bejom may, both here and in the next verse, be translated (as I observed before, vi. 29) from the day, and ever after.

When he presented them.] Made them draw near to attend upon him at his altar.

Ver. 36. In the day that he anointed them.] By virtue of a grant from God when they were made priests, to enjoy this benefit in all future ages.

By a statute for ever.] As long as this law of sacrifices and this priesthood shall last (see vi. 22).

Ver. 37.] This verse contains a summary of what he had commanded Aaron and his sons, from the ninth verse of the sixth chapter unto this place.

Of the consecrations.] The whole order of their consecration is not here directed (but in Exod. xxxix), only something belonging to that matter (vi. 30, &c.).

Ver. 38. Which the Lord commanded Moses in Mount Sinai.] In that mountaneous country which lay near to Mount Sinai, as Maimonides truly expounds it. For he was come down from Mount Sinai, and had delivered to them all that he received there (Exod. xxxiv. 29, 32), before these commands were given: but they still continued near unto it; and so the word behor may be translated, by Mount Sinai. For, as the last words of this verse tell us, they were still in the wilderness of Sinai: that is, in that part of the wilderness which took its name from its nearness to Mount Sinai.

In the day that he commanded.] This doth not

CHAPTER VIII.

1. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Take Aaron and his sons with him, and the garments, and the anointing oil, and a bullock for the sin offering, and two rams, and a basket of unleavened bread; 3. And gather thou all the congregation together unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 4. And Moses did as the Lord commanded him; and the assembly was gathered together unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

5. And Moses said unto the congregation, This is the thing which the Lord commanded to be done.

6. And Moses brought Aaron and his sons, and washed them with water.

7. And he put upon him the coat, and girded him with the girdle, and clothed him with the robe, and put the ephod upon him, and he girded him with the curious girdle of the ephod, and bound it unto him therewith.

8. And he put the breastplate upon him: also conveniently hold, met together to be spectators of this solemnity.

Ver. 5. This is the thing which the Lord commanded to be done.] I am now about to execute what God hath formerly commanded, when I was with him in the holy mount (Exod. xxix. 4). At what time this was executed, is a question among learned men. And our great primates of Ireland places this consecration of Aaron and his sons, together with the tabernacle and all things belonging to it, in the second month of the second year, after they came out of Egypt; moved thereunto, I suppose, by what is said in Numb. vii. 1. 2. So that, according to his opinion, the numbering of the people, and the separation of the Levites to God’s service, preceded this action. But I do not see any reason why we should not think all things were done in the order wherein they are related. And then this consecration was performed in the first month of that year; after the tabernacle had been erected and set apart for the habitation of the Divine Majesty (see Exod. xl. 17, 19).

Ver. 1. Moses consecrated Aaron and his sons.] To the door of the tabernacle of the congregation; as he had been directed (Exod. xxix. 4).

Washed them with water.] As is there also directed; having first likewise washed himself (x1. 31).

Ver. 7. Moses, by an extraordinary commission from God, performed the office of a high-priest on this day, and the six days following; and put Aaron in possession of his office by clothing him with the garments here mentioned (according to the orders which had been given, Exod. xxix. 5, &c.), which was thought sufficient for the consecration of a high-priest, after the captivity of Babylon: when they wanted the holy oil, as hath been before observed. Whence Philo often calls Moses by the name of Ἀρχεπρεύς, i.e. high-priest, and in Shemoth Rabba the tradition is, that he continued high-priest all the time they continued in the wilderness: though others, they confess, are of opinion (which is the truth) that he officiated only the seven days of the consecration; after which this office was settled in Aaron (see Selden, lib. i. de Succession, in Pontificatum, cap. 1).

Ver. 8.] See Exod. xxviii. 30. It is observable that he saith nothing here in this place of the precious stones, but only mentions urim and thummim; ne put in the breastplate the Urim and the Thummim.
9 And he put the mitre upon his head; also upon the mitre, even upon his forehead, did he put the golden plate, the holy crown; as the Lord commanded Moses.
10 And Moses took the anointing oil, and anointed the tabernacle and all that was therein, and sanctified them.
11 And he sprinkled thereof upon the altar seven times, and anointed the altar and all his vessels, both the laver and his foot, to sanctify them.

as in Exod. xxxix. 10 (where he describes the same thing), he makes mention only of the four rows of stones, but saith not one word of urim and thummim, which I look upon as a proof that they were all one.

Ver. 9. According as God commanded him in Exod. xxviii. 36, 37, &c., xxix. 6.

Ver. 10. Moses took the anointing oil.] See Exod. xxix. 26, &c., and xl. 9—11. There being several ways of anointing a thing or person, either by pouring oil upon them, or by putting it upon them with the finger, or by sprinkling; it is an improbable conjecture of Fortunatus Seacchus, that Moses anointed Aaron therewith and its utensils, by dipping his finger in the oil, and putting it upon them. For though the word mashach, which he useth for anointing, be general, yet the Vulgar expressing it by linwent, and the LXX. by ἱποτζα (which import this particular sort of anointing), and there being different words used to express the anointing of the altar and of Aaron, it may well incline one to his opinion (Myrothec. 2, Saer. Elrechrysm. cap. 70).

Sanctified them.] Set them apart by this unction for the holy use; for which they were designed.

Ver. 11. He sprinkled thereof upon the altar seven times.] We do not find this expressly before directed; but the intention of anointing the altar being to make it most holy (because it was to sanctify all that was laid upon it), it was very fit it should be both sprinkled seven times with oil, and also sanctified: in token of its extraordinary sanctity, which was put upon it by this very solemn rite. For here are two distinct words about this anointing; the first is zaz, he sprinkled of the oil upon it; and then jismashach, he anointed it, by putting some of the oil on it; whereas it is said of the tabernacle, and of the things there, only jismashach, he anointed them, without any sprinkling.

Some think, that the altar being mentioned twice in this verse, he speaks of the altar of incense, as well as of the altar of burnt-offerings. But it is plain by those places in Exodus it was the altar of burnt-offerings, which was thus sanctified; and here the laver and its foot (which stood in the same court) is sanctified with it. As for the altar of incense, it is included in what is said in the foregoing verse, that he anointed the tabernacle and all therein.

Both the laver and his foot.] It may be thought that he sprinkled with oil the laver and its foot, as well as anointed them; which is the opinion of the foregoing Fort. Seacchus. But the Hebrew words will not warrant it; for they only signify that they were anointed as the altar was after its aspersion.

Ver. 12. He poured of the anointing oil upon Aaron's head.] Here now is a third word, distinct from the two former, viz. jitszak, which signifies there was more done to Aaron than to any of the holy things, to sanctify him to his office; for the holy oil was poured on his head.

12 And he poured of the anointing oil upon Aaron's head, and anointed him, to sanctify him 13 And Moses brought Aaron's sons, and put coats upon them, and girded them with girdles, and put bonnets upon them; as the Lord commanded Moses.
14 And he brought the bullock for the sin offering: and Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the bullock for the sin offering;
15 And he slew it; and Moses took the blood, and put it upon the horns of the altar round about with his finger, and purified the Anointed him.] Perhaps he drew the oil with his finger upon his forehead, after it was poured on his head, as the Jews think he did (see Exod. xxix. 7, 8, xxx. 30, xl. 13).

To sanctify him.] i. e. Set him apart to this sacred office. Now this consecration of Aaron and his sons being mentioned here together with the consecration of the tabernacle, and all belonging to it, it hath made some conclude, that both were done at the very same time. But I have given some arguments to prove the contrary, upon Exod. xli. 17, 18. And the meaning of these three verses (tenth, eleventh, and twelfth of this chapter) was, not that they were consecrated at the same time, but with the same oil. For first he says, Moses took the anointing oil: and shows how it was employed after a different manner upon the tabernacle and its utensils, upon the altar, and upon Aaron, on whose head it was poured; whereas the former had it only put upon them with the finger, or were sprinkled with it. But though they were not consecrated together, yet their consecration immediately followed one another. For seven days being spent in sanctifying the tabernacle and the altar, then immediately began the sanctification of Aaron and his sons; during which time Moses may be supposed to have received the foregoing laws about sacrifices, in which they were to be employed as soon as they were consecrated. And the seven days for the consecration of Aaron and his sons are immediately succeeding the other seven days which were spent in the consecration of the tabernacle and the altar; it may be the reason why they are here successively mentioned both together, and neither of them mentioned before. For if the account we have in the fortieth of Exodus concerning these things be well attended to, it will appear that nothing is there said of the anointing of the tabernacle, or any thing else; but only that he set it up the first day of the month, as he was commanded, ver. 2, &c. and 17, &c. And he is commanded in like manner to take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle and all therein (ver. 9, &c.), and then to anoint Aaron and his sons (ver. 13, 15); but he relates nothing of his doing either of them till now, when he executed those commands.

As the Lord commanded Moses.] He commanded him also to anoint them at the same time (Exod. xxviii. 41, xl. 15), but it is not here mentioned; because they were not anointed as he was, by pouring oil upon their heads; but sprinkling it on their garments, with the blood of the sacrifice offered for them. And that he did afterward as he had been ordered, ver. 30 (see Exod. xxviii. 41, xxix. 7).

16 And he took all the fat that was upon the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys, and their fat, and Moses burned it upon the altar.

17 But the bullock, and his hide, his flesh, and his dung, he burnt with fire without the camp; as the Lord commanded Moses.

18 ¶ And he brought the ram for the burnt offering: and Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the ram.

19 And he killed it; and Moses sprinkled the blood upon the altar round about.

20 And he cut the ram in pieces; and Moses burnt the head, and the pieces, and the fat.

21 And he washed the inwards and the legs in water; and Moses burnt the whole ram upon the altar: it was a burnt sacrifice for a sweet savour, and an offering made by fire unto the Lord; as the Lord commanded Moses.

Purified the altar.] It was purified before; but this was a further purification of it; that it might be the more fit to be a place to make reconciliation upon it, as it follows in the conclusion of the verse.
Poured the blood at the bottom of the altar, &c.] The Vulgar Latin, I think, gives the true interpretation of these words, rather than translate them in this manner; it being explained and sanctified, he poured out the blood at the bottom of the altar, &c. Fort. Seaceus hath taken a great deal of pains to prove that this expiation (as the Vulgar Latin calls it) went before the anointing or consecration of the altar; in his Myrothec. (par. ii. cap. 31). But his arguments seem to me of no force to overthrow the opinion of Abulensis and Philo, that these words do not speak of a proper expiation of the altar; but that it was only hereby more particularly set apart (as the word sanctify signifies), to be the place where sin-offerings might be made; that men who had committed offences might be expiated by these sacrifices.
Ver. 16.] See Exod. xxix. 13.
Ver. 17. But the bullock, and his hide, his flesh, and his dung, he burnt with fire without the camp:] See Exod. xxix. 14. Yet we do not find that the blood of this sacrifice was carried into the holy place; and therefore it did not fall under the rule in the sixth chapter of this book (ver. 30), but might have been eaten by the priests, as is there allowed (ver. 26). Some think it sufficient, for the solution of this, to say that Aaron and his sons were not yet completely consecrated, and therefore had not a right to eat of the flesh of this sin-offering. But such persons do not consider that Moses, who now acted as a priest, could not be debarred of that benefit by this reason. And therefore it is better to say, that no high-priest, whether ordinary or extraordinary (such as Moses now was), might eat of any sin-offering, offered for their priests themselves; although the blood of it was not brought into the sanctuary. From whence we may draw this consequence: that although the sins of the people were taken away by the priests; who, by eating of their sin-offering, plainly showed that they bare their sin (as the phrase is, x. 17), yet the sins of the priests themselves could not be taken away, by any sacrifice they could offer for sin, of which they might not eat: but they were to expect, as an excellent person of our own speaks (Dr. Jackson, book ix. upon the Creed, chap. 26), a better sacrifice, made by a better high-priest, the Son of God. But these legal sacrifices, in the mean time, were offered in such a place, as prefigured the place where this better sacrifice should be offered, viz. without the camp: as when they came to their rest, without the city of Jerusalem, where our Saviour's body was offered for our redemption.
Ver. 18. He brought the ram for the burnt-offering:] According to the direction given to Moses, when he was with God in Mount Sinai (Exod. xxix. 15, 16), where all that follows here, to the end of the twenty-first verse, is explained: this being nothing else but the execution of what was before ordered.
Ver. 19. He brought the other ram,] For he was commanded to bring two, (ver. 2, and Exod. xxix. 1.) The ram of consecration:] So it is called Exod. xxix. 22, 31, for the reason there given.
Ver. 22, 24.] These two verses are explained Exod. xxix. 20, where order was given for what was now done. I shall only add a remark of R. Levi ben Gerson, upon the order wherein these sacrifices were offered; which was most rational. For, first, there was a sacrifice for sin offered (ver. 14), before they could be worthy to have any gift or present which they made to God received by him. But upon their expiation, a whole burnt-offering was accepted (ver. 16); and after that followed this sacrifice, which was a peace-offering (as appears from ver. 31), part of which was burnt upon the altar, part given to the priest, and the rest they themselves ate for whom it was offered; that it might appear they were so far in the favour of God, as to eat with him of his meat from his table. Ahabinbel hath the same observation.
Ver. 25.] All this verse likewise is there explained, Exod. xxix. 22.
Ver. 26, 28.] These three verses show, that Moses exactly followed the orders he had received, Exod. xxix. 23—25, where they have been explained.
upon his sons' hands, and waved them for a wave offering before the Lord.

28 And Moses took them from off their hands, and burnt them on the altar upon the burnt offering: they were consecrations for a sweet savour: it is an offering made by fire unto the Lord.

29 And Moses took the breast, and waved it for a wave offering before the Lord; for of the ram of consecration it was Moses' part; as the Lord commanded Moses.

30 And Moses took of the anointing oil, and of the blood which was upon the altar, and sprinkled it upon Aaron, and upon his garments, and upon his sons, and upon his sons' garments with him; and sanctified Aaron, and his garments, and his sons, and his sons' garments with him.

31 ¶ And Moses said unto Aaron and to his sons, Boil the flesh at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and there eat it with the bread that is in the basket of consecrations, as I commanded, saying, Aaron and his sons shall eat it.

32 And that which remaineth of the flesh and of the bread shall ye burn with fire.

33 And ye shall not go out of the door of the tabernacle of the congregation in seven days, until the days of your consecration be at an end: for seven days shall he consecrate you.

34 As he hath done this day, so the Lord hath commanded to do, to make an atonement for you.

Ver. 28. Burnt them—upon the burnt-offering.] This shows that they were not a burnt-offering properly, as I there observed, but an appendix to it.

They were consecrations.] Because they were offered to consecrate and sanctify them, as this is explained Exod. xxix. 33 (see there).

Ver. 29. Moses took the breast, and waved it] According to the direction given Exod. xxix. 26, where it is also ordered that this should be Moses' part.

Ver. 30. Moses took of the anointing oil, and of the blood] See Exod. xxix. 21, where it appears plainly this blood that was mixed with the oil, was the blood of the ram of consecration.

Ver. 31.] God having had his part (ver. 28), and Moses, who performed the office of a priest at this time, having had that which belonged to him on that account (ver. 28), the rest was given (as the manner was in peace-offerings) to those for whom the sacrifice was offered: that is, all but the right shoulder, which was burnt upon the altar, and the wave bread, which was given to Moses, as priest (see Exod. xxxi. 31, 32).

Ver. 32. That which remaineth—shall ye burn with fire.] See Exod. xxi. 34. This shows it was of the nature of a peace-offering (vii. 15, 17).

Ver. 33. Ye shall not go out—seven days.] For till then their consecration was not perfected (as the following verbs shew), it being more than the consecration of the altar, was till a bullock had been offered, to cleanse it, and make an atonement for it, for seven days together (see Exod. xxix. 35—37). This was to make them more sensible of the great weight, as well as dignity of their office.

Ver. 34.] Every day of these seven those sacrifices were to be repeated, the sin-offering, the burnt-offering, and the peace-offering; and their garments were to be sprinkled with the blood and the anointing oil, as the Lord required when Moses was with him in the mount (Exod. xxi. 25). This shows the imperfection of all the legal sacrifices; which would not have been so often repeated, if they had been of greater efficacy; yet the continuance of them seven days, doth signify the complete consecration of these priests, according to the rites of those times. In conformity to which, our great high-priest, the Lord Christ, who was perfected by one sacrifice of himself, spent seven days in his consecration to his office. For as Aaron is commanded to attend at the tabernacle so many days together, in like manner our Lord Christ (as Dr. Jackson observes in the forenamed book, chap. 27), did attend the temple five days one after another, before his death (see John xii. 1, 12, &c. Matt. xxi. 8, 9, &c.) and having purged it on the first or second of those days, from the profaneness that was exercised in it by merchandising; and afterward hallowed it by his doctrine, and by his Divine presence, which appeared in several miraculous cures, he went the sixth day into his heavenly sanctuary, into paradise itself; to purify and sanctify it with his own blood: as Moses, at Aaron's consecration, did the material sanctuary and altar with the blood of beasts. And having rested the seventh day, finished all by his resurrection early the next day in the morning.

Ver. 35. Abide at the door of the tabernacle.] Where all things mentioned in this chapter had been done, and were still to be repeated (ver. 3, 4), for they could not go into the sanctuary till they were completed.

Day and night.] This was to make their consecration more solemn, and taken notice of by all the people.

Seven days.] By which means, a Sabbath, as the Jews observe, passed over their heads; without which, they conceive, Aaron and his sons could not have been completed. But the Sabbath of the Lord did never so exactly pass over any high-priest in his consecration, as it did over the High-priest of the New Testament. For however it were of Aaron's it was to our blessed Saviour (as the forenamed Dr. Jackson notes) a day of rest, indeed, after six days of labour, waiting, and prayer, but no Sabbath, which concluded in his bloody death and passion.

Keep the charge of the Lord.] That which he had now enjoined. Or rather, watch the tabernacle and its vessels, &c., as they were to do in time to come. The Hebrew doctors have here raised a great difficulty about the necessary easements of nature; for which they had no convenience, if they might not stir for seven days from the door of the tabernacle; and therefore they fancy, there was a hole dug in the ground for such occasions. But it is more likely they were not so confined, as not to be allowed this liberty: and one cannot well doubt of it, who considers the word minnethor here used (which we translate keep the charge of the Lord), which is a military phrase, signifying the stations and watches kept in their turns for certain hours: after which they were at liberty to attend their own affairs. Such was the charge here one may reasonably think, of not departing from the door of the tabernacle, while they were upon the guard (as we speak), which some or other of them kept night and day; in such order, that while some watched, others might sleep, or step out about the necessary occasions of nature.

That ye do not.] It may seem hard that they should be in peril of their life, if they omitted any of these rites. But this was necessary, to make those

CHAPTER IX.

1 The first offerings of Aaron, for himself and the people. 8 The sin offering, 12 and the burnt offering for himself. 15 The offerings for the people. 23 Moses and Aaron bless the people. 24 Fire cometh from the Lord, upon the altar.

1 And it came to pass on the eighth day, that Moses called Aaron and his sons, and the elders of Israel;

2 And he said unto Aaron, Take thee a young calf for a sin offering, and a ram for a burnt offering, without blemish, and offer them before the Lord.

3 And unto the children of Israel thou shalt speak, saying, Take ye a kid of the goats for a sin offering; and a calf and a lamb, both of the shall have all the sacrifice, as he must have had, according to the law of such sacrifices, being both the priest and the offerer; between whom and the priest (after the fat was burnt) all was to be shared.

Ver. 3. Unto the children of Israel thou shalt speak.] Unto all the elders (ver. 1), who were to bring the following offerings, in the name of all the people of Israel; and that by Aaron's direction, who was now to act as God's high-priest, and give out this order.

Take ye a kid of the goats for a sin offering.] The Hebrew word seir signifies a he-goat. Concerning which Maimonides (in his book concerning Sacrifices) delivers this opinion, that "all sacrifices for sin, whether of private persons, or the whole congregation, at their three principal feasts, new moons, and the day of expiation, were he-goats. For this reason, because the greatest sin and rebellion of those times was the greater sacrifice to demons, who were wont to appear in that form. For which he quotes xvii. 7, ..."They shall no more offer their sacrifices," lesseirim; which we translate unto devils: but the word seirim is but the plural number of the word seir, which signifies a goat. And further he adds, that their wise men think the sin of the whole congregation was therefore expiated by this kid of a goat, because all the family of Israel sinned about a goat when they sold Joseph into Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 31). And such reasons, saith he, as these should not seem trifles, for the end and scope of all these actions was, to imprint and engrave on the mind of sinners the offences they had committed, that they might never forget them. According to that of David, Psalm li. 5, ..."My sin is even gone over my head." This sin-offering was different from that iv. 14, being not for any particular sin, as that was; but in general, for all the offences that the high-priest might have committed.

A calf and a lamb, both of the first year, &c.] When they were in their prime.

Ver. 5. Also a bullock and a ram. These also were, no doubt, to be without blemish, as is prescribed in the two foregoing offerings. And the Hebrew word first year, without blemish, for a burnt-offering;

4 Also a bullock and a ram for peace-offerings, to sacrifice before the Lord; and a meat-offering mingled with oil: for to day the Lord will appear unto you.

5 And they brought that which Moses commanded before the tabernacle of the congregation: and all the congregation drew near and stood before the Lord.

6 And Moses said, This is the thing which the Lord commanded that ye should do: and the glory of the Lord shall appear unto you.

7 And Moses said unto Aaron, Go unto the altar, and offer thy sin offering, and thy burnt-offering, and make an atonement for thyself, and for the people: and offer the offering of the people, and make an atonement for them; as the Lord commanded.

8 ¶ Aaron therefore went unto the altar, and slew the calf of the sin offering, which was for himself.

9 And the sons of Aaron brought the blood unto him; and he dipped his finger in the blood, and put it upon the horns of the altar, and poured out the blood at the bottom of the altar:

10 But the fat, and the kidneys, and the caul above the liver of the sin offering, he burnt upon the altar; as the Lord commanded Moses.

11 And the flesh and the hide he burnt with fire without the camp.

12 And he slew the burnt-offering; and Offer the offering of the people.] After he had offered both the sin-offering (ver. 8), and the burnt-offering (ver. 13), for himself; then he was to begin to offer for the people.

For his own sins being expiated, and his burnt-offering being accepted, he was fit to procure remission and acceptance for them.

Ver. 8. Aaron therefore went unto the altar.] That he might be ready to perform his part of the service, which was to sprinkle the blood, after he had first of all offered the morning sacrifice (see ver. 17).

Slew the calf—for himself.] Ordered it to be slain: for this was no part of the priest's work, as I showed upon the first chapter, ver. 5.

Ver. 9. The sons of Aaron brought the blood unto him.] They received it in basins as it ran from the calf when it was killed (see i. 5), and brought it unto him; who stood at the altar to receive it, and do what follows.

He dipped his finger in the blood.] The forerunner of the right hand, which had been sanctified to this ministry, by putting the blood of the sacrifice of consecration upon the thumb of the right hand (viii. 23, 24), whereby we grasp all things, and cannot hold them strongly, nor perform any thing well, if that be wanting.

Put it upon the horns of the altar.] See iv. 25.

Ver. 10. And he dipped his finger, &c.] See iv. 8, 9.

He burnt upon the altar.] Laid or disposed them upon the altar, to be burnt by the heavenly fire (ver. 24), as most understand it. And the LXX. justify this opinion; who, though they here translate it, "he offered it on the altar," yet, ver. 13, where there is the same phrase, they expressly translate it, εἴρηκεν τῷ θυσίωνα εἰς τὸ θυσίαν, "he laid the burnt-offering upon the altar," and again, ver. 17, in the same manner, εἴρηκεν εἰς τὸ θυσίαν τοὺς, &c., "he laid it upon the altar, beside the burnt-sacrifice of the morning." For common fire, it is supposed, was no longer to be used when Aaron's sacrifice began; as it had been all along before. But there is no certainty in this: and we may as well take the words in their proper sense, that Aaron burnt this and the following sacrifice, as Moses had done before (viii. 14, 21, 28), until the burnt-offering for the people came to be offered, which God consumed by fire from himself; and then followed those other sacrifices mentioned, ver. 17, 18. For all these sacrifices, for Aaron and for the people, could not be laid upon the altar at once; but one after another, in the order here directed; and consequently, this sacrifice here mentioned was actually burnt upon the altar, to make way for those which followed it.

Ver. 11. The flesh—he burnt.] See viii. 17.

Ver. 12. He slew the burnt-offering, &c.] See i. 5.
Aaron's sons presented unto him the blood, which he sprinkled round about upon the altar.

13 And they presented the burnt offering unto him, with the pieces thereof, and the head: and he burnt them upon the altar.

14 And he did wash the inwards and the legs, and burnt them upon the burnt offering on the altar.

15 ¶ And he brought the people's offering, and took the goat, which was the sin offering for the people, and slew it, and offered it for sin, as the first.

16 And he brought the burnt offering, and offered it according to the manner.

17 And he brought the meat offering, and took an handful thereof, and burnt it upon the altar, beside the burnt sacrifice of the morning.

18 He slew also the bullock and the ram for a sacrifice of peace offerings, which was for the people: and Aaron's sons presented unto him the blood, which he sprinkled upon the altar round about,

19 And the fat of the bullock and of the ram, the rump, and that which covereth the inwards, and the kidneys, and the caul above the liver:

20 And they put the fat upon the breasts, and he burnt the fat upon the altar:

21 And the breasts and the right shoulder Aaron waved for a wave offering before the Lord: as Moses commanded.

22 And Aaron lifted up his hand toward the people, and blessed them, and came down from offering of the sin offering, and the burnt offering, and peace offerings.

23 And Moses and Aaron went into the tabernacle of the congregation, and came out, and blessed the people: and the glory of the Lord appeared unto all the people.

Ver. 13, 14.] All that is contained in these two verses is explained in the first chapter (ver. 8, 9), where the law about burnt-offerings is delivered.

Ver. 15.] Having offered all that was necessary for himself, now he became fit to make supplication for the people.

Offered it for sin, as the first.] In the same manner as he offered the foregoing sin-offering for himself (ver. 8, &c.).

Ver. 16. He brought the burnt offering.] Here being no express mention of burning it, some thence conclude, that this was the offering which alone was consumed by fire from the Lord (see ver. 24).

Offered it according to the manner.] Laid it upon the altar as Moses had directed in the first chapter of this book.

Ver. 17. They brought the meat offering.] Which attended upon burnt-offerings (Numb. xv. 2–4, &c.).

Beside the burnt sacrifice of the morning.] This shows that Aaron began his priestly function with the morning sacrifice, which preceded all other, and was never omitted for the sake of any other sacrifice that was to follow it, and it had always a meat-offering waiting upon it (see xxi. 29, 40).

Ver. 18, 19.] These two verses are explained in the third chapter; which treats of such kind of offerings.

Ver. 20. He put the fat upon the breasts.] That it might by elevation and waving be presented unto the Lord; and then burnt upon the altar (see vii. 30).

Ver. 21.] The fat being burnt upon the altar, as God's portion, these were the portion of the priests, who feasted upon God's meat; for they were solemnly presented unto him before they had them (see vii. 31).

Ver. 22. Aaron lifted up his hand toward the people.] Imploring the Divine blessing upon the people; which he afterwards pronounced. At this day, they that are of the family of Aaron, going up the steps which lead to the place where the book of the law is kept, lift up their hands as high as their heads, and pronounce a blessing in their synagogues upon the assembly. And they say the ancient custom was, which is still observed, not only to lift up and spread their hands, but then to join them together by the thumbs and the two fore-fingers; dividing the other from them, in that figure which is represented by an eminently learned person, J. Warensell, in his commentary upon Sota (cap. 7, p. 673 and 1132).

Blessed them.] We read of no order for this; but natural reason taught them, from the beginning, that the priestly office consisted in praying for the people, and blessing them: we find an example of it in Gen. xiv. 18, 19. And not long after Aaron's consecration, Moses delivered from God a form of words, wherein the priests should bless the people (Numb. vi. 24). And at this day, there is nothing done among the Jews with such solemnity, and in which they place so much sanctity, as this. For when the blessing is pronounced, the priest says they all cover their faces; believing they would be struck blind if they should look up; because the Divine Majesty, at that time, sits upon the hands of the priest. So the same Wagenseil observes, in the place above named; which shows, not only how laborious they have been to maintain in the people's minds an opinion that God is still as much present with them in their synagogues, as he was anciently in the tabernacle and temple; but how high a value they set upon the Divine blessing pronounced by his ministers.

And came down from offering of the sin offering, &c.] He pronounced the blessing before he came down from the altar, which stood upon raised ground (though there were no steps to it, Exod. xx. 26), and at the people might the better see what was done, while he offered all these sacrifices for them, and lifted up his hands to implore God's blessing upon them.

Ver. 23. Moses and Aaron went into the tabernacle] The sacrifice being ended, it is likely Moses went with Aaron into the sanctuary, to instruct him how to sprinkle the blood and to burn incense, and order the show-bread, and such like things as were to be done only in the holy place.

Came out, and blessed the people.] I suppose that all the sacrifices before mentioned might be offered after the morning sacrifice (ver. 17), which took up a great deal of time before they were all completed. After which Moses and Aaron went into the sanctuary, and stayed there till the time of the evening sacrifice; and then came out and dismissed the people with a new blessing, when the evening sacrifice was finished.

The glory of the Lord appeared.] That glory which filled the tabernacle (Exod. xi. 34, 35), now appeared without; either at the door of it, or upon it, in the sight of all the people, as Moses had foretold (ver. 6).

Ver. 24. There came a fire out from before the Lord.] Either out of the sanctuary, from the holiness of holies; or from that glory which now appeared unto them, and sent out flashes of fire which burnt up the sacri-
24 And there came a fire out from before the Lord, and consumed upon the altar the burnt

25 sacrifice. In either of these scenes, it may be said to come from the face of the Lord, as the Hebrew phrase is.

Burnt offering and the fat.] It seems to me most natural and easy to take this burnt-offering and its fat for the evening sacrifice; which concluding the work of this day, God gave a special token of his acceptance of all the other sacrifices, by consuming this: which, when burnt, gave a prosperous appearance to all the forementioned rites of the ministry of Aaron, whose authority was hereby established in a miraculous manner. To confirm this, it may be noted, that, as the place which God chose for his worship and service was afterward designed in the time of David after the very same manner (1 Chron. xxii. 35), so it was at the time of the evening sacrifice, as may be gathered from 2 Sam. xxiv. 15, where it is said the pestilence continued from morning to the time appointed, that, is, to the evening; and then David saw the angel, who commanded God to bid him set the altar in the threshing-floor of Araunah; where God answering by fire from heaven, it made him say, "This is the house of God, and this is the altar of burnt-offering." David built the temple in that very place, it was thus consecrated by fire coming from heaven, and consuming the burnt-sacrifice, as well as by the glory of the Lord filling the house (2 Chron. vii. 1—3). And it is very probable, also, that this was at the time of the evening sacrifice; for the former part of the day had been spent in bringing the ark into the house of the Lord, and in the morning prayer; as we read in the two foregoing chapters. Certain it is, that the authority of Elijah to restore God's true religion and worship was thus justified, 1 Kings xviii. 38, 39, and it was at the time of the offering the evening sacrifice (ver. 39). From whence that prayer of the Psalmist (Ps. xxii. 2), "Let the lifting up of my hands be as the evening sacrifice."

All this so curious, that Julian himself acknowledges, that fire came down from heaven in the time of Moses, and again in the days of Elijah, 2 Macc. vi. 17.29, "consumming the sacrifices;" as we find his words related by St. Cyril (lib. x. contra Julianum). And this gave such a Divine authority to the sacrifice of the Lord's offering (1 Chron. xxi. 20), that the pagans endeavored to get credit to their religion by the like reports of fire, from an invisible power, consuming their sacrifices: which perhaps was sometimes really done by the prince of the power of the air, as the apostle calls the devil. However that be, there are several instances of this in Pausanias, Dionyius Halicarnassaeus, Valerius Maximus, and Pliny. But Servius may serve instead of all; who, upon those words of Virgil in Æneid x., "federam fluctu niveum sanctum, saith, that anciently they did not kindle fires upon their altars; sed ignem divinnm precibus eliciabant, &c., "but they procured by their prayers Divine fire," which inflamed their altars. And Solinus saith (cap. 115), "Divine fire came from the wood by a Divine power. Si Deus adesset, si sacram probaret, surmenta licet viridin ignem sponte concepissent, &c., "If God be present, if the sacrifice be acceptable, the fags, though green, kindle of themselves;" and without any one to set them on fire, a flame is raised by the Deity to whom the sacrifice is offered. Thus there rose up fire out of the rock, and consumed Gideon's sacrifice (Judg. vii. 21). They that would see more of this out of pagan writers, may consult J. Dilheurs Dissert. Special. de Cacozelia Gentil. (cap. 11). But especially Huetius, in his Alædæta Questiones (lib. ii. cap. 12, n. 21). But whether this fire, which now came from before the Lord, consumed Aaron's sacrifice instantly, or only set it into a flame, which consumed it leisurely in the sight of all the people, cannot certainly be determined. The Jews seem to suppose the latter; which, when burnt at the evening sacrifice, is more probable ever after by a constant supply of fuel, whereby it was kept perpetually burning, as is ordained, vi. 12, 13 (see note on that place). Where to me it seems very observable, that this law of keeping in the fire perpetually, is ordered to be put in execution at the evening sacrifice, ver. 9 of that chapter. Which is a sufficient reason to incline one to think that the celestial fire now came, as I have supposed, at the evening sacrifice, and consumed the burnt-offering.

Which when all the people saw, they shouted. They did not from it as men afflicted, but shouted for joy; or, as Abarbinel's phrase is, "they lifted up their voices with singing, and prayed to God," or rather, praised him. Just as they did when the fire came down at the presentation of Solomon's temple: "When the people saw it they praised the Lord, saying, For he is good; for his mercy endureth for ever" (2 Chron. vii. 3).

Pelt on their faces. Worshipped God with humble thankfulness; who hereby testified his presence among them, and his gracious acceptance of them. For thus he had of old showed his respect to Abel (Gen. iv. 4), and to Noah (vii. 20), and to their father Abraham; whose sacrifice was thus accepted in the evening, when the sun went down (Gen. xv. 17).

And there was great reason, that both priests and people should rejoice at this sight; for, as the author of the book Cosri discourses (par. iii. sect. 53), "If a man look only at the foregoing part of the work of this day (the killing of the sacrifices, the blood running about their hands; their slaying of them, washing the entrails, sprinkling the blood in order, kindling the fire), they would rather set his mind further off from God, than draw it near to him: till after all these things performed orderly, he saw the fire coming down from heaven, testifying to the presence of the Lord; or he felt another spirit excited in him, beyond anything he was accustomed withal before; or had Divine dreams, or heroic motions; which he believed were the effects of what he had been doing," &c. And no doubt, all good men, in future ages, felt their minds raised by the thoughts that the sacrifices they offered were as acceptable to God as that offered at this time; being consumed, in some sort, by the same fire, which burnt continually on this altar; and after this day, was never extinguished till the captivity. Which seems to be the original of that expression of the people, in their prayer for their king, that God would "remember all his offerings, and accept (turn to ashes, it is in the Hebrew) his burnt-sacrifice." Such as the evening sacrifices (St. Cyril tells Julian), we Christians still offer, but infinitely better, being spiritual and intellectual (and consequently nearer to the Divine nature), and that by fire sent from heaven, viz. the Holy Ghost (of whom this fire was but a figure), ἁταφορμικῶς την ἐκκλησίαν, 1 Illustrating the church; and enabling the members of it to offer continually the sweet-smelling sacrifices of faith, and hope, and charity, and righteousness, temperance, obedience, perpetual doxologies, and all other virtues (lib. x. contra Jul.)
CHAPTER X.

1 Nadab and Abihu, for offering of strange fire, are burnt by fire. 6 Aaron and his sons are forbidden to mourn for them. 8 The priests are forbidden to drink wine when they are to go into the tabernacle. 12 The Law of eating the holy things. 16 Aaron's excuse for transgressing thereof.

I And Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, took either of them his censer, and put fire therein, and put incense thereon, and offered strange fire before the Lord, which he commanded them not.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. [Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron,] His two eldest sons (Exod. vi. 23).

Took either of them his censer.] Here are two of their errors expressed in these words, if Abiralbin conjecture aright (who supposes this to have happened on the last day of their consecration, when fire came down from heaven); first, that they, without any order from God, to go and burn incense in the sanctuary. For though this did not belong to the office of the high-priest alone, yet, upon this solemn day, Aaron only was commanded to perform the whole service; as upon the day of expiation (Isa. 58). And this account Bochartus gives of their offence, that sive vocatione thus obtulenter, "they offered incense without any call to it" (Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 49, p. 557). And secondly, both of them went about this work; whereas the incense was to be offered only by one, and not by two at a time. Procopius Gazerus adds a third error; that they attempted this out of the due season for it, which was only in the morning and evening.

Put fire therein.] As the priests were required to offer "no strange incense" (Exod. xxx. 9), so, in all reason, they were to think it was not to be offered with strange fire; but only with a coal from that altar, where there was a fire kindled by God himself. Offered strange fire before the Lord.] There are two sins more (if Abiralbin take it right); that they brought fire from another place without the sanctuary, and did not take it from the altar; and then, that they attempted to go into the most holy place; which he thinks is signified by these words, before the Lord. The first of these is the opinion also of Aben Ezra, and other learned men among the Jews; who, by strange fire, understand fire that did not go out from before the Lord (ix. 24), that is, not taken from the altar of burnt-offering, where fire from heaven lately consumed their oblations. And so R. Bechah: "They imagined that the fire on the altar of burnt-offerings was only for consuming sacrifices; and therefore they fetch some from without for the burning incense." But as to the second thing, it doth not seem to me probable; for Aaron himself had not yet gone into the holy of holies.

Which he commanded them not.] This they did (saith Aben Ezra) from their own proper motion and opinion: without any authority from God: for whose order they should have waited, if his mind was not already sufficiently declared, as it was fairly awarded (xxvi. 12).

How two such excellent men as these (who had the honour to be called up to God, when he appeared on Mount Sinai, and to have a sight of him, and to eat and drink in his presence, Exod. xxiv. 1, 9, 10, &c.) came to be so rash, and to fall so unadvisedly into so great an error, as this here mentioned, cannot be certainly resolved. But it seems to me highly probable, that at the feast upon the peace-offerings, they had eaten and drunk too liberally; which made them forget themselves, and fall into this gross mistake. For I can see no other reason why that command (ver. 8), of not drinking wine or strong drink, when the priests were to go into the sanctuary, is annexed unto this story of their death and burial; but only this, which I have now alleged; that their miscarriage arose from drinking too much wine before this office was to be performed.

Ver. 2. There went out fire from the Lord.] As they were entering into the sanctuary, or as they stood at the golden altar, ready to offer incense, fire came out of the most holy place (where the glory of the Lord was), and struck them dead.

Devoured them.] It did not reduce their bodies to ashes, nor so much as burn their clothes (ver. 5), but they were killed as men sometimes are with lightning which penetrates into the vital parts, and puts a sudden end to their life. That is meant here by devoured them; took away their breath in a moment. From which expression the Hebrew doctors conclude, that when any body was condemned to be burnt, it was not to be consumed to ashes, but only examined by the fire; because this is called devoured or burning, here in this place (see Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 7, n. 1). They died before the Lord.] Fell down dead in the house of God. Which may seem too great a severity till it be considered how reasonable and necessary it was to inflict a heavy punishment upon the first transgressors of a law concerning a matter of great moment, to deter others from the like offence. Many instances of which there are in Scripture; some observed by St. Chrysostom upon Psalm vi. 2, where he gives this account, why the man who gathered a few sticks on the Sabbath day was adjudged to be stoned, as blasphemers were; because it was a very heinous thing, εὰν προμήθεων εἰδώλων παράβας τῷ πρόσωπαγμῷ, &c., "as soon as a law was enacted, immediately to break it;" which made it necessary it should be thus severely punished, to strike such a terror into others, that they might not dare to do the like, which was the reason, he observes, of the sudden death of Amanias and Sapphira, mentioned Acts v. Isidore of Pelusium hath made the same observation (lib. i. epist. 181), and goes so far back as to our first parents, who were dreadfully punished for a seemingly small offence, because they were the first transgressors. The same others have observed, of the punishment of Cain, who committed the first murder; of the Elishah of Solomon; of the idolatry of the golden calf; the conscience and sacrifice of Achan; the disobedience of Saul, the first king of Israel; the sudden death of Uzzah, who was the first that presumed to touch the ark of God.

Ver. 3. Moses said unto Aaron.] To satisfy him in the justice and wisdom of this dreadful stroke, at which he could not but be extremely affrighted. them that come nigh me, and before all the people I will be glorified. And Aaron held his peace.

4 And Moses called Michael and Elzaphan, the sons of Uzziel the uncle of Aaron, and said

I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me.] To come nigh unto God, is, in the holy language, to perform the office of a priest (Exod. xix. 22; Numb. xvi. 5), who, having the honour of attending upon the service of the Divine Majesty, was bound to approach into his presence with the greatest reverence. We do not read indeed those very words, which Moses here recites in the foregoing books; but, as many thinkers and doctors shall openly declare to us, the sense of these words is in the place forenamed Exod. xix. 22, and the reason of them in Exod. xxix. 42, 44, where the tabernacle being said to be sanctified by the Divine glory, and the priests being sanctified to minister unto him therein (which was seven days a doing, as we read here, viii. 35), they were plainly taught to draw nigh to God with a holy fear, and to do nothing rashly without his written word. For God being peculiarly known by the name of the Holy One, i.e. who hath incomparable perfections, such as no other being hath, he justly required to be accordingly worshipped, suitable to his most surpassing greatness; by peculiar rites of his own prescribing in a different manner from all other beings. It was, for instance, not to allow his eminency, or rather supereminent majesty, to have common fire (such as they employed in their kitchens) used for the burning sacrifices on his altar. And in like manner all other parts of his service were, in reason, to be performed after such a fashion as might signify their sense of the peculiar excellences of the Divine nature; who, therefore, sent fire from heaven as only fit to burn perpetually upon his altar.

Before all the people I will be glorified.] This may be thought to be but a solemn repetition of what was spoken before, as the manner is in these books to deliver the same thing twice in different words. Or the meaning is, if they who draw nigh to me will not sanctify me, I will vindicate my own honour by such punishment as shall overtake all that I am, the Holy One. Thus God is said to be honoured upon Pharaoh by drowning him in the Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 4).

Aaron held his peace.] Silently adored the justice of the Holy One, and did not complain of his severity. For this doth not seem to be the effect merely of great grief, but of great reverence to the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 4. Moses called Michael and Elzaphan.] It appears from Exod. vi. 18, that Uzziel, the father of Michael and Elzaphan (ver. 22), was the younger brother of Amram, the father of Aaron, and consequently Aaron’s uncle.

Come near, carry your brethren] All near kindred are called brethren in Scripture. And these cousinships of theirs are appointed to carry them out, because Aaron’s other sons were now attending upon God in their ministration, upon the day of their consecration. But without this special order, these two persons could not have been admitted to come near into the very sanctuary, being not of the family of priests, though of kin to them.

From before the sanctuary] See ver. 2.

Out of the camp.] For since they buried not in their cities, but in the fields adjacent to them (Gen. xxi. 9, 17), and so they did in aftertimes, Matt. xxvii. 7, and Luke viii. 27, where the tombs are plainly intimated to be without the city.

Ver. 5. So they went near.] There being two aczar and unto Ithamar, his sons, Uncover not your heads, neither rend your clothes; lest ye die, and lest wrath come upon all the people: but let your brethren, the whole house of Israel, bewail the burning which the Lord hath kindled. 7 And ye shall not go out from the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die: for the anointing oil of the Lord is upon you. And they did according to the word of Moses.

the priests of Isis. And Herodotus, also, in his Euterpe, whose words are these, αἱ ἑρωδεῖαι ὢν Θεῖω τοῖς μιν ὀλύμπωνοι, is Alexiptē δὲ ξερεύσα, "in other places the priests of the gods nourish the hair: but in Egypt they are shaved."

Neither rend your clothes. Which was another rite of mourning; not only among the Jews, but among all people in ancient times, especially in the eastern countries; as every one knows that hath read any of their authors (see Job i. 20). And it was used on many other occasions among the Jews, as well as in their funeral; particularly when any man blasphemed (Numb. xix. 16), when any ill tidings came which put them into a passion (2 Kings v. 7), or any misfortune befell them (Gen. xliv. 13; Judg. xi. 35). But was thought so unseemly in a priest, especially when he ministered, that the Jews say, they whose garments were rent by accident, were as incapable of ministering, as they who rent themselves in mourning.

The reason of this precept was (as R. Levi of Barcelona well observes, Precept. civ.), that it being not allowed in those countries for mourners to come into the presence of their kings (as appears by the history of Esther), much less was it seemly for any that attended upon the Divine Majesty, to come into his house in such a haste.

Precept. civii.) the dignity and majesty of the Divine worship were consulted; which, if his ministers had deserted on such occasions, for a moment, would have been brought into contempt. For it would have been a declaration that there was something in the world more to be regarded than God's service. And therefore the punishment of death is threatened (in the foregoing words) to those who were guilty of such an offence.

They did according to the word of Moses. Stayed in the tabernacle, without any of the usual tokens of mourning. Wherein they performed an eminent piece of obedience to God; whose commandment suppressed those natural affections, which are very hard to be kept in subjection.

Ver. 8. It may be thought that the Lord was so pleased with his obedience, that he himself now spake unto Aaron; whereas hitherto he had spoken to him by Moses.

Ver. 9. Do not drink wine nor strong drink. By wine every one knows is meant that liquor which is pressed out of grapes; and by shekar (which we translate strong drink) is meant such liquors as were made in imitation of wine, of dates or figs, and many other sorts of fruits; also that which was made of honey, which we call mead, and meadglin. There have been many authors of such liquors mentioned by Pliny (in his Natural History, lib. xiv. cap. 16), which he calls vinæ factitiae.

When ye go into the tabernacle. To perform your ministry. At other times they might drink wine: and, if we may believe the Jews, they did not offend against this precept, if, before they went into the sanctuary, they drank no more than a fourth part of a bottle; which contained an egg-shell and a half. If they exceeded this measure, then their ministry, they say, was profaned, and they were liable to death by the hand of Heaven. See R. Levi of Barcelona, Precept. civiii., who hath many niceties about this matter; as hath also Maimonides, mentioned by the learned Dr. Outram, in his book de Sacrificiis, lib. i. cap. 6, n. 4.

Leit ye die.] As their brethren did: see upon ver. 1, where I observed it to be very probable, that they were burnt with fire from the Lord upon this account. They that think it worth their while, may see after what manner the cabalists make out this, and what reflections they make upon it, in Theod. Heschkans Cabala Judaica, n. 144, 145.

It shall be a statute for ever. And such a law there was in some heathen countries, that no magistrate, all the year he was in office, nor any judge, while he was in action and employment, should κακοί ἐστίν ἢ ἀρχηγοί τοῖς ἐν χρόνιοι, "so much as taste a drop of wine." So Plato tells us; with which Eusebius compares this law of Moses (lib. xii. Praep. Evang, cap. 25). And Chremones the Stoic, describing (in Porphyry's book τον ἴδιον ἀθώον, lib. iv.) the diet of the Egyptian priests, tells us, that κακοί οὐδ' οὐδ' ὄντως οἷς ἐν ἐκνύτου, "some of them drank no wine at all, and others very little."

Ver. 10. That ye may put difference between holy 11 And that ye may teach the children of Israel all the statutes which the Lord hath spoken unto them by the hand of Moses.

12 ¶ And Moses spake unto Aaron, and unto Eleazar and unto Ithamar, his sons that were left, Take the meat offering that remaineth of the offerings of the Lord made by fire, and eat it without leaven beside the altar: for it is most holy:

13 And ye shall eat it in the holy place, because it is thy due, and thy sons' due, of the sacrifices of the Lord made by fire: for so I am commanded.

14 And the wave breast and heave shoulder shall ye eat in a clean place; thou, and thy sons, and thy daughters with thee: for they be thy due, and thy sons' due, which are given out of the sacrifices of peace offerings of the children of Israel.

15 The heave shoulder and the wave breast shall they bring with the offerings made by fire of the fat, to wave it for a wave offering before the Lord; and it shall be thine, and thy sons' with thee, by a statute for ever; as the Lord hath commanded.

16 ¶ And Moses diligently sought the goat of

Because it is thy due, &c.] Nobody might eat but holy persons; for so God directed, ch. ii. 3, vi. 16—18, vii. 9, 10.

Ver. 14. The wave breast and heave shoulder shall ye eat in a clean place.] They were not bound to eat these in the court of the tabernacle (as in the former case, ver. 13), but in any part of the camp that was not defiled.

Thou, and thy sons, and thy daughters with thee.] These being those which the Jews call lighter holy things, might be eaten by the whole family, as was before observed.

For they be thy due, and thy sons' due.] They were bestowed upon them by an express grant, vii. 34, where, though only his sons be mentioned, as they were present here, yet it is plain all the family, who were clean, might eat of these things (see upon vii. 19).

Ver. 15.] This also he inculcates again, which had been said before (vii. 29, 30), that they must take care first to wave these things before the Lord, and to burn the fat upon the altar: for till this was done, they had no right to eat these things.

It shall be thine, and thy sons'] When they had been presented to the Lord of the whole earth, and he had received his part, these became theirs, by an express grant from him (vii. 32—34).

By a statute for ever.] As long as such kind of sacrifices should last.

Ver. 16.] Moses diligently sought the goat.] Which had been offered for the people (ix. 15).

Behold, it was thine.] This justified Moses' suspicion and fear, that some mistake might have been committed in other matters; because he found, upon a diligent inquisition, that they had burnt upon the altar those parts of the sin-offering which they ought to have eaten themselves (vi. 26, 29). In which it was the easier for them to mistake, without diligent observation of Moses's directions; because the sin-offering, which had been offered for Aaron himself, was just before wholly burnt without the camp (ix. 11), and so were all the sin-offerings for the high-priest, and for the whole congregation, ordered to be (iv. 12, 21), that is, if their blood was carried into the holy place, then nothing of them might be eaten (vii. 30). But otherwise, their flesh was to be eaten in the court of the tabernacle, as is expressly commanded (vi. 26). This distinction they either did not well observe, when it was delivered; or, being oppressed with sorrow for the loss of Nadab and Abihu, they did not think it fit to feast at this time upon the flesh of this offering. For so Aaron excuses this fact (ver. 19).

He was angry with Eleazar and Ithamar.] He said nothing to Aaron, either because he was loth to add to his grief, or because it was the business of his sons to look after this sacrifice, and to see that the flesh of it was disposed of according to God's orders.
the sin offering, and, behold, it was burnt: and he was angry with Eleazar and Ithamar, the sons of Aaron which were left alive, saying, 17 Wherefore have ye not eaten the sin offering in the holy place, seeing it is most holy, and God hath given it you to bear the iniquity of the congregation, to make atonement for them before the Lord?

18 Behold, the blood of it was not brought in

The sons of Aaron which were left alive.] Who, by the punishment of their brethren, should have learned greater caution in their ministry.

Ver. 17. Wherefore have ye not eaten the sin offering in the holy place? That is, obeyed the commandment which I gave you (vi. 26). Seeing it is most holy.] See vi. 25. God hath given it you] See vi. 29.

To bear the iniquity of the congregation, &c.] God bestowed upon the priests this reward of their service, that they might be the more willing to take upon them the people's sins, and to make an expiation carefully for them. And indeed the very means of the people's sin-offering, argued the sins of the people were in some sort laid upon the priests; to be taken away by them. Which being done, they had reason to rejoice also in a feast upon this sacrifice; which God had been pleased to accept, for the taking away of the sins of the people. From whence the sacrifice of Christ may be explained, who is said to bear our iniquity (as the priest is said here to do), all our sins being laid on him; who took upon him to make an expiation for them by the sacrifice of himself. For the priest here by eating of the sin-offering, receiving the guilt upon himself, may well be thought to prefigure one who should be both priest and sacrifice for sin; which was accomplished in Christ.

Ver. 18. Behold.] Observe what I say to you. The blood of it was not brought in within the holy place.] It was none of those sacrifices which I commanded you to burn entirely, but required you to eat of (vi. 26, 30). Ye should indeed have eaten it in the holy place, as I commanded.] For as there was a peremptory law forbidding the priests to eat the flesh of any sacrifice whose blood was brought into the holy place, to make atonement with it; so there was as peremptory a law, that they should eat the flesh of those sacrifices for sin, whose blood was not brought in thither.

Ver. 19. Aaron said unto Moses.] Though Moses questioned only Eleazar and Ithamar, yet Aaron makes the answer: they not being able perhaps, to give an account of what they had done, though sensible of their mistake. Behold, this day have they offered their sin offering, &c.] His apology for them seems to be this, that they had not wholly violated God's command; but performed the substance of it, though they had failed in one circumstance. For they had not only offered the sin-offering for the people (for that is meant by their sin-offering), but also their burnt-offering (ix. 15, 16), and that before the Lord, in the place where he ordered them to be offered. In all this Aaron was the principal minister, but they assisted him; for it is expressly said, they presented unto him the blood of the peace-offerings (which at the same time were also offered), and they put the fat upon the breasts, when he burnt the fat upon the altar (ix. 18, 20). Such things have befallen me:] After this was done, followed the death of Nadab and Abihu, who went in to burn incense: which struck him into such a great consternation, and made him so exceeding sad, that he was not fit to feast with Eleazar and Ithamar upon the sacrifice; and so suffered them to burn it. If I had eaten the sin offering to day, should it have been accepted?] Would God have been pleased with me, if in such sadness and sorrow I had eaten of the sacrifice! This is the reason whereby he justifies the omission of which his sons were accused, in not eating the sin-offering in the holy place. The blame of which he takes upon himself; for to have eaten it with a sad countenance and a heavy heart, he thought would have been to pollute it. And therefore he chose to forbear it, and to give it wholly to God, by burning the flesh of it, as he had done the fat; which he hoped would be more acceptable than to eat it in grief. And to eat it without grief and sorrow was impossible; for though they had not been so dutiful to him as they ought to have been, yet he could not extinguish the affection of a father towards them, nor suddenly cease to mourn inwardly for their untimely death.

From this place Maimonides gathers, there was but one day of mourning due to the dead, viz. the first; the rest were added by the constitution of the elders.

Ver. 20. When Moses heard that, he was content.] He was either satisfied with his reason, and thought he had done well (for nature seems to have directed what was afterwards enjoined, that they should rejoice in their feasts, Deut. xii. 7, &c., and not eat holy things in their mourning, xxvi. 14), or he would not further charge him with a fault, for which there was so far an excuse. For where there is no wilful contempt, but rather a respect intended in any action, all good men are inclined to make a favourable construction of it, and grant it an indulgence, though there be some error in it.
CHAPTER XI.

What beasts may, 4 and what may not be eaten. 9 What fishes. 13 What foulks. 29 The creeping things which are unclean.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses and to Aaron, saying unto them,
2 Speak unto the children of Israel, saying,

These are the beasts which ye shall eat among all the beasts that are on the earth.
3 Whosoever parteth the hoof, and is cloven-footed, and which divideth the doorkind being the seat of the soul, where it doth its business, God would have it fitted to the desires and employments of the soul. And therefore the law (saith he) removes from us all those things which may hinder the soul in its operations. For which reason such and such meats are forbidden, as breed ill blood: among which, if there be some whose hurtfulness is neither visible to us, nor to physicians, do not wonder at it; for the faithful Physician, who forbids them, is wiser than any of us."

This opinion I cannot think to be wholly groundless: for though there be some creatures here prohibited, which seem to us of as good nourishment as those which are allowed; yet, considering that climate wherein the Jews lived, and the temper of their blood, which was very hot, and apt to be extremely corrupted (as appears by the unusual leprosy to which they were obnoxious, more than other nations), it is reasonable to conclude, that God had some respect to this, in the ordering of their diet (see J. Wagensell Consp. Carminis R. Lipmanii, p. 550). Yet I cannot think this to have been the chief reason of this law (though it be very agreeable to the peculiar care God had of his people, that he should not only give them civil and sacred laws, but direct them in the smallest matters, as he did in their apparel, building, &c.), but the main drift and scope of it was, that the Israelites might be separated from all other nations in the world by a diet peculiar to themselves, which kept them from such a familiar conversation, as otherwise they might have had with the gentiles; and consequently from learning their idolatrous customs. And I do not see why I should not add, most of the creatures, which are reckoned unclean, were such as were in high esteem and sacred among the heathen. As a Serpe was to Venus, the owl to Minerva, the blackbird to Apollo, the eagle to Jupiter, and even the dog to Hecate, &c. Whence Origen justly falls into a high admiration of Moses's wisdom: who so perfectly understood all animals, and what relations they had to demons, that he pronounced all those to be unclean, "νανύβακαναναπαλίριεςκαὶταςκαπναςτων

Ver. 1.] The consecration of Aaron being now completely finished, God spake to him, as well as unto Moses; for he being also highly concerned to teach the people the difference that is here made between several sorts of meats (x. 11), which Moses assures them was enacted by Divine authority.

Ver. 2.] They were all to take special notice of what follows, because, by the diet here prescribed, they were discriminated from all other people in the world.

There are the beasts that ye shall eat. God having bestowed upon mankind, after the flood, every living thing to be their food (Gen. ix. 3), it hath raised a question among learned men, why God should limit and restrain his own people from the benefit of this general grant. And some have thought this so unaccountable, that they have said it is in vain to inquire into the reason of the difference that is made here of meats; concerning which P. Canusus declares (as Plutarch doth of the laws of Solon and Lycurgus), that no doubt they were enacted with wise counsel; but the reason of the authors cannot be known (lib. ii. Republ. Heb. cap. 34). But others think the reason is plain enough; and the Jews are of opinion, that the creatures here called unclean, were forbidden to be eaten, because they were unhallowed food. So Maimonides discourses at large in his More Nevoh, par. iii. cap. 48, where he saith, there can be no doubt that every thing here prohibited yields a bad nourishment, except it be swine's flesh and fat; and yet he endeavours to show, that there is no reason to think otherwise of those two. R. Levi of Barcelona is of the same mind, but pretends not to be able to demonstrate it, as Maimonides doth. For the sum of a long and copious discourse, which he hath upon this subject (Precept. lixxix. where he treats of that flesh which was torn by wild beasts) amounts to this: "that the footed, and cheweth the cud, among the beasts, that shall ye eat.

4 Nevertheless these shall ye not eat of them that chew the cud, or of them that divide the hoof: as the camel, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof; he is unclean unto you.

horses, asses, and mules: others that are καιμακταρια, "divided into several parts," like toes; as bison, wolves, and dogs: but a third sort that are only δικεφαλα (as Aristotle calls them), "divided into two parts;" as oxen, deer, sheep, goats, &c. And these are of two kinds; for some divide the hoof into two parts, but it is not cloven quite through; as the camel, whose hoof is parted above, but joined by a thick skin below, and therefore reckoned among the unclean beasts. Others both divided and cloven, which are those allowed by this law to be clean creatures.

And cheweth the cud, &c.] As all those beasts do, which are not ἀσφάλοετα (as Aristotle calls them, lib. x. cap. 50), that is, have not a set of teeth both above and below: such are oxen, sheep, and goats, which want upper teeth; and therefore bring their meat up again into their mouths, after it hath been some time in the stomach; that it may, by a new chewing of it, be better prepared for digestion. So the author of Porta Celi, who explains this very exactly, when he saith, "For want of upper teeth they cannot chew their food perfectly at one time; nor can the stomach make a perfect digestion till it be ground a second time." And therefore parts are parted with a double stomach; an upper, into which the meat goes down after the first chewing; and another, into which it is sent, after it hath been ground a second time.

That shall ye eat.] The Hebrews truly observe (particularly R. Levi Barzelonita, Preceptecl exij.), that all kind of worms and maggots, which had got every one of these marks (of parting the hoof, and being cloven-footed, and chewing the cud) were unlawful to be eaten.

Ver. 4.] This is added as an explanation of the foregoing rule, to show, that if any of the forementioned marks were wanting, such creatures must not be eaten.

Jo the camel, &c.] The latter part of this character is not to be understood, as if the camel did not divide the hoof at all; but not quite through, so as to be κεφι, as well as divided. For though its hoof be divided above, it coheres below, as R. Solomon observes, and so doth Aristotle (lib. ii. cap. 1), and Pliny (lib. ii. cap. 45). This being so very plainly expressed in this law, it is something strange that Heligabalus should order the flesh of camels and ostriches to be served up to his table, Dicenus, praecipue Judaïd us ut edenter: "saying, the Jews were commanded to eat them;" as Lampridius reports his words (cap. 28). Salmacius, indeed, upon that place, saith he found these two words, struthiones and camellos, joined together, to make one word in a MS. of the Palatine library, which reads struthiones. Diodorus, in his History, which seems to some to mean the matter; but then they are forced to interpret praecipue by concessum, as if he had said, "God did not forbid this meat to the Jews:" which is altogether uncertain. It is better to say, that though many of the pagans did read the law of Moses, yet they did it carelessly, without sufficient attention to it.

Ver. 5. Coney.] Much might be said to justify our translation of the word σαφαν, by the English coney, if it could be proved that they chew the cud; which they do not, having upper teeth. Therefore, Bochart, by many arguments, proves this word, saphan, to signify a mountain mouse; which, as Solomon saith (Prov. xxx. 26), make their holes in rocks: which rabbits do not; but this creature doth, as he proves out of the Arabian writers; who call it liṣṭarbu, and so it chew the eud (see Hierozoleon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 33).

Because he cheweth the cud, &c.] Of rathor, though he cheweth the cud, yet wanting the other mark, they were to look upon it as unclean.

Ver. 6. And the hare, because he cheweth (or though he cheweth) the cud,) The same author shows in the same book (cap. 37), that the Hebrew word arnibeth is rightly translated a hare. For though no author, but Moses, saith it cheweth the cud, yet Aristotle saith something like it, lib. iii. cap. 22, where he observes, it hath the same propriety, &c. This he found in an Arabian author, in his Histor. Anatom. Hist. Cent. 9. Histo. xxxvi., tells us, that in his dissection of a hare, though he found but one stomach, which made him wonder, at first, that Moses should reckon it among the creatures that ruminate, yet he found, that what was wanting in the simple stomach was supplied by the largeness of the intestinum carenum, which gut is of a great bigness, consisting of parts which large, which he found liquid and white excrements (like to chyle, as if it were another stomach; the other part towards the ileum, being full of black excrements.

Ver. 7. And the swine,—he is unclean to you.] Though the swine hath the first part of the mark of a clean creature completely, being cloven-footed, as well as having the cud divided, yet not chewing the cud, it is forbidden to be eaten. And this, no doubt, was the sole foundation of the Jews abstaining from this meat. Whose filthy feeding and wallowing in the mire, Maimonides fancies, was the only cause why it was prohibited (More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 48). To which others add, its feeding upon flesh, as he confesseth in the lib. iii. cap. 41, and lib. iii. cap. 42, where he gives other reasons also for it. One of which, viz. that it was apt to breed the leprosy, to which they were very subject in those countries, is ingeniously treated of by Petrus Cuneus in his Republ. Hebrewor. (lib. ii. cap. ult.) and more lately by another very learned person, J. Wagenseil, Carlini R. Lipmanni Confutatio, p. 556. To which Clemens Alexandrinus adds several other reasons (lib. vii. Strom. p. 718), and there are many more in Lactantius relating to mortality (lib. iv. Divin. Instruct. cap. 17). But whatsoever grounds there might be of this prohibition, that alone could not be the reason why the whole nation of the Jews abhorred this more than any other unclean creature, which was equally forbidden to them with him. In which, that is certain, that when they spoke of it, mention its proper name; but called it another (or a strange) thing. Which arose from some other cause; that, in process of time, made this the most abominable of all other creatures. And that was, I take it, because the Gentiles used it in their sacrifices and mysteries of religion; and because nothing was accounted a more delicious food among many great nations; which (if a vehement abhorrence had not been infused into the Jews of this creature) might have invited them to their tables, and bred such familiarity with them, as might have concluded in idolatry. Pliny observes (lib. viii. cap. 51),

5 And the coney, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof; he is unclean unto you.

6 And the hare, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof; he is unclean unto you.

7 And the swine, though he divide the hoof,
CHAPTER XI.

And all that have not fins and scales in the seas, and in the rivers, of all that move in the waters, and of any living thing which is in the waters, they shall be an abomination unto you:

11 They shall be even an abomination unto you; ye shall not eat of their flesh, but ye shall have their carcases in abomination.

12 Whatsoever hath no fins nor scales in the waters is an abomination unto you.

that no creature affords greater plenty of delicious dishes at their tables than this, "Neque alio ex animali numeriosior materia ganae," &c. Insomuch that old Homer, relating how Eumæus entertained Ulysses (Odys. xiv.), saith only, that he killed a great hog of five years old, and that only for five guests. They that would see more of this, may look into Petrus Castellanus, lib. ii. de Esu Carnium, cap. 1, 2, &c. where he shows also, out of Varro (lib. ii. de Rustica, cap. 4), that the gentiles knew of no sacrifices more ancient than this, after they began to offer animals upon their altars. For they thought that would be most acceptable to their gods, which best pleased themselves: insomuch that a swine, which the ancients Greeks called εὐς, was not without their sacred rites. So illo verbo quod dictum Serafin, "from that word which signifies to sacrifice." For the first sacrifices were of this creature, as appears by the mysteries of Ceres, in which a sow was offered; and at their marriages the ancient kings and great men of Etruria offered the like sacrifice; and so did the Latins and Greeks in Italy. The Hierapolitans, indeed, looked upon swine, as τό τρίων σουσαμίνων, and would rather call it a swine, than offer them to their gods; nor would they of Pessinuntum, in Galatia; quod prorsus Mosaicum est, "they which learnt, in all likelihood, from Moses," as Huetius thinks (Demonst. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 11, n. 1). But in many other nations this food was highly valued: and Athenaeus, I observe, gives the very same reason of its name that Varro doth (lib. ix. Delphos.): οὐδὲ σφήν εὐεργείου ἢ παρθένου, τὸς εἰς τῶν πάντων σπέρματα. From whence it is, that Aristophanes calls them μυτοκρόον, "myetical swine," in his Acharn. because as the scholariat there explains it, διὰ τοῦ τῶν Μυτόκρων ὄνομας λέγειν, "they were offered in the mysteries of Ceres." And Julian himself, in his oration upon the Mother of the Gods (Orat. v.), confesses of them, that the ancients hallowed them, diaphanòs, "it was deservedly believed to be a grateful sacrifice to the terrestrial gods" (p. 333. Edit. Patav.).

Ver. 8. Of their flesh shall ye not eat, and their carcase shall ye not touch.] Some think the latter part of this precept signifies no more, but that they should not meddle with their carcases to prepare it for meat (as the text of Curs. Hier. is understood, Gen. x. 5), though they did not eat it. But others take it more largely, that they should not so much as open them, to take out the fat, and apply it to any use. In this the Jews are so scrupulous, that they say they may not touch them (though alive) with one of their fingers, for fear of the leprosy. It being a proverbial saying amongst them, as Castellanus saith concerning the Kaddaschim, that "ten measures of leprosy descending into the world, swine took to themselves nine of them, and the rest of the world one."

If we may believe Herodotus (lib. ii. cap. 47), the Egyptians looked upon swine as so unclean, that if any one touched one of them by chance, as he passed by, he was bound to wash himself, with his garments, in the river. Certain it is, that not only they, but the Abians, and some other neighbouring nations, did abstain from swine's flesh, as Bochartus and others have observed (see his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 57, p. 702, and Petr. Castellanus, lib. ii. de Esu Carnium, cap. 4), which they learned, I doubt not, at first from the Jews; and afterward found other reasons for it. This abhorrence of swine is propagated into far distant countries among the Mahometans; particularly into Hindoos, one of the Philippine islands; where, if any one have but touched one of these creatures, he is not permitted to come into anybody's house for many days after. So Dampier relates in a late voyage round the world (chap. 12, p. 343), where he says, "the sultan's brother having a pair of swines made him by one of their ship's company, did not wear them, till they were killed; and having worn them, fell into a great passion, when he was told the thread wherewith the shoes were sewed, was pointed with hog's bristles; and would not wear them."

Ver. 9. These shall ye eat of all that are in the waters.] Though some of the heathens abstained perpetually from all fish, and others only for some time, (as Curs. Hier. says, when they were under strict prohibitions of purity) (as Julian tells us in the forementioned oration v.), yet God left his people at greater liberty, prohibiting to them only some kinds of fish; by abstinence from which they were sufficiently distinguished from those nations which did eat all indifferently, and accounted fish the greatest delicacy.

Whatsoever hath fins and scales] If both these marks did not concur in a fish, they were not to eat it. But their doctors say (as we learn from R. Levi Barzelonita, Precept. cl.), that if but one scale was found on a fish, it was accounted lawful; and they needed not to observe whether it had fins or none: for all that have scales, they say, have fins; though, on the contrary, all that have fins have not scales. They observe, also, truly, that it is so, that young fish before their scales appeared, if they were of that kind which have scales when they are grown. And, thirdly, all fishes that have scales when they are in the sea, but eat them when they are taken out, are lawful.

In the waters, in the seas, and in the rivers.] By waters in this place, as distinguished from seas and rivers, are meant lakes and ponds. And so Moses expresses all the places where fish is found.

Ver. 10. All that have not fins and scales, &c.] There was an ancient law among the Romans, made by Numa, that no fish which wanted scales should be used in those feasts which they made in honour of their gods. So Pliny tells us, lib. xxxii. Nat. Hist. cap. 2, where he quotes an ancient writer for it.

Ver. 11. An abomination put unto you.] The next words explain what he means by abomination; that they should not eat their flesh, nor touch their carcases.

Ver. 12. He repeats it again, that they might take notice, that this alone was a sufficient mark of difference: and therefore he doth not give any instance of particular fishes that might be eaten, or not, as he did of beasts. He uses also the word abomination concerning prohibited fishes (which he doth not of such beasts, which he only calls unclean), because there was greater disadvantage of their transgressing in this matter; fishes being a more usual food among the eastern people than flesh. Insomuch, that among the later Greeks, the word ὄρνις, which signifies all manner of vulturals came to be used peculiarly for fish. See Bochartus, in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. i. cap. 6, where he observes, also, the greatest luxury was committed in this sort of food; which any one may see that reads Athenaeus.

Ver. 13.] Here are no notes given, as in the two foregoing sorts of creatures, to distinguish clean birds from unclean: and therefore the Hebrew doctors say, all birds are lawful to be eaten, but these twenty-four mentioned in this chapter, which they were to have in abhorrence. Yet they are supposed to give four marks of a clean bird; the principal of which are, if it do not fasten its talons; i. e. be not rapacious, and have one claw longer than the rest (see R. Levi Barzelonita, Precept. cixi.).

They are an abomination: This is repeated to make them more careful in this matter.

Eagle.] He names in the first place, the king of birds, as Pindar calls the eagle, οὐσίης βασιλέα, whose flesh is very hard, and whose nature is very rapacious: and therefore, both upon a natural and moral account, some authors fancy it was forbidden to be eaten (see Vossius, lib. iii. de Orig. et Progr. Idol. cap. 77). But I think Origen hath given a better account of it, in the place I named above; that Moses by his admirable wisdom understood what creatures were looked upon as prophetic by the Egyptians and other nations; and these he prohibited to the Jews: among which he expressly names the eagle and the hawk (lib. iv. contra Celsum, p. 229). Bochartus, Sigalrus saith (lib. ii. cap. 6), the άρνις παράδειγμα τούτων, "the people of Thesee worship the eagle," looking upon it as a royal bird, and worthy of Jupiter. And Julian in his oration upon the Mother of the Gods (Orat. v.) saith, that in the time of their strictest purifications, they were permitted θετείς χρυσάσα (so Spanheimus truly reads in the late edition of Julian's works), "to eat birds," πνη ὀρνίς: οὗ ἱερὸς τὸν πατὴρ συμβεβήκε, "except a few which had been commonly held sacred." Which is a plain acknowledgment of the sacredness of some birds among the gentiles.

Ostrich.] All authors in a manner agree, that the Hebrew word περας signifies a kind of eagle; but what kind is not so certain. Bochartus thinks it is rightly translated by Junius, as it is in the LXX., by the Hebrew word παρας, in Micah iii. 3, is used for breaking of bones (see Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 5).

Ostray.] This is also of the same species; and signifies that sort which the Greeks call καλυτες, the sea-eagle. But Bochartus in the same book, cap. 6, thinks the Hebrew word אוֹשִׂף, rather signifies that which they call καλομεταρίς, the black eagle. Which though it be the least, yet is the strongest of all other, and therefore called ευλεία by the Romans: and was so noted for many other qualities, besides its great strength, that it makes it probable Moses did not here omit it.

The waters, that shall be an abomination unto you. 13 And these are they which ye shall have in abhorrence among the fowls; they shall not be eaten, they are an abomination: the eagle, and the ostridge, and the ospray, Ver. 14. Fulture, and the kite] No wonder interpreters differ in their translation of the two Hebrew words, daa or ajia: the former of which we translate a vulture, the latter a kite (which others translate quite contrary, taking daa, or raas, as it is called in Deuteronomy, for a kite), because there is no way to find the signification of them, unless it be, by the roots, from whence they may be thought to be derived. Which makes Bochart think the first ought to be translated a kite, called daa, from its very swift flight, Most of the ancient and later interpreters also are of this mind. As for the second word in this verse, ajia, some take it for a vulture: but Bochart, from several observations, judges it to be a kind of hawk or falcon (see the same book, cap. 8). After this word there be followers in Deuteronomy supposed to be a bird which is here omitted, called ajia, which he takes for the black vulture; as the reader may find in the next chapter (cap. 9).

After his kind] Though there be some little difference in shape, yet these birds all belong to one species (see ver. 22).

Ver. 15. The gray raven] Nobody doubts that the Hebrew word oreeb (which signifies blakness), is rightly translated a raven; of which the Arabian writers mention four kinds. And some think under this name is comprehended, not only crows, and daws, and crows; but starlings and pies also (see Bochartus, cap. 10, p. 302).

Ver. 16. Owl.] The Hebrew word babhænas, it appears by many places in the prophets, signifies a bird which inhabits the wildernesses, and desolate places (see Isa. xxxii. 21, xxxiv. 13; Jer. i. 39, &c.). By which the ancient interpreters of Scripture almost unanimously understand the ostrich; though a very learned man of our own nation (Nic. Fuller in his Miscellaneous, lib. vi. cap. 7), endeavours by a probable translation of the Heb. to prove babhænas, babhænas. Though he hath been the constant persuasion of the Jews, that God did not permit them to eat the flesh of an ostrich, which is nowhere forbidden, if not in this word. And therefore Bochartus maintains against our Fuller, and labours to prove that babhænas signifies the female ostrich, par. ii. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 14, where he shows the word bath (i.e. daughter) is prefixed to the name of many birds, without any respect to their age, and doth not signify their young ones; but only the females.

Night hawk.] In the next chapter to that now named, the same Bochart proves, that the Hebrew word thæmus (which we here translate the night-hawk), signifies male ostrich. For there is no general rule by which we can determine the difference between the gender of the Hebrew language, to comprehend both sexes (as there is for an eagle and raven), and therefore Moses mentions both male and female distinctly, that none might think, by forbidding one of them only, he allowed the other.

Cuckow.] The LXX., St. Jerome, and some later interpreters translate the Hebrew word soycograph by the Greek word δακτυλιος, a "seemull." Which the same great man, before mentioned, thinks most probable (cap. 18).

Hawk] There is the greatest consent in the translation of the Hebrew word netz, which all agree signifies a hawk; from its strength and swiftness in flight, which made it sacred to Apollo. For Eusta-
CHAPTER XI.

18 And the swan, and the pelican, and the gier eagle.

19 And the stork, the heron after her kind, and the lapwing, and the bat.

20 All fowls that creep, going upon all four, shall be an abomination unto you.

21 Yet these may ye eat of every flying creeping thing that goeth upon all four, which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth:

22 Even these of them ye may eat; the locust after his kind, and the bald locust after his had in honour by the people of Thessaly, and by the Egyptians, as he observed in the formentioned book, cap. 29.

Herons] There are at least ten different interpretations of the Hebrew word anaptra; among which ours is one. But it being derived from a word which signifies anger, Bochartus rather takes it for a mountain-balon, which is a fierce bird, and very prone to anger.

Lapwing.] The Hebrew doctors take dukiophah for a mountain-rock, which had a double crest, and whence hath its name, according to R. Solomon. Or rather it may be called from the place where it reports; for diek in Arabic is a rock, and kapha a rock, from whence Bochart probably conjectures this bird had its name, because it lives in mountainous places. And he thinks the LXX. and the Vulgar have rightly translated it Derosa, and upasam: which is the sense also of four Arabian interpreters. It is a portentous kind of bird, which hath a crest round its bill to the hindermost part of its head; and one of the principal birds used in the ancient superstitions of the magicians and augurs, as he observes, cap. 31.

Bur. As Moses begins the catalogue of birds with the noblest, which is the eagle, so he ends it with the vilest, which is a bat; being of a dubious kind, as Aristotle observes, between a bird and a mouse, lib. iv. cap. 13, where he saith it doth ιακοπτερον τοσ πετων και πιακον, &c. See the famous Bochartus, who shows that his name in Hebrew, which is attaleph, imports it to be a bird of darkness. Whence that phrase in the prophet Isaiah, ii. 20, "In that day a man shall cast his idols of silver and gold to the bats, and to the moles:" i.e. they shall no more appear to delude men with their glittering brightness, but be utterly destroyed.

Ver. 20. Fowls that creep.] The Hebrew word oph is not well translated fowls; but signifies rather all flying things going upon all fours. All flying things that are meagre, and seldom forbidden; such as the kinds of flies, and wasps, and bees, as Jonathan here explains it. A fly indeed is observed to be izonov; but though it have six feet, yet it goes only upon four, as not only Lucian, but Aristotle notes; the two fore-feet serve for other uses (see Bochart in his Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 9).

Shall be an abomination unto you.] It is observed by some, that the birds here forbidden are either rapacious, and live on flesh (as eagles and hawks, &c.), or are night birds (as owls, &c.), or haunt lakes and marshes (as the bittern, &c.), or are heavy, and not easily raised from the earth, as the ostrich; or live in graves or in dung, as the upupa and some of those flying things mentioned in this verse: and upon these accounts are forbidden by Moses; who allows all those that live upon a cleaner food, as those that follow do.

Ver. 21. Yet these may ye eat of every flying creeping thing, &c.] In this verse he excepts such flying insects, as, besides their four feet whereby they go, have two legs or thighs, which enable them to leap upon the earth, as well as to go. Such are all other insects mentioned in the next verse; unto which Aristotle ascribes six feet, whereas Moses mentions but four. In which they do not disagree; for Aristotle plainly saith, "they have six feet, εις τοις..." kind, and the beetle after his kind, and the grasshopper after his kind.

23 But all other flying creeping things, which have four feet, shall be an abomination unto you.

24 And for these ye shall be unclean: whosoever toucheth the carcase of them shall be unclean until the even.

25 And whosoever beareth ought of the carcase of them shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even.

26 The carcases of every beast which divideth the hoof, and is not clovenfooted, nor cheweth the cud, are unclean unto you: every one that toucheth them shall be unclean.

27 And whatsoever goeth upon his paws, among all manner of beasts that go on all four, dreed and ninety-three); of which he seeing hogs and hens and other creatures feeding greedily, he and his family adventured to eat freely of them also, and found the taste of them like that of a crab. And a Jew of Jerusalem, who was then in their country, assured him, that the locusts in Judea were much of the same shape with these in Germany, which he demonstrated to him by a draught he had made of them.

After his kind.] Here it may be fit to note, in the conclusion of all, that this phrase, after his kind (which is so often repeated in this discourse of fowls and flying things), doth not necessarily signify that there are different kinds of every bird or flying thing to which it is applied; but only imports every one of that kind. For he doth not speak in the plural number, according to their kinds, but in the singular, after his kind; which only denotes that the whole species is prohibited. And what he saith of some fowls, is in reason to be applied to all; though, to avoid repetition, he doth not add these words [after his kind] to every one of them.

Ver. 23. All other flying creeping things, which have four feet, and whosoever they were locusts, or any other kind of creature, who came under this character, they were to avoid them carefully.

Ver. 24. Whosoever toucheth the carcase. If they did either eat of them, or so much as touch the carcase of them, they might not be admitted to come into the tabernacle, nor eat of any holy thing, nor converse with their neighbours.

Until the even.] He doth not say they were to wash themselves, or their clothes (as in the following verse), which would incline one to think, that their mere separation for all the day, from communing with God and with one another, was their cleansing, without any other purification. But there are so many commands for washing themselves, and their clothes, in other directions than this, that it hath persuaded some to think such cleansing was necessary in this case also (see xv. 5—8, 10, and several other verses in that chapter).

Ver. 25. Whosoever beareth ought of the carcase of them.] Though they were only to carry them out of the camp or city, to remove them out of the way, that they might not infect the air.

Shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even.] His body also, in all likelihood, was to be washed, as was required in other purifications. No time is appointed for this, which, perhaps, a man might think fit to do presently, but, notwithstanding, he was to remain unclean till the setting of the sun.

Ver. 26.] He takes occasion from hence to inform them, that it was not unlawful to touch the carcases of beasts, before prohibited to be eaten (ver. 3. &c.), as of the fowl and flying things now mentioned. But while they were alive it was not unlawful to touch them; for they used carnals, and horses, and asses, for their necessary service; and therefore it is so expressed in other things (ver. 31), when they are dead.
those are unclean unto you: whose toucheth their carcase shall be unclean until the even.
28 And he that beareth the carcase of them shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: they are unclean unto you.
29 ¶ These also shall be unclean unto you among the creeping things that creep upon the earth; the weasel, and the mouse, and the tortoise after his kind, ape, the lion, the bear, dogs and cattle, &c., whose forefoot resembles hands: these might neither be eaten, nor their carcases touched, without incurring uncleanness till sunset.

Ver. 28.] See ver. 25.

Ver. 29. These also shall be unclean] So that they might not so much as touch them (as it is explained ver. 31), when they are dead, much less eat them.

Among the creeping things that creep] Among things that have such short feet, that some of their bellies seem to touch the ground.

Wasel.] Though most interpreters follow this translation of the Hebrew word chelol; yet Bochart hath alleged a great many probable reasons that it signifies a male; and one is, because it is joined here with the word Hemorion, p. l. lib. iii. cap. 35, where he treats of this very largely.

Mouse.] All acknowledge the Hebrew word hechbar signifies mouse, and more especially a field-mouse, which doth great mischief there; and thence hath its name, as the same Bochartus shows in the foregoing chapter of that book. But all sorts of mice are here to be understood, as Jonathan observes, who thus paraphrases this word, "the black mouse, the red, and the white;" for they are of so many colours.

Tortoise] The same author has taken a great deal of pains to prove that tzab doth not signify a tortoise; but as the LXX. and St. Jerome take it, a land-crocodile, which is a large sort of lizard, a cubit long, with which Arabia abounds; out of which language he endeavours at large to prove the truth of this interpretation (lib. iv. cap. 1).

Ver. 30. Ferret.] Out of the same language, and the Syriac and Samaritan paraphrase, the same judicious writer proves, that anahka signifies another sort of lizard, which the Latins called stellio, and in those countries, hath a shrill cry (see there, cap. 2).

Chameleon.] Most of the ancient interpreters take coinomen, for this word, "the black mouse, the red, and the white;" for this is the name (as this name imports) of all other; and in these countries was famous for its encounters with serpents and land-crocodiles; as the aforesaid Bochartus shows out of the Arabian writers (lib. cap. 3).

Lizard.] All the ancient interpreters agree, that the Hebrew word letan signifies a sort of lizard, but of what kind it is hard to determine. The aforesaid Bochartus, by the Arabic writers both shown, it is like to that which is of a reddish colour, and lies close to the earth, infecting the meat which it touches with its venom (lib. cap. 4).

Snail.] The same admirable person, with great probability, still thinks Moses speaks of a sort of lizard called here conemel, because it lies in the sand, which, in the Talmudic language, is called conemel (lib. cap. 5).

Mole.] It is apparent that the word hinsemael, which we here translate a mole, is of a very doubtful signification: for in the sixteenth verse of this chapter, it signifies a sort of vessel; as here, in all probability, another sort of lizard. And if we may guess what sort, by the original of the word, it probably signifies the chromel, which grapes to draw in air (see Bochart, Histor. par. i. lib. iv. cap. 6). But 30 And the ferret, and the chameleon, and the lizard, and the snail, and the mole.

31 These are unclean to you among all that creep: whosesoever doth touch them, when they are dead, shall be unclean until the even.

32 And upon whatsoever any of them, when they are dead, doth fall, it shall be unclean; whether it be any vessel of wood, or raiment, or skin, or sack, whatsoever vessel it be wherein after all that can be said, it must be acknowledged, the significations of all these words are lost among the Jews; as Aben Ezra confesses upon this verse: "Neither these eight sorts of creeping things, nor the birds before mentioned, are known to us, but by tradition." Which is as much as to say, they are not known at all; for there is no tradition about them, as the Talmudists acknowledge; who send those who are doubtful what birds are lawful, and what not, to be informed by those that are masters of the art of fowling. Which might help to convince the Jews, were they not resolved to shut their eyes, that difference of meats is now ceased, because they know not what is forbidden, and what not, in many cases. And, consequently, the Messiah is come, to whom the scripture of Psalms (xviii. 10) was addressed to their father Jacob's prophecy, Gen. xlix. 10), so that they should be no longer separated, but all nations collected into one body, and converse freely together, without any danger of being defiled. For idolatry being abolished by him, there was no reason remaining for keeping up the discrimination between Jews and gentiles by a different diet. This some of the present Jews saw very well, who said, that in the days of the Messiah it should not be unlawful to eat swine's flesh, no more than it was while they were subduing the land of Canaan. This tradition is acknowledged by Abbarbinel himself in his Rosch Annah, where he disputes for the eternity of their law, and endeavours to elucidate this tradition of the ancient doctors by allegorical interpretations (see J. Carpio's in Stuckard. Mischpah. hammelech, cap. 5. Theorem. xviii.).

Ver. 31. These are unclean to you] The Jews understand this with respect to the touching the dead carcases of these creatures, and make the sense of it to be, "These eight alone are unclean to you; all other reptiles, as serpents, and scorpions, &c., you may touch and none harm will befall you." This is confirmed by the prophet Isaiah (xviii. 6), that the days of the Messiah should be prosperous and fruitful. The word of the Lord shall be a vessel of health, and not of death, and a garment to cover you in all the days of the Messiah, shall be the fruit of righteousness, and the effect of perpetual salvation. And his spirit shall make you strong for the days of his prosperity and salvation. (Jer. xxvii. 6.) And this prophecy of the prophet is very ancient; for they say, that the prophet Ezechiel observed, that when the Messiah was come, there shall be no more hollow serpents and scorpions, as the Hebrews express it, Ezech. xii. 13. (Asa. 25. R. c.) The word house is also very properly translated vessel; and the fire is the same thing as wood; and the vessel as the wood, and these as a whole, as the word Vessels, Precept. clii. For nothing was unclean by Moses's law, whilst it was alive, but only a leper, and a woman in her separation. Worms, dogs, swine, &c., were unclean to be touched, only when they are dead.

Until the even.] See ver. 4. This was a plain document, as Pellican there observes, that there are no impurities that are so offensive as these; but it was merely a prudential constitution, to make such defilements end within the day wherein they were contracted.

Ver. 33. Upon whatsoever any of them, when they are dead, doth fall.] That is, it might not be used till it was cleansed. Wherein the same R. Levi saith, the Jews are wont to call these the fathers of pollutions; because by their contact they defile other things (vessels and raiment, &c.), as well as men (Precept. clii.), where he acknowledges that the reason why these creatures made things unclean, more than others, is not manifest. But he gives this pious admonition thereupon: "If by our reason we be able to discern the usefulness of some precepts, let us be very thankful for it; but if we cannot find how they are any way profitable to us, let us believe that God any work is done, it must be put into water, and it shall be unclean until the even; so it shall be cleansed. 33 And every earthen vessel, whereinto any of them falleth, whatsoever is in it shall be unclean; and ye shall break it. 34 Of all meat which may be eaten, that on which such water cometh shall be unclean; and all drink that may be drunk in every such vessel shall be unclean. 35 And every thing whereupon any part of their carcasse falleth shall be unclean; whether it be oven, or ranges for pots, they shall be broken down: for they are unclean, and shall be unclean unto you. 36 Nevertheless a fountain or pit, wherein there is plenty of water, shall be clean: but that which toucheth their carcasse shall be unclean. 37 And if any part of their carcasse fall upon any sowing seed which is to be sown, it shall be clean. 38 But if any water be put upon the seed, and any part of their carcasse fall thereon, it shall be unclean unto you. 39 And if any beast, of which ye may eat, die; he that toucheth the carcasse thereof shall be unclean until the even. 40 And he that eateth of the carcass of it shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: he also that beareth the carcasse of it shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even. 41 And every creeping thing that crepeth in his infinite wisdom, saw the benefit we should receive by it, and therefore commanded it." Whosoever vessel it be, wherein any work is done, it must be put into water, &c.] The heathens purified all things, in a manner, by washing them in water; but Moses requires only these things, which were of common use, to be so purified, in case of any defilement. And therefore Maimonides saith, "Such laws as these were made to lessen their labour and service; and if there be any thing in them that seems too troublesome and tedious, it arises from our ignorance of the rites and customs of those times, which make such precepts necessary" (par. iii. More Nev. cap. 47). Ver. 32.] It defiled both the vessel and that which was contained in it. Ye shall break it.] This is prescribed vi. 28, because such vessels were of no great value. Ver. 34.] The Jews have many observations about these sorts of pollutions: but the simple meaning is, that any meat which might otherwise be lawfully eaten, was made unclean, if any water poured out of such a vessel as is before named, had come upon it. For the water being defiled, it made the meat on which it came to be unclean also. This appears to be the sense by what follows. All drink.] It might not be drunk out of such a vessel, though otherwise it was not prohibited; but though liquid things were by such means made unclean, yet not dry things (such as bread), because they did not so soon receive an effluxion from a dead carcass as quick things did. This they gather from ver. 37. 35. Ver. 35. Every thing whereupon any part of their carcasse falleth.] Though the whole carcass did not fall upon the things here named, yet, if any part of it did, they were not fit to be used any more, but were to be broken in pieces (see ver. 32). The design of all which laws is very plain, that making the Israelites very cautious how they touched these things, or any other on which they fell, they might much more abhor to eat any unclean creature; and thereby be kept a separate people from all other nations, from whose familiar conversation they were by this means restrained, and consequently in less danger to learn their idolatrous customs.

Ver. 36. Ver. 37.] A mouse, for instance, was found dead among the wheat that was to be sown, it might notwithstanding be used for food; but other beasts, which were intended for seed, was made unclean, and might not be used till it was washed. The reason of this difference is plain, because the seed that was to be sown went through many alterations before it could become food, which took away all the pollution. Ver. 38.] Wet seed might be supposed to have received some tincture from the carcasses, which dry did not: and not being so fit to be sown till it was dry, was in that time to be cleansed. Ver. 39. Ver. 40. Ver. 41. See ver. 21, 25. He speaks of such as ate of this meat ignorantly: for if they did it knowingly, it was a presumption to which cutting off is threatened (Numb. xv. 30).

42 Whatever goeth upon the belly, and whatsoever goeth upon all four, or whatsoever hath more feet among all creeping things that creep upon the earth, them ye shall not eat; for they are an abomination.

43 Ye shall not make yourselves abominable with any creeping thing that creepeth, neither shall ye make yourselves unclean with them, that ye should be defiled thereby.

44 For I am the Lord your God: ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy; for I am holy: neither shall ye defile yourselves with any manner of creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.

45 For I am the Lord that bringeth you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: ye shall therefore be holy, for I am holy.

46 This is the law of the beasts, and of the fowl, and of every living creature that moveth in the waters, and of every creature that creepeth upon the earth:

47 To make a difference between the unclean and the clean, and between the beast that may be eaten and the beast that may not be eaten.
CHAPTER XII.

1 The purification of women after childbirth. 6 Her offerings for her purifying.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
2 Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a woman have conceived seed, and born a man child; then she shall be unclean seven days; according to the days of the separation for her infirmity she shall be unclean.
3 And in the eighth day the flesh of his foreskin shall be circumcised.
4 And she shall then continue in the blood of her purifying three and thirty days; she shall touch no hallowed thing, nor come into the sanctuary, until the days of her purifying be fulfilled.
5 But if she bear a maid child, then she shall be unclean two weeks, as in her separation; and she shall continue in the blood of her purifying three score and six days.
6 And when the days of her purifying are fulfilled, for a son, or for a daughter, she shall bring a lamb of the first year for a her blood; for all the following days were days of purification; not of entire separation.

Three and thirty days.) All the days of her uncleanness were forty: and for the first seven days she was to be separated from all conversation with her neighbours; but the following three-and-thirty she had free conversation with them, and was only excluded from the sanctuary, and from eating of the peace-offerings, or the paschal lamb, and (if she were the wife of a priest) of the tithes, and other lesser holy things; of which otherwise she might partake.

She shall touch no hallowed thing, &c.] If Maimonides may be credited, the Zabiti, the ancient sort of idolaters in those eastern parts, had a great number of tedious and tiresome customs about the purification of their childish women; from all which God freed his people, by restraining them only from coming into his sanctuary, or partaking of holy things; but, otherwise, leaving them at liberty to perform all manner of offices in their family, during the time of their purification (More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 47). It is apparent also, that other gentiles kept their women from their temples, a long time after their childbirth; and that superstitious people would not so much as go within their doors. See Dilherrus, in the forrmmed book and chapter.

Ver. 5.] The time of strict separation, when they brought forth a female, was double to that which was prescribed (ver. 2) when they brought forth a male. And so also was the time of their purification; which lasted threescore and six days, as they in the other case by thirty-and-three. The reason of which difference, not only the Jews, but others also, derive from the greater redundancy (as R. Levi Barzeloni calls it. Præcept. elxvi.) of blood in the latter case than in the former; and from the slowness of nature in its operation, which made the purgation longer before it was effected. Hippocrates himself treats of this difference, in his book de Natura Puerp. Where he saith, women are sooner purged after the birth of males than of females (see Joch. Menius in his Syntagma de Puerperio, cap. 6, 7). The natural weaknesses of women also, during this time, required quiet, and little company: from which the very temper of their blood, in those climates, made a longer separation more necessary than in these colder regions. But if there were no such apparent reason to be given of these things, yet, vel el ipso vonomanda antiquitate, et simplicitate suscipienda forunt et minime contemnenda (as Conrad. Pellicanus speaks upon the foregoing chapter, ver. 35), "they ought, for the sake of their venerable antiquity and simplicity, to be duly regarded, and not to be despised."

Ver. 6. When the days of her purifying are ful-burnt offering, and a young pigeon, or a turtledove, for a sin offering, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, unto the priest:

7 Who shall offer it before the Lord, and make an atonement for her; and she shall be cleansed from the issue of her blood. This is filled[,] Which were not till the end of the fortieth day for a son, and the eightieth day for a daughter. And therefore, the offerings here mentioned were not offered till the day after, viz. the forty-first day for the one, and the eighty-first day for the other; because, till then her purification was not perfected, as Maimonides observes in his book de Sacrificiis (Tract. v. sect. 5), where he observes, also, they might not eat of holy things, till these sacrifices had been offered for them.

Bringing a lamb of the first year] Which then was in its greatest perfection, as hath been often noted.

For a burnt offering.] In gratitude to God for giving her a safe deliverance, and bestowing a child upon her, and raising her up to her former strength, and bringing her again to his sanctuary. Where, by this offering, she also commended herself and child to his care, love, and blessing, and implored his Divine guidance and assistance in its education. For these offerings, as I observed before, were a kind of supplication, which they that brought them made to God: and there was nothing that pious people could more earnestly desire on such occasions, than that God would take their little ones into his tuition. Who are continually liable to so many dangers, that with unwillingness of their angels, they could never grow to be able to take care of themselves. They are the words of Conradus Pellicanus upon this place: who them refer, how necessary it is that the people of the church should be admonished frequently, to commend their children unto God both by private and public prayers, and take care of their instruction, lest they become like the horse and the mule, that have no understanding.

A young pigeon, or a turtledove, for a sin offering.] To complete her purification from uncleanness. For that is here meant by sin; the impurity which the law made, by separating such persons from others, and from the sanctuary for a time. And thus a sin-offering is commanded to be brought by a leper, when he was cleansed; who was charged only with a legal uncleanness, not a moral. And it is more plain, from what is ordained concerning menstruous women, whose courses were purely natural, and yet they were to offer a sin-offering when they were gone (xx. 30), because the law accounted that a state of uncleanness; and from the case of a Nazarite, who had unlawfully touched a dead body, Numb. vi. 21, by which it is said, he had sinned by the dead; i. e. was legally polluted. And this may be the reason, perhaps, why a burnt-offering is here mentioned before the sin-offering, which is wont to precede the other (ver. 7, 8).

It may be conceived, indeed, that in all the foregoing cases, those persons (especially lepers) had some way offended God, before or in their state of separation; and therefore were to have their sin (properly so called) expiated by a sin-offering. And R. Bechai also gives another probable account of it; that this sacrifice was offered not for her own sin, but the sin of her first parent, the mother of all living, who brought sin-and sorrow into the world; for from the law for her that hath born a male or a female.

8 And if she be not able to bring a lamb, then she shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons; the one for the burnt offering, and the other for a sin offering: and the priest shall make an atonement for her, and she shall be clean.

Unto the door] It was a most wise constitution (as a person of excellent learning, Dr. Aix, observes), which bound this people, from their first coming into the world, to their going out of it, to have a dependence upon the priests and the Levites (who for that purpose were dispersed through all the tribes of Israel, that people might be instructed by them how to govern themselves in all the passages of human life). For there are laws not only about marriages and successions, but about their lying-in, whether of a son or daughter, and about all they were to do while that time lasted, and when it ended; and indeed all the time they lived, and when they went out of the world; in their funerals, and mourning for the dead (ver. 7. 9. [Psal. i. 11].) By this offering she was restored to the liberty of God's house, and to partake of holy things. For so it follows.

For her that hath born a male or a female.] All this principally respected the woman; yet not excluding her child, when it was borne by the fortieth day (ver. 30); for then was the day of his mother's purification presented unto the Lord. That indeed had respect to the law about the first-born: but a very ancient MS. and the Syriac, and Origen, taking this for the day of their purification, and not merely of hers (κατά σαρκῶν αὐτῶν), it plainly shows the child could not be admitted into the Divine presence, no more than the mother, till the days above mentioned were accomplished.

Ver. 8. If she be not able to bring a lamb, &c.] This was a merciful provision for the poorer sort, as in other cases (v. 7, 11). And from this very place we may learn in how mean a condition the mother of our Lord was; who for her purification did not bring a lamb (unto which her piety, no doubt, would have prompted her, if she had been able), but only this lower sort of offering, as we read, Luke ii. 24.

The priest shall make an atonement for her.] This sacrifice was as available as the other, to restore her to communion with God's people. The Greeks imitated this; among whom the fortieth day was insignis (as Censorinus speaks), famous or remarkable upon more accounts than one. For women with child did not go to the temple and diem quadragesimum, or forty days after the forty-first day; and after their delivery, commonly, they were not fit to go out till forty days more (his words are, "Quadragesinta diebus plerque festae graviore sunt, nee sanguinem interdum continere"), during which time their little ones were sickly, never smiled, nor were out of danger. Which is observed by that great physician Celsius (lib. ii. cap. 1), "Maxime, omnia pertinacia prima quadragesimum dies perspicat."

And therefore, when this day was past, they were wont to keep a feast (as Censorinus there tells us, cap. 11, de Die Natali), which they called Тестисаκωστον, at which time, it is likely, they offered sacrifices also, as the Jewish women did.
CHAPTER XIII.

1 The laws and tokens whereby the priest is to be guided in discerning the leprosy.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying,

2 When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh a rising, or a scab, or bright spot, and it be in the skin of his flesh like the plague of leprosy; then shall he be brought unto Aaron the priest, or unto one of his sons the priests:

3 And the priest shall look on the plague in the skin of the flesh: and when the hair in the plague is turned white, and the plague in sight be deeper than the skin of his flesh, it is a plague of leprosy: and the priest shall look on him, and pronounce him unclean.

4 If the bright spot be white in the skin of his flesh, and in sight be not deeper than the skin, and the hair thereof be not turned white; then the priest shall shut up him that hath the plague seven days:

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1.] Here God speaks to Aaron again, as well as unto Moses (see xi. 1), because he and his posterity were peculiarly concerned in the following laws about the leprosy, both in judging and cleansing of it.

Ver. 2. When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh a rising, or a scab, or bright spot;] The leprosy appeared in one of these three forms: either as a tumour or swelling, or a scab, or a bright spot in the skin.

Like the plague of leprosy: There were some swellings, and scabs, and spots, which were not the leprosy, but only like it. And therefore Moses here teaches the priests how to discern between a true leprosy and the resemblance of it; that accordingly they might either pronounce a person clean or unclean, and shut him up, or let him have his liberty; shave him, or let his hair grow.

Plague of leprosy: If we may believe Pliny (lib. xxvi. cap. 1), this disease was peculiar to Egypt, which he calls genitrix talium vitiorum: and if Aristotle, in Eusebius, saith true (lib. ii. Prepar. Evang. cap. 27), Pharaoh, who sought to kill Moses, was the first who was struck with this disease, and died of it. So false is the story of Manetho, who, to hide the true cause of the Israelites' departure out of Egypt, saith, that they cast out a company of leprous people, of whom Moses was the captain. Out of Egypt, it is likely, this disease spread into Syria, which is noted likewise to have been much infested with such foul eruptions in the skin; which have as many various names, as there are uses by which they are cured, or spots there; and are commonly all comprehended under the name of leprosy, as P. Cænus observes (lib. ii. de Republ. Judæorum, cap. ult.). But Moses here distinguishes them, and seems to instruct the Israelites that the leprosy which he speaks of was no common disease, but inflicted by the hand of Heaven. So the Hebrew doctors understand it; particularly R. Levi Barzelonit (Precept. cxxxvii.): "a leprous man ought not to look upon his disease as a casual thing; but seriously consider and acknowledge that some grievous sin is the cause of it." Which made the knowledge of their priests so admirable (as the author of the book Cosep spake, par. ii. sect. 58), that they were able to understand what was Divine in the leprosy, and what was from nature. For that there was something Divine in it is confirmed by the story of Naaman (2 Kings v. 7); where the king of Israel plainly declares, none but God could cure a leper: whom therefore they looked upon as smitten by God; and thence called this disease the plague or stroke of leprosy, and sometimes simply the plague or scab (ver. 5, 3, 17, 22, of this chapter). For they could not understand how such a pestilent disease as infected not merely men's bodies, but the very walls of their houses, and garments, should proceed merely from ordinary causes; and therefore they thought there was an extraordinary hand of God in it.

He shall be brought unto Aaron the priest. Not to the physicians, but to the priests; who were the only judges whether it was a true leprosy or no; and if it were, could best direct him to his cure (by repentance and prayer to God), and cleanse him when he was cured. But they might resort to any priest whatsoever, as Mr. Selden observes out of the Tal-メソ (where there was a large treatise of this matter), though he was maimed in any part of his body, and so unfit to minister at the altar, provided his eyes still continued good (lib. ii, de Synedr. cap. 14, num. 5).

Ver. 3. The priest shall look on the plague. When there is a suspicion that it is a leprosy. The same great rule he observes, that this inspection be made upon any day of the week but the Sabbath or festivals.

Yet not in the night, nor in any hour of the day but the fourth, fifth, eighth, and ninth: for they accounted the morning, evening, and noon, not such proper times to make this inspection. Which, they say, also might be made by an Israelite; though none but the priest could pronounce one clean or unclean. For though perhaps the priest was ignorant, and stood in need to be informed by wiser persons than himself, yet that man who was not a priest could only direct him what to judge, but not give the judgment. According to that law (Deut. xxi. 5), "Out of their mouth, or by their word, shall every stroke be tried:" which particularly relates to the leprosy (Cuix. 8).

When the hair is turned white, &c. He begins with the last of the three indications of a leprosy, viz. the bright spot. In which, if the very hair was turned white, and it was not only a superficial whiteness, but the spot seemed to have eaten deeper into the very flesh, then it was to be judged a true leprosy. R. Levi Barzelon expresses it thus; "When there was one or more places so white that their whiteness was like that of an egg-shell, or more glossy, then it is the leprosy."

Shall look on him. Having made this inspection, and found it to be the leprosy.

Pronounce him unclean. Command him to be separated from the congregation, and shut up by himself (ver. 4).

But though all the Israelites, children and servants, as well as others, were under this law, yet no gentle, nor the proselytes of the gate, were, as Maimonides and the rest of the Hebrew doctors tell us.

Ver. 4. If the bright spot be white in the skin, &c. If there be barely a white spot in the skin, which hath not altered the hair.

And it shall be not deeper than the skin, and the hair thereof be not turned white. The forenamed R.
5 And the priest shall look on him the seventh day: and, behold, if the plague in his sight be at a stay, and the plague spread not in the skin; then the priest shall shut him up seven days more:

6 And the priest shall look on him again the seventh day: and, behold, if the plague be somewhat dark, and the plague spread not in the skin, the priest shall pronounce him clean: it is but a scab: and he shall wash his clothes, and be clean.

7 But if the scab spread much abroad in the skin, after that he hath been seen of the priest for his cleansing, he shall be seen of the priest again:

Levi explains this passage thus: If it were not a perfect white, but something dusky, below the whiteness of an egg-shell, he was to look upon it as if which might prove a lesser sort of foultess in the blood and skin, short of the leprosy, which infected the very hair in that place.

Shall shut up him—seven days:] He had something like the plague, which might prove to be it; and therefore he was to be separated from others so long, that some judgment might be made, whether it was, or would be so or not: for seven days commonly make considerable alterations in the state of all diseases.

Ver. 5. Look on him the seventh day:] Until which it was not likely any certain judgment could be made. And, behold:] Observe this.

If the plague in his sight be at a stay:] In the Hebrew the words are, If the plague stand in his sight; i.e. seemeth to him not to have spread itself at all in the skin, as it follows in the next words. Or, as it may be translated, if it continue in the same colour, which it had before, and were not altered: for the Hebrew word signifies colour as well as sight. And if this translation be right, then here are two marks which the priest was to observe (viz. whether the spot had not altered its complexion, and whether it had not spread further in the skin); but according to our present translation there is but one, the next clause being but the explication of this.

Shut him up seven days more:] The case remaining dubious, he was to make a further trial.

If the plague be somewhat dark:] The priest was to mark diligently whether there were any alteration in the colour, and that which was bright before now looked dark; which justifies the second interpretation of the first clause in the foregoing verse.

Spread not in the skin:] This was another token by which the priest was to be governed in his judgment.

Pronounce him clean:] He was to be shut up no longer, but left at liberty to go abroad and freely converse with his brethren.

It is but a scab:] An ordinary scab, or scurf, short of the leprosy: such as is now in Guam and Mindanao; which Dampier (in his late New Voyage round the World, chap. 12), describes to be a dry scurf all over the body, that causeth great itching, and raiseth the outer skin in small white flakes, like the scales of little fish, when they are raised on end with a knife. But he did not perceive that they made any great matter of it, for they did not refrain any company for it.

He shall wash his clothes, and be clean:] Having been suspected to have a leprosy, and something like it appearing, which had kept him separate from his brethren several days, he was to use this small purification; because there was some kind of impurity in his blood, which broke out into the skin, though not infectious.

Ver. 7. If the scab spread] The second sort of leprosy was a scab (ver. 2), which seems to have been of two kinds; one of which Moses joins to what he saith of the swelling, and the other to what he saith of the bright spot.

After that he hath been seen of the priest:] This is, after the priest had pronounced him clean (ver. 6).

He shall be seen of the priest again:] A new inspection was to be made by the priest. And if any man, (as Maimonides saith) was so proflane as carelessly to neglect it, by not going to the priest, and showing him his case, his punishment was to have his leprosy cleave to him for ever.

Ver. 8.] Though it lurked for a time, yet this spreading of it in the skin was to be taken for an evident mark that it was the leprosy.

Ver. 9. When the plague of leprosy is in a man:] That is, when there is a suspicion of the first sort of leprosy, mentioned ver. 2, and called a rising or swelling.

He shall be brought unto the priest:] By those who feared his company might be infectious; but good men went of themselves to him.

Ver. 10. The priest shall see him:] Diligently view, and consider the nature of the scab.

If the rising be white:] If upon examination the priest found a third mark, besides the two former (whiteness in the skin and the hair turned white), viz. that it had eaten into the very flesh; he was to look upon it as an undoubted leprosy.

Quick row flesh] Quick or living flesh (as the Hebrew word is) signifies sound flesh not corrupted. So the meaning seems to be, if it have broken through the skin, and in the raw sound flesh there appeared white spots, there needed no further consideration: for it would soon taint the whole mass of blood.

Ver. 11. It is an old leprosy:] The first two signs were very bad, particularly the second, the hair turning white, (just as a plant, saith Procopius Gaurus, or a flower dies, together with the earth in which it grows), but this last was far worse; being a mark of an inveterate evil that had been long breeding; and got not only into the skin and the hair, but into the very living flesh; which, as the same Procopius speaks, it began to corrode, and would devour.

Pronounce him unclean:] Without any further examination.

Shall not shut him up:] Because there was no need of any more proof, nor any doubt, whether it was the leprosy or not.

For he is unclean:] It was apparent from the tokens, which were already very visible.

Ver. 12. If a leprosy break out] He calls that a that hath the plague from his head even to his foot, wheresoever the priest looketh; 13 Then the priest shall consider: and, behold, if the leprosy have covered all his flesh, he shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague: it is all turned white: he is clean.
14 But when raw flesh appeareth in him, he shall be unclean.
15 And the priest shall see the raw flesh, and pronounce him to be unclean: for the raw flesh is unclean: it is a leprosy.
16 Or if the raw flesh turn again, and be changed unto white, he shall come unto the priest;
17 And the priest shall see him: and, behold, if the plague be turned into white; then the priest shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague: he is clean.
18 ¶ The flesh also, in which, even in the skin thereof, was a boil, and was healed, disease, which was not truly so, but was by some thought to be so, because it had a likeness to it.

Him that hath the plague] i. e. Seemeth to have it.

From his head even to his foot.] An eruption in every part of his body, which was spread all over with sears.

Ver. 13. He shall pronounce him clean] This sort of breaking out, from top to toe, as we speak, was not to be looked upon as the plague of leprosy; being only a rite to the body, than a disease.

It is all turned white.] There was no danger in this eruption; nature having only discharged those putrid salt humours which were in the blood. Just as those among us, who have the measles and small-pox, are likely to do well, when they come out everywhere; but not when they stick in the skin.

Ver. 14.] When the sound flesh appeared speckled with the formentioned spots, it was an evident token that it was a settled leprosy; nature being not able to throw out the ill humour into the skin; but working inward into the flesh.

Ver. 15.] When he sees the sign before named, he shall make no further examination, but declare him to be unclean.

Ver. 16. If the raw flesh turn again.] If there was such an alteration in it, that it was freed from these pestilent spots.

Be changed into white.] Look like other flesh, which hath a white skin upon it.

He shall come unto the priest.] Desire him to make a new examination of the state of his body.

Ver. 17. The priest shall see him.] Take a view of his body; especially in those parts where the leprosy was suspected to be.

If the plague be turned into white, &c.] If, upon due consideration, his body appear alike white everywhere, and no spots to be seen in the flesh, the priest was to declare him to have no leprosy remaining.

Ver. 18.] In this and the following verses he treats of such a leprosy as arose out of ulcers which had been healed: and afterward there was a new eruption, which might prove a leprosy.

Ver. 19. In the place of the boil.] Where the bile formerly broke out; but seemed to be healed.

There be a white rising, or a bright spot, white, &c.]

These two are the first and last indications of a leprosy, mentioned ver. 2.

Somewhat reddish,] This is a mark not hitherto mentioned: which some render "exceeding shining:" or "an inflammation which looked very red." For so the Hebrew word adamadmeth seems to import; it being certain, that the doubling of the radicals of any word increases the sense. This is apparent from abundance of instances in other words; which are heaped up together by Bochartus in his Hierozoicon (par. ii. lib. v. cap. 6), where he observes, with respect to this word, that it being impossible that the same thing should be both very white and very red, it hath made most interpreters expound this word adamadmeth as we do, somewhat reddish; quite contrary to the true sense of the word, which imports a high degree of some colour, and therefore ought to be translated exceeding glittering. For adam signifies not only red, but also to glisten: and accordingly, persons very leprous are said in Scripture to be as white as snow (Exod. iv. 6; Numb. xii. 10; 2 Kings v. 27). See ver. 49 of this chapter,

It be shewed to the priest.] That he might pass his judgment upon it, whether it were the leprosy or the raw flesh broken out of the boil.

In the place where the bile formerly was (ver. 19).

Ver. 20.] If, upon a serious search, it appear to have the two marks here mentioned (which are those before set down, ver. 3), the priest was to declare him unclean.

It is a plague of leprosy broken out of the boil.] In the place where the bile formerly was (ver. 19).

Ver. 21.] If he find upon search neither of the two marks before named.

But be somewhat dark, &c.] Though it had not eaten into the flesh (which was a certain sign of a leprosy), yet, if it changed colour, there was some ground of suspicion: and therefore he was to be "shut up seven days" (see ver. 4).

Ver. 22. If it spread nowhere.] The spreading of the spot was a token the blood was much vitiated, and that this foul disease was begun in the body.

It is a plague.] Of leprosy.

Ver. 23. If the bright spot stay in its place, &c.] If it continued in the same condition, and made no progress, it was an indication the bile was breaking out again, and would not make him unclean.

Ver. 24. Or if there be any flesh, in the skin whereof there is a hot burning.] In the Hebrew the words run flesh that burneth have a white bright spot, somewhat reddish, or white; 25 Then the priest shall look upon it: and, behold, if the hair in the bright spot be turned white, and it be in sight deeper than the skin; it is a leprosy broken out of the burning: wherefore the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is the plague of leprosy.
26 But if the priest look on it, and, behold, there be no white hair in the bright spot, and it be no lower than the other skin, but be somewhat dark; then the priest shall shut him up seven days:
27 And the priest shall look upon him the seventh day: and if it be spread much abroad in the skin, then the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is the plague of leprosy.
28 And if the bright spot stay in his place, and spread not in the skin, but it be somewhat dark; it is a rising of the burning, and the priest shall pronounce him clean: for it is an inflammation of the burning.
29 ¶ If a man or a woman have a plague upon the head or beard;
30 Then the priest shall see the plague: and, therefore, if it be in sight deeper than the skin; and there be in it a yellow thin hair; then the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is a dry scall, even a leprosy upon the head or beard.
31 And if the priest look on the plague of the scall, and, behold, it be not in sight deeper than the skin, and that there is no black hair in it; then the priest shall shut up him that hath the plague of the scall seven days:
32 And in the seventh day the priest shall look on the plague: and, behold, if the scall spread not, and there be in it no yellow hair, and the scall be not in sight deeper than the skin; he shall be shaven, but the scall shall he not shave; and the priest shall shut up him that hath the scall seven days more:
33 And in the seventh day the priest shall look on the scall: and, behold, if the scall be not spread in the skin, nor be in sight deeper than the skin; then the priest shall pronounce him clean: and he shall wash his clothes, and be clean.
35 But if the scall spread much in the skin after his cleansing;
36 Then the priest shall look on him: and, this, "Or the flesh, when it shall be in the skin a burning fire." That is, when there is an inflammation made in the skin and the flesh, by a hot burning coal, or some such thing falling upon it. For in the foregoing paragraph (ver. 16, &c.), he speaks of ulcers which arose of themselves from bad humours in the body; and here of such as were made by fire.
And the quick flesh that burneth] The part of the body that is burnt.
Have a white bright spot.] Very shining (see ver. 19). For this was a sign of the leprosy broken out in that burnt place, which otherwise would have looked black.
Ver. 23. If the hair—be turned white.] See ver. 20.
Ver. 26.] The same direction is given here, as in the foregoing case (ver. 21).
Ver. 27.] This verse and the next contain the same marks with those ver. 23, 24.
Ver. 28. It is a rising of the burning.] A tumour made by fire, or a hot iron, &c., which burnt the part. A mere inflammation (as he calls it in the end of this verse) arising from that burning.
Ver. 29. Plague upon the head or the beard.] Such a kind of disease, Pliny saith, came into Italy in the middle of the reign of Tiberius Caesar which they called menagreus, because it commonly began in the chin; and was so filthy, ut quaerente mors preferenda esset, "that any death was preferable to it" (lib. xxvi. Nat. Hist. cap. 1).
Ver. 30.] There are the same marks of this sort, with that of the former: only instead of a white hair, which there was in other kinds of leprosies, there was a yellow hair in this; and not so thick as the white.
Ver. 31.] This was some indication that it was not a leprosy; yet if there were no black hair in it (as it here follows) which was a sign of soundness and health (ver. 27), the case was not certain, but doubtful; and therefore he was to be shut up seven days, to see what it would prove.
Ver. 32. Shall look on the plague.] So he calls it, because it had a resemblance of the leprosy.
If the scall spread not,] For this was the nature of the disease, which Pliny describes in the place above mentioned, that it spread itself in many persons, from the chin all over the face, except the eyes; and went down to the neck, the breast, and the hands, facto cutis furfur, "with a filthy scurf of the skin," which is here called a scall.
In it no yellow hair.] This, with the foregoing and the following sign (that it was not in sight deeper than the skin) made it probable it was not the leprosy. Yet he was not upon this immediately discharged; but a further trial, as the next verse tells us, was to be made, before he was set at liberty.
Ver. 33. He shall be shaven, but the scall shall he not shave, &c.] For soreness's sake, the head and beard were to be shaven (which might be performed by any body), that the priest might the better discern whether the scall spread or no. Only the place where the scall appeared was not shaven; because the priest was to observe of what colour the hair in it was. So R. Levi Barzelonita (Praecept. cxxii.). "They shave round about the scall, leaving only the two next hairs; that they may know the decrease or increase of the disease."
Shall up him—seven days more.] In which time some considerable alteration would be made one way or other.
Ver. 31. In the seventh day] Before it was completed.
If the scall be not spread] Here are the same marks which were mentioned before: that if the scall did not spread in the skin, nor eat into the flesh, he was not to be shut up any longer, but pronounced clean; and, after he had washed his clothes, be admitted into the society of God's people again (see ver. 6).
Ver. 35.] It fell out sometimes, that the scall, which had stood at a stay for a fortnight, and seemed neither to spread nor corrode at all began to go on to the neighbouring parts.
Ver. 36.] If he found this single mark, that after the scall had been at a stand a good while, it began to spread much, he was not to trouble himself for any further token, by seeking for the yellow hair, (ver. 30), but immediately declare him to be a leper.
behold, if the scall be spread in the skin, the priest shall not seek for yellow hair; he is unclean.

37 But if the scall be in his sight at a stay, and there is black hair grown up therein; the scall is healed, he is clean: and the priest shall pronounce him clean.

38 ¶ If a man also or a woman have in the skin of their flesh bright spots, even white bright spots:

39 Then the priest shall look: and, behold, if the bright spots in the skin of their flesh be darkish white; it is a freckled spot that greweth in the skin; he is clean.

40 And the man whose hair is fallen off his head, he is bald: yet is he clean.

41 And he that hath his hair fallen off from the part of his head toward his face, he is forehead bald; yet is he clean.

42 And if there be in the bald head, or bald forehead, a white reddish sore; it is a leprosy sprung up in his bald head, or his bald forehead.

43 Then the priest shall look upon it: and, behold, if the rising of the sore be white reddish in his bald head, or in his bald forehead, as the leprosy appeareth in the skin of the flesh; he is a leper man, he is unclean: the priest shall pronounce him utterly unclean; his plague is in his head.

45 And the leper in whom the plague is, his clothes shall be rent, and his head bare, and he shall put a covering upon his upper lip, and shall cry, Unclean, unclean.

46 All the days wherein the plague shall be in him he shall be defiled; he is unclean: he shall dwell alone; without the camp shall his habitation be.

47 ¶ The garment also that the plague of leprosy is in, whether it be a woollen garment, or a linen garment;

Ver. 37.] If after this the scall stopped again, and made no further progress; and withal there was a black hair appeared in it (which the priest could not find before, but now was grown up in it), he was to take it for an evident sign that the man was cured of his leprosy. For the hair being restored to its natural colour, was a certain indication that the blood was cleansed from its impurity.

Ver. 38.] No other sign of the leprosy but this.

Ver. 39.] In this case the priest was to observe, whether the spots had any thing of a cloudiness in them; for if they had, it was not a leprosy: if they were perfectly clear and bright, then it was.

Ver. 40.] From the hinder part of it.

Ver. 41.] The design of these two verses is, to instruct the priest that the mere falling off of the hair from his head, which made him bald, either behind or before, should not be taken to be a sign of the leprosy.

Ver. 42, 43.] If either in the hinder or forpart of a bald head there appeared a white sore exceeding bright (as it should be translated), like that which appeared sometimes in the skin (ver. 34), then, as it here follows, he was to be looked on as a leprous man.

Ver. 44. Shall pronounce him utterly unclean; As unclean as any of the forenamed persons.

His plague is in his head.] The leprosy appears in his head, as in other persons it appears in the skin of their bodies.

Ver. 45. The leper in whom the plague is; Any of the forenamed sort of leprosies.

His clothes shall be rent.] After the manner of mourners (as some take it), that he might sensibly declare his afflicted condition. For upon any sad occasion, they were wont in those countries to rend their clothes (Ezra ix. 3, 5; Job ii. 12). Others, indeed, think this was intended only for a mark of his uncleanness: but I do not see why it might not serve to both ends.

His head bare.] This was another token of mourning. But the Hebrew writers unanimously translate these words quite contrary: the phrase in the original being, his head shall be free; i. e. say they, from cutting or shaving; which was as much as to say, he should let his hair grow long. This also was a sign of sadness and sorrow (see x. 6).

Put a covering upon his upper lip.] Either he was to cover it with his hand, or with the skirt of his garment, which they threw over their heads, when they were in a state of mourning. Of which this was another sign (Ezek. xxiv. 17, 23), as it was also of shame (Mic. iii. 7). Some will have all these to be marks only for men to avoid them: but that is sufficiently taken care of, in the last words of this verse.

I shall only add, that the Hebrews well observe, that none were bound to any of these things, who were shut up or suspect of leprosy; but only such as were absolutely pronounced to be leprous.

Shall cry, Unclean, unclean.] Give notice to passengers not to come near him, by crying out aloud, so that they might hear him, I am in the most unclean condition wherein any man can be. Some fancy this was required, that men might avoid infection; but the true reason was, that they might avoid legal pollutions by conversation with them; as appears by the next verse. Jeremiah seems to allude to this, Lament. iv. 15. And there seems also to have been the like care among the heathen, to give notice of any place which was unclean, that none might be defiled by it. So Servius tells us upon Æneid. iv. that the Romans were wont to set a cypress-tree (which being cut down could not grow again) before the door of a dead man, whereon he burnt his arms, etc. The last words, domum præteriret, "lest any man, who was going to perform sacred offices, should unawares pass by his door."

Ver. 46. He shall be defiled.] Remain in that desolate state.

He is unclean.] Separate from company.

He shall dwell alone.] 2 Kings xx. 5.

Without the camp.] There were three camps (as the Hebrews commonly observe); that of the Divinity (or the sanctuary), that of the Levites, and that of the Israelites: out of all which a leprous man was to be removed, that no man might have conversation with him, but only such who were leprous like himself; who in aftertimes were shut out of the cities, as now out of the camp (2 Kings vii. 2).

Ver. 47. The garment also that the plague of leprosy is in; This is a matter which we do not now understand; that a leprosy should not only cleave to a garment and infect it, but appear and be seen in it. As, in the next chapter, Moses speaks also of a leprosy in a house (xiv. 34), which he doth not mention here, because he had no houses in the wilderness, but dwelt in tents covered with skins, and such-like things: in which, as well as in garments, he supposes the leprosy will be (see xiv. 34). But what kind of disease this was, which appeared in insensible things, the Syrians and Egyptians perhaps might then under-48 Whether it be in the warp, or woof; or of linen, or of woollen; whether in a skin, or in any thing made of skin;
49 And if the plague be greenish or reddish in the garment, or in the skin, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in any thing of skin; it is a plague of leprosy, and shall be shewed unto the priest:
50 And the priest shall look upon the plague, and shut up it that hath the plague seven days:
51 And he shall look on the plague on the seventh day: if the plague be spread in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in a skin, or in any work that is made of skin; the plague is a fretting leprosy, it is unclean.
52 He shall therefore burn that garment, stand, but we now are ignorant, as P. Cuneus speaks; Cujusmodi id vitium in rebus inanimatis fuerit, Syri fortasse et Ελληνων τυχειστικον; nos hINC ignoramus (lib. ii. De Republ. Hebræor. cap. ult.). And, indeed, it seems to have been a Divine stroke, as according to ancient signifies (xiv. 34), and appears not only from the place above mentioned (2 Kings v. 7, 27), but from xv. 5, of the same book. And so the Jews have always understood it, particularly Maimonides, who, in his treatise on this subject (cap. 16, sect. 9), saith, “that this change in garments and houses did not proceed from natural causes, but was a sign that the displeasure of God hath been inflicted by God, as a token of his high displeasure. And it is not at all incredible that such a strange plague should then infest them, which is not now known in the world; when we consider what unusual diseases there have been in other countries, unknown in former times; which afterwards have also vanished, and are now to be found only in books. Pliny mentions several new diseases, omni a priori avo incognitos, “unknown to all ages past;” some of which were peculiar to some provinces, and touched not others. Concerning which he did not know what to say, but only this: Quid hoc esse dementem, aut quas Deorum iras? What shall we call this! or from what great anger of our gods does it proceed, that which already certainly infest men’s bodies (which in number are above three hundred) should not be sufficient; but new ones are still to be feared” (lib. xxvi. Nat. Hist. cap. 1). He looked, that is, upon these strange diseases as sent by God, when men had highly incurred his displeasure. The last century was famous for such an extraordinary plague (as Johannes Wierus, who then lived, often calls it), when the scurrity, which was confined before to some northern regions, near the sea, overran the Low Countries, being at that time unknown in Germany, Italy, France, and Spain, which were entirely free from it (see his Observationum Medica- rum, lib. i. sect. 1).

Woolen garment, or a linen] There is a great dispute among the Talmudists, whether garments made of camels’ hair (which they call the wool of camels) were comprehended under these words or not.

Ver. 48. Warp, or woof; of linen, or of woollen.] In the inward or outward part of it.

In a skin, or in any thing made of skin;] They were more likely to be infected than woollen or linen garments; because they had been part of the body of living creatures.

Ver. 49. If the plague be greenish or reddish] There seems to be great reason in what Maimonides saith, in his treatise of the leprosy, that the Hebrew word whether warp or woof, in woollen or in linen, or any thing of skin, wherein the plague is; for it is a fretting leprosy; it shall be burnt in the fire.

53 And if the priest shall look, and behold, the plague be not spread in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in any thing of skin;

54 Then the priest shall command that they wash the thing wherein the plague is, and he shall shut it up seven days more:

55 And the priest shall look on the plague, after that it is washed; and, behold, if the plague have not changed his colour, and the plague be not spread; it is unclean; thou shalt burn it in the fire; it is fret inward, whether it be bare within or without.

Jerakrak (which is made by the doubling of the radical letters) should be interpreted the most intense green; such as is in the wings of a peacock (as he speaks) or in the leaves of a palm-tree. As the word adradnum, in like manner, signifies the highest degree of another colour, viz. redness; such as the brightest scarlet (see ver. 19). And if a spot of these colours were found in a garment or skin, as broad as a bean, it was a sufficient ground to think it might be the leprosy; if it were not so broad, it was accounted clean.

It is a plague.] It was justly to be suspected, and therefore was to be brought to the priest for his judgment to be passed upon it. Who was to make a trial what it would prove, by shutting up that garment or skin wherein the spot was for the space of seven days; as is directed in the next verse.

Ver. 50.] If, upon his inspection, he found the forenamed tokens, he was to do with it as he did with persons who were under a suspicion of a leprosy.

Ver. 51.] There were three certain marks (as Maimonides notes) of the leprosy in a garment; the extreme greenness or redness of the spots in it; and the spreading of them after they were first discovered.

Fretting leprosy.] The Hebrew word manemeth, which we translate fretting, is very variously rendered by the ancient interpreters; as Bochart hath observed in his Hierozoicen, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45, where, from the Arabic tongue, he thinks it may be best translated an exasperated or irritated leprosy; that is, very sharp and prickling (which suits well with our translation), eating into the garment or skin, till it was consumed. Abarbinel translates it painful, because this sort of leprosy in the body of a man was full of anguish. And so this word is used in Ezek. xxviii. 24, where a thorn is called mamir; and translated by us a grieving thorn.

Ver. 52.] It seems this leprosy could never be got out of the garment or skin wherein it was; which therefore was ordered to be burnt, as never likely to be fit for use.

Ver. 53, 54.] If the spot was at a stay, and did not proceed further, then the garment, as the following verse directs, was to be washed, and shut up for seven days: in which time it appeared whether the impurity were quite gone, or still remained.

Ver. 55. Have not changed his colour.] If washing had not altered that violent colour, but it still continued very red or green.

Be not spread;] Or, though it be not spread; yet it was to be pronounced unclean, and adjudged to be burnt.

Vol. I.—58
56 And if the priest look, and behold, the plague be somewhat dark after the washing of it; then shall he rend it out of the garment, or out of the skin, or out of the warp, or out of the woof:
57 And if it appear still in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in any thing of skin; it is a spreading plague: thou shalt burn that wherein the plague is with fire.

58 And the garment, either warp, or woof, or whatsoever thing of skin it be, which thou shalt wash, if the plague be departed from them, then it shall be washed the second time, and shall be clean.
59 This is the law of the plague of leprosy in a garment of woollen or linen, either in the warp, or woof; or any thing of skins, to pronounce it clean, or to pronounce it unclean.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 The rites and sacrifices in cleansing of the leper.
2 This shall be the law of the leper in the day of his cleansing: He shall be brought unto the priest:
3 And the priest shall go forth out of the camp; and the priest shall look, and behold, if the plague of leprosy be healed in the leper; and if he be cleansed from his leprosy, then shall the priest put his finger in his mouth, and look upon the leper's flesh; and, behold, if the leprosy be healed, then shall it be washed the second time, and washed the third time; and if it be healed within, then it shall be declared unclean.

The signs of leprosy in a house.

43 The cleansing of that house.

42 And the priest shall look, and, behold, if the plague of leprosy be healed in the leper; and if he be cleansed from his leprosy, then shall the priest put his finger in his mouth, and look upon the leper's flesh; and, behold, if the leprosy be healed, then shall it be washed the second time, and washed the third time; and if it be healed within, then it shall be declared unclean.

Diligently examine in what condition the leper is, by the rules mentioned in the foregoing chapter.

If the plague of leprosy be healed. The priest, no doubt, had been informed, before he went to make the inspection, that there were good grounds to believe the man was freed from his leprosy.

Two birds alive and clean. The margin of our Bible translates it two sparrows; and who that has looked at the word in this sense have done it very ingeniously.
CHAPTER XIV.

5 And the priest shall command that one of the birds be killed in an earthen vessel over running water:

6 As for the living bird, he shall take it, and the cedar wood, and the scarlet, and the hyssop, and shall dip them and the living bird in the blood of the bird that was killed over the running water:

7 And he shall sprinkle upon him that is to be cleansed from the leprosy seven times, and shall pronounce him clean, and shall let the living bird pose into the open field.

8 And he that is to be cleansed shall wash his clothes, and shave off all his hair, and wash himself in water, that he may be clean: and after that he shall come into the camp, and shall tarry abroad out of his tent seven days.

9 But it shall be on the seventh day, that he shall shave all his hair off his head and his beard and his eyebrows, even all his hair he shall shave:

Ver. 5. One of the birds be killed.] Not as a sacrifice; for that could be made nowhere but at the altar, whereas this was without the camp, at a great distance from the sanctuary; and therefore was used only as a rite of cleansing (see ver. 49).

In an earthen vessel over running water.] There seems to be a transposition (as is very usual) in these words: the sense being, over an earthen vessel, that hath running, i.e. spring water in it. For so R. Levi Barzelonita, in the place before named, describes this ceremony: "The priest takes a new earthen vessel, and pours into it living water, till it be a quarter full:' which was the measure, according to the tradition of the scribes. Who say also, that the best and fattest bunch of hyssop, of a handful long, and as much scarlet-wool as weighed a shekel; he then dipped the bird's tail and wings, with the hyssop and scarlet wool, in the water tinctured with the blood of the other bird.

Ver. 6.] He took a stick of cedar wood (as R. Levi Barzelonita describes this rite, and Maimonides saith the same), which was a cubit long; and tying the bird to it, with its tail uppermost, together with a bunch of hyssop, of a handful long, and as much scarlet-wool as weighed a shekel; he then dipped the bird's tail and wings, with the hyssop and scarlet wool, in the water tinctured with the blood of the other bird.

Ver. 7. Sprinkle upon him that is to be cleansed.] R. Levi will have it, that he sprinkled the back of his hand, towards the top of it, with this water and blood.

Seven times.] In token of a perfect purification (see iv. 17).

Pronounce him clean.] So as to let him come into the camp (from whence he had been excluded), as, in aftertimes, into the city.

Ver. 7.] The manner of doing it (as the same R. Levi relates) was, the priest, going into the city, threw the bird over the walls towards the wilderness; the intention of which was, to show that the leper was restored to a free conversation with all his neighbours, as the bird was with the rest of its kind (see ver. 53).

Ver. 8. Wash his clothes.] He was to do this, and what follows, before he could be admitted into the camp.

Wash himself in water.] i.e. Wash his whole body. All which contributed to cleanliness.

After that he shall come into the camp.] But not enter into his own habitation; as appears by the words following.

Tarry abroad out of his tent seven days.] They lived in tents while they remained in the wilderness, which every man had apart, for himself and for his family. Unto which a leper was not restored immediately after his admission into the camp; for fear there should be any undiscovered remainder of his disease, whereby his wife and children might be endangered. For which reason he might not lie with his wife, till seven days were over.

Ver. 9. On the seventh day, that he shall shave all his off: and he shall wash his clothes, also he shall wash his flesh in water, and he shall be clean.

10 And on the eighth day be shall take two he lambs without blemish, and one ewe lamb of the first year without blemish, and three tenth deals of fine flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, and one log of oil.

11 And the priest that maketh him clean shall present the man that is to be made clean, and those things, before the Lord, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation:

hair[.] This may be thought to have been the time appointed for the shaving mentioned in the foregoing verse: but R. Levi, and other Hebrew doctors, understand it of a second shaving at the seven days' end, that they might be assured nothing of the leprosy remained.

Even all his hair he shall shave off[.] Under his armholes, and in other places of the body where it uses to grow; as well as the hair of his head, and his beard, and his eye-brows.

He shall wash his clothing[.] This seems to be a second washing, after the first at the end of the seven days. And the Hebrew doctors note, that the killing of the bird, the shaving and the sprinkling, were all to be done in the day-time; the rest might be done either by day or by night.

He shall wash his flesh[.] His whole body. For which end such a measure is prescribed by the Hebrew doctors, as would cover it entirely.

He shall be clean[.] So as to be not only restored to his tent, but admitted to go to the tabernacle of the congregation, and offer the sacrifices appointed (in the following part of this chapter) for his complete purification. Till which time he was called Mecussar Kapparah, one that needed expiation; and was not permitted to eat of the holy things.

Ver. 10. On the eighth day[.] If we may believe the Hebrew tradition, he washed himself again on this day, in the court of the women; where there was a room, called the chamber of the lepers, provided for that purpose. So Maimonides. Which great caution was imitated by the primitive Christians, who would not receive great sinners into their communion again, till they had made a long trial of the truth of their repentance.

Take two he lambs—and one ewe lamb[.] There were three kinds of sacrifices to be offered upon this occasion; viz, a trespass-offering, a sin-offering, and a burnt-offering; for which these three lambs were to be provided.

Of the first year[.] Such were all the lambs to be, both male and female.

For a meat offerings[.] To each of these sacrifices there was a meat-offering appointed, consisting of a tenth part of an ephah of fine flour, i. e. an omer (see Exod. xvi. 36). Which is a thing unusual: for we read of no meat-offerings ordered (in the fourth and fifth chapters of this book, which treat of them) to accompany either trespass-offerings or sin-offerings. But there were peculiar rites belonging to the cleansing of a leper, different from the common usages, to make him sensible how great a mercy he had received from God, who alone could cure this disease, which his hand had inflicted.

Mingled with oil[.] As the manner was in meat-offerings (see ch. ii. 1).

One log of oil[.] Which served to another purpose, mentioned ver. 15, 16 of this chapter. And oil being of a healing virtue, may be thought to denote the perfect health and soundness to which the leper was now restored; as the fragrancy of it put him in mind of the happiness he now enjoyed.

A log was the smallest measure among the Jews, containing about half a pint of our measure, as a very learned pairate of our own (Dr. Cumberland) hath computed in his Scripture Weights and Measures, p. 86.

Ver. 11. The priest that maketh him clean[.] Who performeth this office of declaring the leper perfectly clean.

Shall present the man—at the door, &c. He set the man in the first place at the east gate of the court of the Israelites (which in aftertimes was called the gate of Nicaron), with his face towards the sanctuary. For here all those who needed expiation stood; it being unlawful for them to enter into the court of the Israelites, until the expiation was made. So Maimonides observes in his treatise called Mechussare Kapparah, see vii. 3.

Ver. 12. Shall take one he lamb, and offer him[.] Next he was to bring one of the lambs to the same place, and present him to the Lord, as is directed in the end of the verse; for that is meant here by offering him, the slaying of him following in the next verse.

For a trespass offering[.] After the manner that the trespass-offerings were offered (of which see ch. vii.), that he might beg pardon of God (as Abarbinel understands it) for such sins as he had ignorantly committed.

The log of oil[.] Which was presented at the same time with the lamb.

Wash them[.] Both the lamb and the log of oil.

For a trespass offering[.] Which was done by washing them to and fro, up and down, and turning towards all the four quarters of the world, as was noted before. But Maimonides saith, this was waved towards the east: and if he waved them both together, or separated one from the other, the lamb first, and afterward the log of oil, it made no difference.

Ver. 13. He shall slay the lamb[.] The lamb was brought, saith the same author in the forenamed treatise, to the door of the court where the leprous man stood, who stretched out his hands into the court and laid him upon his sacrifice; after which it was killed, as is here directed.

Where he shall kill the sin offering[.] See vi. 25.

In the holy place[.] In the court of the tabernacle, at the north side of the altar of burnt-offering (ch. i. 11), which was a place more holy than the entrance, or east end of the court, where the peace-offerings were to be killed (see ii. 2).

For as the sin offering is the priest's, so is the trespass offering[.] See ii. 7. Both of them were to be eaten by the priests in the court of God's house; and, therefore, were equally holy.

It is most holy[.] See ii. 3.

Ver. 14. The priest shall take some of the blood[.] There stood two priests, as Maimonides represents it, 17 And the priest shall put on the tip of the right ear of him that is to be cleansed, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot:

18 And the priest shall take some of the log of oil, and pour it into the palm of his own left hand:

19 And the priest shall dip his right finger in the oil in that is in his left hand, and shall sprinkle of the oil with his finger seven times before the Lord;

20 And the priest shall offer the burnt offering and the meat offering upon the altar: and the priest shall make an atonement for him before the Lord; and he shall be clean.
21 And if he be poor, and cannot get so much, then he shall take one lamb for a trespass offering to be waved, to make an atonement for him, and one tenth deal of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering, and a log of oil.

22 And two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, such as he is able to get: and the one shall be a sin offering, and the other a burnt offering.

23 And he shall bring them on the eighth day for his cleansing unto the priest, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, before the Lord.

24 And the priest shall take the lamb of the trespass offering, and the log of oil, and the sacrifices, the trespass-offering, the sin-offering, and the burnt-offering, had its proportion of a tenth-deal of flour offered with oil: But if we think the whole was appropriated to the burnt-offering, yet it was the same thing to the leper, whose cleansing cost him as dear one way as the other. Only by understanding it thus, the priest, perhaps, had a greater reward for his pains; if we suppose he only burnt a handful upon the altar (as the manner was in these offerings) he had all the rest to his own use (see ch. ii. ver. 2, 3).

Make an atonement for him. By this, his atonement was completed; and he was made so perfectly clean as to be admitted to be partaker of the altar, when peace-offerings were sacrificed.

But this very long process, through so many different rites, and for so many days, before men could be acquitted from a legal defilement in their bodies, was a plain instruction to all persons of good sense, how much more difficult it would prove to cleanse their souls from those moral impurities which they contracted by long habits of sin: and what great pains must be taken both by the sinners themselves, and by God's ministers, to root out and wash away the memory of God towards them was to be implored, of which they ought not hastily to presume.

Ver. 21. If he be poor.] The Divine goodness always made a merciful provision that his service should not be burdensome to men; and therefore took care the poor should not be charged with too costly sacrifices, and in a manner, the benefit of them as much as the rich (see i. 14, 17, v. 11. &c.).

He shall take.] After he had undergone all the purifications before mentioned, from the fourth verse of this chapter to the tenth, which continued for seven days together: for though his poverty excused him from such chargeable sacrifices, as others of greater ability were to offer, yet he was to be at all the trouble and pains that others took for their purification; there being not one of the rites before prescribed which is omitted in the following verses, only they were less expensive.

One lamb:] It is not determined whether it should be a he lamb or a ewe lamb; and, therefore, it was left indifferent, for the greater ease of his poverty; only it was to be of the same year, and without blemish, as is prescribed ver. 10.

Waved.] According to the directions given ver. 12.

An atonement for him.] Which was effected by this as well as by a more valuable sacrifice; when it was the best he had to offer.

One tenth deal of fine flour] Instead of three-tenth deals, which the rich sort were to offer (ver. 10). But if a poor man had vowed he would offer all that is prescribed in that verse, in case God would be pleased to cure him, he was bound thereby, (as Maimonides says in the forenamed treatise), and this smaller sum was to subserve for his cleansing; but, by the help of his friends or neighbours, he was to procure all that he had vowed.

Log of oil.] This is the same quantity the better sort were to offer; for oil was not dear in this country.

Ver. 22. Two turtledoves, or two young pigeons.] Instead of the other two lambs, required of those who could provide them (ver. 10).

Such as he is able to get.] The best he could procure: but the meanest would be accepted, if he could get no better.

One shall be a sin offering, and the other a burnt offering.] Neither of which was to be omitted, though the things offered were but mean (see i. 14, v. 11.); it being necessary he should perform all religious services, according to his ability. And I think the observation of Conr. Pelicamnus is not absurd, that, though there was an exchange made of two lambs for two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, in consideration of a man's poverty; yet no person whatsoever, whether rich or poor, could be cleansed without the sacrifice of one lamb: which may well be looked upon as the figure of the Lamb of God, who alone taketh away the sins of the whole world.

Ver. 23. Bring them on the eighth day.] This plainly suggests, that this poor man had done all that was prescribed on the seventh day preceding, as well as the rich. For his cleansing, &c. See ver. 10, 11, &c., where all that follows unto ver. 33, is explained: there being the same rites prescribed, and in the same words about a poor man, which were used for the cleansing of the rich.

Take some fire of the blood.] See this explained, ver. 14.

Ver. 26. Pour of the oil.] See ver. 15. It is not said either there or here how much, but only some of the oil (as it is there translated), that is, as much as the priest thought would be sufficient.

Ver. 27.] According to the directions given before, ver. 16.

Ver. 28. Put of the oil.] See ver. 17.

Upon the place of the blood of the trespass offering.] It being not said here, upon the blood of the trespass offerings, (as the words are ver. 17), but upon the place of the blood; the Jews infer thence, that if the blood laid upon the tip of the ear, thumb, or toe, were by any means wiped off, it was sufficient to lay the oil in the very place where the blood had been. So Maimonides, in the forenamed treatise, concerning those that wanted expiation, sect. 5. But that which he there adds is very unreasonable; that if a man wanted the thumb of his right hand, or the great toe of his right foot, or the lap of his right ear, he could never be pu-in his hand upon the tip of the right ear of him that is to be cleansed, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot, upon the place of the blood of the trespass offering:

29 And the rest of the oil that is in the priest's hand he shall put upon the head of him that is to be cleansed, to make an atonement for him before the Lord.

30 And he shall offer the one of the turtle-doves, or of the young pigeons, such as he can get;

31 Even such as he is able to get, the one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering, with the meat offering: and the priest shall make an atonement for him that is to be cleansed before the Lord.

32 This is the law of him in whom is the plague of leprosy, whose hand is not able to get that which pertaineth to his cleansing.

33 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying,

34 When ye be come into the land of Canaan, which I give to you for a possession, and I put the plague of leprosy in a house of the land of your possession;

riphied from his uncleanness. For it is not to be thought that God would make his cleansing impossible, who was made immoveable or defective in any of these parts: which had been to add one misery to another. Therefore, in this case, he put, on the contrary, having brought the unclean person to the priest, the oil might be put upon the parts next to these.

Ver. 29. Put upon the head, &c.] See ver. 18.

Ver. 30. Such as he can get, i.e. The best that he is able to procure.

Ver. 31. Such as he is able to get,] He repeats it again, that the man might not be troubled if he was not able to procure the very best, provided he did his endeavour to bring the best that his estate could reach.

One for a sin offering, &c.] See ver. 19, 20.

Ver. 32. This is the law of him] Who was shut out of the camp, because of the leprosy, which formerly appeared in him.

Ver. 33. This hand is not able to get that which pertaineth to his cleansing.] Who is so poor that he cannot procure what is prescribed to those that are able to make such offerings as are before mentioned (ver. 10, &c.), for their reception into the congregation again, when they are found to be free from their leprosy.

But here Maimonides puts this case: suppose a man, having brought the offering of the poor, suddenly becomes rich man's offering, immediately becomes poor, what is to be done? He answers: if this happen before the sacrifice be finished, he is to proceed according to the state in which he was when his sin-offering was offered: that is, offer the sacrifice of a rich man, viz. another lamb, if he was then rich; or the sacrifice of a poor man, if he was then poor.

Ver. 33.] Now he again speaks to them both conjunctly (which he did not ver. 1), as he had done xiii. 1, because Aaron and his sons were peculiarly concerned to judge concerning the leprosy in houses as well as in their inhabitants.

Ver. 34. When ye be come into the land of Canaan.] This seems to import that the leprosy did not infect their habitations, till they came into the land of Canaan. When some of the rabbins say (as R. Levi Barzelonita observes, Precept. clxxvi.), that God sent this plague for the good of the Israelites, into certain houses, that they being pulled down, the treasure which the Amorites had hidden there might be discovered. But this looks like one of their dreams, who are not willing to think themselves at any time out of the favour of God.

Which I give to you for a possession.] From these words (and those in the conclusion of this verse, where Canaan is called the land of their possession), Moses bar Nachman draws a better conclusion; that the leprosy was a Divine stroke in this country, and not elsewhere; because then it was a holy land, bestowed upon the Israelites by God, who dwelt here himself, and punished great offences against his Divine majesty with this sore disease; whereby he banished them from his presence, till they amended.

I put the plague of leprosy, &c.] These words seem to be added to a good scar of Midrash Rabbah, that this plague was a supernatural stroke: not like the contagion which now adheres to the house and clothes of those who have the pestilence. Thus Abarbinel understands it, when he saith, I put the plague, it shows the thing was "not natural, but proceeded from a special providence and pleasure of the blessed God." And so Poole, author of the Commentary on Ezekiel. He says, "This plague was inflicted as a punishment of leprosy upon houses and garments, as a punishment for lesser sins; and when men continued still to multiply transgressions, then it invaded their bodies." So that it began in the houses, which were not infected by the inhabitants, but by the inhabitants by the houses. And Maimonides will have this to have been done in such manner, that the plague of leprosy first invaded a man's habitation; though not the whole house, but some stones only, in the beginning of it. Then it spread all over, till the house was pulled down. From thence it went to men's garments; and, if they did not amend, to their bodies; till in the issue they were shut out of the camp, from the company of their brethren. And R. Levi Barzelonita explains it after the same manner, in the place before mentioned. And Abarbinel thinks the end and intention of this miracle (as he calls it) "to be a caution and admonition from God, that the man might be converted from his sins: as if the stone in the wall had cried out, and the beam out of the timber answered it (as Habakkuk speaks, i. 11), to the master of the land the Lord thy God, O Israel: behold, the plague is come into thy house; and if thou wilt not be converted, it shall abide upon thee and on thy children." And he saith this is the opinion of their rabbins.

In a house] They had no houses till they came into Canaan; but dwelt in tents.

Of the land of your possession.] The Jews were so fond of Jerusalem, that they have excepted it from this plague; because, saith the forenamed R. Levi, Jerusalem was not divided among the tribes; and, there-35 And he that owneth the house shall come and tell the priest, saying, It seemeth to me there is as it were a plague in the house:

36 Then the priest shall command that they empty the house, before the priest go into it to see the plague, that all that is in the house be not made unclean: and afterward the priest shall go in to see the house:

37 And he shall look on the plague, and, behold, if the plague be in the walls of the house with hollow strakes, greenish or reddish, which in sight are lower than the wall;

38 Then the priest shall go out of the house to the door of the house, and shut up the house seven days:

39 And the priest shall come again the seventh day, and shall look: and, behold, if the plague be spread in the walls of the house;

40 Then the priest shall command that they take away the stones in which the plague is, and they shall cast them into an unclean place without the city:

41 And he shall cause the house to be scraped within round about, and they shall pour out the dust that they scrape off without the city into an unclean place:

42 And they shall take other stones, and put them in the place of those stones; and he shall take other molder, and shall plaster the house.

43 And if the plague come again, and break out in the house, after that he hath taken away the stones, and after he hath scraped the house, and after it is plastered;

44 Then the priest shall come, and look, and, behold, if the plague be spread in the house, it is a fretting leprosy in the house: it is unclean.

45 And he shall break down the house, the stones of it, and the timber thereof, and all the fore, cannot be comprehended under the name of their possessors. This he had out of the Gemara of Bava kama, where this is reckoned among the ten privileges of the holy city; that it was not defiled with the plague of leprosy (see Con. L’Empeur’s annotations on Bava kama, cap. 7, sect. 7).

Ver. 35. He that oweth the house shall come and tell the priest, &c.] As soon as any inhabitant (for he is meant by him that oweth the house) had a suspicion that this plague was in his dwelling, he was bound to give notice of it to the priest; or else he was in danger to incur a further punishment.

Ver. 36. Empty the house.] Of all the household-stuff; and that the inhabitants also should go out of it.

Before the priest go into it.] To see whether that which the man suspected was the plague or not.

Be not made unclean.] Till the priest had given his judgment, all things in the house were accounted clean: as till a man was pronounced by him to have a leprosy, nobody was bound to avoid his company.

Afterward the priest shall go in.] When it was cleared of every thing that might hinder his exact inspection.

Ver. 37. If the plague be in the wall.] They were principally to be searched, together with the pavement, and the roof; where this plague appeared.

With hollow strakes.] There was the same kind of mark of a leprosy in a house, that there was of it in the body of a man; for if a spot was deeper than the skin of the flesh (xiii. 9), it was a bad token: for like manner, when there were hollow or depressed strakes in the wall of a house (or as it is in the latter end of this verse, in sight lower than the wall), it was a sign of the leprosy, which began to corrode and eat into it. This seems to be the import of the Hebrew word shikkaruroth, which signifies something that lies deep, and is sunk into the place where it is. For that is a more probable derivation of the word, from shakah, than that of Porsteus, who derives it from sheloh, which signifies false. And so the LXX. translate it by the Greek word σκολυτής, signifying the leprosy had so eaten into the stones, as to have pitted them (as we speak in our language), i.e. made a cavity in them. Which the Jews justly looked upon as a thing very extraordinary, or extraordinary effect (as Simonides calls it) of the Divine hand.

Greenish or reddish, &c.] Which was the mark of a leprosy in a garment (xiii. 49).

Ver. 38. The priest shall go out of the house to the door.] Where he was to stay till he had seen the house shut up, that none might go into it, and thereby be endangered to be defiled.

Shut up the house seven days.] In which time he might be able to make a certain judgment, whether it was the leprosy or not (see xiii. 4). For the plague would sooner appear when the house was not inhabited.

Ver. 39. The priest shall come again the seventh day.] Make a new inspection, as he did when a man or a garment were suspected to have the leprosy (xiii. 8, 9, 51).

If the plague be spread in the walls.] This was a bad sign in a man’s body or garment (xiii. 5, 51).

Ver. 40. Command that they take away the stones.] As far as it was spread in the walls of the house; which it seems were generally made of stones, when they came to Canaan. Deeper houses, the Jews say, were not infected with the leprosy: nor a habitation called a house (as their doctors affirm) unless it had four walls of four cubits high, built of stones and timber (ver. 45).

Cast them into an unclean place.] Where they threw their dung and all manner of filth. For such places there were without their cities; as there were others where no manner of filth might be thrown; which were called clean places (see iv. 12).

Ver. 41. He shall cause the house to be scraped.] All the rest of the walls, where no spots as yet appeared, were to be scraped; that if any of the contagion stuck to them, it might be taken away, and the spreading of it prevented. For which end these screenings were also thrown out into the same unclean place where the stones were laid.

Ver. 42. Shall take other stones.] Put fresh untainted stones in the room of the other which were taken out of the walls.

Plaster the house.] Command them to lay fresh plaster all over the walls, where they were scraped.

Ver. 43. If after all the forementioned care (of putting in new stones, scraping, and new plastering the walls) the same marks appeared again, which are mentioned ver. 37, the house was to be pulled down, as it is directed in the next verse but one.

Ver. 44.] Upon notice given him; or, perhaps, he was bound to come after a certain time, and examine the state of it.

If the plague be spread.] Of the same nature with that in a garment, which could not be stopped (see xiii. 51).

It is unclean.] Ineasible to be cleansed from the leprosy, and therefore (as it follows) to be demolished.

Ver. 45. He shall break down the house.] This was
CHAPTER XIV.

51 And he shall take the cedar wood, and the hyssop, and the scarlet, and the living bird, and dip them in the blood of the slain bird, and in the running water, and sprinkle the house seven times:

52 And he shall cleanse the house with the blood of the bird, and with the running water, and with the living bird, and with the cedar wood, and with the hyssop, and with the scarlet:

53 But he shall let go the living bird out of the city into the open fields, and make an atonement for the house: and it shall be clean.

54 This is the law for all manner of plague of leprosy, and scall, 55 And for the leprosy of a garment, and of a house,

Because the plague is healed.] A stop being put to its progress, it was a sign the house was free from the plague of which it was suspected.

Ver. 49.] The following rites are used for the cleansing of a house, which were appointed for the cleansing of man (ver. 4). And the reason of it was, as Abarnel well conjectures, to denote that the house was smitten for the man's sake; who was to look upon himself as saved and preserved by the Divine mercy.

It is not said here, indeed, that these two birds should be alive and clean (as is directed, ver. 4); but that is necessarily understood; for he is ordered immediately to kill one of the birds, and let the other fly away (as in the former case), and nothing unclean could be of effect to cleanse a man from uncleanness.

Ver. 51.] This whole verse is explained before, ver. 6, which differs not from this in any thing, but only that the living bird is there mentioned in the first place, and here in the last; and in this verse is more distinctly declared that all these things should be dipped in the blood of the slain bird, and in the running water.

Ver. 52.] There is nothing to be observed here, more than before, but only this, that the house is said to be cleansed by the living bird; as well as by the blood of that which was slain: its flying away being a declaration the house was free for any man's habitation. Thus the scape goat, which was let run into the wilderness, took away the sins of the people, as well as the goat offered at the altar (see xvi. 5).

Ver. 53. He shall let go the living bird] This justifies what the Jewish doctors say upon ver. 7 (see there).

Make an atonement] An atonement was made for the house, no other way than for the altar (see upon ver. 18), by cleansing it so as to make it fit for any man to dwell in it.

It shall be clean.] The owner (who was commanded to forsake the house, ver. 36) or any one else, might return to it, and inhabit it, as before it was suspected to have the plague in it.

Ver. 54. This is the law.] The rule whereby to judge and to cleanse all leprous bodies of men, and that leprosy in the head or the beard, called a scall (xiii. 50—58).

Ver. 55, 56.] The foregoing verse and these two are a recapitulation of the laws delivered in the thirteenth chapter and in this.

Ver. 57. To teach] To guide the priest in judgment, when to pronounce a man, a garment, or a house, infected with the leprosy; or when to declare them free from it.

moter of the house; and he shall carry them forth out of the city into an unclean place.

46 Moreover he that goeth into the house all the while that it is shut up shall be unclean until the even.

47 And he that lieth in the house shall wash his clothes; and he that eateth in the house shall wash his clothes.

48 And if the priest shall come in, and look upon it, and, behold, the plague hath not spread in the house, after the house was plastered: then the priest shall pronounce the house clean, because the plague is healed.

49 And he shall take to cleanse the house two birds, and cedar wood, and scarlet, and hyssop:

50 And he shall kill the one of the birds in an earthen vessel over running water:

a damage to the owner, but it was to prevent a greater unto him, and unto others; and was not done till there was no remedy. For if he had heartened to the stones that cried out of the wall (as Abarnel speaks), saying, Repent, and amend, &c. (which was the meaning of the plague), the infection would have spread no further (see ver. 34). The same author fancies, that this plague in their houses was an emblem of the idolatry they would exercise there when they came into Canaan; and that the pulling down of their houses, was a sign of the destruction of the sanctuary itself, because of their iniquities. This seems to be something forced: but we may not unfitly look upon this manner of proceeding with their houses, when they were infested (some of the stones whereof were taken out, &c., before all was pulled down), as a representation of God's proceedings with them, when they rebelled against him; for, first, some of them were removed; and then the whole nation, by degrees, very much impaired, before they were all carried captive out of their own land.

Shall carry them forth?] Order them to be carried to the place, where the stones and the scrapings of the house, mentioned ver. 40, 41, were thrown. Which may well be looked upon as a figure of their being cast into heathen countries, which in Scripture are called unclean lands. Such the land of Canaan was before they came into it (Ezra ix. 11), and such were all people uncircumcised (Isa. iii. 1).

Ver. 46.] If he did but enter within the door of the house, while it remained under a suspicion of being defiled, he contracted a defilement himself, under which he lay till night. Which strict care to keep the Israelites free from all such pollutions, is an admonishment to us (as Conradus Pellicanus well notes) to avoid all suspected places and company: according to the exhortation of the apostle, "Abstain from all appearance of evil." (See Abarnel.

Ver. 47. He that lieth in the house shall wash his clothes.] It sufficed for the cleansing of him that only entered into such a house, but made no stay there, to be separated for a short time from society: but he that lay there all night, was to do more for his purification; being in more danger to bring away the infection, if there were any.

Ver. 48.] If the plague hath not spread] Just as it was in the leprosy in men's bodies or garments (xiii. 6, 53).
56 And for a rising, and for a scab, and for a bright spot:

This is the law. Here is a conclusion of what belongs to this matter. Which profane minds, who love to disparage the Holy Scripture, and admire no ancient authors but such as Homer, Virgil, and Plautus (to use the words of Pellicanus upon ver. 39), may derive and unworthy to be made a part of a Divine law. But men better disposed may discern herein the great goodness of God to the Israelites, whom he had adopted for his peculiar people, in taking care to give them precepts about all manner of things, which were many ways profitable both for the regulating their manners and preserving their health, and accustomed to an exact obedience to him in every thing. And who doth not see that by these external rules and ceremonies he admonishes us to keep pure consciences, void of offence both towards God and men, in a strict observance of all the rules of our most holy religion?

CHAPTER XV.

1 The uncleanness of men in their issues. 13 The cleansing of them. 19 The uncleanness of women in their issues. 28 Their cleansing.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses and to Aaron, saying,

2 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When any man hath a running issue out of his flesh, because of his issue he is unclean.

3 And this shall be his uncleanness in his issue: whether his flesh run with his issue, or his flesh be stopped from his issue, it is his uncleanness.

4 Every bed, whereon he lieth that hath the issue, is unclean: and every thing, whereon he sitteth, shall be unclean.

5 And whosoever toucheth his bed shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even,

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1.] For Aaron was particularly concerned to see these laws observed, as well as the foregoing.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel. Moses, he is likely, first delivered these laws to them, in the presence of Aaron; who afterward instructed and expounded them to the observance of them.

When any man hath a running issue. He speaks of that disease which physicians call a gonorrhœa; which commonly proceeded from an ill course of life, and had in those countries a great virulence in it. If it proceeded merely from some strain in the back, by carrying too great a burden, or by violent leaping (and several other natural causes, which Maimonides enumerates in his Mechuss. Kapparah, cap. 2), the man was not defiled with it, nor concerned in this law. And therefore the causes from whence it proceeded were diligently to be considered, as Maimonides here admonishes; which might be discerned by such effects, as made it a very nasty and offensive disease in those hot countries, as it is sometimes here in these colder climates.

Out of his flesh. The word flesh signifies the secret parts, as it doth Gen. vi, xvi. 13; Ezek. xvi. 26; and other places.

Because of his issue he is unclean. Upon that account alone was he to be kept from the sanctuary, and separated from company (see ver. 31).

Ver. 3. And this shall be his uncleanness in his issue. The rule whereby to judge of it.

Whether his flesh run with his issue, &c.] Whether there were a continued distillation of the corrupt matter, or it was so congealed as to stop in the passage; either way it made the man unclean.

Ver. 4.] This and the following verse unto ver. 13, are a demonstration that this disease made a man legally unclean to a very high degree; being so offensive, that not only every thing he touched became unclean, but whosoever touched such things was made unclean also. There is little in them that needs any explication; the only difficulty was, to know whether a man laboured under this disease. Which was not wholly left unto his conscience to determine; but his conscience discovered it; the continual flux making a great alteration in the whole habit of his body. For virulent gonorrhœas sometimes last several years (as Tho. Bartholus saith, he knew one that had it ten years, and was reduced to skin and bone), being frequently accompanied with inflammations and ulcers in the neighbouring parts from which the filthy humour flows (Bartholin. Hist. Anatom. Cent. Hist. Hist. xxxvi.);

Ver. 5. Toucheth his bed. Upon which he hath lain.

Shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water. Which was the law in other cases, when men had touched an unclean thing (xli. 23).

Ver. 6. He that sitteth on any thing. Though he did but just sit down, and did it ignorantly, presently rising up again as soon as he knew his error, he became defiled, and might not go to the sanctuary till he was purified by washing his clothes and himself in water.

Ver. 7. He that toucheth the flesh. That is, any part of his body.

Ver. 8. If he—that is, if he—spit upon him. By the same reason, if he blew his nose upon him it defiled him.
washes his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even.

11 And whomsoever he toucheth that hath the issue, and hath not rinsed his hands in water, he shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even.

12 And the vessel of earth, that he toucheth which hath the issue, shall be broken: and every vessel of wood shall be rinsed in water, 13 And when he that hath an issue is cleansed of his issue; then shall he number to himself seven days for his cleansing, and wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in running water, and shall be clean.

He shall wash his clothes," i.e. The man upon whom the spittle fell.

Ver. 9.] By the same reason that the seat he sat upon was defiled (ver. 4).

Ver. 10. Whosoever toucheth any thing that was under the man which hath the issue, shall wash his hands in water, or any thing else that was under him when he rode.

11 That beareth any of those things, &c.] Removeth them from one place to another; though it be to carry them out of the way, that others may not be defiled by them unawares.

Ver. 11. Whosoever he toucheth that hath the issue, and hath not been broken, or any thing else that was under him when he rode, his hand shall be unclean.

12 It is somewhat doubtful whether these words ("hath not washed his hands in water") belong to him that had the issue, or to him that his hands touched. Most understand it of the former, that if the man who had an issue touched any other man, and had not first washed his hands, that man whom he touched should be defiled. But the Syraea takes it to refer to the man that was touched by him, who, if he did not immediately wash his hands with water, was to be cleansed after a more laborious manner, by washing his clothes, and bathing himself in water. But I do not see how washing of his hands could cleanse him, when the man that had the issue touched, perhaps, some other part of his body.

Ver. 12. Shall be broken." That it might not be employed hereafter to any use (see xii. 33, vi. 19).

Every vessel of wood shall be rinsed] Such vessels were not broken, but only well washed, because they were not so easily made as the other, and were of more value. There are so many washings prescribed here, and on other occasions, that it is reasonable to believe there were not only at Jerusalem, and the other cities, but in every village, several washing-places contrived for these legal purifications, that men might, without much labour, be capable to fulfil these precepts. And one cannot but think that such frequent washings were enjoined, to admonish them how carefully they ought to preserve purity of heart and life.

Ver. 13. When he that hath an issue is cleansed] It having to refer to some other man, as it was not of those who had the leprosy.

He shall number to himself seven days] That there might be sufficient proof made whether the issue was stopped; that is, he was really cured.

Wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh] In the conclusion of the seventh day.

In running water," i.e. Spring water (as we speak), which was most pure. River water was the same, which comes from springs.

Shall be clean] So that he might keep company with his neighbours, but not have communion with God at the sanctuary, till after the following sacrifices were offered: for if, in the end of the seventh day, after his washing, the flux returned again, all the labour was lost, and he was to stay seven days more,

14 And on the eighth day he shall take to him two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, and come before the Lord unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and give them unto the priest:

15 And the priest shall offer them, the one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering; and the priest shall make an atonement for him before the Lord for his issue.

16 And if any man's seed of copulation go out from him, then he shall wash all his flesh in water, and be unclean until the even.

17 And every garment, and every skin, whereon is the seed of copulation, shall be as Maimonides observes in his treatise on this subject, cap. 3.

Ver. 14. On the eighth day] If he continued free from the flux, after his washing on the seventh day, in the evening.

Ver. 15. The priest shall offer] As in the case of a poor leper (xiv. 31), who was bound also to offer a trespass-offering of greater value.

Make an atonement for him] Perfectly restore him to partake of holy things, of which he was debarred while he had his issue. And here it may be fit to observe, that the greater part of all the legal defilements depended upon the seat or place of the Divine Majesty (as the author of Sepher Cospi speaks, par. ii. sect. 49), whose presence there made their country be called the holy land, and was the ground of all these injunctions about cleanliness; to which, he thinks, they have no obligations at this day, now that they live in an unclean world (i.e. among us Gentiles), and want the presence of the Divine Majesty among them.

Ver. 16. If any man's seed] Though the holy writers speak very plainly of some things that we think it not so modest to name in that manner, yet it is observable, on the other hand, that in things of the same nature they use circumlocutions to express them, which stick not to speak of in blunter words. As when they say, "the water of the feet," meaning urine; and call going to stool, "uncovering of the feet," which shows that it is nothing but the vast difference of times and places, which makes that language seem uncivil to us, that was not so to them; and, on the contrary, made them very cautious in their expressions, where we think it unnecessary.

Go out from him," Irvoluntarily; in his sleep, or otherwise, which the Hebrews call hert, i.e. accidental.

He shall wash all his flesh] This was one of the smallest legal pollutions, from which they were soon cleansed without any sacrifice; and which some of them think did not oblige them to wash, unless they intended to go to the sanctuary. But though that opinion be not true, yet this rite had such a respect to the sanctuary, that now they have none, they do not think themselves bound to use it on such occasions.

Ver. 17. Every garment, &c.] These things were made so unclean by such accidents, that they might washed with water, and be unclean until the even.

18 The woman also with whom man shall lie with seed of copulation, they shall both bathe themselves in water, and be unclean until the even.

19 ¶ And if a woman have an issue, and her issue in her flesh be blood, she shall be put apart seven days: and whosoever toucheth her shall be unclean until the even.

20 And every thing that she lieth upon in her separation shall be unclean: every thing also that she sitteth upon shall be unclean.

21 And whosoever toucheth her bed shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even.

22 And whosoever toucheth any thing that she sat upon shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even.

not be used the next day, nor till they were washed.

Ver. 18. The woman also with whom man shall lie] It is no wonder the holy writers speak so plainly of these matters, being men of great simplicity, free from all wantonness, commonly far advanced in years; among whom marriage and a numerous issue were accounted the greatest blessings, and therefore coveted by all, and renounced none.

Shall both bathe] There is no sort of pollution in the act of marriage, which is of God's own institution, but what this law made; and the law made it, as Theodoret thinks, that the trouble of such constant purification after it, might preserve them from the immediate use of it. So those words of his signify, κελεύει καθαρισθῆναι, η εκ της σεμνοτροφίας τον σύνεχειαν οτί πρὸ τοῦ κάθαρος αὐτοῖς (Quest. xx. in Levit.).

Ver. 19. If a woman have an issue, &c.] In the Hebrew the words run much cleaner; “and a woman when she shall have an issue of blood, and her issue be in her flesh.” The latter part of which are added, to distinguish this from bleeding at the nose, or from the hemorrhoids (which did not pollute any body); for the word flesh here signifies, as it doth ver. 2. She shall be put apart seven days.] From her husband, and from the sanctuary, where these sorts of uncleannesses have a peculiar respect, as I before noted. And Maimonides here, not unfitly, observes, that whereas the Zabiti accounted a man polluted if he did but speak with a menstruous woman, or if the wind, which came from the quarter where she was, blew upon him; God only required her not to meddle with holy things, nor to approach to the sanctuary. Otherwise she might eat all manner of common meat, and perform all domestic offices for her husband, as formerly, only not lie with him, while she remained in this condition. So he explains this, More Nev. par. iii. cap. 47.

Whosoever toucheth her shall be unclean until the even.] If they were grown persons, as Menochius well observes; for infants were excepted from this pollution, by their age and the necessities of nature. The same is observed by Maimonides, in the chapter forenamed; that the more frequent any of these uncleannesses were, the greater and longer purifications were required. As touching of a dead body, especially of friends and neighbours, being the most usual, it could not be cleansed but by ashes of the red heifer (which were not easily had), and not till seven days were passed. In like manner, fluxes and menstrual pollutions, because they often hap-

23 And if it be on her bed, or on any thing whereon she sitteth, when he toucheth it, he shall be unclean until the even.

24 And if any man lie with her at all, and her flowers be upon him, he shall be unclean seven days: and all the bed whereon he lieth shall be unclean.

25 And if a woman have an issue of her blood many days out of the time of her separation, or if it run beyond the time of her separation; all the days of the issue of her uncleanness shall be as the days of her separation: she shall be unclean.

26 Every bed whereon she lieth all the days of her issue shall be unto her as the bed of her separation: and whatsoever she sitteth upon shall be unclean, as the uncleanness of her separation.

27 And whosoever toucheth those things shall be unclean, and shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even.

pened, and were more grievous than touching the unclean, those therefore that laboured under them, had need of seven days' purification; but that they touched them, of one day only, before they became clean.

Ver. 20.] The very same sort of uncleanness was contracted in this case, as in the foregoing, ver. 4, &c. For if we believe some authors, it might not only be properly called her sickness; but such an one as had some infection in it (at least something offensive) in those hot countries (see Pliny, lib. vii. 5, and lib. xxvii. 34). Ver. 21.] This and the two following verses contain the very same prohibition in this case, which were given in the other (see ver. 5, 6, &c.).

Ver. 24.] If a man lie with her] I. e. Unwittingly, not knowing in what condition she was: for if he did it knowingly, both of them were liable to be cut off (xx. 15).

He shall be unclean seven days.] As having contracted one of the greatest sorts of uncleanness (ver. 19). For though this flux was natural and beneficial, and therefore could have no sort of uncleanness in it but what was made by this law: yet there was a great reason for the keeping men from the company of women in this condition, if leprosies, and such-like diseases, were thereby propagated, as Theodoret says some think; Σομίν μὴ τυπεί ἐν τῇ τυποσεμνοτροφίᾳ, καὶ λέοντα καὶ λεπίδα ἀποτελούμενα, &c. Especially since they were so libidinous a people (as he describes them, in words of a very bad signification), that it was highly necessary to lay such restraints upon them; and to make even involuntary pollutions very penal, that they might learn of such μάλιστα ἐναγαμή τοιχοσία, “that all wilful uncleannesses were far more detestable.”

Ver. 25.] As before he spoke of the natural course of the blood, so here of a disease; which Procopius Gazaus calls malum inimicabile, “an incurable evil.” So it sometimes proved, as appears by the story of those women in the gospel, whose case this was (Matt. ix. 29).

All the days of the issue.] She was to be in the same condition with the woman mentioned ver. 19, who was put apart seven days; i. e. as long as her uncleanness lasted. Which made the case of those that laboured under this infirmity very lamentable, because they were shut up in some many years.

Ver. 26.] Every bed whereon she lieth, &c.] Like the bed and the seat of her mentioned ver. 20.

Ver. 27.] As in the case before mentioned ver. 21.
CHAPTER XVI.

28 But if she be cleansed of her issue, then she shall number to herself seven days, and after that she shall be clean.

29 And on the eighth day she shall take unto her two turles, or two young pigeons, and bring them unto the priest, to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

30 And the priest shall offer the one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering; and the priest shall make an atonement for her before the Lord for the issue of her uncleanness.

Ver. 28. If she be cleansed] Cured of her disease. Then shall she number to herself seven days,] For a trial whether it was a perfect cure or not. After that] If there were no return of the flux. She shall be clean.] So as to be restored to common conversation: but not to the sanctuary, till the following obligations were made.

Ver. 29.] See ver. 15.

Ver. 30. Thus shall ye separate the children of Israel] Take care that they separate themselves; by instructing them, when they are under any of the forenamed impurities, to observe the directions now given. Thus the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin understand these words.

That they die not] Lest I punish them with death, if they approach unto my sanctuary, having any of the forementioned uncleannesses upon them.

When they defile my tabernacle] This shows what is meant by separation and putting apart in the foregoing verses: which was principally from the tabernacle where God dwelt. Out of respect to which, and to preserve their due regard to it (that is, to God himself), all these cautions were given, as I observed before, ver. 15 of this chapter. And see ch. xii. ver. 4, what I noted out of Maimonides, who discourses excellently on this subject, in his More Novoch. (par. iii. cap. 47), where he observes, that there could not well be a more notable means contrived, to maintain a holy fear and reverence to the Divine Majesty upon their minds, than to forbid every person that was any way polluted to come unto his sanctuary. For there were so many sorts of pollutions, made by the law, that it was very hard to avoid falling under some of them: and, consequently, a business of great care, circumspection, and labour, to approach, as they ought, into the Divine presence. For if a man escaped defilement by a dead body, yet he could not easily avoid being defiled by some of the eight creeping things, which he might chance to tread upon; or might fall on his meat, or his drink: and if he escaped these, yet he might be defiled involuntarily by the means mentioned here (ver. 16), or by touching a menstruous woman, or one that had a flux of blood; or, at least, by touching their beds, their seats, or something belonging to them, &c. All which kept a man from the sanctuary; which he could not enter therefore when he pleased, but was to stay a certain time before he could be admitted to worship God there; and not then neither, till he had washed himself. "By all which actions, reverence, affection, and devotion, were preserved to the sanctuary; and men were excited to great humility, which in this was principally regarded."

Ver. 32. This is the law of him that hath an issue, &c.] In this and the next verse, he recapitulates the matter of great care, in the latter end of the foregoing, sum up the contents of that.

Ver. 33. If the man, and of the woman.] Even of the person that hath an issue, whether he be man or woman, &c.

CHAPTER XVI.

1 How the high priest must enter into the holy place. 11 The sin offering for himself. 15 The sin offering for the yearly feast of the expiations.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses after the death of the two sons of Aaron, when they offered before the Lord, and died:

2 And the Lord said unto Moses, Speak unto Aaron thy brother, that he come not at all times into the holy place within the vail before the only to sacrifice unto the Lord alone, but after such a manner as he ordered.

Ver. 2. Speak unto Aaron thy brother,] Into the holy place without the veil, he, or some of the other priests, were bound to go every day, morning and evening, when they offered incense: but into this, as none of them might go at all, so he not at all times, when he went into the other; but only upon one particular occasion, which is mentioned here in this chapter.

Before the mercy seat,] This being the place of God's special presence, none might enter into it but his principal minister; and he no oftener than the Divine mercy seat, which is upon the ark; that he die not: for I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy seat.

3 Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place:

Majesty allowed; which was only once a year (it appears from ver. 29), when he offered the great sacrifice here prescribed. And so much was intimated to Moses before (Exod. xxx. 10). And the Jews add, that on this day of the year he might go in but four times; once to burn incense; a second time to sprinkle the blood of the bullock; then to sprinkle the blood of the goat; and lastly, to fetch out the censer, wherein he could see for it, if he went in a fifth time, he died for his presumption, as they say; particularly R. Levi Barzel. (Praiseef. ecli.xxxvi.). Such sacred places the gentiles had in some countries, which, according to this pattern, were opened only once a year. Particularly Pausanias mentions, in his Boeota, the temple of Dindymene: which they thought it not lawful to enter more than one day in the years Eiga

And the same he saith of another, in the same-book; and in his Eliaca, of the temple of Oracus, Avgouria me un vaxo xo Exos castos, &c. "It is opened once every year" (see Dr. Ottrum's excellant book de Sacrificiis, lib. i. cap. 3).

And if I come into the cloud he is not done for his presumption, in offering with other fire than God allowed. In the like danger Aaron himself had been, if he had come into the Divine presence without his leave, and without such caution as is given ver. 13, which is the reason of this order here delivered to Moses, and by him to Aaron, for the prevention of any such dangerous act.

And as he saith in the cloud upon the mercy seat. That was God's own dwelling-place, where his glory appeared; into which, therefore, none might enter, but when he appointed, and as he directed. The only difficulty is, what is meant by the cloud, wherein he saith he will appear on the mercy-seat. One would think he meant, as usually, the cloud wherein the Divine presence appeared (Exod. iv. 16, 17); for so this would be a great reason for this opinion: for if there had been a cloud in the most holy place, over the mercy-seat, before the high-priest entered, what need had there been to make a new cloud of smoke (as he is ordered, ver. 13), when the Divine glory was sufficiently obscured already! Besides, in the place before mentioned (Exod. xlv. 24), the cloud, as I now observed, is said to have been without the tabernacle, and to cover it; the glory only being within; and in the other place of the book of Kings (and 2 Chron. v. 13, 14), it is said only to fill the house of the Lord, i.e. the body of the temple: but not to be settled upon the mercy-seat. Where we may very well doubt whether there was any cloud or not; but only the Divine glory. The only ground that we can see for it, is that God is said there to dwell in thick darkness: which seems to import that the Divine glory was wrapped up in a cloud. But however that be expounded, these words, which we here translate, "I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy-seat," may well be rendered, "I will be approached in a cloud" (i.e. of incense). For in this word we understand the appearance used Exod. xxvi. 15, not for God's appearing to them, but for the people's appearing with a young bullock for a sin offering, and a ram for a burnt offering.

4 He shall put on the holy linen coat, and he shall have the linen breeches upon his flesh, and shall be girded with a linen girdle, and with the linen mitre shall he be attired: these are holy garments: therefore shall he wash his flesh in water, and so put them on.

And he shall take of the congregation of the children of Israel two kids of the goats for a sin offering, and one ram for a burnt offering.

6 And Aaron shall offer his bullock of the sin offering, which is for himself, and make an atonement for himself, and for his house.

3) "fine linen of Pelusium," which was a city in Egypt, famous for the richest and whitest linen, as our authors show (in his trees as that created out of Pliny and Silius Italicus. And if we may believe the Talmudists, as the high-priest put on fine linen of Pelusium in the morning of this day, so he put on fine linen of India (i. e. in their language, of Ethiopia or Arabia, as Braunius observes, lib. i. de Vest. Sacrd. cap. 7, n. 9) in the evening of it; which was not of much less value than the other. And this is not disagreeable to Moses, who saith, God commanded the priest's garments to be made "for glory and beauty," (Exod. xxviii. 2). And therefore the high-priest appeared, even upon this day, in a splendid and noble habit; which was not inconsistent with inward humility and lowliness of mind. As Moses, they declare, as we may observe, that the performance of God's service was not to be obstructed. For whereas, upon other days, the high-priest washed his hands and his feet in the brazen laver; on this day, if we may believe the Jews, he washed them in a vessel of gold, as the same Braunius observes out of Massachet Joma, cap. 4. There are those who fancy the high-priest went into the most holy place with the right hand girded and breastplate, whereas were the names of the children of Israel: but that is quite contrary to what Moses here delivers, who mentions no other garments but those of fine linen which he wore upon this day; no, not when he went into the holy place (ver. 23). And the Hebrew doctors all thus understand it, as Mr. Selden shows out of them and Joseph. Ziphion, de Succession. in Pontific. Hebrar. cap. 7, p. 250.

Yet the Roman church hath grounded a solemn practice upon the forementioned fancy; the priests, and bishops too, being wont on Good Friday to minister only in the habit of deacons, while they are reading or singing the office of the passion; but when the office is over, they put on their mitres and pontifical vestments, and then they put on richer vestments, proper to their order. Which is a mistaken imitation of the ceremonies under the law, upon this great day of atonement; when the high-priest never put on any of his golden garments for the service of it.

Linens breeches upon his flesh.] To cover his secret parts. For the word flesh is to be understood here as in xv. 5.

Girded with a linen girdle, &c.] These two, with the two foregoing, make up the four white garments which might possibly, as the Jews say, be made of the finest and richest linen that could be got, that the high-priest might appear splendid in the simplest habit wherein he ministered. But it is evident he was ordered to have on those garments which were wrought with gold, and scarlet, and blue, and purple (Exod. xxviii. 6, 8, &c.), because such very sumptuous apparel, it must be acknowledged, was not so suitable to the service of the day. On which the high-priest (as the Hebrew gloss notes upon this place) did not so much put on the person of a patron, as of an accuser; and is set up before God, and begging pardon for them.

Holy garments.] To be used only when he ministered in the sanctuary (Exod. xxviii. 2).

Shall he wash his flesh in water.] There was no need, upon other days, to wash more than once, in the beginning of Divine service; but on this great day he washed five times, as oft as he shifted his garments and went from one ministry to another; as appears in part from ver. 23, 24, where we see what he has observed. Here he seems to speak of his washing after he had offered the morning sacrifice, &c. in his golden garments: and then began the service of the day in these white garments alone.

Ver. 5. He shall take of the congregation.] The former sacrifices (ver. 3) were for himself: these for all the people.

Two kids of the goats for a sin offering.] These two goats made but one sin offering; which is described more largely and particularly, ver. 8—10. The former, perhaps, which was sacrificed to the Lord, was to procure those good things which they had forfeited by their sins; and the other (the scapegoat) was to carry away those sins which they had deserved: for the name that is commonly given it by the Greeks, signifies its power to turn away punishments. Or the simple reason of it might be, that the Israelites, by this double sacrifice (for both were presented before the Lord), might be the more fully satisfied of the expiation of their sins.

There is the like example before us of two birds appointed by the cleansing of a leper's house; one of which only was killed, the other let fly away; but both of them are said to cleanse the house, and to be for atonement (xiv. 49, 52, 53). In which some of the ancient fathers thought they saw a notable type of our Lord Christ. Whose sacrifice, as it was prefigured by all the legal sacrifices (for the paschal lamb itself was a type of himself for us, I Cor. v. 7), so by this more especially on the day of expiation. Which was of greater and more universal efficacy than all the rest, and therefore represented him more fully than the other did. Insomuch that these two goats joined in one sacrifice, may be thought to represent one Christ, consisting of two natures. For since it was not possible, ad Paulus, to admoderate both the το Σταυρον αυτου και το Εανθαμανον, "that which was mortal, and that which was immortal" in Christ; he commanded two to be brought, ἵνα μέν πνευματικός τῆς καρδίας το πάντων προτύπωσης, καὶ δι' ἁπαντοκράτους ἐφήγη το ἀπὸ τῆς ἡμέρας οὗ ἐξωτερικός "that the goat which was offered in sacrifices, might prefigure the possible nature of his flesh: and that which was let go, might show the impassible nature of his Divinity," Quest. xxiii. in Levit. And St. Cyril discourses to the same purpose, in his ninth book against Julian.

One ram for a burnt offering.] Which was no more than was appointed for Aaron himself (ver. 3), who herein is equalled with all the princes of the people; in whose name this ram seems to have been offered.

Ver. 6. Aaron shall offer his bullock—for himself.] Not by killing it, which was done afterwards (ver. 11), but only by presenting it before God to be sacrificed; which was done with a solemn prayer, where-in he besought God to be propitious unto him and mine.

The former God is here, and a new one is set down in Massachet Joma, cap. 3, sect. 8. He laid his hand upon the head of the bullock, and said, "I have done amiss, and been rebellious, and sinned before thee, and I and my house." &c. For himself, and for his house.] For his family, 7 And he shall take the two goats, and present them before the LORD at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. as I said (ver. 3), and for all the priests; who are called "the house of Aaron" (Ps. cvx. 10, 12, cxvv. 9). And I do not see why all the house of Levi should not also be understood; for they are not comprehended within the division of the children of Israel" (mentioned in the verse before), and therefore must be contained here under the name of the house of Aaron (see Num. i. 49).

Ver. 7. He shall take the two goats.] Mentioned ver. 5, which were to be of equal stature, of the same colour by ισχίος ίσος πάνω, (so the Hebrew a sacrifice, y in Joma, cap. 6), both designed to the same end, the expiation of their sins. Present them before the Lord, &c.] All the sin offerings which were made for the congregation, were presented either by the high-priest, or by the elders (iv. 15), and by them devoted to God, to be sacrificed of their own proper substance. For it is the same with his offering of the bullock in the verse foregoing; which was nothing else but his solemn consecration of them, as I said, to be sacrificed. According to which pattern, our blessed Lord and Saviour, a little before he suffered upon the cross, and made himself a sacrifice for us, voluntarily offered himself to die for our sins. Which is the meaning of those words of his, John xvii. 19, "where, praying for his apostles, he saith, "For their sakes I sanctify myself," that is, offer myself to die as an expiatory sacrifice for them. For that αὐθεντεῖν sometimes signifies as much as ποιεῖται, Dr. Outram hath demonstrated, lib. ii. de Sacrificiis, cap. 3. And so St. Chrysostom here expounds these words, "I sanctify myself, or offer myself as a sacrifice, and consecrate and devote myself to be sacrificed. And it is an unfavorable conjecture of another very learned friend of mine, now also with God (Dr. Spencer), that the appointing of two goats to be both presented to God at the same time, and with the same rites, was to preserve the Jews in a belief that there is no distinction of good things and evil, but that which is a sin, is an evil thing, and which is a good: which is the ancient belief of the Chaldeans, and other eastern people, and from them propagated to the Greeks and Romans. Most of whose sacrifices (as another very learned man of our own country hath observed) had respect to these two principles; to one of which they offered in the morning, and to the other at night. See Dr. Windet de Vita Functorum Statu, sect. 3, where he observes, that there are plain footsteps of this old error at this day, through all the east, as far as China: for there was an endeavour to infect Christianity with it, by Manes the Perpinian, in the reign of the Emperor Aurelian; nor was there any heresy that spread so far as this doctrine did.

Ver. 8. Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for the LORD, and the other for the scapegoat. Now from hence, perhaps, it was that some fancied Azazel signified the devil; as R. Menachem and R. Eliezer among the Jews; Julian among the heathen; and some great men lately among us. Who conceive, that as the other goat was offered to God at the altar, so this was sent among the demons, which delight to frequent desert places, and there appeared often in the shape of this creature. But this will not agree with the Hebrew text, which says, this goat was for Azazel, as the other was for the Lord. Now none, sure, will be so profane, as to imagine, that both these goats being set before the Lord, and presented to him, as equally consecrated to him, he would then order one of them to be for himself; and the other for the devil. Which is not possible, for he would not go according to his own pleasure, but according to his own will, which agrees well enough with the name of this goat, according as the ancient translators understood it; some of which, as Symmachus, render it αἰδηγοῦμαι, "the goat going away:" others, as Aquila, ἀκόλουθον, "the goat that goes," and the LXX. οἰκομένως. In which they had no thought of the notion of this word among the Greeks, who called these de-9 And Aaron shall bring the goat upon which the Lord's lot fell, and offer him for a sin offering.
10 But the goat, on which the lot fell to be the scapegoat, shall be presented alive before the Lord, to make an atonement with him, and to let him go for a scapegoat into the wilderness.
11 And Aaron shall bring the bullock of the sin offering, which is for himself, and shall make an atonement for himself, and for his house, and shall kill the bullock of the sin offering which is for himself:
12 And he shall take a censer full of burning coals of fire off from the altar before the Lord, and his hands full of sweet incense beaten small,
and bring it within the vail:

mon by this name, who were esteemed άλλος, άλλος, and άλλος, as J. Pollux speaks, "averters of evil things from them:" but simply meant, as Theodoret interprets it, άλλος, άλλος, άλλος έποιμόνοισιν, which is a term used by the Greeks to signify those who went about among the Jews, as a kind of scapegoat, to carry away the iniquity" which would otherwise have fallen upon them. And so St.
Jerome expounds it, Hierus emissarius, which agrees with the notion which Bochartus puts upon the word out of the Arabic tongue. This goat being sent away into remote places, there to remain separate from the flock to which he belonged; and that upon a mountain (as the Jews fancy) in the wilderness of Sinai, which from this goat was called Azazel: but I see nothing for ground of this.

Ver. 9. The goat upon which the Lord's lot fell, ] In the Hebrew the word is went up; for he first took it up out of the urn, and then let it fall upon the goat.

Offer him.] Devote him to God to be a sacri fee for their sins: beseech him to accept of this sacrifice for that, and for these, and for all their sins, and for all the iniquity (as the prophet speaks, Zech. iii. 2), by virtue of this offering for them.

Make an atonement with him, ] For this was a sin offering, though not slain, no less than the other: as appears from verse 5, which shows these two goats made but one sin-offering; which was partly slain at the altar, and partly let go (as it here follows) to run whither he would: the more perfectly to represent the taking away of their sins, and "removing their iniquity" (as the prophet speaks, Zech. iii. 2), by virtue of this offering for them.

Some, indeed, have thought that this goat was not sacrificed, but only presented alive before God, and so let go; lest it should be thought God could not forgive their sins, unless he was appeased by some slain beast; which imagination was destroyed by letting this sin-offering run away, and not killing it.

But I can see no ground for such a construction; because these were not two, but one sin-offering, as I said before: which being slain in part, established that opinion in them, of the impossibility of obtaining reconciliation without a bloody sacrifice.
Certain it is, that the whole law supposes this, that "without shedding of blood there is no remission," as the apostle observes (Heb. ix. 22). And therefore it will be more agreeable to the Holy Scriptures, if we think, as some do, that the first goat represented our Lord in his sufferings, and this other in his resurrection; whereby he was freed from the bands of death; both his death and his resurrection being for our deliverance, as the apostle shows, Rom. iv. ult.

Let him go.] Whither he pleased. For so the Hebrew world skaloc (send him away, or dismiss him), signifies, in Scripture, entire liberty, such as God demanded for the Israelites from Pharaoh (Exod. iv. 23, v. 1).

For a scapegoat] Into remote places.
In token their sins were quite carried away, to be found no more; for the goat was not merely sent into the wilderness, but into the most desert places of it, as appears from ver. 22.

Ver. 11.] This former part of the verse is word for word the same with ver. 6, which shows that offering there (as we translate it) was nothing else but bringing it to be offered; or presenting it before the Lord, to be a sacrifice for himself, and for his family. But now his bringing it was, that it might be killed immediately, as it follows in the latter part of this verse.

Shall make an atonement.] By killing it, as the next words tell us.

Kill the bullock—for himself.] He was first to offer for himself, before he could acceptably offer for the people, as the apostle observes, Heb. v. 3, ix. 7. And as the Jews tell us (in Massachet Joma, cap. 4, sect.
2), he again put his hand upon the head of the bullock, and made the confession and supplication before mentioned upon ver. 6. And when he had done, then he killed the bullock with his own hands: but though all other sacrifices might be killed by any persons, yet the high-priest himself was bound to kill this; as they say in the same place of the Misna (sect. 3).
And having received the blood of the bullock in a basin, he delivered it to another priest, to keep it in continual agitation, till he had offered incense in the holiest place, then the bullock might not grow thick and be elected; but he kept liquid and thin, fit to be sprinkled before the mercy-seat.

Ver. 12. He shall take a censer ] Which he held in his right hand.

From off the altar.] From the brazen altar where the bullock was slain; for coals were burning before God nowhere else but there.

His hands full of sweet incense.] With his left hand
he took as much of the incense, mentioned Exod.
xxx. 33, 36, as his hand would hold (besides the incense which he burnt every morning and evening, which was a whole pound), and put it into a cup.

Bring it within the vail?] With both these, the censer of coals, and the cup of incense (the former in his right hand, the other in his left), he went in. Yet though all other sacrifices might be killed by any persons, yet the high-priest himself was bound to kill this; as they say in the same place of the Misna (sect. 3).
And having received the blood of the bullock in a basin, he delivered it to another priest, to keep it in continual agitation, till he had offered incense in the holiest place, then the bullock might not grow thick and be elected; but he kept liquid and thin, fit to be sprinkled before the mercy-seat.

This the Hebrew doctors take to have been so difficult a work, that, in the Gemara upon Joma (cap. 1), they say some of the elder priests were sent to, and they had to show him how he should fill his hand with the incense. And the Misna there says, that they adjured him in these words:
"We are the legates of the great Sanhedrin, and thou art our legate and theirs; we adjure thee, we adjure thee by Him whose name dwells in this house, that thou change not any thing of all that we have said unto thee." And so they parted with tears on both sides. The reason of which solemn adjuration, they say, was, that the Sadducees affirmed, he might burn the incense without the vail, and so enter into the most holy place; directly contrary to this text, which required him to do it within; where nobody could see what the high-priest did, and consequently could not tell whether he performed the sersives there aright. Therefore, they took this oath of 18 And he shall put the incense upon the fire before the Lord, that the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy seat that is upon the testimony, that he die not:

14 And he shall take of the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it with his finger upon the mercy seat eastward; and before the mercy seat shall he sprinkle the blood with his finger seven times.

Ver. 13. He shall put the incense upon the fire] He entered (as the Misna saith in Joma, cap. 5) with his face towards the south; and so went sideways (for he might not look upon the ark, where the Divine glory was) till he came to the staves of the ark; where he set down the censer, and put on the incense. And then he filled the house with a cloud of smoke, he went out backward (out of reverence to the Divine Majesty), into the holy place without the veil. Where, when he was come, he made this short prayer, "May it please thee, O Lord God, that this year may be hot and also wet; that the sçerate may not depart from the family of Judah, nor thy people Israel want food, and that the prayer of the sickened may be heard." And then he presently went out of the sanctuary, and showed himself to the people; that they might not suspect he had done amiss, and miscarried in his office. For so they say it sometimes happened, that the high-priest, having violated these holy rites appointed by God, was struck dead in the holy place.

The incense which was burnt every day in the holy place, at the golden altar, representing the prayers of the saints, as St. John teaches us (Rev. viii. 3, 4), this incense, which was burnt in the holy of holies, may well be thought to represent the prayers of the high-priest himself, which he made upon this occasion; as our blessed Saviour did before he offered the great sacrifice. For these verses (xxv., of which more hereafter), with the blood of which he now appears in the heavens before God for us.

That the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy seat!] So that nothing of it might be seen; it being the place of the residence of the Divine Majesty (Exod. xxv. 21, 22), whose glory was inaccessible.

Ver. 14. He shall take of the blood of the bullock.] Having done what is commanded in the foregoing verses, he came out of the sanctuary, and went to the priest whom he left at the altar of burnt-offering, stirring the blood in the basin, which he delivered to him (as I observed, ver. 11), and taking it from the well, and sprinkling it with it (the second time) within the veil; and standing where he did before, when he burnt the incense, sprinkled it as is directed in the words following.

Sprinkle it] "The very root or essence of a sacrifice (as the maxim of the Jews is) lies in the sprinkling of the blood."

Upon the mercy seat] One would think, by this translation, that he sprinkled the mercy seat itself, with some of the blood. But all the Jews understand it quite otherwise: and indeed the Hebrew words are al pene, "over against the face," i. e. as they interpret it (in the Misna before mentioned, cap. 5), towards the mercy-seat. And so it follows in the next words, "and before the mercy-seat shall be sprinkled." Only this difference there was in the sprinkling: that this particle ad, they think, imported that he was to make the first sprinkling, here mentioned, towards the top of the mercy-seat. The Vulgar Latin wholly omits this part of the verse, and only mentions the latter sprinkling, seven times, contrary to the commentator, "over against the mercy-seat eastward."

Eastward.] I should have thought the observation of our learned countryman (Mr. J. Gregory) very remarkable, if he had been commanded only to sprinkle the blood eastward. For then there might have been room for his conjecture, that though Aaron at all other times went his face towards the west (where the most holy place was), and at the very killing of the goat and the bullock, not only looked that way himself, but turned their faces towards the west (as the Jews say in Joma), yet, when he came to perform the chief part of this mystery, "he turned his back upon the hecagratly elements of the world," sprinkled this blood eastward, as an heir male, whose name is the East, i. e. Christ. But I do not see how this agrees with the sprinkling the blood before the mercy-seat; which could not be done without looking towards the west. And therefore it must be confessed that he did not sprinkle it eastward: but standing eastward of the mercy-seat, with his face towards the west, he performed this second sprinkling, as two of our very learned countrymen have observed, Mr. Sheringham upon Joma, and Dr. Outram, lib. i. De Sacrificiis, cap. 16, n. 4.

Seven times.] Concerning this number seven, see before, iv. 6. This was the second time of going into the holy of holies upon this day. Ver. 15. Kill the goat.] The blood of which was received in a basin, as that of the bullock was (see ver. 11), and he carried it within the veil (as here follows), and did just as he had done before, (ver. 14). But whether he first burnt incense, as he had done before he brought in the blood of the bullock, is uncertain: it is likely the same that had been then made still remained; so that there was no need to renew it.

Sprinkle.] For he stood in the same place (as the Misna observes), and there sprinkled once towards the top of the mercy-seat; and then seven times before the bottom of it. Which is not here expressly said, but is to be understood from what goes before: which orders him to do with this blood as he had done with the first.

This now was the third time of his going into the most holy place upon this day (see ver. 2).
CHAPTER XVI.

16 And he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins: and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation, that remaineth among them in the midst of their uncleanness.

17 And there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement in the holy place, until he come out, and have made an atonement for himself, and for his household, and for all the congregation of Israel.

18 And he shall go out unto the altar that is before the Lord, and make an atonement for it; and shall take of the blood of the bullock, and of the blood of the goat, and put it upon the horns of the altar round about.

19 And he shall sprinkle of the blood upon it, when our blessed Saviour consecrated himself to be a sacrifice for us (as I noted upon ver. 7), he first commended himself to God, in that solemn prayer before his death, John xvii. ver. 1, 2, &c., and then to his apostles, who were his household, ver. 9, 10, and so forward to the twentieth verse; and then prayed for all that should believe on him; i.e. the whole congregation of Christian people, from ver. 20 to the end. Immediately after which, he went to the place where he was apprehended, and led to be condemned and crucified, John xix. 1 (see Dr. Outram, De Sacrificiis, lib. ii. cap. 3, n. 3).

Ver. 18. And he shall go out unto the altar that is before the Lord.] These words, before the Lord, seem to restrain this to the golden altar, where incense was offered in the sanctuary: and so I find it generally interpreted, even by the Jews themselves (in Joma, cap. 8, sect. 5), as well as Christians. But the words, he shall go out, plainly signify his coming from the sanctuary, where the golden altar was (and had been cleansed, we may well suppose, together with it, ver. 16), in the outward court, to the altar of burnt-offering, which was also before the Lord (Exod. xxix. 11), though at a greater distance from him: and the altar of incense, which, as we have said, stood in need to be cleansed, as much as the altar of incense. Now, unless it was ordered to be cleansed in these words, I can see no care taken about it at all. In Exod. xxx. 10, there is express mention, indeed, made of making an atonement upon the altar of incense once a year; and nothing said of the other: and if we will so understand it here, then the words, he shall go out, must have respect to his going into the holy place, mentioned in the verse before.

Make an atonement for it.] This is generally understood, as I said, of the golden altar, because such express mention is made of its purification yearly, in the place now mentioned (Exod. xxx. 10). And, no doubt, there was some sort of expiation done when he made atonement for the table, where it stood: but there being the same need, as I said, to expiate the other altar (where no fewer errors had been committed than here, and which stood nearer to an unclean people, who encompassed it), I cannot but think that it is here included.

Shall take of the blood of the bullock, and of— the goat.] He put the blood of the bullock and of the goat together; and then poured them into another vessel, that they might be well mingled. For here is no command in this place, that he should go round the altar twice; and tip the horns of it, first with the blood of the bullock, and then of the goat, separate one from the other; as the Misna in Joma observes, cap. 5, sect. 4.

Put it upon the horns of the altar, round about.] He began at the north-east corner, and so went to the north-west; and from thence to the south-west, and lastly to the south-east: and as he came near to each corner, he put the blood upon it. So the Jews describe this matter in the same place, sect. 4.

Ver. 19. He shall sprinkle of the blood. Not upon the middle of the altar, but nigh the corners; viz. in with his finger seven times, and cleanse it, and hallow it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel.

20 ¶ And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the place where he ended, when he put the blood upon the horns of the altar. So the Jews say in the place above mentioned (sect. 6). And I do not see why the particle upon should not be expounded here, as in ver. 15 (if their interpretation be true), to signify, that he sprinkled the blood before the altar; which he did not touch.

21 And the two goats, these refer this cleansing to his taking the coals and the ashes from the altar, that he might sprinkle the blood in a clean place. And then the words are to be translated, ‘He shall sprinkle the blood, &c., having cleansed and hallowed it.’ But the conclusion of the verse determines us to another sense, which is, that by sprinkling the blood he cleansed and sanctified it, from the uncleanness of the children of Israel,” whereby it had been defiled; the priests having either come in their uncleanness thither, or not performed their service as they ought there; and the people thereby remaining in their impurities.

Now, when the high-priest had done all this, the Jews say (in the Misna before named) he poured the rest of the blood of the bullock and goat at the bottom of the altar of burnt-offerings (where, I conceive, he concluded this atonement), for there was a conveyance to carry it away, as I observed upon iv. 17. And they make account, also, that if every thing was not done in this order it was ineffectual, and was to be done over again. For example; if the blood of the bullock was sprinkled before the blood of the bullock (contrary to the directions, ver. 14, 15), he returned, and sprinkled the blood of the goat after that of the bullock, &c.

Ver. 20. Made an end of reconciling the holy place.] Making it fit to continue God’s dwelling-place (ver. 16).

Tabernacle of the congregation.] By this, I think, is meant the sanctuary, and every thing in it; particularly the golden altar.

The altar.] Of burnt-offerings, where he ended his atonement for the whole house of God.

Bring the live goat:] Two had been presented to the Lord (ver. 7, 10), that is, solemnly consecrated and devoted to be expiatory sacrifices; one of which having been slain, the other was now brought to be made an expiation for sin, after another manner. And he was brought, no doubt, to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, where they were wont to lay their hands upon other sacrifices (1. 3, 4).

21. Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head] Laying of the hand upon the head of the beast, was a rite used in all sorts of sacrifices, whether burnt-offerings, peace-offerings, or sin-offerings, see i. 4, iii. 2, iv. 4, 33. In which places, mention is made only of laying on his hand: but here the high-priest is commanded to lay on both hands, as he and his sons did in the sacrifice of the bullock and the ram at their consecration (viii. 14, 15). The meaning of which was, the more solemnly and entirely to devote the sacrifice to the use for which it was designed; which, in this sacrifice, was to bear all their sins. For they were all laid upon this sacrifice, unto which the punishment of them was transferred; this rite signifies as much as if they had said, whatsoever we have done amiss, let it be upon us, but this sacrifice be charged with it: that is, let the punishment which we deserve. Such phrases there are, 2 Sam. 1. 16; Esther ix. 25; Ps. vii. 16, and other places.

Confess over him.] This must have been understood, if it had not been expressed; for imposition of hands was always accompanied with prayer, of one sort or other, according to the occasion of it. Inasmuch, that the Jews say, “where there is no confession of sin, there is no imposition of hands; for imposition of hands belongs to confession” (see Dr. Outram, De Sacrif. lib. i. cap. 15, n. 8). And it is observable, that the high-priest made confession three times on this day. First for himself, and then for his brethren the priests, and now for the whole congregation; saying this prayer (as they tell us in Joma, cap. 6, sect. 2).

I beseech thee, O Lord, this people, the house of Israel, hath sinned against thee, and I my soul: thou mayest be cleansed from all the sins of Israel. And the word Lord, as soon as all the priests and the people that were in the court heard pronounced by the high-priest, they bowed and fell down flat upon their faces, and worshipped, saying, “Blessed be the Lord; let the glory of his kingdom be for ever.”

All the iniquities—all their transgressions in all their sins.] These three words, iniquities, transgressions, and sins, are the very words used by the high-priest in his confession before mentioned; which comprehend all manner of offences, whether committed deliberately or not against negative or affirmative precepts (as they call them). Grotsch, in his notes on this place, hath thus distinguished them, but whether exactly or not cannot be determined. But it is probable that sins signify offences committed by error, not deliberately; iniquities, such as were deliberately committed against the prohibiting precepts; and transgressions, those that were deliberately committed against commanding precepts. All, except those to which cutting off was threatened, which were not expired by any sacrifice.

Putting them upon the head of the goat.] By putting his hand on the head of the goat, and confessing their sins over him (with prayer to God to remit them), they were all charged upon the goat, and the punishment of them transferred from the Israelites unto it. Just as the sins of all mankind were afterwards laid upon our Saviour Christ (as the prophet speaks, Isa. lii. 6), “Who his ownself bare our sins in his own body” (saith St. Peter, 1 Ep. ii. 21), the punishment passing from us to him, “who was made sin for us” (2 Cor. v. 21). Which expressions are manifest allusions unto this sacrifice on the great day of expiation, which was the most illustrious figure of the sacrifice of Christ, and shows, beyond all reasonable contradiction, that Christ suffered in our stead, and not merely for our benefit. For it is very evident, the sacrifice offered on this day was put in the place of the people; and all their sins, that is, the punishment of them, laid upon its head. And it appears by the form of all other sacrifices, when we are speaking generally of the times, that the high priest brought them off the guilt

which he had contracted, from himself, and laid it on the sacrifice which was to die for him. Which he did by laying his hand on the head of it at the door of the tabernacle while it was alive. Then he took the goat which he had so placed, he made a confession of his sins, for which he desired forgiveness by the offering of this sacrifice; that is, he prayed by these rites, that the beast being offered and slain, he might be spared from punishment, which was a plain transferring the guilt from himself unto his sacrifice. Which being yet alive, and thus laden with his guilt, was sent into the wilderness, and set there as a pledge for the guilty person: that is, died in his stead; for there was no other reason of its being put to death there in that manner.

I have insisted the longer on this, because nothing can better explain the true meaning of Christ's dying for us: which was by transferring the suffering due to our sins, to Christ himself, as that mannequin was in the legal sacrifices. Which was a thing, let me add, so notorious in the world, that other nations from hence derived the like custom to that here mentioned by Moses.

Particularly the Egyptians, as David Chytreus hath long ago observed, and since him many others out of Herodotus: who tells us (lib. ii. cap. 39), that their priests had the custom of laying on the head of the beast which they sacrificed, Εύσταθος κατά Σάμουλον, εἰς κεφαλήν τρισάπτωσιν "that if any evil was to fall, either on themselves who sacrificed, or upon the whole country of Egypt, it might be turned upon the head of that beast." And this, he saith, was the custom over all the land of Egypt; and the reason why no Egyptians would offer a sacrifice to Neptune; and thus the Mussilenses did, this the notion of the Egyptians only, but of other countries also; who called those sacrifices which were offered for them θρεπτικὰ, being sacrificed in their stead; and the life of the beast given for theirs. Thus the Greeks sometimes sacrificed men, when some very heavy calamity was fallen upon them, whom they called ἐπιθερμοσια. And their not being able to pardon them out of their sins," by suffering in their room. For they prayed thus over him, who was devoted every year for the averting evils from them,

Παρακλησία ἤκουσε, εἰς τό σπέρμα τοῦ κατάστασιν ἢ σφοδρότερόν ἐσσε ἢ χρήσθω ἡ εὐδοκία, εἰς τόν ἱεράτημα τοῦ κατάστασιν "be thou our cleansing; that is, our preservative and redemption, or ransom." And with these words they threw him into the sea as a sacrifice to the Abyssinian gods. And thus, as Servius tells us (upon the third Aeneid), in time of a plague, praying, ut in ipsum recidenter malia totius civitatis, "that on him might fall the evils of the whole city."

Send him away] As soon as the confession was over, the goat was sent away. By a man prepared beforehand (as the ancients interpret it), or that stood ready for this purpose. Jonathan saith, he was designed for it the year before; others say only the day before; and that the high-priest appointed him: who might appoint anybody whom he thought fit; but did not usually appoint an Israelite, as they say in Joma, cap. 6, n. 3.

Into the wilderness:] It is not certainly known what wilderness this was; but the Hebrews call it the wilderness of Tzuk, which they say, was ten miles from Jerusalem. And they say, that at the end of each mile there was a tabernacle erected, where men stood ready with meat and drink, which they offered to him that went with the goat, lest he should faint by the way. And the nobles of Jerusalem, they add, accompanied him the first mile; farther than which they might not go, because this day was a Sabbath. After which, they that were in the first tabernacle accompanied him to the next; and they that were there to the third; and so forward to the last; that they might be sure to have this great work done of carrying their sins quite away from them. So we read in the treatise on this subject, called Joma, cap. 6, sect. 4, 5, which Malmonides hath explained, as I have now done.

Ver. 22. The goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities. This shows more fully still the nature of this sacrifice, in which all their iniquities, i.e. the punishment of them was laid, that he might carry them away. For this goat was not capable to bear their sins, but only their punishment; as Christ also did, who knew not sin, but was made sin for us, in order to the punishment of our sins laid on him. For, that this scape-goat, which was loaded with their sins, was a sin-offering, is plainly said before in this chapter; and consequently represented Christ (who is our sin-offering), as well as the other part of this sin-offering did, whose blood was carried into the holy place. And in some regard this scape-goat was a very notable presentation of him; if it be true, that our Saviour entered upon his office, of being the Mediator of our reconciliation with God, upon this great day of atonement, which was the day on which he was baptized, as our Dr. Jackson, together with some good chronologers think. For though the tradition of the western church be, that his baptism was a very notable presentation of him; yet, as Jansenius, and some others of the Romish communion, do not think fit to follow it, so he judges it more probable to have been on the tenth of September. In the beginning of which month, when the feast of blowing of trumpets was celebrated (as we read, xxii. of this book, 24), John Baptist began to lift up his voice saying, a trumpet, and thus he said, certainly docked to him, and, confessing their sins, were baptized by him in Jordan; where our Saviour also being baptized on the tenth day, which was the day of atonement, and being declared the Son of God by a voice from heaven, was "immediately driven by the Spirit into the wilderness," as St. Mark tells us, i. 12. Which was a manifest prediction (he thinks) to John Baptist, that this was the Redeemer of the world prefugured by the scape-goat; who, going into the wilderness on the day of atonement, immediately after the people had made confession of their sins, gave him to understand (who was well acquainted with the meaning of their legal rites) that he was sent by God to take upon himself the sins of the world, and then by him to take them for his entering into the holy season offered to God, and slain as a sacrifice to God for them. And this he did at that very time, when the paschal lamb was killed (as I have shown upon Exod. xii. 6), to the end that they might take notice he was the Lamb of God, whose sacrifice that lamb prefugured: as by being led into the wilderness on the same day as the scape-goat was carried forth, the Jews to show that the mystery represented by that ceremony was exactly fulfilled in him.

This notion of his I thought good to mention (though, as far as I know, he is singular in it), because it carries some probability in it, if what the apostle saith (Col. ii. 17) be well considered, that the law contained 'shadows of things to come, the body of
of the congregation, and shall put off the linen garments, which he put on when he went into the holy place, and shall leave them there:

24 And he shall wash his flesh with water in the holy place, and put on his garments, and come forth, and offer his burnt offering, and the burnt offering of the people, and make an atonement for himself, and for the people.

which was Christ." Who was a body consisting of so many different parts, and so complete (as he observes), that no one, nor a few legal ceremonies, could perfectly foreshadow it: but as the ceremonies were many, and almost infinite, so every one did foreshadow some part or piece of this complete body: that is, no remarkable part of it, no special event or action, which concerned our Saviour Christ, but was foreshadowed by some of his legal ceremonies; see Christ's Answer to John's question, numb. 62—64, and in his ninth book upon the Creed, concerning the Consecration of the Son of God (which was printed several years after), sect. 4, ch. 24, n. 5—8, where he resumes this argument, and endeavours to answer this question: Why, since Christ was to accomplish the legal priesthood, and himself by his bloody sacrifice upon the cross, he did not offer himself, and die upon this very day of atonement. To which he gives full satisfaction: but it is too long here to be inserted.

Unto a land not uninhabited. So the LXX. translate the Hebrew word γεζερα, γην ἀκατορ, "a land into which nobody came," or "desolate country." The Hebrew word properly imports a land cut off from commerce, that is, from habitable countries; not which cuts off what is sent into it, by its rugged and sharp stones, as the Jews expound it. This still sets out the design of this sacrifice, which was to free men so perfectly from the punishment of their sins, that they should not fear the return of them any more. For this goat was not made to return, nor to do any service but to be slain, according to the most uninhabitable and inaccessible part of it (as the Greek word properly signifies), where none were likely ever to see it again.

He shall let go the goat in the wilderness.] When he came to the last stage, nobody accompanied him that led the goat any further; but he went the tenth mile alone; by himself, by his bloody sacrifice upon the cross, he did not offer himself, and die upon this very day of atonement. To which he gives full satisfaction: but it is too long here to be inserted. And the Misna saith (in the place before named), that he threw it headlong down the rock Tzuk; where they say, it was broke in pieces before it came to the middle of it; or, as Jonathan said, God raised a storm which blew the goat down with a mighty force. But this is contrary to the very words; see chap. xvi. 18, verse 21, where he speaks, not of letting the goat go, but of dismissing him, in the wilderness, to run whither he would. And it seems contrary also to the intention of this law, which was, that only one of the goats should be killed, the other let go alive. Whereby was represented, that their sins, which were expiated by the blood of the sacrifice, should not return again to be charged upon them. Or, that their souls were free from their sins as the leprosous person was from his confinement, when the bird was let fly into the fields. Which perfect freedom from the punishment of their sins, was further signified by the burning of the flesh, the skin, and the dung of the sin-offering, without the camp: which denoted that all memory of the sins for which this expiation was appointed, was cleansed removed and abolished.

The Jews will have it, that a piece of scarlet cloth being tied upon the horns of this scape-goat (as another was about the neck of the goat which was sacrificed), when the man had brought it to the top of the rock Tzuk, he divided the cloth into two pieces, and let the goat go away with one, and tied the other to a tree, which may be seen sometimes when it changed colour and became white, as they say it did when the goat was thrown down headlong. Anciently, indeed, they say this scarlet cloth was tied to the gate of the temple, and if it turned white when the goat was sent away (as they pretend it usually did), there was great joy among the people, because it was a sign their sins were forgiven, according to that of the prophet, Isa. i. 18, "though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow." But if it did not change its colour into white, they hung down their heads, and were full of sorrow: they looking upon it as a token of God's anger. Which I relate only for this purpose, that I may take notice how the same authors, who tell this story, confess, that for forty years before the destruction of the second temple, that is, from the time of our Saviour's death, this third piece, whichever it was at all, which, if it be true, was a notable token of the wrath of God coming upon them, for their crucifying the Lord Christ.

Ver. 23. Aaron shall come into the tabernacle.] All that the high-priest did about the scape-goat was performed at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation; which was the place wherein he lay dressed over him all their sins (see ver. 20, 21), which, being done, and he having sent the goat away, he is now ordered to come into the sanctuary itself.

Shall put off the linen garments.] See ver. 4. The Jews say there were two sorts of white garments which he wore on this day: one in the morning, which were laid upon him, and then removed, and dressed over him all their sins; see ver. 20, 21, which, being done, and he having sent the goat away, he is now ordered to come into the sanctuary itself.

Shall leave them there.] Never to be used more, either by him, or by anybody else. But they were laid up where they were left; and new ones made against the next year, as the Gemara upon the third chapter of Joma relates. And the same is affirmed by Braunus, li. ii. de Vest. Sacerd. cap. 25, n. 9.

Ver. 24. He shall wash his flesh. Either in the laver which stood in the outward court, or in a room in the house of the priests, which in aftertimes was called happehret, where the priest, they say, washed himself upon this day ever time he changed his garments. And this agrees well enough with the words of Moses, which here follow, that when he had put on his garments, he should come forth; that is, from this chamber, to perform such offices as are after mentioned. The end of this washing, in this place, seems to have been, that he might purify himself after he had touched the goat, which bare all their iniquities (ver. 21), as the man that carried him into the wilderness was to wash after he had done that business (ver. 26). Though others will have it, that it was in token he had now finished the expiation. Certain it is, here is another washing, distinct from that mentioned verse 21, that he might wash himself, after he had put on the white garments. Which in part justifies what the Misna saith in Joma, cap. iii. sect. 3.
25 And the fat of the sin offering shall he burn upon the altar. 26 And he that let go the goat for the scapegoat shall wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in water, and afterward come into the camp. 27 And the bullock for the sin offering, and that the high-priest washed five times upon this day; all in the house kapporeth, except the first; which could not be in the court of the tabernacle, because he was to wash before he entered into it. For there were five ministries to be performed upon this day, at each of which he changed his garments; and between every ministry, when he changed his garments, he washed himself. There is a long discourse about this, and about washing his hands and his feet, in Toraḥ Cohanim, quoted by our learned countryman, John Sherringham, in his annotations upon Codex Jona, p. 57, &c., which they endeavoured to ground upon the very words of this verse.

Now as the leading of Christ Into the wilderness, upon the day of atonement, was foreshadowed by the ceremony of the scape-goat; so his baptism on the same day was as expressly foreshadowed, or prefigured, as that ceremony of Aaron, which was, or could be, by the legal ceremony here mentioned, ofAaron’s washing his body in the holy place. They are the words of Dr. Jackson, in Christ’s Answer to John’s Question, sect. 64, where he endeavours to make out this,

Put on his garments.] viz. His other garments, which he had officiated upon other days; which the Jews call his golden garments, to distinguish them from the white garments; which alone he wore when he went into the most holy place. And the Jews call by this name of golden garments, all the eight garments of the high-priest; four of which were common to him with the lower priests, and were made of linens; and the other four, by them made for him, appear as if he were all clothed in gold. For they either consisted of solid gold, as the plate on his forehead; or had solid gold appendant, as the robe had; or had gold interwoven, as the ephod and the breastplate. Now he put on these, after he had put off the linen garments, mentioned ver. 4, 25, which were never worn but when he ministered in the holy of holies; where he did not appear with the breastplate of urim and thummim, and the rest of the golden garments, as some learned men have imagined; particularly Corn. Bertram, in his book de Republ. Hebr. cap. vii., where he saith, Hujus sacerdotis erat semel in anno adytum sanctuarii adire, indutus ipso ephod, “It belonged to the high-priest to go once every year into the most secret place of the sanctuary clothed with the ephod.” Which is directly contrary to ver. 4, of this chapter. But many other great men have fallen into the same mistake (see J. Brunnius de Vestitu Sacerdot. Heb. lib. ii. cap. 20, n. 25, and cap. 25, n. 3, 10).

Come forth.] From the place where he put on his golden garments unto the altar of burnt-offerings. Offer his burnt offering.] I take this for the daily evening sacrifice, which usually was one lamb; but on this day was two rams, one for himself, and another for the people; unto which there was an additional offering of seven lambs of the first year; as they were in Jona, cap. 7, sect. 3. But before this, they say, he went any where to the people as a judge, and read the book of the law, which was with great ceremony delivered to him. And he might read either in his pontifical habit, or in his own robes (which he pleaded), for reading was no ministry, but that summit where there was this reading began at Num. xxix, 7, &c., where the sacrifice of seven lambs is ordered upon this day. Make an atonement] Rather, “having made an atonement;” which was already done by other sacrifices, not by these.

Ver. 25. This fat of the sin offering shall he burn] This also, I think, should be translated in the same manner, “having burnt the fat of the sin-offering,” which was done, I suppose, in the morning, when both the bullock and the goat were offered for sin (ver. 11, 14), but was not mentioned till now, to show that their sacrifices were not perfected till both Aaron and the people were reconciled; after which their burnt-sacrifices were acceptable to him. This burning of the fat was ordered in all sin-offerings (iv. 8, 10, 26), and therefore, was not now to be omitted. And, perhaps, it was reserved to be burnt, when the flesh of the bullock and the goat was burnt without the camp (ver. 27), which was in the conclusion of all the sacrifices, or in the close of the day.

Ver. 26. He that let go the goat for the scapegoat] After the man had dismissed the goat, it was not lawful for him to return farther back than one mile to the last tabernacle, where he was permitted to rest himself after his labour, and not remain all night in the wilderness. So they tell us in Jona, cap. 6, ver. 6.

Shall wash his clothes.] This goat being a public xaiphon, or “purification” (upon whom all their sins were thrown, was extremely impure; and therefore could not be touched, without rendering the person who led him away unclean in the highest degree: which was the reason that he was bound to wash both his clothes and also his whole body in water, before he could go so much as come into the city, or to go to his own house, μη πιστεύειν εἰρήνην καὶ σῶμα πυκνότητος εἰς τῇ πυκνότητι. “who had not first washed his clothes, and his body in running water, or in spring-water (lib. ii. cap. 109, sect. 41). For nothing is more known than that such a kind of purification for washing themselves, was a custom all the world over; and continues to this day in the eastern, or other hot countries, not only among the Mahometans, but the pagans, who plunge themselves three times, one after another, into their rivers, rising up with their faces to the east, as all travellers into those parts tell us.

Afterward come into the camp.] Have free conversation with his brethren, and, I suppose, without any farther ceremony, be admitted to the sanctuary.

Ver. 27. Bullcok [Mentioned ver. 11, 15. Whose blood was brought] Of which we read in the same place, ver. 11, 15.

Shall one carry forth?] But first they were ripped up, and the inurium, as they call them (mentioned in iv. 8, 9), taken out, to be burnt upon the altar. And then the priest dissected them (as the Misna saith in Jona, cap. 6, sect. 7), not to pieces, as was wont to be done in burnt-offerings, but made only deep incisions, letting the parts hang still together; which being done, four men saith R. Solomon, carried them the goat for the sin offering, whose blood was brought in to make atonement in the holy place, shall one carry forth without the camp; and they shall burn in the fire their skins, and their flesh, and their dung.

28 And he that burneth them shall wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in water, and afterward shall he come into the camp.

29 ¶ And this shall be a statute for ever unto you: that in the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, ye shall afflict your souls, and do no work at all, whether it be one of your own people the remission of their great sin, in worshipping the golden calf; in memory of which it was ordered to be entirely a day of repentance and of Divine worship, called the Day of Atonement.

Ye shall afflict your souls] By fasting and abstinence, not only from all meat and drink, but from all other pleasure whatsoever: insomuch, that they might not wash their faces, much less anoint their heads, nor wear their shoes, nor use the marriage bed, nor read (if their doctors say true) any portion of the law, which would give them delight: for example, the story of the young man sacrificed, and leading them through the Red Sea, &c., so far is the Mahometan story from having any colour of truth. It is likely, also, that to increase their grief they rent their clothes (as they did in other fasts in aftertimes), put on sackcloth, girded it close to their flesh, sprinkled ashes on their heads, &c., which were all intended, no doubt, to increase in outward sorrow for all their sins, with a hearty abhorrence of them, and resolution to mortify and abstain from them. For though the word soul be generally expounded the sensitive part of us, which is afflicted by fasting (as the prophet Isaiah expounds this phrase, lix. 3, 5), yet it is absurd to think that God was pleased with this alone, which made them break off their sins by righteousness; which the prophet there declares was the only acceptable fast to the Lord.

The Hebrew doctors here observe, that they did not afflict little children on this day, by making them fast from all food, till they were of the age of eleven years; but only taught them what they were to do when they came to age, that they might be accustomed to the precept (see Joma, cap. 8, sect. 4).

Do no work at all] Not only abstain from all pleasure, but from all labour whatsoever: nothing being to be done upon this day but confession of sins and repentance, as Maimonides expresses it in the place before mentioned.

You of every one your country, or a stranger that sojourneth] The Hebrew word ezrach is extant only here and xxiii. 12, which signifies as much as one that had his original among them, being born an Israelite, as it is there expressed. The opposite to which is gher (a stranger, we translate it), one that was of another nation, but had embraced the Jewish religion, and lived among the Jews; who in the New Testament is called a proselyte.

Ver. 30. On that day shall the priest make an atonement] If upon this day they afflicted and humbled their souls (as Conr. Pellicanus glosses), with "fasting and prayer and anguish for their sins, with alms also, beseeching God's mercy with tears and sighs in sackcloth and ashes, resting from all servile works, and devoted wholly to the Lord."

To cleanse you] From all the transgressions and sins mentioned ver. 16, from which both the high-priest, and his family, and all the people were to be purged on this day. For which reason the greatest care was to be used to see it rightly observed, because all their happiness depended upon it. For the land of Canaan was promised them upon condition that they kept the law; offering all the sacrifices therein prescribed; especially this great sacrifice, which was to cleanse them from the guilt of all their neglects or breaches of this law. Which should teach us Christians to conclude, that as the inheritance of that good land was assigned the Jews in consideration of those sacrifices, as the condition of that covenant, by which they were prescribed; so the inheritance of the kingdom of heaven is made over to us by the covenant of grace, in consideration of the obedience and sufferings of Christ Jesus, of which they were a figure. For it is his blood "that cleanseth us from all unrighteousness" (as St. John speaks), and secures our claim to the heavenly inheritance.

That ye may be clean] If a man was bound to offer sacrifice for any sin that was certain, he was not excused from it by this sacrifice on the day of expiation; but was bound to make that other sacrifice also. But the day of expiation freed those who were bound to offer sacrifices for no sins (as St. John speaks), and indemniseth (in his treatise of Offences committed through Error, chap. 3, sect. 9), that those sins which were known to none but God, were taken away by this solemn day of expiation, without any other sacrifice. But the Misna, in the last section of Joma, acknowledges very honestly, that the day of expiation did not purge away sin; guilt of the offences they had committed against their neighbour, unless they first gave him satisfaction.

Before the Lord] Who dwelt among them, and would continue to do so, if they observed his laws, and took care to be thus cleansed from all their sins. But, lest any man should mistake this matter, it may be here fit to observe, that there were no sacrifices at all appointed for any uncleanness of body or spirit, and therefore when he speaks here of making them clean from all their sins upon this day, such as these (for instance, murder, adultery, idolatry, &c.) are not included: for this great sacrifice could not obtain a pardon for them, but only for offences committed against the ritual laws contained in this book; and these also when committed through error or ignorance: for if they were done purposely, or cutting off was threatened to them (see Numb. xv. from ver. 29 to 32). And this appears plainly from the sacrifices themselves that are here appointed; which had no virtue in them from their own worth and value, but only from God's institution, to make expiation for their sin. For the death of a bullock or a goat was not of such a nature as to expiate for the taking away of guilt, unless he had given it such a power. And that power which he was pleased to allow unto them, was neither infinite, nor could it be so. For the guilt that they were principally designed to abolish, was not of such a nature as to require such an expiation: it arising from thence which were neither good nor evil in themselves; and therefore could not create such a guilt. Such were all the uncleannesses from certain natural fluxes, from touching a dead body, and innumerable other such-like impurities: which depending wholly upon the will of God, who by a positive law made such things to bring men under a guilt; by the same will be appointed a proportionable expiation of it by these sacrifices, whose power to cleanse depended also purely upon his pleasure. And if they had any virtue to purge men from the real guilt of sins committed against the eternal laws of God; this they had not of themselves, but from the most gracious will of God, who was pleased to apply to this purpose the future satisfaction of the immaculate Lamb of God, of which these sacrifices were a shadow and type. For a body being prepared for the Son of God, and he offering himself for us, that was a sacrifice of such infinite value in its own nature, that it expiated all manner of sins of all men. To this effect, that excellent person Job. Wagenheim discourses, in his confutation of R. Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 488.
may be clean from all your sins before the Lord.

31 It shall be a sabbath of rest unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls, by a statute for ever.

32 And the priest, whom he shall anoint, and whom he shall consecrate to minister in the priest's office in his father's stead, shall make the atonement, and shall put on the linen clothes, even the holy garments:

Ver. 31. It shall be a sabbath of rest unto you.] In the Hebrew the words are a Sabbath of Sabbaths, i.e. a great or perfect Sabbath, like that of the seventh day in every week; on which they might do no manner of work. And so the seventh day is called, just as this is, a Sabbath of rest, or Sabbath of Sabbaths (see Exod. xxxi. 15, xxxv. 2); which gave occasion to these Jews we meet withal in Martial and other, at the Jews' fasting on their Sabbath-days: for reading Moses's books carelessly, they fancied the Jews observed as strict a fast upon every Sabbath-day, as they did on this, which was but once a year.

Ye shall afflict your souls.] See ver. 29.

Ver. 32.] The high-priest, who should be anointed and consecrated in his father's stead (when he was dead), is here ordered to make this atonement yearly. That is, what was now done by Aaron, was to be done by every high-priest successively, when he was legally put into his office; by vesting him with the priestly garments, anointing him and offering the sacrifices of consecration (viii. 7, 10, 32).

This statute confined the sacred work of this day to the high-priest, who alone could perform it: but it shows withal, as the apostle observes, the great imperfection of this legal priesthood, which could not, by reason of death, continue always in one person: but there were many priests, succeeding one another in the office, which became often vacant. Whereas our great High-priest, "because he continued for ever," i.e. never dies, "hath an unchangeable priesthood; and therefore is able to save to the uttermost, and evenmore, those that come to God by him" (Heb. vii. 23—25).

Put on the linen clothes.] He was to take a special care not to officiate on this day in any other garments but those mentioned ver. 4, which were peculiarly appropriated to this service, and called the white garments; which were a figure, perhaps, of the perfect purity of our great High-priest, who, as it there immediately follows (Heb. vii. 26), "is holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners."

Ver. 33.] In this verse he only sums up the whole duty of the day: in which a general atonement was made, for all things, and for all persons. The only thing to be observed is, that the expiation of the sanctuary, the tabernacle, and the altar, preceded the expiation of the priests and of the people, who were to be expiated by the sacrifices offered there. But the expiation of the high-priest himself, who was to make the expiation of the sanctuary, preceded all the rest; as is apparent from ver. 1.

Ver. 34. An everlasting statute.] The repetition of this the third time (see ver. 29, 31), shows of how great importance it was, that this annual solemnity should be observed.

Unto you.] The high-priests (before mentioned), of whom he speaks in the plural number, because none of them could continue always (as I have observed, ver. 32), but enjoyed the office successively, upon the death of their predecessors.

To make an atonement] This is only a repetition of what was said, ver. 30, that it should be incumbent on the high-priest, by a perpetual obligation, to make an atonement for the people's sins on this day; as it was incumbent on the people (ver. 29) to afflict their souls upon this day.

He did as the Lord commanded Moses.] The service of this day was immediately performed by Aaron, according to the forenamed order.

CHAPTER XVII.

The blood of all slain beasts must be offered to the Lord at the door of the tabernacle. 7 They must not offer to devils. 10 All eating of blood is forbidden. 15 And all that dieth alone, or is torn.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses saying,

2 Speak unto Aaron, and unto his sons, and unto all the children of Israel, and say unto them; This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded,

3 And he shall make an atonement for the holy sanctuary, and he shall make an atonement for the tabernacle of the congregation, and for the altar, and he shall make an atonement for the priests, and for all the people of the congregation.

4 And this shall be an everlasting statute unto you, to make an atonement for the children of Israel for all their sins once a year.

And he did as the Lord commanded Moses.

1 The blood of all slain beasts must be offered to the Lord at the door of the tabernacle. 7 They must not offer to devils. 10 All eating of blood is forbidden. 15 And all that dieth alone, or is torn.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1.] After he had ordered the great annual sacrifice, in the foregoing chapter, he gives some directions about other sacrifices, for which there would be occasion every day.

Ver. 2. Speak unto Aaron, &c.] Who were all concerned in what follows; and therefore this command is directed to the whole "house of Israel" (ver. 3), to whom this was delivered, it is likely, by their elders: or else Moses himself went from tribe to tribe, and spake to their several families.

This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded.] Enjoined by a special law.

Ver. 3. What man soever—killeth an ox, &c.] viz. For a sacrifice or offering (as it follows, ver. 4) these being the only creatures of the herd and the flock that were permitted to be brought to God's altar. There are these, indeed, who think Moses speaks of killing these creatures for common use; which it was lawful for them to do anywhere, after they came to the land of Canaan (Deut. xii. 15), but now they were not to kill them for their food, unless they brought them to the door of the tabernacle, and there first sacrificed some part of them to the Lord, before they tasted of them themselves. By which their sacrificing to demons was prevented (to which they were prone, ver. 7), and they also constantly feasted with God
CHAPTER XVII.

Israel, that killeth an ox, or lamb, or goat, in the camp, or that killeth it out of the camp,

4 And bringeth it not unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer an offering unto the LORD before the tabernacle of the LORD; blood shall be imputed unto that man; while they dwell in the wilderness. But this is better founded upon Deut. xii. 20, 21, where it is supposed that they had thus done, while they remained in the wilderness; and were so near to the house of God, that they might easily bring thither every beast they killed for ordinary use. But they were dispensed with; and the sacrifice may be offered to God, but not in the tabernacle, and could not possibly, when they had a mind to eat flesh, go so far as to the tabernacle or temple, which was many miles from some of them. Instead whereof, they were bound to come at the three great festivals, and appear before God at his house, wheresoever they dwelt.

[wharsever.] This seems to show that he doth not speak of killing these beasts, ab usum vesendui, as St. Austin's words are, "for the use of eating" (for that they did not do out of the camp, but in their tents), but de sacrificiis, he speaks "concerning sacrifices." For he prohibits (as he goes on) private sacrifices, lest every man should take upon himself to be a priest, &c. [v. 4. Bringeth it not unto the door, &c.] In ancient times every man had performed the office of a priest in his own family: but now that liberty is taken away, because they had abused it to idolatry: and every man was bound to bring his sacrifice to the house of God, where none but the sons of Aaron could officiate, and had the most sacred obligations on him. But every man, even the Laodiceans themselves, in future times, found it necessary to exact the very same; as appears by Plato in the latter end of his tenth book of Laws, where he hath these memorable words: "Esto nemo unde te, quemque suae aetatis quosque idolum, idumque muta, idemque in idibus omissus eumtenant. Let this be a law imposed absolutely upon all, that no man should have a sacred place in private houses:" but when he hath a mind to offer sacrifice, let him go to the public temples, and deliver his sacrifice to the priests; whether men or women, of agnus taen. tamimico, "whose business it is to take care that these things be performed in a holy manner." By which it appears, that these were two established principles of religion in wise men's minds, to sacrifice publicly, and to bring their sacrifices to the priests, who were to take care to offer them purely. Unto which Moses adds one thing more, that their public sacrifices should be offered only at one place: which was a most efficacious preservative from all strange worship: nothing being done but under the eye of the ministers of religion, and the governors of the people. Insomuch that the Vulgar Latin translates it (regarding the sense more than the words), Ideo sacerdoti offerre debetur, &c. "Therefore they ought to bring to the priest their sacrifices," &c.

Before the tabernacle] Before the Divine Majesty, which dwelt in the tabernacle; round about which they all inhabited, and were so near it while they travelled in the wilderness, that, as there was no trouble in bringing all their sacrifices thither, so they knew certainly whither to go. And thus the Hebrew doctors observe it was when they came into Canaan; where, while the tabernacle was fixed in Shiloh, none might sacrifice anywhere else; but when it wandered uncertainly (after Shiloh was destroyed), being some-he hath shed blood; and that man shall be cut off from among his people:

5 To the end that the children of Israel may bring their sacrifices, which they offer in the open field, even that they may bring them unto the LORD, unto the door of the tabernacle of the times in Mispeh, sometimes at Gilgal, and at Nob, and Gibeon, and the house of Obed Edom, they fancy it was lawful to sacrifice in other places. For so we find Samuel did, 1 Sam. vii. 9, ix. 13 (where he sacrificed in a high place), xi. 13, xvi. 2, and David, 2 Sam. xxiv. 18, and Elias, 1 Kings xvii. 25. But the sacrifices offered without the tabernacle, must be done by an immediate warrant from God; for none of these persons were priests, but prophets guided by Divine inspirations (see Dr. Outram, lib. i. De Sacrificiis. cap. 2).

Blood shall be imputed unto that man, &c.] He was to be punished as a murderer; that is, die for it. For to have blood imputed to a man, in the Hebrew phrase, or to be guilty of blood, is, to be compelled to have his blood shed, or to lose his life. Which, as of old it was the punishment of every one who killed another man (Gen. ix. 6), so here he is condemned to die who sacrificeth anywhere but at the tabernacle.

And that man shall be cut off] This, not another punishment (unless we suppose it relates to his possessions), and not the man himself, which was done, but the priest should be cut off. Every one who sacrificed without the tabernacle, not only, 1. was to lose his life, 2. (whether he died or not) it was a sign of his death; but, as in other places of this book, cutting off is so evidently joined with death, that so little cannot be meant by it, as depriving such persons of the privileges of God's people (for instance, when any offered his children to Moloch, xx. 2—5, or did not affict his soul on the day of atonement, xxiii. 29, 30), those who were in this place it most certainly signifies that cutting him off is to be applied to death; because he was to be punished as a murderer. Which severe penalty was enacted in this case, to preserve the Israelites from idolatry. For if they had been permitted to offer sacrifice where they pleased, they might easily have forsaken God by altering the rites which he had ordained; nay, by offering to strange gods: particularly to the demons which, in those days, frequented the fields, and endeavoured to persuade the ignorant that they were gods, as seems to be intimated in the next verse and ver. 7.

Var. 5. To the end] Or, for this cause; i. e. to avoid that heavy punishment before mentioned.

[They shall bring] as the Vulgar Latin translates it (regarding the sense more than the words), Ideo sacerdoti offerre debetur, &c. "Therefore they ought to bring to the priest their sacrifices," &c.

[Which they offer in the open field,] Where the pagans erected their altars, to procure fruitfulness to their fields. Insomuch that Libanius saith (in his oration τοις ἀντίων), that the temples, or holy places, were the very soul or life of the fields: οὐ εἰς ἄλλα ἀντίας, τοις ἀντίων ἔρισαν. And that "in them lay the hope of the husbandmen:" καὶ τοῖς γεμφρομένοις ἐν αὐξών αἱ ἀντίαι. How old this idolatry was, we cannot certainly tell; but it continued a long time among the Israelites, as we learn from the prophet Jeremiah, xiii. 27, and Hosea xv. 11, where he saith, "Their congregation, unto the priest, and offer them for peace offerings unto the Lord.

6 And the priest shall sprinkle the blood upon the altar of the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and burn the fat for a sweet savour unto the Lord.

7 And they shall no more offer their sacrifices unto devils, after whom they have gone a offering all their sacrifices at the tabernacle; that so the blood might be sprinkled upon the altar (and poured out at the bottom of it, as it is required in other places of this book), and not kept together in a vessel, or a hole in the ground, as the manner of the ancient beams were; and from the forenamed places in the field, and sat about this blood, and feasted upon the flesh of their sacrifice. So Maimonides saith the custom of the Zabirii was (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 46).

Burn the fat] So the manner was in all sacrifices: which is said also to be "for a sweet savour unto the Lord" (Gen. xv. 9, 10); that is, of the fat, heifer, goats, for sacred animals.

Ver. 7. They shall no more.] It seems by this they had been guilty of other idolatrous practices, besides that of worshipping the golden calf (Exod. xxxiii.). And so much is expressed Deut. xxxiii. 17. And it was a sin of which their fathers had been long guilty, especially in Egypt (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ezek. xx. 7, xxxii. 2, 3), which they had not left, but continued in a wretched manner. (More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 46, 25.)

Offer their sacrifices unto devils.] These words show the reason why God commands them, under such a heavy penalty, to offer only in one place at the tabernacle; because, while they sacrificed in the open fields, they had been in danger to be seduced by demons, who were wont to frequent those places (especially in deserts), and present themselves to ignorant people as if they were gods, and entice their devotion towards them. Which demons, or evil spirits, appeared, it is likely, in the form of goats; and therefore are here called seirim, which properly signifies goats. And hath made some imagine, that they really sacrificed to these creatures, as some of the Egyptians did, (More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 46, 25.)
whoring. This shall be a statute for ever unto them throughout their generations.

8 ¶ And thou shalt say unto them, Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers which sojourn among you, that offereth a burnt offering or sacrifice, 9 And bringeth it not unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer it unto the Lord; even that man shall be cut off from among his people.

10 ¶ And whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood; I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people.

wilderness; as Mr. Selden observes in his Prolegomena to his book De Diis Syris. They that would see more of these seirim, may consult L. G. Vossius, lib. i. de Orig. et Progr. Idol. cap. 8, and Bochartus's Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. vi. cap. 7.

There is one, indeed (Anton. Van Dale), who hath lately endeavoured to explode all these fancies, as he esteemeth them, of demons: which he would have to be that heathen precept, to which they had from them derived to other nations. But he will never be able to make any wise man believe, that the world was so sottish as to worship the images of goats (which he takes to be made by seirim), if there had not been an appearance of something in that shape which they accounted Divine.

After whom they have gone a whoring.] i. e. With whom they have committed idolatry. For this sin was justly called by the name of unlewdom, ever after they were solemnly contracted and espoused to God, to be his peculiar people (Exod. xix. 5). Which is the reason that he is said so often to be a Jealous God (particularly Exod. xx. 5), highly incensed, that is, at their worshiping other gods beside him. For this reason he enjoins, (as Ezekiel declares as the foulest whomedom (xvi. 22), and particularly mentions this whomedom with the Egyptians, ver. 26, and the Assyrians, ver. 29, &c. This shall be a statute for ever—throughout their generations.] These words seem to me to determine the sense of the foregoing precept, to which they had from them derived to other nations. But he will never be able to make any wise man believe, that the world was so sottish as to worship the images of goats (which he takes to be made by seirim), if there had not been an appearance of something in that shape which they accounted Divine.

Ver. 8. Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel.] This provision also shows how he speaks in the foregoing of bringing all sacrifices whatsoever to the tabernacle; the same law which was given before to the Israelites, being now extended to all strangers that sojourned among them. By whom he means all such as were proselytes to the Jewish religion. So the LXX. here translate it; and they add the very same words to ver. 3, where the house of Israel is only mentioned in the original Hebrew. The only question is, what sort of proselytes are here intended? And I take it he speaks of the proselytes of righteousness (as the Jews call them), who were circumcised, and thereby embraced the whole religion of Moses. And this, I find, is the general opinion: though some few learned men contend, that any stranger, who had renounced idolatry (whom they called a prosylete of the gate), might bring his sacrifices to the altar. Which one can hardly allow (though asserted by so great a man as Grotius, lib. i. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 16), because he speaks of the same strangers here, which are mentioned ver. 10, where all such strangers are forbidden to eat blood. Which will hardly admit of being interpreted as were become Jews by circumcision: for other strangers might eat it, as appears from Deut. xiv. 21, where the Israelites are allowed to sell what died of itself to a stranger, that he might eat it if he pleased: and such creatures had their blood in them.

That off'rath a burnt offering or sacrifice,] i. e. Any other sacrifice besides burnt-offerings, viz. sin-offerings, or trespass-offerings, or peace-offerings. None of which were accepted, but from such as were admitted into the Jewish religion: though the pious gentiles, the strangers before mentioned, might bring burnt-offerings.

Ver. 9. Bringeth it not unto the door.] As he ordered their peace-offerings to be, ver. 4. 5. Shall be cut off.] This demonstrates, that the foregoing precept and this belong to the same matter; being enforced with the same penalty (ver. 4). And it also shows, that the strangers before mentioned, signify such gentiles as were circumcised: for otherwise they were not the body of the people of Israel, from which they are threatened to be cut off, if they did not observe this law.

Ver. 10. Whosoever man, &c.] See ver. 8. That eateth any manner of blood.] This is forbidden before, ii. 17, and repeated again, vii. 26 (see both those places), where it is explained what blood he means; either of men or beasts. Nothing is said of fishes, because they were not offered at the altar, they have little blood in them: nor is there any direction given anywhere how they should be killed. It is said, indeed, in this place, that they should not eat any manner of blood; but the meaning seems to be, neither of blood offered at the altar, nor of beasts killed for their own use: or else it is to be limited as before, to the blood of beasts and birds: ‘(see ver. 13) for fishes were not at all considered. And here the reason is added why they should not eat blood (which was not mentioned in the forenamed places), because it was the life of the beast, and was therefore reserved to make atonement for their souls.

I will set my face against that soul, &c.] That is, be extremely angry at that soul, and severely punish him, by cutting him off (as it here follows) from the body of the nation. Maimonides observes in the forenamed place (Mere Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 46), that this is the same expression which is used against him that offered his children to Moloch, xx. 3, and that this phrase is never used in Scripture concerning eating meat of any other sort, but especially these two, idolatry and eating blood. For the eating of blood is mentioned by the shows (as well as the other shows) to one kind of idolatry, in the worshipping of demons: whose food the ancient idolaters imagined the blood was; by eating of which their worshippers had communion with them (see Psalm xvi. 4, and Grotius there).

Ver. 11.] Some think here are two distinct reasons against eating of blood: but the words, as they lie in the Hebrew, may well be translated, ‘Because the life of the flesh (of any beast, that is) is in the blood,’ therefore ‘I have given it to you (or, appointed it for you) upon the altar, to make an atonement,’ &c. Which is as much as to say, the life of the beast lying in the blood, was to be taken from it to expiate your sins, that by its death, in your stead, your life may be pre-12 Therefore I said unto the children of Israel, No soul of you shall eat blood, neither shall any stranger that sojourneth among you eat blood.

13 And whatsoever man there be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, which hunteth and catcheth any beast or fowl that may be eaten; he shall even pour out the blood thereof, and cover it with dust.

14 For it is the life of all flesh; the blood of it is for the life thereof: therefore I said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall eat the blood of no manner of flesh: for the life of all flesh is the blood thereof: whosoever eateth it shall be cut off.

15 And every soul that eateth that which died of itself, or that which was torn with beasts, whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger, he shall both wash his clothes, and

CHAPTER XVIII.

16 But if he wash them not, nor bathe his flesh; then he shall bear his iniquity.

(yi. 1, 2, &c.). And the Jewish doctors say, he who violated this law, was only to be beaten: for cutting off, either by the hand of God, or the court of judgment, was not threatened to sins of so light a nature as this. So Maimonides observes in his More Noevoch, par. iii. cap. 41.

Ver. 16. But if he wash them not—he shall bear his iniquity. Be liable to be punished by God, for the neglect of the means of his purification. And if while he continued thus unclean, he ventured to eat of the peace-offerings, he was in danger to be "cut off from his people" (vii. 90).

exposed to any one, but these to whom they were espoused and joined in marriage.

I am the Lord.] By my authority, who am your sovereign, and the sovereign of the world, these laws are enacted: and I will punish those that break them.

Ver. 7.] It is commonly thought by interpreters, that the particle we translate or, is here as much as that is (for so it signifies in some places, particularly in Gen. xxvi. 25; xxviii. 22, etc.); but it is only an explication of the former, and makes them but one prohibition, against a man's marrying his mother. And this, indeed, the next words seem to imply, she is thy mother; who bare thee, and therefore not to be taken to be thy wife, much less to be otherwise known by thee. But we may, as well think, that the meaning of the particle of the text was not which were unlawful before the law of Moses was given (see Selden, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1, and cap. 11, p. 596, &c.). But the ancient Hebrews give a good reason for all these laws, as Grotius observes, lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pactis, cap. 5, sect. 13, n. 2.

She is thy mother; this is the very first prohibition; being a going back in nature for a man to marry his mother. Which, though it was practised in those days by the Canaanites, and Egyptians, and by the Persians also, in aftertimes, and some other eastern countries, yet in the western part of the world (as Mr. Selden observes) such marriages were uncommon. Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pactis, lib. ii. cap. 5, sect. 2. For the law of nature was against such marriages, notwithstanding the practice of persons, nay, whole nations, whom God gave up to παραπόνησις. (See St Paul shows), "dishonourable affections," for their other sins: especially for their forsaking him, and falling to idolatry.

Maimonides gives this as the general reason of prohibiting this, and all the following marriages: because to persons so forbidden to join together, are all, in a manner, such as are wont to live together in the same house (for so fathers, mothers, children, brothers, and sisters do), who might easily be tempted to lewdness one with another, if even marrying together were not severely forbidden. And thus the LXX. translate the words of the foregoing verse; none of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to you, παραπόνησις. The, κοινωνίας καταχράσθη. "to those that are so near of kin, that they usually dwell in the same house:" as parents and children; brothers and sisters; and the brothers and sisters of our parents. Mahomet, as lewd and impudent as he was, had not the boldness to control these laws; but, in the fourth chapter of his Alcoran, he expressly forbids his followers to marry their mothers, their mothers in law, &c., and a great many of the rest which here follow.

Ver. 8. Thy father's wife shalt thou not uncover:] That is, of a step-mother. Such was the incest of Reuben with Bilhah (Gen. xxxv. 22), and of Absalom with the wives of his father David (2 Sam. xvi.}

thou not uncover: it is thy father's nakedness.

21, 22), and of Antiochus Soter with Stratonice; who, also being from such a connection, was taught that all things were honest that pleased the king.
The thing itself is so hateful, that the very naming it is a condemnation; and therefore it is all one with the prime natural law, which prohibits the conjunction of parents and children. "For she that is one flesh with my father (as a great man speaks), is as near to me as my father; and that is as near as my own mother.
As near, not by his false estimation of law, though not in the accounts of nature; and, therefore, though it be a crime of a less turpitude, yet it is equally forbidden, and is against the law of nature, not directly, but by interpretation" (book ii. chap. 3, Ductor Dubitantium, rule iii. n. 29).

It is thy father's nakedness. He having known her, it is lawful to him to beget the son to have her also.
Now the Jews, if the father had only espoused her,
it was not lawful for the son to have her to wife; or if he had divorced her, it was not lawful for the son to have her, even after he was dead (see R. Levi
p. 16, 17).

For the nakedness of thy sister. As the nearness of flesh (mentioned ver. 6) above a man, is his mother; and below him, is his daughter: so, on the side of him, is his sister.

Daughter of thy father. Though she were begotten by his father of another wife, not of his mother; yet he might not marry her.

Or daughter of thy mother. Born of her by another husband.

Whether she be born at home, or born abroad. Be legitimately born in wedlock; or illegitimately, out of wedlock; as the Talmudists expound it: see Selden, lib. v. De Jure N. et G. cap. 10, p. 591, where he observeres, that though the Egyptians (as Philo and other reports), with such like nations, thought the mother was to have the right of the sister, which was practised also in Greece; yet the greatest men in the western countries condemned such marriages; which some of the Greek philosophers also disallowed:
and Euripides himself called barbarous, even when it was practised. Insomuch, that in after ages this wicked custom was quite abolished; and that before Christianity was well settled among them. For Sextus Empiricus saith, that in his time it was utterly unlawful: see there, cap. xi. p. 603, 605, &c., where he shows the Romans always abhorred such mar-rriages; nay, it was late before the Persians took up this abominable custom, after the example of Cambyses: who being in love with his own sister, as Herodotus relates (in his Thal. axe. xxvii.), and having married her, he commanded she should not marry before that country; he commanded the royal judges (as he calls them), who were the interpreters of the laws, to advise whether he might lawfully do it, or not: who, to please him, and yet not seem to give an illegal opinion, answered, ομοι αυτη αυτην ουδε αρρητη ουκ ουδε κοινωνη ανθρωπων ανθρωπων, &c., "That they could find no law which permitted a brother to marry a sister; but there was a law, that the Persian kings might do even what he would" (see Grotius, lib. ii.
De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 5, sect. 13).

Even their nakedness thou shalt not uncover. It shall be unlawful to thee to marry any of the forenamed of thy daughter's daughter, even their nakedness thou shalt not uncover: for their is thine own nakedness.

11 The nakedness of thy father's wife's daughter, begotten of thy father, she is thy sister, thou shalt not uncover her nakedness.

For though the marriage of brother and sister was never lawful in the heavens, where God created but one man and one woman, by whose children the world was peopled; yet, when it was so, there was great reason that it should be made utterly unlawful, as many have demonstrated; particularly Bishop Taylor, in his Ductor Dubitantium, book ii. chap. 2, rule
iii. n. 24, 25, &c. "For now it is next to an unnatural mixture (as he speaks), it hath something of corruption in it, and blending the very first partings of nature, which makes it intolerably scandalous and universally forbidden; for if it were not, the mischief would be horrible and infinite."

Ver. 10. Of thy son's daughter, or of thy daughter's dughter. This law concerns a man's granddaughter, by his son or his daughter, whether legitimately born, or spuriously. For though he custom or law, which God created was not farther off, as a hedge to this law. So R. Levi calls it, in the place forenamed. The ancient Romans also, as our Mr. Selden shows, were very strict in restraining the marriage of men with their nieces, either by their brothers or sisters, and with others mentioned in the following laws of Moses, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gentium, &c., cap. 11, p. 605, &c.

Ver. 11. Of thy father's wife's daughter. This prohibition seeming to be the same with that, ver. 9, some of the Hebrews have expounded this concerning the daughter of a mother-in-law begotten by another father. For the words may be thus translated, as Mr. Selden observes the order of them will bear (lib. i. De Uxore Heb. cap. 4). "The nakedness of the daughter of thy father's wife (for she that is born of thy father is thy sister) thou shalt not uncover."

And with this the Greek and several other versions of the Bible agree, who make the prohibition of the wife's daughter to end before he speaks of his own sister. And it is the sense of the principal men among the Karaites, as he shows, cap. 6. But this is against the constant sense of the Hebrew doctors, who say it is lawful (as in the marriage of an in-law which she had by another husband; for there is no nearness of flesh at all between these two. And therefore, as in the ninth verse, the marriages of all brothers and sisters, in general, are forbidden; so here, more particularly, the marriage with a sister by the same father, though not by the same mother; which was not necessary to be expressly forbidden; because forewarned to the law, the sons of Noah thought it lawful to marry a half-sister (as we speak) by the father's side, though not by the mother's (see Buxtorf. De Spons. di Divort. p. 15, 16). And this was the ancient law of Solon among the Athenians, that they might marry ωμοστρατος, their sisters "by the same father," but

Vol. I.—62

13 Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy mother's sister: for she is thy mother's near kinswoman.

14 Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy father's brother, thou shalt not approach to his wife: she is thine aunt.

15 Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy daughter in law: she is thy son's wife; thou shalt not uncover her nakedness.

16 Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy brother's wife: it is thy brother's nakedness.

17 Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of a woman and her daughter, neither shalt thou take her son's daughter, or her daughter's daughter, to uncover her nakedness; for they are near kinswomen: it is wicked.

not διαμεταφραστικως, their sisters "by the same mother;" as Joh. Meurinus shows in his Themis Attica, lib. i. cap. 11. And it is supposed by Selden, that one of these had not been in so many words prohibited, as well as the other, by reason which, Jewish might still have continued in that practice, which was usual before the law (see Sam. Petitus in Leges Atticas, p. 440).

Some are of the opinion, that, in the ninth verse, the son of a second venter is forbidden to marry the daughter of the first: and here, the son of the first venter, to marry the daughter of the second. And others fancy, that the sister here meant is one that was adopted by his father.

Ver. 12. Of thy father's sister: And it made no difference whether she was his father's sister legitimately or illegitimately begotten by his grandfather; as R. Levi Barzelonita represents the opinion of the Jewish doctors (Praecept, cxvi.), that marriages also were prohibited by the ancient Romans, as Mr. Selden observes in the place forenamed (lib. v. cap. 11, p. 605), though before the law of Moses they are supposed to be lawful; for it is commonly thought that his father Amram married his aunt Joseheba (Exod. vi. 20), and therefore no wonder it was practised in Egypt, which was accounted by the Ancients to be the birthplace of the Romans. Which Herodotus saith (in his Ératé, cap. lxix.), Archidamus their king married Lampus, who was sister to his father Zeuxidamus, δοτός αὐτῶν ἀπετέρως, Leitychides (who was father both to her and to Zeuxidamus) giving her to him in marriage.

Ver. 13. Of thy mother's sister. So near, that he could not as well be permitted to marry her, so his son also, who was not but a little farther removed from her, was forbidden to touch her. And by the same reason that a man might not marry his aunt, an uncle might not marry his niece. Which, though practised among the Romans after Claudius married Agrippina, till the time of Constantine; yet it was a new thing, as Claudius himself acknowledges in Tacitus (Novus Praecept, cap. xxv.), which he observes, particularly at Sparta, where Herodotus saith (in his Ératé, cap. xxxi.), Archidamus their king married Lampo, who was sister to his father Zeuxidamus, δοτός αὐτῶν ἀπετέρως, Leitychides (who was father both to her and to Zeuxidamus) giving her to him in marriage.

Ver. 14. Of thy father's brother. This is explained in the next words, "thou shalt not approach to his wife:" that is, not marry thy uncle's wife. And therefore such less might an uncle marry his brother's daughter: as Herodotus tells us Darius married Phra-tagana, the daughter of his brother Atarnes, who gave him all his estate with her; and Leonidas, king of bastets, married Gorgo the daughter of his brother Cleomenes. See lib. viii. (called Polymina) cap. 224, and 239.

She is thine aunt.] By such near affinity, that marriage is forbidden with her, as well as with an aunt by consanguinity (v. 12, 13). In which the ancient Romans also were very strict, as our Selden observes in the place above named. And it was disputed whether he was only espoused to her, or had after marriage divorced her, or was separated by death: or whether he was his father's brother legitimately, or spuriously, as R. Levi Barzelonita observes, Praecept. cxvii., and cxviii. Where he notes, that though the father's brother's wife be only mentioned, yet the mother's brother's wife is also prohibited. This is repeated xx. 20.

Ver. 15. Of thy daughter in law, &c. Though only espoused to him; and therefore much more when solemly married; as the same R. Levi explains it, Praecept. cxxx., where he hath the same observation as before; that if she was afterward divorced, he might not marry her, and that it is probable the wife of a bastard son is prohibited: for he is his son; though a child by a slave, or a stranger, is never called a man's son.

Ver. 16. Of thy brother's wife, &c. Unless he died childless; for in that case the next brother was bound to marry her (Deut. xxv. 5, see Buxtorf. De Spons., p. 82, and Grotius in Matt. xiv. 4). Much less a man marry his brother's daughter, as was before noted, who was nearer to him, and of his own flesh. Which was so much abhorred by the ancient Romans, that Claudius Caesar durst not celebrate his marriage with Agrippina, till he had got a decree of the senate for it, Quo justae, et patruos fratruncule filias, nuptiae etiam in posterum statuerentur: which made the marriage of uncles with their brother's daughters to be lawful for the future: which hitherto had been without example." So Tacitus relates in the forenamed book of his Annals (cap. 5), where he saith, notwithstanding this decree, there were none found, but only one man, who desired such matrimony; and most thought he did it to gain Agrippina's favour: "necque tandem est, nisi unus, tales matrimonii cupit, &c."

Ver. 17. Of a woman and her daughter. If a man married a widow that had a daughter, it was a wicked thing to marry that daughter, either while her mother lived, or after she was dead.

Neither shalt thou take her son's daughter, or her daughter's daughter. To preserve them from this, the Jews added, as a hedge to this law, a prohibition to marry the granddaughters of such daughters, as R. Levi Barzelonita tells us (Praecept. cxxv.).

For they are her near kinswomen.] Of such consanguinity with her (from whom they directly come), as makes it very criminal in him that is one with her to marry them.
18 Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, to vex her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other in her life time.

19 Also thou shalt not approach unto a woman to uncover her nakedness, as long as she is put apart for her uncleanness.

It is wickedness. The Hebrew word zimmah imports more than wickedness. The LXX translate it ἁσέβεια, "impurity," the Vulgar Latin, incoet, others, nefarior wickedness, which is the word in the civil law for those marriages that are contrary to nature. Such were these in some measure, though not in the highest degree.

Ver. 18. Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister. There are a great many eminent writers, who, following our margin, translate [one wife to another], imagine that here plurality of wives is expressly forbidden by God. And they think there is an example to justify this translation in Exod. xxvi. 3, where Moses is commanded to take care the five curtains of the tabernacle were coupled together, one to its sister (as the Hebrew phrase is), i.e. one to another. And so, they reason, this man, having a beloved wife, should not take another while she lived. Which, if it were true, would solve several difficulties: but there are such strong reasons against it, that I cannot think it to be the meaning. For as many wives as one was indulged before the law, so they were after. And Moses himself supposes as much, when he says that a man should not take children he had by a beloved wife, before one by whom he hated, if he was the eldest son. Which plainly intimates an allowance in his law, of more wives than one. And so we find expressly their kings might have, though not a multitude (Dent. xvii. 17). And their best king, who read God's law day and night, and could not but understand it, took many wives, without any reproach: nay, God gave him more than he had before, by delivering his master's wives to him (2 Sam. xii. 8). And, besides all this, Moses speaking all along in this chapter of consanguinity, it is reasonable (as Schindlerus observes) to conclude he doth so here: not of one woman to another; but of one sister to another, who should not be taken also. Some have understood the word sister improperly in this place, as the words daughter and mother in others (ver. 17, and xx. 11), where he forbids a man to take a "woman and her daughter," or a "woman and her mother," as Theodoric Hackans judiciously notes, Disput. 1. De Locutionibus Saecris, p. 29 (see Selden, lib. v., De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6, and Buxtorf. De Synod. p. 28, 29). The meaning therefore is, that though two wives at a time, or more, were used in those days, no man should take two sisters (as Jacob had formerly done) begetten of the same father, or born of the same mother, whether legitimately or illegitimately, as the fornamed R. Levi expresses it (Praecept. cevii.). Who may seem to be prohibited before, by consequence and analogy (because the marriage of a brother's wife is forbidden, ver. 16), yet it is here directly prohibited, as other marriages are; which were implicitly forbidden before. For, ver. 7, the marriage of a son with his mother is forbidden; and ver. 10 the marriage of a father with his daughter.

20 Moreover thou shalt not lie carnally with thy neighbour's wife, to defile thyself with her.

21 And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Moloch, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the Lord.
22 Thou shalt not lie with mankind, as with womankind: it is abomination.

23 Neither shalt thou lie with any beast to ing dominion. This appears by comparing Jer. xix. 5, with xxxii. 35. But more especially it signifies the sun, the prince of the heavenly bodies (see Vossius, De Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 5), as the queen of heaven was the moon (Jer. vii. 15). Now it is evident, by several passages in Scripture, that the ancient priests, when forbidden to give them to Moloch, not only made their children pass through the fire, but also offered them in sacrifice unto Moloch. The former I take to be forbidden in this law; the latter in xx. 3, where giving their children to Moloch is prohibited under a severe penalty, of being put to death for that crime; whereas there is no penalty annexed here to their making them pass through the fire. Which I take therefore to have been a less crime than the other; though an idolatrous rite, practised by those who abhorred the cruelty of offering the very life of their dear children to Moloch. Instead of which, this rite was devised, of making them pass through the fire (for though the word fire be not here in the Hebrew text, yet it is understood by all, and expressed Deut. xx. 10), so as to keep from the practice of those who called it; and by this means to dedicate them to the worship and service of Moloch. And therefore, being a rite of initiation, whereby parents consecrated their sons and daughters to their deities; we never find it mentioned in Scripture, but only concerning children (not concerning men and women), whom the priests were forbidden to dedicate in this manner; which was, in truth, to alienate them from the Lord God of Israel.

Now, that thus was practised among the ancient pagans as a rite of initiation, appears particularly in the mysteries of Mithra (see Suidas upon that word); and continued long among the Persians, if we may believe Benjamin of Tudela, in his Itinerarium p. 214 (see G. Schickardi Tarich, p. 136, &c.). And this very phrase, make to pass unto {for the word fire, as I said, is not here mentioned}, signifies as much as ad partes ejus transire, "to be addicted to any one;" like that phrase προτετερωσαν τω θεω, "to come unto God" (Heb. xi. 6). And so this Hebrew phrase is used, Exod. xiii. 12, and may very well be thus understood: therefore, on the contrary, that their children unto Moloch. For the heathen thought their children uncLean, and obnoxious to the anger of their gods, and consequently in danger to be taken away from them, if they were not thus expiated, as Maimonides tells us (More Nevoch. par. ii. cap. 37). And on the contrary, they fancied (as R. Levi Barzelonita observes, Preecept. civiii.), that if only one of their children were thus consecrated to Moloch, all the rest were blessed, and should be prosperous. For he very nicely takes notice that the Israelites are forbidden to make any of their seed to pass through the fire: it not being the manner, he saith, to make them all pass. But the idolatrous priests (to make the people more willing to this service) cunningly persuaded them, that if any one child was offered to Moloch, it procured a blessing upon all; and if there was only one child in a family, they laid no obligation on the parents to do this.

The manner of doing it, at this distance of time, cannot certainly be known. Some say their parents carried them through two fires upon their shoulders. Others, that they were led between them by their priests: and so R. Levi in the place before named: "The father delivered the child to the priest, in the name of the idol; just as it is said concerning legal sacrifices (xx. 14, "he shall give them to the priest." Others think that the priest, or somebody else, waved the child about in the very flame, while men and women danced round the fire; or, leaped through the flame. And Joh. Coeh. observes, upon the title Sanhedrin, cap. 7, n. 7, that some are of opinion, the children were burned, thus doing them the utmost torments; whereby the fire: which being an emblem and representative of the sun, plainly signified such children were consecrated to that deity. And this comes nearer to the Hebrew phrase, as we translate it, that they did not pass between fires, but through the fire. But which way soever it was done, whether they waved the child through the very fire, and presented it to Moloch, before whom the fire was kindled, or led it between two fires; when they had so done, the priest restored the child to the father again. And in some such way Ahaz made his son "to pass through the fire, according to the abomination of the heathen" (2 Kings xvi. 3), which cannot be meant of his burning him: for Hezekiah's son outlived him, and succeed in his throne (see Theodor. King. quest. 47, Maimon. De Idolol. cap. 6, sect. 14, n. 4—7, and Vossius's notes; with Simeon De Mois in Ps. cxi. 37). Neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God. By offering their children to Moloch, they in effect rejected and disowned (as I before observed) the Lord God of Israel: for they consecrated their children to another god: for he gave them children; who were therefore to be devoted to none but him. I am the Lord. The only sovereign of the world; who will severely punished the transgressors of this law.

Ver. 29. Thou shalt not lie with mankind: A detestable wickedness; condemned by all nations, though practised by some few persons among them. Inso- much that the apostles of Christ make mention of it with the greatest abhorrence (Rom. i. 27; 1 Cor. vi. 9; 1 Tim. i. 10). For not only several of the Roman emperors were infamous upon this account, but some also of the Greek philosophers.

This prohibition is repeated, according to Maimonides, in Deut. xxiii. 17, whom our translation follows; there shall not be a "Sodomite of the sons of Israel." But Onkelos interprets that place otherwise.

Ver. 23. Neither shalt thou lie with any beast, &c.] i.e. Of any kind whatsoever. Some are apt to say, What need was there of such prohibitions? when it is so monstrously unnatural, to mix with creatures of a different species from us, as all beasts are. But such persons do not understand, that this was not only practised in Egypt (against whose doings he cautions them, ver. 3), but was also made a piece of religion: women devoted to the worship there used, most filthyly submitting to the lust of their sacred goats. So Strabo tells us, lib. vii. p. 802, that at Mendes, where they worshipped Pan, γαϊα ἵνα κατάντησις "goats (which were there worshiped) lay with women." For which he quotes Pindar: as do also Priscianus and Ælian, lib. vii. De Animal. cap. 19, as Cassaubon there notes. And Herodotus recounts this to pollute his name, by giving them they did openly (so ἀφετέρου signifies) when he was in Egypt. His words are these, in his second book called Ἐντερπε, cap. 46, "Εν νοθεσί δ' εν τω νομῷ καταντήσαντο ἵνα μετά τοῦ παρασκευής γυναικὸς τράγος ἢ μοιχοῦ ἢ μοιχαὶ ἢ μοιχοὶ 24 Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things: for in all these the nations are defiled which I cast out before you:

25 And the land is defiled: therefore do I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land vomiteth out her inhabitants.

26 Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations; neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you:

27 (For all these abominations have the men of the land done, which were before you, and the land is defiled;)

28 That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you.

29 For whosoever shall commit any of these abominations, even the souls that commit them shall be cut off from among their people.

30 Therefore shall ye keep mine ordinance, that ye commit not any one of these abominable customs, which were committed before you, and that ye defile not yourselves therein: I am the Lord your God.
LEVITICUS.

CHAPTER XIX.

A repetition of sundry laws.

I And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
2 Speak unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, and say unto them, Ye shall be holy: for I the Lord your God am holy,
3 ¶ Ye shall fear every man his mother, and his father, and keep my sabbaths: I am the Lord your God.
4 ¶ Turn ye not unto idols, nor make to your-

Ver. 1.] The following precepts, which contain in a manner all their duty, seem to have been delivered to Moses immediately after the former; being in a great part a repetition of some principal things which had been already commanded.

Ver. 2. Speak unto all the congregation] It is uncertain whether he delivered these precepts only to their elders and heads of their tribes, to be communicated by them to the people; or at several times he called every family of every tribe, and spoke these words to them himself.

Ye shall be holy.] This very thing was said to them before, with respect to several meats which are forbidden them, xi. 44 (see there). And now is repeated with a peculiar respect (as Maimonides thinks, More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 47) to the filthy marriages and abominable idolatries mentioned in the foregoing chapter; as it is repeated again in the next chapter (xx. 7, 82), with respect to some other things. It being a general reason, why they should be separated from all other people, by the observation of peculiar laws (which is the meaning of being holy), because they were the worshippers of Him, whose most excellent nature transcended all other beings, not only in purity, but in all other perfections.

Ver. 3. Ye shall fear every man his mother, and his father.] This duty is called honour in the fifth com-mmandment (Exod. xx. 12), and the father there put before the mother; which being here called fear, and the mother put before the father, it shows, saith Maimonides, that “honour and fear are equally due to both,” without any difference. And the proper expressions of fear and reverence are (according to those doctors), not to sit in their seat, nor to contradict them in any thing they say; much less to cavil against them; nor to call them by their proper names, but to add the title of Sir, &c. (as we speak), or the like. And the expressions of honour, are not to sit down in their presence; and to provide them with necessaries, if they fall into poverty, &c. (see Selden, lib. ii. De Sacred Alms, 13, 557, &c. and R. Levi Barzelonita, Precept. xxviii.).

Keep my sabbaths.] Obedience, as well as reverence, is included in the word fear; but if parents commanded them to break the Sabbath-day, or to profane any other day consecrated to God’s service, they were not to be obeyed.

Ver. 4. Turn ye not unto idols.] Not so much as to look upon them; no, nor to think of them (as R. Levi selves molten gods: I am the Lord your God.

5 ¶ And if ye offer a sacrifice of peace offerings unto the Lord, ye shall offer it at your own will.
6 It shall be eaten the same day ye offer it, and on the morrow: and if ought remain until the third day, it shall be burnt in the fire.
7 And if it be eaten at all on the third day, it is abominable; it shall not be accepted.

Barzelonita expounds it, Precept. cxxxv.), much less to inquire after what manner the gentiles worshipped them (which is expressly forbidden, Deut. xii. 30), for by this means they might be allured to idolatry. The word we here translate idols is a word of contempt, signifying a thing of nought. Or, as some of the Jews will have it, intended as a preservative from the particle al, signifying not; and El, i.e. God. As much as to say, which are not gods; and therefore called in Scripture vanities, which can do neither good nor hurt.

Nor make ye to yourselves molten gods:] This seems to have respect to the golden calf, which they made to worship, and is called a molten calf (Exod. xxxii. 4).
But all great images are no less forbidden; for if to look towards an idol was a sin, much more was it to make an image of any sort to worship it. The Jews are something curious in their observations upon this precept. For, in the book Siphra, they say that they might not make molten gods for others, much less for themselves. Whence that saying, “He that makes to himself an idol, violates a double precept: first in making it, and then in making it to himself” (see R.
Levi before mentioned, Precept. cxxxvi.).

I am the Lord your God.] The same reason is given in the foregoing verse for the observation of their Sabbaths: and that of the seventh day every week, was ordained in memory of the creation of the world; and consequently held as a preservative from the calumnies (as I observed upon Exod. xx. 8), which, perhaps, makes these two precepts be here put together. But it is evident Moses doth not observe the order wherein these precepts were first delivered; but rather inverts it, beginning with the fifth commandment, and so going back to the fourth; and here to the first two.

Ver. 5. If ye offer a sacrifice of peace offerings.] As they were to avoid all idolatry, so they were to be careful to perform the service due to the true God in a right manner. Peace-offerings are only mentioned, because they were the most common sacrifices, being of three sorts (see ch. vii. 11, &c. and xvii. 5).

Ye shall offer it at your own will.] Either of the beef, or of the kid, or of the fat of the ox, or of the fat of the sheep, or of the fat of the goat (ch. iv. 1, 6).
Or rather (as the Vulgar Latin and the LXX. understand it) they were to offer it so, that it might be acceptable to the Lord; according to the rules prescribed in the seventh chapter.

Ver. 6. It shall be eaten the same day—and on the morrow.] This shows he speaks particularly of those peace-offerings which were a new, or a voluntary offering (ch. vii. 16), for sacrifices of thanksgiving might not be kept till the morrow, but were to be eaten on the same day, ver. 15 of that chapter (see the reason of this, Exod. xxvii. 18, the latter end).

If ought remain?] See ch. vii. 17.
Ver. 7. On the third day.] See ch. vii. 18.
It shall not be accepted.] See there. This seems to 8 Therefore every one that eateth it shall bear his iniquity, because he hath profaned the hallowed thing of the Lord: and that soul shall be cut off from among his people.

CHAPTER XIX.

8 Therefore every one that eateth it shall bear his iniquity, because he hath profaned the hallowed thing of the Lord: and that soul shall be cut off from among his people.

9 ¶ And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field, neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of thy harvest.

10 And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, justify the sense which the Vulgar puts upon those words, ver. 5, which we translate, "according to thy will and thy commandments".

Ver. 8. [Dear his iniquity.] See ch. vi. 18. Because he hath profaned] By keeping them till they were in danger to stink, or to be corrupted. That soul shall be cut off] By the judges, if the thing was known: otherwise by the hand of God.

Ver. 9. [When ye reap the harvest] Which was a time of great joy, while it was rare. It is, likely, many precepts of that sort before mentioned. Thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field: But leave a sixtieth part (as their wise men have determined it), and that in the extreme part of the field rather than in any other place, that the poor might know where to come for it; as R. Levi Barzelonita explains it, Precept, ccxxvii. And this, whether they were at the sowing, or at the reaping (as Mr. Selden observes out of the Talmudist, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6, p. 692, where he shows it was the custom to add something to the sixtieth part, proportionable to the largeness of the field, or the multitude of the poor, or the greatness of the crop. Neither shalt thou gather the gleanings] That is, if any fell to the ground as they gathered them, they were not to take them up. That is, if one or two clusters fell; but not if three, much less if more: for they construe this as they do the precept about ears of corn (ver. 9). They also say, they were bound to leave the corners of the vineyard untinct, as well as the corners of the field. (R. Levi Barzelonita, Precept, ccxxx. and ccxxxii. and Mr. Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6, in the place before named.) And these precepts obliged such strangers as sojourned among them, as Gen. xxxiv. 18. And before they were admitted to embrace the Jewish religion, were examined whether they understood that they must observe such and such precepts, particularly those here mentioned, which were profound to them plainly and distinctly; and after they had promised to keep them, they were circumcised, &c. As G. Schickard observes out of the Talmudists. The Talmudic custom was, after the destruction of Jerusalem, in Mishpat Hamelekh, cap. 5, Theorem xvii.

Leave them for the poor and stranger.] Though by strangers the Jews think it understood a prosody of righteousness (as they call him who had embraced their religion, by receiving circumcision), yet they do not hinder from putting it paralinguistic of this charity; as the same R. Levi says. And if any one neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger: I am the Lord your God.

11 ¶ Ye shall not steal, neither deal falsely, neither lie one to another.

12 ¶ And ye shall not swear by my name falsely, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the Lord.

13 ¶ Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him: the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning.

14 ¶ Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put desire them to avenge him from his oath, of which he truly repented. Which they did, when they found him truly penitent; saying, “Be thou loosed.” or, “It is remitted to thee,” or the like. So Mr. Selden observes out of Maimonides, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 11. n. 3.

Plato hath said some remarkable things concerning forum avenger, and also of lying, and deceit, for which I refer the learned reader to his eleventh book of Laws, p. 216, 217, edit. Serrani.

I am the Lord.] And therefore expect the greatest reverence to my name; and that you should deal honestly one with another.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, &c. Here are several precepts, almost in vain, in their sense, but have some peculiar national applications belonging to them. For (as R. Levi Barzelonita observes), “in all things from which God would have them carefully abstain, he multiplies admonitions” (Praecpt. cxxxvi.). Accordingly here to defraud is to keep in one’s hand that which belongs to another; and such a person, he saith, is called an oppressor in Scripture. The Vulgar Latin refers it to that which remains from others by calumny; as the next words relate to that which is wrested from them by open violence.

Neither rob him.] The same R. Levi expounds this of that which is taken from another by manifest force, and doth not belong to him that takes it (Praecpt. cxxxvii.). For so the Hebrew word gazilah signifies, that he does not one hand of another against his will (1 Chron. ii. 23).

The wages of him that is hired, &c. For this was a kind of force and robbery, to detain what was owing to him against his will. In Deut. xxiv. 15, the words are, “Thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it.” From whence the Hebrew doctors conclude there were two sorts of people that wrought for hire; one were day-labouers, whom Moses speaks of in this verse; another, labourers by night, of whom he speaks in Deuteronomy. Neither of which were to stay for their wages beyond the time appointed; but the one were to have it before sunset, the other before morning; for it was due as soon as the day or the night was done. So the Masora, “The day-labourer receiveth his wages all night, and the night-labourer all day.” See the forenamed R. Levi (Praecpt. cxxviii.), who gives this reason for it, that “the merciful God would have his creatures subsist; which poor labourers cannot do if they want their wages to buy them victuals.” Upon which account, the detaining of their wages is said to be a new sin, in that Deut. xxiv. 14, and in St. James v. 4.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt not curse the deaf. No Israelite, whether man or woman, was to be cursed, though he could not hear the curse, and so was insensitive of the injury, as R. Levi explains it (Praecpt. cxxix.). For there was the addition of barbarous baseness in it to curse or revile him who was not capable to answer for himself, nor do himself right: and the case of the sick, and the infirm, or the absent, was the same with the deaf. As for others, who were not deaf, it was forbidden to curse them, saith Maimonides, because it provoked to anger and rage, which stirred men up to take revenge. “A word before the blind.” This is as inhuman as the former; proceeding from so great a dience, that the Hebrew doctors seem to think men incapable of it; and therefore expound it of giving ill counsel to simple people, and advising them to their damage. So R. Levi (Praecpt. cxxxii.). which is no less contrary to nature than laying a stumbling-block in the way of those that cannot see to avoid it; and a far greater sin, because it abused their minds, and might tend to the hurt of their souls.

But shall fear thy God.] Believing he sees and hears, and will avenge the cause of those who cannot right themselves, because they know not who injured them. If any man was convicted of either of these crimes, he was beaten.

I am the Lord.] And am therefore to be feared and obeyed.

Ver. 15. Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: The Jews take this to be an admonition to their judges, that they should have an equal regard to the plaintiff and defendant, and not prefer one before the other. Whence these words are thus explained in Siphra: “Thou shalt judge thy neighbours justly; not letting one party stand, and bidding the other sit; nor suffering one to speak as much as he pleaseth, nor let him change the cause of truth;” (see Selden, De Synedr. lib. ii. cap. 13, n. 10). But some hath explained this so largely as Maimonides, in the whole twenty-first chapter of Sanhedrin, where he, in general, defines the just administration of justice to consist in an equal respect to both parties in the suit; so that one of them have not the liberty to say what he will, and let the other be bound to do according to particular s, wherein equal respect to both parties is to be observed; some of which, it will be fit to mention, because they illustrate the words of St. James, in the second chapter of his Epistle, ver. 2—4, “If two parties appear in a cause, one of which is clothed in precious garments, the other is ragged, or in a poor habit, let it be said to him that is the more honourable. Either do you bestow upon your adversary as good apparel as you have on yourself, or else put on such as he wears, that you may be both alike, and then appear before the court of judgment. By no means let the one sit, and the other stand; but let them both be commanded to stand: or if it please the judges to give them both leave to sit, then do one of them sit in a high place, the other in a low, but both on the same bench, one by the side of the other.” See R. Levi Barzelonita (Praecpt. cxxvii.), who observes, that mankind are preserved by a righteous judgment; and therefore, if a judge was found to have given an unjust sentence, he was condemned to make restitution to him, whose cause he had perjured (Praecpt. cxxvii.)

 Thou shalt not respect.] See Exod. xxiii. 3.

Nor honour the person of the mighty:] This R. Levi explains (Praecpt. cxxiii.), as he did the first clause: “The judge shall not bid the great man sit down while the meaner stands; but both shall stand before the judge, as if they were in the presence of the Divine Majesty, who standeth in the midst of the judges” (Ps. lixxii. 1). If, by the favour of the judges, both were permitted to sit, yet, when sentence came to be pronounced, both rose up and stood; according to Exod. xviii. 13.

But in righteousness shall thou judge thy neighbour.] The observation of Maimonides is drawn directly from this place; but he also observes, from this place, that though the lowest court of judgment ordinarily consisted of no less than three judges, yet, by the law, one of poor, nor honour the person of the mighty: but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour.

16 Thou shalt not go up and down as a talebearer among thy people: neither shalt thou stand against the blood of thy neighbour: I am the Lord.

17 Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart: thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour, and not suffer sin upon him.

them might sit alone as judge in matters not capital; because it is said here, in the singular number, "in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour:" for, at the same time, he acknowledges their wise men require that he should take some assessors to him, when they say, "Do not judge by thyself alone, for there is no sole judge, but one only," viz. Geon (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synod. cap. 11, n. 3, and Guili. Schickardi. Mishpat Hamelech, cap. 4, Theor. xiv.).

Ver. 16. Thou shalt not go up and down as a talebearer The vulgar Latin takes the Hebrew word rachit to signify one that goes about with calumnies. But it may simply signify, as we translate it, a talebearer; whom Aben Ezra compares to a merchant or pedlar (as the Hebrew word means), yet it was not one what he sells to another, and goes about the country as a talebearer does from house to house, carrying to one what he hath heard at another, saying, Such a one hath said so and so of you; whereby peace and concord are destroyed among men. For commonly such men carry false stories to the neighbours, or add to the true, and secretly backbite others; which hath moved many to think a detractor is meant by this word, who hopes by his tales of others to get some advantage to himself, as every trader doth by his merchandise. Whence the Jews say, "An evil tongue kills three; him that speaks; him that hears; and him of whom he speaks." R. Levi, Precept. ceixi.

Neither shalt thou stand against the blood of thy neighbour.] Much less be a false witness against him, to the endangering of his life. So it is commonly interpreted, because the accusers and witnesses stood before judges who sat in the courts of judgment. But R. Levi Barzelonita, and the rest of the Hebrew doctors, generally understand it otherwise; that no man should suffer his neighbour to perish in judgment, or other ways, when he could free him by his testimony or assistance (Precept. ceixiv.). So it is said in Siphra, in so many words; "Whence do we gather that he who can clear another by his testimony, must not suppress it in silence!" Because it is said, "Thou shalt not stand against the blood of thy neighbour." Whence it follows, that if a man saw his neighbour any way in danger, he was bound, if he could, to deliver him; not only when his life was in hazard, but that which is as dear as life, one's honour and chastity. Thus, if any one went about to force a woman espoused to another, &c., he saw that it was done to a person, though with the death of him that made the attempt, and so ill-natured a piece of justice which they committed to private men, as Mr. Selden shows out of the Jewish authors (lib. iv. De Jure N. et G. cap. iii. p. 481, &c.). But then, they restrain this charity only to themselves; and from the word neighbour argue, that they are bound to do thus only to an Israelite. Nay (which is strange), some of these rabbins, and others, do likewise say, that they fancy they are forbidden to do such kindness to a gentile (see there, p. 485.)

Ver. 17. Thou shalt not hate thy brother] When thy brother hath done thee any wrong, do not conceal a secret hatred against him in thy breast, but tell him plainly of his fault; as the next words seem to direct. It appears by this, they were ill interpreters of the law, who thought it forbade only external acts of sin, but not evil affections which were not executed. Rebuke thy neighbour.] Time after time (if he will not be sensible of it at first) argue the case with him, and reprove him for his fault. And if he will not amend, do it publicly (as the Vulgar Latin interprets it), and bring him before the judge, and reprove him. But he extends this to all sins, whether against God, or against themselves; which, he thinks, they were bound to reprehend privately, and then publicly, if the offenders did not grow better.

Not suffer sin upon him.] He interprets it, "But not put him to confusion." For nothing is more grievous to a man to be accused of sins, and so reproved, that the reproving ought to be mild and gentle, especially when the offence is against one's self; but in those against God, greater sharpness is allowable. So he discourses, Precept. cexiv. The words in the original being, "Thou shalt not bear sin upon him;" charge him with his guilt too severely; or, as others take it, "Thou shalt not accuse him of any crime whereas he is not guilty." Our translation, in the margin of our Bibles, takes it as if, by not reproving their neighbour, they brought the guilt of his sin upon themselves; for so the words there are, "That thou bear not sin for him;" which is an excellent sense, if the Hebrew word also did not signify upon him, not for him. And the sense of the Targum of the Talmud is, as he stood it; this saying of Rabbi Chama being famous among them, "Jerusalem had not been destroyed, but because one neighbour did not reprove another;" see Selden, lib. i. De Synod. cap. 9, p. 250. Where he observes, the doctrine of the ancient Jews was (drawn from this text), that when one man offended another in things concerning themselves, relating to their civil affairs, he was to be reproved by his neighbour, once, or twice, or thrice, if the matter required; but without sharpness, and so that he was not exposed to public shame: but if the offence was against God, in matters of religion, they say private reproof was first to be given; and if that did not work amendment, then public before all. And they admitted public re-procription upon no other score: but said, "He that publicly puts his brother to shame, shall have no part in the other world."

Ver. 18. Thou shalt not avenge.] Not deny to do their brethren a kindness, out of a remembrance of any injury received from them; as R. Levi interprets it (Precept. cexivii.). By which means, as he observes, strife and contempts, and this most necessary of the laws, and all the peace and concord established among men. It may be thought, also, that as they are forbidden to take revenge themselves for the wrongs any one did them; so likewise to seek for redress from the public, merely to satisfy their wrath and desire to have the injurious person suffer, and not to prevent the like or greater injury to himself.

Nor bear any grudge.] When thou dost thy neighbour a kindness, do not spoil by upbraiding him with all his faults. For the Hebrew word natar signifies having something in reserve in one's mind, particularly anger or wrath; which our translation frequently supplies to make out the sense (Jer. iii. 13; Ps. cit. 9; Nahum i. 2). And so the LXX. understand it here, xai ou' πιστεύεις, &c., "and thou shalt not be angry with the children of thy people.'

But thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.] In not doing to him what thou wouldst not have done to thine own, and taking not what is thine, is the bond of love to God, as against Moses's command, ver. 34. And certain it is, the word neighbour comprehends more than Israelites, as appears by the last commandment, which forbids them to covet the wife of another, a neighbour, therefore, is every other man, as in Deut. xxii. 26, and more plainly in Exod. xix. 2, where the Egyptians are called their neighbour. And therefore D. Kimchi saith very honestly upon Ps. xv. 3, "A neighbour is every one with whom we have any dealing or conversation." Which justifies our blessed Saviour, in making this command, of "loving their neighbours as themselves," to teach all men who might do so, to covet the wife of a neighbour. I am the Lord.] Unto whom you are all equally subject; and upon that account ought to love one another (see ver. 34).

Ver. 19. Ye shall keep my statutes.] This may be thought to be promised to what follows; lest such commands as are contained in this verse, seeming small, should be neglected by them. Thou shalt not let thy cattle (or rather make them) gender with a diverse kind.] As horses with ass, goats with sheep, &c., whose mixture one with another they were by no means to procure. But if they did of themselves come together, it was lawful to use such heterogeneous creatures as were so produced. For they did not abhor the use of mules, which were either begot by accident among them, or brought from other countries to them.

The reason the Jews commonly give for this precept is, because God having made all things perfect in their kind, it was a presumptuous attempt to go about to miscarry his creation, and add to his works. By this means also men were deterred from tampering with different mixtures, which they saw to be abominable in brutes. So R. Levi Barzelonita (Praecept. cxxiii.) and Philo, whose words are very ingenuous (lib. De Creatione Princip.), "Things of the same kind were made for society one with another;" but things heterogeneous (as we call them), were not intended to be mixed and associated; and therefore, he who attempts to mingle them, shall be neglected by those who would "wickedly destroy the law of nature." To the same purpose Josephus (see Selden, lib. vi. de Jure N. et G. sec. Heb. cap. 3, p. 798). Maimonides also himself gives an account of this reason of this precept, More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 49, where he saith, "No creature hath a desire commonly to mix with a creature of another kind; and therefore men ought not to promote such a desire." But after all, there might possibly be a respect in this precept to some idolatrous customs which Moses intended to prevent or abolish: for there is good ground to think the following precepts in this verse were so intended; and in aftertimes, some gentiles did procure such mixtures of creatures as are here forbidden (mules, for instance), in honour of their gods: see our learned Dr. Spence, lib. ii. de Leg. Heb. Ritualibus, cap. 20, where he endeavours to prove, that by cattle in this place is peculiarly meant oxen and asses, which were used in husbandry; and are of such different natures, that none would ever have thought to procure their conjunction, unless he had been moved to it by the devil.

Thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed.] The reasons of this, according to the Jews, are the same with the former; and R. Levi extends it to trees; which, he saith, they were not to engrat of different kinds one upon another. But it concerns them, says he, only such seeds and plants as are for men's food; not those which are for medicine (Praecept. clix.). But Maimonides found a particular reason for this precept, from the idolatrous customs of the old Zabii; who not only sowed different seeds, and grafted trees of a diverse kind one upon another, in such or such aspect of the plants and with a certain form of words and fumigations; but also with abominable filthiness, at the very moment of the incision. Which he proves out of a book, concerning the incision of an olive into a citron: and doubts not, that God forbade his people to sow with mingled seed, that he might root out that detestable idolatry, and those preternatural lusts, which abounded in those days (More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 37).

Neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woollen come upon thee.] In the Hebrew the words are, "A garment of mixtures of schantaaz shall not come upon thee." But, that they might certainly know what schantaaz was, it is explained in Deut. xxii. 11, to signify (as saith the Targum) "to make an abomination by mixing linen and wool together." The Jews have taken abundance of pains to find out the original of this word; which Bochartus derives from the Arabic word sore, which signifies to mingle, and nes, which signifies to weave (Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45). But Joh. Draemius, I think, hath demonstrated, that it doth not import the weaving of any different things together, but only of linen and woollen; and that by woollen is to be understood only what is made of the wood of sheep, not of camels or goats, which they called by the same name (lib. i. De Vestitu Sacerd. Heb. cap. 4, n. 2, 3, 6). Where he observes out of Maimonides, in his Halach. Kelaim, that if a man saw an Israelite wear such a garment, it was lawful for him to fall upon him, and tear his garment in pieces; although he were his master, who taught him wisdom. And the reasons for this abhorrence are commonly such as are given of the former precepts: to preserve them from the horrid confusion which was among the gentiles, by incestuous and unnatural mixtures. But Maimonides takes it to have been principally intended as a preservative against the imitation of the actions of the gentiles in those times wearing such mixed garments, of the product of plants and animals, with a ring on their fingers, made of some metal; as, he says, he found in their books (More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 37). By which mixture, it is likely, they hoped to have the beneficial influence of some lucky conjunc-woman, that is a bondmaid, betrothed to an husband, and not at all redeemed, nor freedom given her; she shall be scourged; they shall not be put to death, because she was not free.

21 And he shall bring his trespass offering unto the Lord, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, even a ram for a trespass offering.

22 And the priest shall make an atonement for him with the ram of the trespass offering:

tion of the planets or stars, to bring a blessing upon their sheep and their flocks.

Ver. 20.] The Jews had some servants that were gentiles; who, if they embraced the Jewish religion, were baptized; sometimes with their servitude, and sometimes with the full grant of liberty. But some there were in a middle condition, partly free and partly servile; viz. when part of their redemption-money had been paid, and part was still behind. Now, as, while a woman was a perfect slave, no Israelite might marry her; so, when she was partly free, though he might espouse her, and the espousals were valid, yet they could not be of full force till her liberty was perfected. And of such a maiden the Hebrew doctors understood Moses to speak in this place, that it was in part free, but not wholly, as the next words interpret it.

Not at all redeemed.] Not entirely, but in part redeemed; and, consequently, her freedom not absolutely granted to her.

She shall be scourged.] If she had been perfectly free, both he that lay with her, and she herself; should have been put to death (Deut. xxii. 23, 24). But being not fully free, and consequently not fully his wife who had espoused her, it was reckoned adultery; and therefore punished only with scourging (see Sed- den, lib. v. de Jure N. et G. cap. 12, p. 613). And Maimonides, I observe, thus expounds it, of a woman that was not a mere servant, and yet not completely free, but between both (More Noevoch. par. iii. cap. 41). But whereas we mention here in the text the scourging only of the woman; in the margin it is rightly noted, that the Hebrew words are there shall be scourged, viz. of them both, as the Vulgar Latini, and with great reason understands it. And the Hebrew word bikkoroth properly signifies scourging with thongs made of a bull's or ox's hide; as Barchatus observes in his Hierozoicon (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 29, and cap. 33, n. 8).

They shall not be put to death.] Her master not having set her quite at liberty, her marriage was not complete; which freed her from suffering death, though some punishment she deserved, because it was begun.

Ver. 21. He shall bring his trespass offering.] Which was not enjoined her, because she had not where- withal to offer for her expiation; all she had being her master's and not her own.

A ram.] Which was the proper sacrifice in such a case (ch. v. 17, 18).

Ver. 22.] She needed an atonement as well as he, being equally guilty in consenting to the fact; and being espoused to another, seems to have had a greater guilt upon her; and therefore was left in a lamentable condition, without any public assurance of God's pardon.

For his sin which he hath done:] Which had so much guilt in it, that besides the punishment he suffered in being scourged, this satisfaction was to be made to God.

The sin—shall be forgiven him.] By virtue of the before the Lord for his sin which he hath done: and the sin which he hath done shall be forgiven him.

23 ¶ And when ye shall come into the land, and shall have planted all manner of trees for food, then ye shall count the fruit thereof as uncircumcised; three years shall it be as uncircumcised unto you: it shall not be eaten of.

24 But in the fourth year all the fruit thereof shall be holy to praise the Lord withal.
25 And in the fifth year shall ye eat of the fruit thereof, that it may yield unto you the increase thereof: I am the Lord your God.

And they observe many benefits which the Israelites received by this means; not only in exciting their thankfulness to God, but their love to that holy place: unto which some of their family might conceive such an affection, as to settle there, and learn the law.

Ver. 25. In the fifth year, &c.] He would not have them think that they should lose any thing, by staying till the year of jubilee; but it being the year of increase, he promises them there, that, by forbearing so long, their trees should be the more exceeding fruitful.

I am the Lord] Who bestowed this land upon them to hold of him by what tenure he pleased; by whose blessing they might expect to receive the increase thereof abundantly; without the help of such wicked arts as are not eat, i.e. they are not offered in the temple, certain things lie till they were purified, and, when the sun was in such or such a degree, sprinkling them about the trees which they had planted, with certain magical ceremonies, they fancied flowers and fruits would be produced sooner than they could have been without these practices.

26 ¶ Ye shall not eat any thing with the blood: neither shall ye use enchantment, nor observe times.

Law, upon the account of the heathens' performing their superstitious worship in this manner, by gathering together blood for their demons, and then coming themselves and eating of it with them, whereby they were their demons' guests; and by this kind of communion with them, were enabled to prophesy and foretell things to come. And this interpretation is the more probable, in reference to the law. Then, also, sacrifices, or the flesh, or both, to have such familiarity with them, as to receive revelations from them, and be inspired with the knowledge of secret things; if we consider the two other prohibitions in this verse, that is joined with this of "not eating upon blood," which shows that it was a rite of divination.

With the Hebrew words are lo tenachashu which, all agree, signify some superstitious observation or other, whereby they made omens, and guessed what would happen to them; either from men's sneezing, or the breaking of a shoe-latchet; or the name of a man they met withal; or some creatures' crossing their way, or passing over a dead body, or the like. It was very much in use among the gentiles in old time, as appears from Homer (in his seventh Iliad.), where Chalchas seeing a serpent devour eight sparrows with their dam, divined how long the Trojan war would last: and many such instances he heap up together in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. i. cap. 3. R. Levi Barzelonitis (Praecept. cellii.) says there is not any kind of divination: by their stuff falling out of their hand: by a serpent creeping on their right hand, or a fox going by their left, &c., which made them forebode any work they were about; but he thinks, withal, it may signify, as we translate it, enchantment: to cure wounds (for instance) by reading a verse of the law: or laying the book of the law on a child's head, or on the earth; or to procure sleep, which are such superstitions as are now in use among some Christians, who hang the first verse of St. John's Gospel about people's necks to cure an ague. But such things could not be meant by Moses, who had not yet delivered them a copy of his laws: nor can we certainly fix upon any other in particular which were then in use; see 1. Coch upon the title Sunhedrin, chap. 7, p. 18, and Maimonides de Idololatria, cap. 11, sect. 4–6, &c., where he gives a great number of instances of such superstitious observations as were in use among the heathen: some of which are mentioned by Theophrastus in his characters of Superstition; and by Plutarch, in his book on the same subject; and are derided by Terence in his Phormio, act. iv. scen. 4, with which superstitions the gentiles were so inclined that when they became Christians, they could not presently shake them off; as appears by the frequent reprobations which St. Chrysostom (and others) gives to these who continued to be governed by them; particularly in his eighth homily upon the fourth of this most excellent Epistle. But I must explain, that he confesses (as Dr. Cudworth hath observed, in his treatise of the Right Notion of the Lord's Supper, ch. ult.) that blood itself was forbidden in the especially in his sixth homily against the Jews, he sharply rebukes those that used ηγερεται και ποιοωσα, "charms, and things hung about the neck," to cure aches; whereby they got a worse disease in their souls, and wounded their consciences, &c. And in other places he reprehends their observing of omens, good and bad; some of which were very strange (see tom. vi. p. 610, 611, edit. Savil.).

Nor observe times.] Take no notice of days, according to the precepts of astrologers, who made some to be lucky, others unlucky. For the Jews generally think, something of this nature is holy in the Hebrew word temenōν being derived, they imagine, from ανάθ, which signifies time (as R. Levi, before mentioned, saith, Preecept. ecliv.), such an hour being thought, by superstitious people, to be fit for business; but another very cross to it. Which opinion God seems to have intended to extingush, by appointing the sabbath as the only day of rest. With this error, they should rest from their labours, leaving all the other six days to be employed in their business, without any difference of days or hours. But there being no such signification, as many think, of that word in the Hebrew language, they rather derive temenōν from ανασ, a cloud, imagining Moses to forbid them to mark the cloud as their guide, or to fix their eyes on their motions; which was a thing common among the gentiles. But Maimonides, who, in the eleventh chapter of Avoda Zara, interprets it, as we do, of observing times, by esteeming one day fortunate and another unfortunate, mentions another notion of this word of ανασ, an eye; and saith, in the same treatise, that jugglers are the deluders, in playing their theatre, that are comprehended under the name of motenī. And there are those also, who, deriving this word from ανασ, to answer, think it intends such as pretended to tell their fortunes.

I shall not determine which of these is most likely; but only observe that there was no supersition of this sort more ancient than that of astrology, which was in use among the old Chaldæans, whereas the prophets banished from east men's nativities (as we speak), and threaten to tell their fortunes. But this sort of men were rejected, as Strabo tells us, lib. xv., by the astronomers of that country; and so they were by the best philosophers in other nations, as Tully tells us, who calls their pretences, Chaldæarum magiae, lib. ii. De Divin. And therefore, no wonder God cautions his own people against them, as he doth not only here, but by his prophets, especially Jeremiah x. 2, 3, "Learn not the way of the heathen, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven, for the heathen are dismayed at them," &c. But then this caution was most necessary when they were going captive into that country, which at that time was the only day of rest, and their observing of omens, derived from την, which signifies an eye; which they deluded by the sleight of their hand, or other means.

Some of the Jews confess that their nation is at this day extremely addicted to these things. See Wagensell's Annot. on Sota, p. 529, &c., where he recites a long passage to this purpose, out of propheticus Franciscus Ollingensis, a converted Jew; whom one of his own nation undertaking to confute, he confirmed the charge.

Ver. 27. Ye shall not round the corners of your heads.] Or, "The ends of the hair of your head." For the Hebrew word pehon, which we translate corners, signifies also the ends or extremities of any thing; and the meaning is, they were not to cut their hair equal, behind and before; as the worshippers of the stars and the planets, particularly the Arabians, did (as R. Levi Barzaloni interprets it, Preecept. ecliv.). For this made their head have the form of a hemisphere.

The LXX. translate it, ου ροτητες σαφην εις τα ταρεπαύς. Where σαφην is the same with the Hebrew sixth, which signifies that lock which was left in the hinder part of the head, the rest of the hair being cut in a circle. And thus the ancient Arabians cut their hair, as Herodotus tells us, in imitation of the Hebrews, and were simple people (Joseph. xvi. cap. 6), the Idumeans, Ammonites, Moabites, and the rest of the inhabitants of Arabia Deserta, are called "circumcised in the corners," i. e. of the head (Jer. ix. 26). And the Greek scholarist on that place saith, that in his time the Saracens were so cut.

But there are those who think this refers to a superstitious custom of shaving the head in their mourning for the dead. For they cut it off, or shave it, and that round about, and threw it into the sepulchre with the bodies of their relations and friends; and sometimes laid it upon the face or the breast of the dead, as an offering to the infernal gods, whereby they thought to appease them and make them kind to the deceased.

But that this relation to the dead, is probable from the like law, repeated Deut. xiv. 1, and from the next verse to this see Maimonides, De Idol. cap. 12, 1, 2, 5.

Neither—mar the corners of thy beard.] There were five corners (as the phrase is) of their beards; one on either cheek, and one on either lip, and one below the chin; none of which, much less all, they might remove, or cut off, as the ancient Arabians are said, if we may believe Maimonides, par. iii. More Nevoch, cap. 37. But if the former have respect to their mourning for the dead, I do not see why this should not also be so interpreted; the gentiles being wont (as Theodoret observes) to shave their beards and snite their cheeks, at the funerals of their friends.

Ver. 28. Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh.] Either with their nails, or with knives, or other sharp instruments; as the manner of the heathen was.

For the dead.] To pacify the infernal spirits, and make them propitious to the dead; which was the end at which the gentiles aimed in sacrificing themselves and their hairs. Others think, that this was a flesh, out of great grief and anguish of spirit, doth not seem to be prohibited, no more than tearing off their hair; which were in use among the Jews, without any offence against this law, Jer. xvi. 6, 7, xli. 5, and other places (see Malmon. De Idol. cap. 13, sect. 10—13; I. Gerard Vossius, De Idol. p. 369, edit. 1; and Gierus, De hebet Hebræorum, cap. 10, sect. 2, 3). Huetius thinks that law of Solon's, which was transcribed by the Romans into the twelve tables, "that women in mourning should not scratch their cheeks," had its original from this law of Moses (Demonstr. Evangel. prop. iv. cap. 12. n. 2).

Nor printf any marks upon you.] If this refer to the dead (as the foregoing prohibition doth), then these marks were made by the gentiles in their flesh, at the funeral of their friends; that, by the compunction and pain they felt in their bodies, they might appease the infernal powers. And so Aben Ezra understands it: though there be no footsteps, that I can find, and as any other footstep (but it is probable only from what goes before. There is far greater reason for another exposition, that these prints were made in the flesh, that they who had them might be known to belong to such or such a god. For it was the custom of idolaters, saith the often named R. Levi (Praecept. coeli.,) to devote themselves to their gods by these diptichs, as signifying to the servants (for every one knows, in future times, slaves had marks set upon them to certify to whom they belonged,) redeemed with their price, and stamped with their marks. And these marks were made with a hot iron, in their hands, foreheads, or necks; or they were pricked with a needle dipped in glastum, as they say, and made bloody spots in their skin; the manner was among the Arabians, especially the Scenites. And they expressed either the very name of the god to whose service they were consecrated, or else, by a proper character, denoted whom they honoured: as a thunderbolt signified they were devoted to Jupiter; a spear or helmet to Mars; a trident to Neptune, &c. And these were signs (or sacraments, as we may call them) whereby they were solemnly addicted to their worship.

It is possible there might be some nations then that made some marks in their flesh as an ornament to them: for at this day the women in Greenland do not paint their faces, which are very swarthy, but stigmatize them in several places, by drawing a needle and thread diptichs, as signifying to their purposes, for they have not used any such marks (Anatom. Histor. Cent. iv. Hist. 90). But if any such thing were in use in ancient times, it easily might degenerate, of those before mentioned: for nothing more certain than that they made such marks in honour of Mars, the god of battle; and that he who devoted himself to Hercules, received σταματα ιερα, ιεων διδοις τας δεος, "sacred marks, giving up himself to that god," as Herodotus speaks (lib. ii. cap. 13) of one that fled to his temple in Egypt. And Lucret., "sait of the priests of the Syrian goddess, σεζαυουα δα επητο, &c.," they were all marked; some in their wrists, others in their necks; from whence all the Assyrians σεζαυαρφονα, carry such brands or marks in their flesh." And so are the Jews, that were initiated in the Egyptian rites, said (by the author of the third book of Maccabees) to be stigmatized with the leaves of ivy, which were the insignia of Bacchus. From which ancient practice, it is probable, Christians have derived the custom of printing the Jerusalem cross upon the arms of those who go to visit our Saviour's sepulchre (see Pollius, in Carmina inedita Gregor. Nazianz. p. 160). I shall add no more, but that the Jews themselves were so inclined to receive such a badge, as that they made no scruple to print the name of their own God in their flesh; as appears by that saying mentioned by Schickard out of the title Sopherim: "If any man write the name of God upon his flesh, let him neither wash nor anoint in that place" (see his Mishpat Hamelek, cap. ii. Theor. 5, and Carpozovius's Annotations upon it).

I am the Lord. For this reason such marks were forbidden, because the Israelites were peculiarly devoted to him as their sovereign Lord and Benefactor for the Sabbath adds, your God; and therefore were not to own any other but him, whose mark they had received in circumcision; which made all other absolutely unlawful.

Ver. 29. Do not prostitute thy daughter. It is scarce to be imagined that any man would prostitute his daughter to be a common strumpet; though he might possibly, if he had observed something of this in his discourse to Succoth-Benoth (see Symb. De Diis Syris, ii. cap. 7).

Those are fanciful interpretations which R. Eliezer and R. Akiba make of these words; who say, a man prostitutes his daughter who did not get her a husband when she was marriageable; or married her to an old man (Tose. Bari. 49.) Lest the land fall to whoredom. Unto which nothing could contribute so much as to make whoredom a piece of religion.

The land become full of wickedness. By such "abominable idolatries" (as St. Peter calls them), and many other foul sins, particularly murders, which flowed from hence; as Maimonides observes in his Tose. Bevil. 49. &c. 27.

Ver. 30. Ye shall keep my sabbaths. Not the days consecrated by the gentiles to the service of their gods; but the solemn days which I have appointed for the remembrance of my benefits (see ver. 2).

Reverence my sanctuary. This reverence consisted principally in coming to it so prepared as the law required, and then entering in a state prescribed: and then behaving themselves there with an awful humility. But the better to secure this reverence, the masters in Israel ordained, that no man should come into the mountain of the house with a staff, or a sword, or a girdle with a purse, or with shoes on his feet; and that no man should spit there, nor make it a thoroughfare; nor go out of it with his back towards the sanctuary, but go backward leisurely, with his face towards it till he was out of the gate, &c. So Maimonides, in his Beth Habbecheira, cap. 7; R. Levi Barzelonita, Praecept. cxxxi.; and see Petrus Cunaeus, lib. ii. cap. 12, De Republ. Hebr.

But the great thing which secured the reverence due to the sanctuary, was that which I mentioned at first—the strict purity from all legal defilements with which they were to be prepared; which made it very difficult in a condition to approach it. For when there were so many ways of being defiled, and so much time required to make men clean again, and so many things in many cases to be done for that purpose, it was not possible that they should be at to come thither very often, without exceeding great care and diligence; as I observed before out of Maimonides (par. iii. More Nevoch, cap. 47), which very much tended to preserve their reverence to the sanctuary: for men led by sense, as they were, make rites, neither seek after wizards, to be defiled by them: I am the Lord your God.

32 Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honour the face of the old man, and fear thy God: I am the Lord.

nothing of those places to which they may go when they please; but those to which they cannot be ad mitted, who sit in pride, and vanity, and only at certain times, and after great pains to fit themselves for it, they are apt to have in great esteem.

I am the Lord] whose majesty dwelt in that house; unto which therefore nobody might approach either for prayer or for sacrifice, without an awful sense of him. For so Maimonides explains it in the place now named: the sanctuary itself was not to be reveredence, but He who commanded that reverence.

Nor did this reverence belong only to the tabernacle or temple, instituted by God's express command for that ceremonial service which was unlawful to be performed anywhere else (for then it might seem proper only to that ceremonial dispensation, and to be performed only at the place and in the manner of the actual practice of the Jewish nation shows that they thought themselves obliged by this precept to use reverence in their synagogues, which were neither instituted by any written precept of the law, nor for any ceremonial service, which was confined to the temple, but for public assemblies, to bear the law read, and expounded, and to offer the prayers of the people to God; for in the Psalms of Asaph (where there is the only mention we find of synagogues in the Old Testament), they are called, not only houses and assemblies of God, but also sanctuaries (as the word is here in Moses), Ps. Lxxiii. 17, Lxiv. 4, 7, 8, Lxxviii. 12. See Mr. Thornlike, in his Rights of Religion, p. 913.

That have familiar spirits.] it is uncertain what is here meant by oboth, which we translate "familiar spirits." But the word oboth signifying a bottle, or hollow vessel (Job xxxii. 19), the Jews think it probable that it is the same as the Greek ἱγγαστρικὰς φάτνες, "who had a spirit or demon speaking out of the belly," or chest, with a hollow voice, as if it came out of a bottle. So the woman whom Saul went to consult, is called "bealath oh," a "mistress of such a spirit;" where it is plain, oboth signifies the spirit, or demon (see ch. xx. 27), and he or she that had familiarity with such a spirit, was properly called bealoth, or bealath oh, the master or mistress who possessed it, and gave answers by it, with a voice that seemed to come out of the lower parts of the body. In one place, indeed, the LXX. translate it, οἱ ἐκ τῆς γῆς φανταστικοί (Isa. xix. 3), "They that speak out of the earth; because the voice coming from the lower parts of her that was possessed, seemed to come out of the earth; and if it came from under the arm-holes, still it was so low and hollow, as if it had been out of the bottom of the belly, or the cavities of the earth. Others imagine such persons had the name of oboth, because they were swelled with the spirit, as a bladder is when it is blown. However it was, this continued till the times of the gospel, as appears from Acts xvi. 16, for she that had the spirit of Python was the same with Priscilla, whom, as Plutarch informs us (see Epitomes, &c., on this place), and Le De Dieu on that place). The famous Pythia, who delivered the oracles of Apollo, sat over a hole, and by her secret parts received the spirit which swelled her, and made her utter oracles; as Origen observes, lib. vii. contra Celsus; and St. Chrysostom, Hom. xxix. in 1 Epist. ad Corinth. (see Beyerus in loc. Annot., upon Selden De Dies Syris, p. 226, &c.:

There are these that look upon all that these authors say as old stories, to which no credit is to be given. But Aug. Eugabius affirms, that he himself had seen such women, called neurofisques (which is the same with the Greek ἱγγαστρικὰς φάτνες, from whom, as they sat, a voice came out of their secret parts, and gave answers to inquiries. And Callius Rhodiginus of Trier, in his De Bapt., cap. viii. Andychaudim, said they were entertained with laughter; for not only he saw such a woman, and heard a very small voice coming out of her belly, but innumerable other people, not only at Rhodigium, but in a manner through all Italy; among whom there were many great persons (who had her stripped naked, that they might be sure there was no fraud), to whom the Pythia answered, and not by a spirit, as they inquired. Hieron. Olenaster also, upon Is. xxi. 4, saith, he saw such a one at Lisbon, from under whose arm-holes, and other parts of her, a small voice was heard, which readily answered to whatever was asked.

Neither seek after wizards.] The Hebrew word jiddeinim, importing knowledge, as all confess, signifies such as we call cunning men; who pretended to tell what was lost, or what fortune people should have; and these were men (as far as I can judge), as the other were mostly women, who held intelligence with some demon; for this word seems to have the same signification in Hebrew which the other hath in Greek, for this reason, because, knowers; and jiddeinim are as much as ἱγγαστρικὰς φάτνες, which is the very same, futurorum consilii, as Mr. Selden observes; and so the LXX. translate it, γηγαστρικοὶ (2 Kings xxii. 7), though here and chap. xx. ult. they render it ἱγγαστρικοῖ, and elsewhere τίποτον ἱγγαστρικὸν. This knowledge they pretended to obtain (as some think) by looking into the entrails of their sacrifices; or as Maimonides will have it, by putting the bone of a certain bird, called jadua, into their mouths, with certain fumes and adjurations, which made them fall into an ecstacy, and foretell things to come (R. Levi Barzelonita, Preecept. celix.). And there are those who think that these jiddeinim were such as pretended by charms to cure diseases, &c., of which we can have no certainty, as being only on the LXX. in this place, who, as I observed, translate it by a more general word in another.

To be defiled by them.] With the foulest sins. For seeking to these was a forsaking of God, and one peculiar kind of idolatry; and therefore they that were guilty of it were to be stoned (as the same R. Levi observes) if they committed this sin knowingly, and there were witnesses of it. If there were no witnesses, then they were left to God to be cut off by his hand (ch. xx. 6).

I am the Lord.] Unto whom you are to seek for all that you desire.

Ver. 32. Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head,] gers in the land of Egypt: I am the Lord your God.

That they might accustom themselves to modesty and humility (as Maimonides glosses upon this law, More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 36), for the maintenance of which the usage was, they say, to rise up to them, when they were at the distance of four cubits; and as soon as they were gone by, to sit down again; that it might appear they rose up purely in respect to them. To this nature directed all civilized people: who anciently, as Juvenal says (Sat. xiii.), believed this a great wickedness, to be punished with death, if a young man did not rise up to an old.

And such a law there was established among the Lacedemonians, τοις γίνεσθαι ανενεργως ανέδεικτον ήτοι και πατίρα, "that aged persons should be reverence no less than if they were their fathers." And so Plato, πάς ανελέξας των λατως πρεσβυτηρος ἐτη και εἴστης, "let every one reverence him that is elder than himself, in deed and in word" (lib. ix. De Legibus, p. 875), where he requires that a youth should honour a stranger that was his ancient; and hath this memorable saying, καλλωπιζομαι χρι τω καλω δοκιμαζω, &c., "that youth should glory more in obeying well, than in ruling well: and first of all in obeying the laws; for this is all the greater service, and next in giving honour to old men; and to those especially, who have passed their days honourably and with glory" (see more to this purpose in Henricus Stephanus De Juris Civile Font. et Rivi). And there was the greater reason for this reverence towards old men in this nation, there being nothing else among them but age and experience that could qualify them for service; and they were all equally noble, and equally rich; of the same profession, all brought up in the same manner.

Honour the face of the old men.] Or, of the elder; that is, or those who are skilful in the law, as the Jews interpret it; and I see no reason to contradict it (as some have done), since he speaks of aged persons before. See Mr. Selden, lib. i. De Synod. cap. 14, where he deduces this at large: and another excellent writer of our own, Mr. Throntdike, in his Rights of the Church in a Christian State, p. 314, &c. "For if such as taught the law had not been honoured before men, nobody would have minded their words, nor received what they propounded, about things to be known or to be done," and much more as Mr. Selden, in his More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 36. And it made no difference of what age he was, whether an old man or a young (for some elders, it appears by Daniel, were not aged); but the same honour was given to him, even by wise men, as R. Levi Barzelonita shows (Precept. cxxii).

Fair day God.] This is the fountain of all virtue; particularly of the forementioned; God having imprinted a venerable character upon those who are grown aged, especially on such as are wise, and instruct others in virtue. But some of the Hebrews think that in this verse there are three degrees of honour enjoined to three ranks of men; one to the aged; and next to the wise and learned; and the third to the judges, who they imagine are here meant by Elohim (God) whom they are commanded to fear or reverence.

I am the Lord.] Most high above all; and therefore greatly to be feared.

Ver. 33. If a stranger sojourn with thee—ye shall not see him.] Not so much as by upbraiding him with this being a stranger, or his having worshiped idols heretofore; for of such a stranger they under-stand this, as was become a proselyte to their religion (see ch. xviii. 8, 12, 13; and Exod. xxii. 21). But common humanity teaches everybody to be kind to all manner of strangers, and not merely to refrain from oppressing them, or giving them vexation. For they had most excellent discourses about this in several places; particularly lib. v. De Legibus, where he shows, that God is the avenger of all wrongs done to strangers, more than of those that are done to our fellow-citizens; ιςος γὰρ ὁ θεὸς τῆς ἀθανασίας, &c., "for a stranger being destitute of friends and kindred, is the greater object of pity, both of men and of God; and therefore, he that can hurt most, should be most ready to help him," &c. (see p. 739, 730, edit. Saraii). Upon which account he makes it lawful for a stranger to pluck any of the best fruit, as he is upon his way, whether grapes, figs, or apples, &c. (lib. viii. p. 845). And the corn being divided, as he would have it, into twelve parts; and a twelfth part divided into three; he orders one of those parts to be given to strangers, p. 847, 818. Τὸ γὰρ ἡμών ἀποφέρεσθαι, &c., "for a stranger or sojourner ought to be comforted in a most friendly manner," &c. (see lib. xii. p. 953, 953).

Ver. 34. As one born among you.] They understand this only of such a stranger, who by circumcision with some show of profession: whom they were to be so far from oppressing, that they were to treat him as if he had been a native Jew, and love him as a brother.

Love him as thyself.] He had commanded them (ver. 18), "to love their neighbour," i. e. an Israelite (they expound it, as themselves; and now he commands them as strangers, whom they had admitted as members of the nation; which demonstrates, they think, he was become an Israelite; and therefore was to have the same privileges with themselves, both in all civil and sacred things. And this, no doubt, was true, that they were bound to treat such a proselyte with a tender affection, and to make no difference between him and an Israelite. For he was to be admitted to eat of the paschal lamb, and of the peace-offering, and he might marry with an Israelite; insomuch, that Moses saith, "one ordinance shall be for both" (Numb. xv. 15). All the difference I can find was, that they never admitted any stranger to be a member of the great Sanhedrim. But notwithstanding all this, I cannot think it reasonable, or just, that the Israelites should have rejected strangers, and the Gentiles, whom they had renounced idolatry; and so they understand the word stranger in the twenty-fifth chapter of this book (ver. 47), and I see no reason why such a stranger should not be admitted here to have a share in their affliction, who was become a worshipper of the true God, though he had not taken upon him to observe the whole law.

Ye were strangers.] This reason is little less than a demonstration, that such strangers as I now mentioned are comprehended in the foregoing precept. For the remembrance of what their condition was in Egypt, is that whereby they are moved to have pity on those whom they found among themselves in the same; and they and the Egyptians were not of the same religion, but they found such kind entertainment among them, that they were ready to give to those who were of their religion.
36 Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the Lord your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt.

This argument indeed became stronger, when any persons were incorporated with them, and became more one with them, than they were with the Egyptians; but was of great force to procure kindness to those who did not live by their laws.

I am the Lord: Who have done so much for you when you were mere strangers, that you should not stick to be kind to those who are in the like condition.

Ver. 35. Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in measurement, or weight, or any manner of work. The Hebrews refer this word judgment to all the following particulars; and think that Moses uses it here to show of what moment this law is, which he calls doing judgment; so that he who measures or weighs hath the office of a judge; and if he commit any fraud in his measures or weights, he is a corrupter of judgment, and is called wicked, abominable, accursed. They are the words of R. Levi Barzelonita, Precept. cxx., where he adds, that such men are the cause of five mischiefs, which are imputed to unjust judges; "who defile the land; profane the name of God; remove the presence of the Divine Majesty; bring a sword upon the people; and at last carry them captive out of their own country." And therefore, every one is called a judge of all matters: and if he commit any injuries against this crime, as destructive to human society; particularly Justinian ordained that such offenders should be beaten 15 times, C 10 times, "sorily, as impious people."

In meteyard: By which they measured lands, cloths, and such like things; for middath (as Posterus observes) is the measure of continued quantity, viz. in things dry.

In weight: By which they paid and received money in those days; and sold brass and iron, and things of like nature.

In measure: The Hebrew word masreuh (from which seems to come the Latin mensura, and our English word measure) denotes the measure of discrete quantity (as we speak), as of corn; and of all continued fluid quantity, as of wine and oil. And the forenamed R. Levi will have it to signify the very least of such measures; about which, saith he, the law concerns itself, that men should be exact in them, as well as in the greatest. And so Hesychius here notes, that Moses provides against all injustice in small things, as well as in great; for what the possession of a field or a house is to a wealthy man, that the measure of wine or corn, or the weight of bread, is to the poor, who have daily need of such things for the support of their life.

37 Therefore shall ye observe all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: I am the Lord.

Ver. 36. Just balances, just weights.] This verse only positively requires strict justice in those things, wherein the former verse forbade all iniquity. And these two words refer to things sold by weight.

Just ephah, and a just hin: These two words, ephah and hin, comprehend all sorts of measures of things, whether wet or dry. And, that they might have such just weights and measures among them, the standard of them was kept in the sanctuary, by which all were to be governed; as appears from 1 Chron. xxiii. 29 (see Exod. xxx. 13). The Jewish doctors also say, that it was a constitution of their wise men, for the preventing all fraud in these matters, that no weights, balances, or measures should be made of any metal, as of iron, lead, tin, &c. (which were obnoxious to rust, or might be bent, or easily impaired), but of marble, stone, or glass, which were less liable to be abused.

For these constitutions Moses was so famous, that his name was celebrated on the account of them in other nations. Nay, Lucius Ampelius (a rude kind of writer, but who had collected much out of better authors), saith, that Mochus was the inventor of such weights and measures, and thenMS. &c. (which are written in the constellation called Libra. Now if for Mochus we read Moschos, it is the very name of Moses in Hebrew (viz. Mosheh), who is called so by other authors, as the learned Huetius observes in his Demonstr. Evangel. Propos. iv. cap. 7, p. 16.

I am the Lord, &c.] This is the general reason for their obedience; which is repeated in this chapter above a dozen times. Sometimes more briefly, "I am the Lord;" and sometimes a little larger, "I am the Lord your God;" and here with this addition, "which brought you out of the land of Egypt." Whereby he in a special manner demonstrates himself both to be their Lord (faithful to his promise, Exod. vi. 2) and their God, who obliged them to his service, by the most singular benefit.

Ver. 37. My statutes, and all my judgments.] These words, statutes and judgments, comprehend all the laws of God: some of which were prohibitions, which they were to mark and observe diligently, so as to abstain from such things; and other precepts, or commands, which they were to practise, and do according to them.

I am the Lord:] No more need be said to engage your obedience in every thing than this, that I am your sovereign, and the sovereign of the whole world.

CHAPTER XX.

1 Of him that giveth of his seed to Molech. 4 Of him that favoureth such an one. 6 Of going to wizards. 7 Of sanctification. 9 Of him that curseth his parents. 10 Of adultery. 11, 14, 17, 19 Of incest. 13 Of sodomy. 15 Of beastiality. 18 Of uncleanness. must be put to death.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 2 Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that before (ch. xviii. 21), and add this which follows unto it.

Or of the strangers] The proselytes, who had embraced their religion, were no less concerned in this law than the native Israelites (see ch. xvii. 8, 10, &c.).

That giveth any of his seed unto Molech:] This giveth any of his seed unto Molech; he shall surely be put to death: the people of the land shall stone him with stones.

3 And I will set my face against that man, who burneth their children in the fire to Adramelech, and describeth the fire of God, and the fire of heaven, as the fire of the earth: he that sacrificeth his children, shall not escape.

4 And thou shalt take addedly of his seed, which have sinned against him: thou shalt surely set all his substance for the fire, for blood pollutes thee, and thou shalt destroy all his substance when he hath sinned.

5 If thy brother, or thy brother's wife, come out of a foreign country, and come unto thee, and say, I will serve thee: thou shalt take of their seed, which are born in thy house, and thou shalt set them on foot, and make them serve thee.

6 And it shall come to pass, when thou hast children male, that thou shalt instruct them to serve God: and thou shalt teach the daughter of thy son, and thy daughter, to be obedient to all the commandments of the Lord, and to do them.

7 And it shall come to pass, when ye be multiplied, and the land is subdued before the Lord your God, ye shall not make with thedaughters of the land, the daughters of the land, as ye, for they will turn away your sons, and your daughters, and cause you to serve other gods: so would the Lord angry against you, and destroy you.

8 But thou shalt not take for thee any wife of a foreign nation, of the daughters of the Ammonites, or of the Moabites, or of the Philistines, or of the Egyptians, or of the Hittites.

9 For they offered their sons and their daughters unto the gods of the nations, whither they went to be among them; and they caused their sons and their daughters to prostitute themselves with the gods of other nations: wherefore the Lord was angry with the children of Israel.

10 Now therefore, if it come to thy knowledge, and thou hear that they have done all these abominations, what is written in this book of the law, shall ye not be afraid? and thou shalt shew thee strong against all thy enemies, all those that persecute thee.

11 For the Lord thy God is among thee, as a mighty very great god, and terrible,merciful, and forgiving, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth.

12 For he will not clear him that sinneth against him: but all whose transgressions are unrepentant, and hardeneth himself against all the commandments of the Lord, even those will he bring upon all the families of the earth, by all the plagues which he hath brought upon them, until that all they which are against him are destroyed.

13 Thou shalt keep every commandment which I command thee this day, that ye may be strong, and go in to possess the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers, to give them.

14 All their kings whom ye shall meet, and all their nations, ye shall smite, and break their chariots, and burn their stoves, and take their land, and dwell in it.

15 And the Lord shall inherit unto himself the nations which ye destroy, as the Lord your God hath said unto you, in the day that ye came out of Egypt.

16 Only be strong and very brave: be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed before them; for the Lord thy God is among thee, he will not fail thee, nor forsook thee.
The second is, the excision of the soul only; which is threatened by Moses six-and-twenty times, and particularly to incestuous marriages. The third is, excision both of soul and body; which is threatened to fifteen sins; among which they reckon this, of giving their children to Molech (see Selden, lib. vii. De Jure N. et G. sec. Heb. cap. 9, p. 828, 829, &c.).

To defile my sanctuary,] By this sin God's sanctuary was defiled, as well as his holy name profaned, because they sacrificed to Molech in other places, despising the tabernacle, which was the only place appointed by God where Divine service was to be performed. And therein consisted part of the honour and reverence which God required to his sanctuary (ch. xix. 30), that it should be looked upon as the only place where acceptable sacrifices could be offered to him. And therefore, then it was dishonoured and defiled, when they offered sacrifice in any other place, as they did, in aftertimes, to Molech in the valley of Hinnom, as I observed before, 2 Kings xxiii. 16. Where they built high places to Baal (which is another name for the sun), on purpose that they might offer their children upon them (Jer. xx. 5, 6, xxxii. 35). This was a plain contempt of God, and of his sanctuary, which they forsook, as if it had not been a holy, but a defiled place. Otherwise they would have kept to it, and offered nowhere else, nor after any other manner than according to the rites thereof.

To profane my holy name,] By giving the name of God and his honour to such an abominable idol.

Ver. 4. [If the people of the land.] In that part of the country where the sanctuary was, there was usually a temple of their idol, as the priest of Baal was at Samaria, and the priest of Dagon at Ashdod, the Israelites were very apt to fall into idolatry, and therefore did this snarespring, as it were, every way to allure them thereto.

Do any ways hide their eyes.] If they connived at what he did, and assembled their knowledge of it: or would not speak the whole truth, and endeavour to convict him of this foul crime, that he might be stoned.

Ver. 5. I will set my face against that man.] As the idoler was liable to this punishment from the hand of Heaven (see ver. 3), so they that favoured him, and would not testify against him when they knew him guilty, fell under God's high displeasure (which is meant by "setting his face against them"), and so did all their children, whom God threatens to destroy. He speaks, indeed, in the singular number, because commonly in such cases, there was some one person by whose authority others were persuaded to wink at such offences, and not to discover what they knew of them. But all such men are threatened with the Divine vengeance in the next words.

And will cut him off, and all that go a whoring after him. &c.] That is, all others, who, following his example, favour such idolaters, and protect them from punishment. For every one knows that idolatry is called by the name of whoredom in Scripture; because God having espoused the Israelites to himself, as his peculiar people, their forsaking him, to serve other gods, was a spiritual adultery.

To commit whoredom with Molech,] i.e. To worship him as their god.

against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people.

7 ¶ Sanctify yourselves therefore, and be ye holy: for I am the Lord your God.

8 And ye shall keep my statutes, and do them: I am the Lord which sanctify you.

9 ¶ For every one that curseth his father or his mother shall be surely put to death: he hath cursed his father or his mother: his blood shall be upon him.

Ver. 6. And the soul.] i.e. The person.

That turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards,] Who they were that pretended to have true acquaintance with spirits, as was extraordinary: such as were wizards, where they are commanded "not to regard them," and here, if any did consult them (which is called turning after them), cutting off is threatened to them; that is, shortening their days: for such persons are reckoned by the Jews as the chief of those six sorts of sinners, who were liable to the first kind of exaction, which I mentioned, ver. 5. As for the man himself who had a familiar spirit, or was a wizard, he was to be stoned, if he was discovered and convicted (ver. 27). And so they observe in Sanhedrin, cap. 7, n. 7.

To go a whoring.] It was a kind of idolatry to seek to such people for advice or relief; being a forsaking of God, and putting confidence in them. Though sometimes "to go a whoring," signifies the commission of any grievous sin, which idolatry usually led men into; as Mr. Selden hath noted, lib. iii. De Uxore Hebr. cap. 23.

There is some reason to think, there was something magical in the obligation of their children to Molech; and that thereby they consulted with demons about things future or secret: because such spirits are often violently forbidden, after the prohibition of giving their children to Molech; and because they are frequently joined together in other places, as in Deut. xviii. 10, 11; 2 Kings xvii. 19, and xxii. 6. Certain it is, that in aftertimes they did sacrifice children, and cast them into their bowels; as Joh. Geusius hath shown out of Porphyrius, Philostratus, Herodotus, and others. Lib. De Veteribus Humannis, par. i. cap. 17. I will even set my face, &c.] See ver. 3, 5.

Ver. 7. Sanctify yourselves therefore.] Worship therefore God alone; to whose service you are set apart.

Be ye holy.] Keep yourselves free from all idolatry (see ch. xi. 14).

I am the Lord.] See ch. xix. 2, 3, 10, &c.

Ver. 8. Ye shall keep my statutes and do them.] Be governed by these laws, and not by the customs of other people.

I am the Lord which sanctify you.] Separated you to myself from other people, by peculiar laws which I have given you.

Ver. 9. For every one.] Or, if any one; the particle we translate for signifying frequently with, or if.

That curseth his father or his mother.] Reprocheth them with imprecations.

Shall be surely put to death.] i.e. Be stoned. And it made no difference, whether he cursed them when they were alive, or after their death, as R. Levi Barzelonita says, the rule of their doctors was; yet they resolve, that, unless he cursed them by some proper name of God, he was not liable to be put to death, but only to be scourged (Praecept. cclxi.). See Exod. xxii. 17.

His blood shall be upon him.] When the law only 10 And the man that committed adultery with another man's wife, even he that committed adultery with his neighbour's wife, the adulterer and the adulteress shall surely be put to death.
11 And the man that lieth with his father's wife hath uncovered his father's nakedness: both of them shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them.
12 And if a man lie with his daughter in law, both of them shall surely be put to death: they have wrought confusion; their blood shall be upon them.
13 If a man also lie with mankind, as he lieth with a woman, both of them have committed an abomination: they shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them.
14 And if a man take a wife and her mother, it is wickedness: they shall be burnt with fire, both he and they; that there be no wickedness among you.

The greatest thing that can be objected against this account of the punishment of adultery, is that which St. John tells us the Jews said concerning the woman taken in the very act of it, "Moses in the law commanded us, that such should be stoned" (John viii. 5). But it may be answered, that this woman was espoused only, and not yet married; and so, by the law, as I observed before, was to be stoned (Deut. xxii. 23, 24). If this seem absurd, that the adultery of one espoused should be accounted a greater crime than of one married (for stoning was a heavier punishment than strangling), it ought to be considered, that the love of those who were newly espoused, was commonly more fervent than theirs who were married, especially among the Jews, who for light causes were wont to be separated from their wives; and therefore no wonder if the adultery of the former was judged a greater crime than of the latter.

Ver. 10. The man that committed adultery, &c.] By the ancient law of Draco and Solon, the husband of the adulteress, if he found them in the fact, might kill them both, or put out their eyes, or stigmatize them; or make the adulterer pay a fine, if he had a mind to spare his life. See Meursius in his Themis Attica, i. exp. 4, 5, and the Leges Attica, set forth by Petitius, lib. vi. tit. 4, where it appears, that it was infamous for the husband to live with his wife after she had committed adultery; and that it was unlawful for her to enter into the public temples, or go dressed in the streets. If she did, anybody might tear off her clothes, and beat her, only not kill her (see S. Petri Comment. p. 440, &c.).

"Shall surely be put to death." It is not left to the husband's liberty, by this law, whether he would spare their lives or not; but the fact being proved, they were both to die for it: only it is not said here what kind of death they should suffer; nor was the same kind of death inflicted upon all that were guilty of this crime; for, if the daughter of a priest played the same part, she was to be burnt (Deut. xxii. 23); and the adulterer to be strangled, as the Jews understand it. If a man lay with a virgin espoused to another man, but not yet married, they were both to be stoned, by the express words of the law (Deut. xxi. 23).

But adultery with a married woman, if we may credit the Jewish doctors, was punished with strangling (see Selden, lib. ii. Depr. of Heb. cap. 2). For when we meet with this phrase, "they shall surely die," it is always meant of death by the sentence of the house of judgment (as they speak), and if the law add no more, they resolved it to be by strangling. If these words be added, "their blood shall be upon them," then, they say, they were to be stoned. This, I observed before; and shall add now, that strangling, as they describe it, was not such a punishment as our hanging the men by the neck; but the criminal being stuck up to the knees in dung, they tied a napkin about his neck, and drawing it hard at both ends, choked him. There was such a thing as hanging men on a gallows (as we speak), but it was after they were dead, and only such as had been stoned; and not all of them neither, but such alone as had been stoned for blasphemy or idolatry (see J ohn. Carpusovius upon Schickard's Jus Regnum, exp. 4, Theor. xiv.).
15 And if a man lie with a beast, he shall surely be put to death: and ye shall slay the beast.

16 And if a woman approach unto any beast, and lie down thereto, thou shalt kill the woman and the beast: they shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them.

17 And if a man shall take his sister, his father's daughter, or his mother's daughter, and see her nakedness, and she see his nakedness; it is a wicked thing; and they shall be cut off in the sight of their people: he hath uncovered his sister's nakedness; he shall bear his iniquity.

the Karaites formed this rule, "after the same manner that men were obliged by a precept in Scripture, the women were obliged also" (Selden, lib. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 5).

That there be no wickedness among you. That others may be deterred from the commissiion of such enormities: for the Hebrew word imports more than ordinary wickedness (see ch. xviii. 17).

Ver. 15. If a man lie with a beast.] See ch. xviii. 23. This death was by stoning, as appears from the next verse.

Ye slay the beast.] Just as they were to destroy, not only the inhabitants of an apostate city, but their cattle also, &c. (Deut. xiii. 15, 16,) to terrify others from committing the like sin; and, as the Talmudists observe, that there might be no memorial left of so foul a crime, by men's pointing at the beast, and saying, There goes the beast that such a man lay with. They might have added, to prevent monstrous births (see Selden, lib. i. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4). Maimonides gives a good reason, why a beast that killed a man should be slain; as a punishment to the owner, for looking no better after it; but his application of it to this matter seems impertinent (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 40). Bochartus's gloss is far better; the beast was killed as an instrument in the crime, just as a forger of deeds is hanged with his pen and counterfeit seals; and a conjurer with his magical books and characters. And this also is useful for an example, though not to other beasts, yet to men: whose concern it is to consider, that if beasts were not spared, who were not capable of sinning, what would become of them who committed such crimes against the known law of God, and the impressions of nature itself? ([Hierozolion. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 16].

Ver. 16. Their blood shall be upon them.] This relates to the man and the woman (mentioned in these two verses), who committed this foul crime; for a beast is not capable of punishment. But, as the canon law speaks, Pecora inde credendum est jussa inerisci, quia nulli flagittio contaminat reipublicam factum memoriam: "it is to be believed, that the beasts which were polluted with such a flagitious wickedness, were therefore commanded to be slain, because they rubbed up the memory of the fact:" which is the very reason given of it in the Mishna, Tit. Sanhedrin, cap. 7. n. 4. And so R. Solomon: "the beast was killed, lest it should be said, There is the beast for which such a woman was put to death."

Ver. 17. If a man shall take his sister, &c.] Whether she was his sister by the whole blood (as we speak), or by half blood only, by the father's side or mother's, he was not permitted to marry her by the law mentioned, ch. xviii. 9. For her nakedness.] It is the same with uncovering her nakedness to lie with her; as it is there expressed, and here in the end of the verse ("he hath uncovered his sister's nakedness"), the sense of seeing being put for that of touching, or any other, in this language.

It is a wicked thing.] A flagitious, or nefarious wickedness, as the Vulgar expresses it. But the Hebrew word chesed signifies sometimes in the prophetic and legal language, indulgence; the Talmudists take these words, as if they came in by a parenthesis, to obviate an objection which might be made, that Cain and Abel married their sisters. True, saith Moses, that was by an indulgence in the beginning, arising from the necessity of things, when there were none but brothers and sisters in the world. But now they shall be cut off in the sight of their people, who marry such near relations. So the Gemara Hierosol. ad Tit. Sanhedrin (see Selden, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent., cap. 8, p. 581). And so the Chaldee paraphrase, ascribed to Jonathan, whose words are these: "it is a filthy thing; but I used an indulgence to the first men by whom the world was to be propagated, until mankind was sufficiently multiplied: after that, whosoever doth any such thing, let him be cut off, &c."

Cut off in the sight of their people.] Publicly put to death (see ver. 10).

He shall bear his iniquity.] i.e. The punishment of it (ch. v. 1). Ver. 18. If a man shall lie with a woman having her sickness, &c.] Here the sentence of death is pronounced upon them; whereas in ch. xv. 24, it is only said, the man should be uncircumcised seven days. Therefore many think in that place he speaks of doing this ignorantly, and here of doing it knowingly. But if the man might be ignorant of the condition she was in, the woman herself could scarce be so; and, therefore, others think, when the fact was altered not at once, they only incurred a legal impurity for a certain season; but when it was publicly known, and proof made of it before a judge, it was a capital crime, because it was done in contempt and despite of the law; otherwise it could not have been so publicly known as to be legally proved. Whether this law obliges in the state of Christian charity, at large discussed by Bishop Taylor (not to mention other writers abroad), in his Doctor. Dubitant. book ii. ch. 2, rule iii. n. 8, and book iii. ch. 2, rule ii. n. 3, &c. Ver. 19.] See ch. xviii. 12, 13. They shall bear their iniquity.] It not being said, they shall die, or be cut off (as in the former cases), it hath made some conclude this sin, being not of so high a nature as the foregoing, was punished only as those that follow (ver. 20, 21), where they that committed them are threatened to die childless.

Ver. 20.] See ch. xviii. 14. They shall die childless.] This is understood by some as if Moses meant they should be put to death, before they could have any fruit of such a conjunction. But most think he only means, that either they should...
21 And if a man shall take his brother's wife, it is an unclean thing: he hath uncovered his brother's nakedness; they shall be childless.

22 ¶ Ye shall therefore keep all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: that the land, whither I bring you to dwell therein, spue you not out.

23 And ye shall not walk in the manners of the nation, which I cast out before you: for they committed all these things, and therefore I abhorred them.

24 But I have said unto you, Ye shall inherit their land, and I will give it unto you to possess have no children; or that their children should not live, but die before their parents; or be looked upon as a spurious issue, and not inherit their estate; which is the sense St. Austin puts upon these words. And Procopius Gazaev also mentions it; and says this was the Roman law about all incestuous marriages. Senean or whom not receiveth the inter liberes, "such issue shall not be reckoned among their children."

Ver. 21.] See ch. xviii. 16.

Ver. 22. Keep all my statutes.] Particularly these concerning the foregoing matters (see ch. xviii. 4, &c.).

That the land—spue you not out.] As it did the former inhabitants (see ch. xviii. 25, 28).

Ver. 23. Ye shall not walk in the manners of the nation.] viz. Of the Amorites, as the Hebrews rightly expound it; for they were the principal nation in Canaan, and extremely given to idolatry. R. Levi Burlamonda extends this to all their customs, Trimming their hair, and such like (Preecept. cefuli), but it seems here particularly to relate to their marriages and idolatry (see ch. xviii. 3).

For they committed all these things.] These words show that the foregoing have particular respect to their abominable marriages and idolatry.

Therefore I abhorred them.] So as to cast them out of their country (ch. xviii. 25). Onkelos translates it, "my Word [Memri] abominated them." Which is a plain intimation of a notion they had in ancient times of more persons than one in the Deity; and particularly here denotes him whom St. John calls the Word. For Memri (Word) plainly signifies a person in this place; and a person of the same essence with Jehovah.

Ver. 24. I have said.] Made you a promise. Ye shall inherit their land, &c.] For he promised to expel the former inhabitants of that country, to make room for them (see Exod. iii. 8, 17, xxiii. 27, 28, xxxiii. 3).

Which have separated you] This may refer either to your fathers before, that they should not live like other nations, because he had, by peculiar laws, as well as by signal deliverances, distinguished them from all the people of the earth; or to what follows, that he had made such a difference between them, and other people, that in their very diet they should not agree with them, much less in the forenamed impurities. For, that the difference of meats was instituted, to keep them from familiar conversation with their idolatrous neighbours, is very evident (as I before observed), and the gentiles themselves took notice of it, and looked upon them as unsociable people upon this very account. Josephus often mentions this objection against them. And Euphrates complains (in Philostratus De Vita Apollon. Lib. cap. 2), "That of old they separated not only from the Romans, but it, a land that floweth with milk and honey: I am the Lord your God, which have separated you from other people.

25 Ye shall therefore put difference between clean beasts and unclean, and between unclean fowls and clean: and ye shall not make your souls abominable by beast, or by fowl, or by any manner of living thing that creepeth on the ground, which I have separated from you as unclean.

26 And ye shall be holy unto me: for I the Lord am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be mine. From all mankind: for they had invented, Non obstante, "a manner of living that would not let them mix with other people," either at a common table or in their prayers or sacrifices.

Ver. 25.] According to the prescriptions in the eleventh chapter, which are here briefly repeated, to enforce the observation of the foregoing precepts against such incestuous marriages as other nations allowed; their law not permitting them so much as to eat such meat as those nations did; but to account many things, which they freely used, unclean and abominable.

Abominable, &c.] See ch. xi. 43.

Which I have separated from you as unclean.] Forbidden you to eat; and thereby severed you from all other people. Which had this intention in it (among others already mentioned), that this nation, from whom the Messiah was to spring, might be kept pure and sincere; free from all mixture with strange people; unto which nothing contributed more effectually [as an excellent person hath observed] than the difference of meats, which made it not easy for them to contract acquaintance, much less friendship, with other nations. And truly, unless the people from whom the Messiah was to come, had been kept separate from all other nations, either all hope of him would have been lest, or many in every country, to the great hurt and destruction of mankind, would have preferred the people whose they were, by keeping them a people distinct by themselves, it came to pass that all countries theraeabouts were filled with a report, that the Lord of the world should come out of Judea: see Joh. Wagenseil, Confut. Carm. Lipman, p. 364, &c.

Ver. 26. Ye shall be holy unto me.] See ch. xi. 44, xix. 2, and ver. 7 of this chapter.

And have severed you from other people.] The very difference of meats which they used, was a token that God had separated them from other people, to be subject to such rites and laws as he ordained: and hereby also they were so severed from others, as to be kept from the most familiar conversation with them which is injurious, and the more especially by keeping them a people distinct by themselves, it came to pass that all countries theraeabouts were filled with a report, that the Lord of the world should come out of Judea: see Joh. Wagenseil, Confut. Carm. Lipman, p. 364, &c.
27 1 A man also or a woman that hath a familiar spirit, or that is a wizard, shall surely be put to death: they shall stone them with stones: their blood shall be upon them.

because of men's natural tenderness and clemency towards women." Thus he, More Nevovch, par. iii. cap. 37. Procopius Gazæus's gloss on these words is very pious, but something fanciful; "He that is hardened like a stone to virtue, deserves to be stoned. For magic commits murders, digs up sepulchres, disturbs the souls of men. For magicians are men who corrupt human nature."

CHAPTER XXI.

1 Of the priest's mourning. 6 Of their holiness. 8 Of their estimation. 7, 13 Of their marriages. 16 The priests that have blemishes must not minister in the sanctuary.

1 And the Lord said unto Moses, Speak unto the priests the sons of Aaron, and say unto them, There shall none be defiled for the dead among his people:

2 But for his kin, that is near unto him, that is, for his mother, and for his father, and for his son, and for his daughter, and for his brother,

3 And for his sister a virgin, that is nigh unto him, which hath had no husband; for her may he be defiled.

4 But he shall not defile himself, being a chief man among his people, to profane himself.

care of his funeral, and see him buried, a priest might do it himself, rather than his body should lie above ground.

Ver. 2. But for his kin.] Here is an exception to the general rule; because it would have been very hard to restrain natural affection from carrying them to their parents, and children, and brethren, and sisters, when they died. Which cases would not often happen, as Maimonides observes in the place before alleged; and they are particularly named, that there might be no mistake, nor any colour to extend this indulgence to relations more remote.

For his mother, and for his father, &c.] If any have a mind to know the rabbinical reasons, why the mother is here put before the father, and, ver. 11, the father before the mother, with such-like things, he may consult Simeon De Muis in his Varia Sacra, p. 366, &c.

Ver. 3. For his sister a virgin,] I see no reason why it should be restrained to his whole sister, both by father's and mother's side (as some of the Hebrew doctors would have it); for, that his half-sister, by either of them, was nigh unto him (as it here follows), it appears by the law about incestuous marriages (ch. xviii. 9).

Which hath had no husband.] To take care of her funeral, which her brother therefore, though a priest, might. It is commonly observed, that there is no mention here of his wife. But Maimonides, with great reason, thinks it was lawful for him to mourn for her; but it was needless to mention her, who, by the law of God, was dearer to him than father or mother. And there is this argument for it: that Ezekiel, who was a priest, is forbidden, by a special command, to mourn for his wife, which otherwise he would have done (ch. xxiv. 16, &c.).

Ver. 4. He shall not defile himself, being a chief man.] But though he might defile himself for such very near relations, yet he might not for the greatest man in the nation, who was not so near of kin to him.

This seems to me to be the easiest and the most natural sense of this verse, by adding the particle lamed (which in the two foregoing verses is put before mother, father, son, daughter, brother, and sister) to bad, i. e. chief man (as we translate it); nothing being more usual than to omit such a particle, which yet must be understood when it hath been often before mentioned. And thus the Vulgar Latin under-5 They shall not make baldness upon their head, neither shall they shave off the corner of their beard, nor make any cuttings in their flesh.

6 They shall be holy unto their God, and not profane the name of their God: for the offerings of the Lord made by fire, and the bread of their stand it; and the sense is the same, if we take it as our Saxon. Ch. Ver. 5, vi.] Conr was good, (and, "But he shall not defile himself (for any other), being a chief man," &c. As for the marginal translation, I can see no ground for it; and there must be a greater supplement, by adding for his wife; which one cannot well think is here forbidden, as I observed on the foregoing verse. They also who translate it, "a chief ruler shall not defile himself," &c., have still less reason, the whole discourse in this place being concerning the priests.

To profane himself.] He himself, in sacred offices, being the greatest person, would have been profaned, i.e. rendered a common man, if he had annoyed for any but those whom nature had very closely linked to himself.

Ver. 5.] Though they were allowed to mourn for some persons, yet for none after this manner: that is, according to the custom of certain places in Chaldea, as Aben Ezra glosses upon these words. And he might have added also, of the Egyptians; among whose ceremonies we find this in aftertimes, and it is likely it had been very ancient. For Jul. Pinnicus tells us, in the beginning of his book, that in their annual lamentations of Osiris, they were wont to shave their heads, that they might bewail the miserable misfortune of their king, by depriving themselves of the ornament of hair," &c. And he adds, that they did tear their flesh, and cut open the scars of their old wounds, &c. where John, Woeber observes the same out of several other authors. And Plutarch, in his book of Superstition, saith, they generally used in mourning to be shaven; whereas the Hebrews let their hair grow (see ch. x. 6, xix. 27).

Ver. 6. They shall be holy.] Attend to their office, unto which they are peculiarly consecrated; and not, without great necessity, be at any time unfitted for it. For he fadeth not away as the common people do: or rendering themselves incapable to minister unto the Lord; as they were when they were any way defiled.

For the offerings] They attend upon his altar, where the burnt-offerings, peace-offerings, and all the rest were offered.

And the bread of their God, they do offer.] The word and is not in the Hebrew, and the sense will be clearer if it be left out: "the offering of the Lord made by fire," being called the "bread of their God," i.e. his meat, or food. For the altar was his table; and what was burnt thereon was in the nature of his provision; which in the Scripture language is comprised in one word, bread, as in 1 Sam. xiv. 28. And therefore no wonder the sacrifices are here called by that name, and by Malachi his meat or food (ch. iii. 11). Which phrase is used, as the author of Sepher Corei well observes, to keep up the notion that God dwelt gloriously, and kept house among them (par. ii. cap. 26).

Ver. 7. Not take a wife that is a whore.] All incestuous marriages were as much forbidden priests as any other men. But, besides, here are three sorts of persons whom it was unlawful for a common priest to marry, though there was no kindred between them.

God, they do offer: therefore they shall be holy.

7 They shall not take a wife that is a whore, or profane; neither shall they take a woman put away from her husband: for he is holy unto his God.

8 Thou shalt sanctify him therefore; for he is holy.

The fast is a whore; whereby the Hebrew doctors understand, not any one that was a common prostitute, but one that was not an Israelite, or an Israelitish woman, with whom a man had lain, whom it was unlawful for her to marry. Which comprehends not only all such as are forbidden in the eighteenth chapter of this book; but those also in Deut. xxiii. 2, 3 (see Selden, De Successionibus, lib. ii. cap. 2, et iii. cap. 29). Or profane.] A woman was accounted so (as he shows in the same place) who was either descended from such a person, as is before mentioned; or who was born of such a conjunction, as is here forbidden to a priest. And there are those who think it may be understood of one that had been consecrated to a priest's office and died, as she served her body, which she exposed to the worshippers of that deity; who, though she afterwards repented, and became good, yet a priest was not to marry her, no more than an ordinary whore. But the simplest meaning of these three seems to be, that they should not marry one that had prostituted her body, or that had been any way vitiated, though against her will; or was of suspected chastity; or (as it follows) was divorced from her husband.

Neither—a woman put away from her husband.] For commonly women were put away for some fault, as Abarbinel notes; and were presumed not to be such as a priest should desire. To the same purpose Procopius Gazeus. A priest, saith he, should not put away his wife, if she served the Lord, had steadfastly kept her chastity, and was undefiled. For he fadeth not away as the common people do: or rendering themselves incapable to minister unto the Lord; as they were when they were any way defiled.

For the offerings] They attend upon his altar, where the burnt-offerings, peace-offerings, and all the rest were offered.

And the bread of their God, they do offer.] The word and is not in the Hebrew, and the sense will be clearer if it be left out: "the offering of the Lord made by fire," being called the "bread of their God," i.e. his meat, or food. For the altar was his table; and what was burnt thereon was in the nature of his provision; which in the Scripture language is comprised in one word, bread, as in 1 Sam. xiv. 28. And therefore no wonder the sacrifices are here called by that name, and by Malachi his meat or food (ch. iii. 11). Which phrase is used, as the author of Sepher Corei well observes, to keep up the notion that God dwelt gloriously, and kept house among them (par. ii. cap. 26).

Ver. 7. Not take a wife that is a whore.] All incestuous marriages were as much forbidden priests as any other men. But, besides, here are three sorts of persons whom it was unlawful for a common priest to marry, though there was no kindred between them.
offereith the bread of thy God: he shall be holy unto thee: for I the Lord, which sanctify you, am holy.

9 ¶ And the daughter of any priest, if she profane herself by playing the whore, she profaneth her father: she shall be burnt with fire.

10 And he that is the high priest among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil was poured, and that is consecrated to put on the garments, shall not uncover his head, nor rend his clothes:

11 Neither shall he go in to any dead body, nor defile himself for his father, or for his mother;

12 Neither shall he go out of the sanctuary, nor profane the sanctuary of his God: for the crown of the anointing oil of his God is upon him: I am the Lord.

13 And he shall take a wife in her virginity.

For I the Lord, which sanctify you, am holy.] 1, who have taken you to be my peculiar people, excel in all perfections; and therefore require persons of extraordinary sanctity to minister unto me.

Ver. 9. The daughter of any priest, if she profane herself.] The Hebrew doctors understand this of one married, at least espoused. So Aben Ezra and R. Sol. Jarchi say expressly, "Our rabbins confess with one mouth, that one not espoused is not concerned in this law" (see Selden, lib. 1. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 6, and lib. iii. cap. 33, p. 488).

She shall be burnt.] Which was the sorest punishment among the Jews (see ch. xx. 14), and was not inflicted upon other persons, in this case (who were barely stoned, Deut. xxii. 14), but only upon the daughter of a priest, from whom greater virtue was expected. But if the witnesses of this fact were convicted of perjury by other credible witnesses, produced by the woman or her father, then both her husband and her, and these false witnesses, suffered the same punishment that she should have done (see Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Heb. cap. 1, p. 321).

Ver. 10. He that is the high priest.] Hitherto the laws given in this case concern the common priest: now follow those by which the high-priest was to govern himself, who was under peculiar laws more strict than the rest.

Upon whose head the anointing oil was poured, &c.] He having a peculiar consecration different from the rest, by pouring the holy oil upon his head, and clothing him with the most glorious robes (see ch. viii. 7, 8, &c.), was in all reason to distinguish himself, more than his brother, and therefore was subject to these laws.

And that is consecrated.] In the Hebrew the words are, whose head is filled; as it was with the fat and the right shoulder of the ram of consecration, &c., by which he was hallowed to minister in the priest's office (Exod. xxix. 22—24).

To put on the garments.] To be high-priest.

Shall not uncover his head.] Rather, shall not let his hair grow neglectted without trimming; as the manner was, in token of mourning. So Onkelos and Jonathan, and a great many more (Selden, lib. ii. De Sucessione in Pontificatum, cap. 5, p. 335), and what I have noted upon the tenth chapter of this book, ver. 6.

Nor rend his clothes.] Another token of mourning which he was to forbear; though the Talmudists will have it, that he might rend his garments at the bottom, about his feet, but not at the top, down to his breast; as P. Cunaeus observes out of Mass. Horajoth, lib. ii. de Rep. Hebr. cap. 5. Before his anointing and consecration, and putting on the holy garments, it was not unlawful for him to attend the funeral of his father; and therefore Eleazar was present when Aaron died (Numb. xx.), being as yet in a lower ministry, and not completely advanced to the office of the high-priest, but only declared Aaron's successor by putting on his garments (see ch. x. 6).

Ver. 11.] He might not go into the house, where the body of his father or mother lay dead, which was permitted to the inferior priests, ver. 2, &c., and, consequently, he was not to make any external signs of mourning for son or daughter, brother or sister.

Ver. 12. Neither shall he go out of the sanctuary.] If he was there when he heard of the death of his father or mother, he was not to stir out from thence till he had finished his ministry (see ch. x. 7). For he had a little house (after the temple was built) within the precincts of it, where he commonly remained all the day-time, which was called lishcath Cohen gadoth, "the parlour of the high-priest:" as Cunaeus observes out of Mass. Middoth, lib. ii. De Repub. Hebr. cap. 3. At night he went to his own dwelling-house, which was in Jerusalem, and nowhere else; there he might perform all the offices of a mourner, except those which are here forbidden; and the people came to comfort him (as Maimonides relates in his treatise on this subject), and, sitting upon the ground, while he sat in his chair, at the funeral feast, they said, "Let us be thy expiation" (i.e. let all the grief that is on thee fall upon us) unto which, he answered, "Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord," as their words are reported in Sanhedrin, cap. 2, n. 1.

Nor profane the sanctuary.] By preferring his affection to the dead, before the service of God in the sanctuary: or, by returning thither to his ministry, when he had been defiled by the dead; which had been a great profanation: for he that touched a dead body was unclean seven days (Numb. xix. 11, 12).

For the crown of the anointing oil—is upon him.] Some supply the word and between crown and anointing oil; and so make two reasons why he should distinguish himself from all other men: first, because the holy crown, as it is called (Exod. xxix. 9), which had the title of the high-priest in it (Exod. xxviii. 36), was set upon his head; and his head also was anointed with the holy oil (Exod. xxi. 23, 30), whereby he was, in a special manner, consecrated to the service of the Most High. But there is no need of this; for the anointing oil itself was that which sanctified him to his office, and was poured on him after the holy crown was set on his head (Lev. xii. 9, 12); and so these words may be translated, "the consecration (for so the Hebrew word nezer signifies) of the anointing oil of his God is upon him." That is, he must remember he is solemnly devoted unto my ministry by that anointing; and therefore must not leave it to attend any other.

I am the Lord.] Whose servant he is by a peculiar obligation.

Ver. 13. He shall take a wife.] From the word with, in the singular number, the Talmudists generally conclude that polygamy was not allowed to the high-priest, who was to have but one wife at a time, though other men were permitted to have more (see Selden, lib. iii. De Sucessione in Pontif., cap. 2, p. 297, and Uxor. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 8). If he did take another, he was to give a bill of divorce to one of them before the great day of expiation; or else he was incapecably 14 A widow, or a divorced woman, or profane, or an harlot, these shall he not take: but he shall take a virgin of his own people to wife.
15 Neither shall he profane his seed among his people: for I the Lord do sanctify him.

to perform the offices of it; as P. Cunaeus observes in the plectra forenamed out of Ionia. But if his wife died, it was not unlawful for him to marry again, as Tertullian fancied from this very place (lib. de Monogam. cap. 7, and Exhort. ad Cast. cap. 7).

In her virginity.] And not so much as espoused to any other person. Nor was any sort of virgin thought fit for his wife; but only one that was newly come out of her minority, and had not yet attained to her full puberty; as Maimonides explains the sense of their ancient doctors. See Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. 7; where he observes also, that this is to be understood of the high-priest after he was in his office; for if he had married a widow before he was high-priest, he was to keep her, and not put her away when he was advanced to his dignity. But this allots the high-priest. This law obliged all the common priests, who were to marry none but virgins; as they are persuaded from Ezek. xlv. 22. And no less a man than Hugo Grotius seems to be of this opinion, both here and in his book, De Jure Belli et Paeis (lib. ii. cap. 5, n. 9), in his Annotata to that section. But the Hebrew doctors are all of a contrary mind, and say, Josephus and Philo: as Mr. Selden observes, in his Addenda to the seventh chapter of his first book Uxor. Hebr.; and lib. ii. De Success. in Pontif. cap. 2, p. 208. And so Cunaeus also in the place forenamed, speaking of this very law, "Non enim Sacerdotibus positas eadem lex fuit; quippe viduum illi rite duxerunt." Keil. But argues, a later mode of interpretation, that Joh. Wagensberg hath more truly confuted this opinion. which he hath shown Grotius was singular; for, besides that Ezekiel there supposest thou might marry the widow of a priest, it is evident both from Jewish and Christian interpreters, that the state of things under the law is not to be measured by what the prophet Ezekiel saith concerning the future temple and priests family by such mixtures as have been mentioned; but I rather think it to be a new precept (as the Vulgar Latin takes it), that as he might marry none but of his own people, i.e. an Israelite; so among his people he should not match with a vulgar person, but with one nobly born; for that was the way to preserve the dignity of the priestly state; whereas those all these was his aim.

I the Lord do sanctify him.] I have separated him to myself, for a special and most holy service; for which reason he was to distinguish himself from other men, even in his marriage, to make them the more reverence the Lord whom he served. Upon this account it was that many constitutions were made by the elders, forbidding him to marry any other people; whereas they intended to advance his honour. For instance, he was forbidden to go into the public baths, or to feasts. If he would visit any that mourned, he was to be attended by other priests. He was obliged to cut his hair every week, but never to shave with a razor; to be in the sanctuary every day, and to go home not above twice in a day; to have but one wife at a time; and going into the temple to have three other priests with him, &c. So Maimonides in Celi Mikkdash, cap. 8.

Ver. 16.] Upon this occasion God gave some other precepts concerning the priests who were to wait upon him in his house and at his table.

Ver. 17. Here beginning forthwith of marriages such as would have been a dishonour to the priesthood, had they been permitted, he now forbids any to serve at his altar, who had the least blemish in his body; for that would have disparaged his divine service. Whosoever he be of thy seed] Whether high-priest or the common priests.

In their generations] In future ages as well as the present.

That hath any blemish,] From these general words the Hebrew doctors conclude, that not only the particular blemishes afterwards mentioned made them incapable to minister, but all other whatsoever which appeared in the body; of which these here named are but a specimen or example. So Maimonides, in Biath Hamikdash, whose words are, "the blemishes expressed in the law are propounded for examples of the rest," which they reckon to be in all one hundred and forty-two, accounting only those which openly appeared, and not those which were inward, in the kidneys, bladder, or bowels; because there are no examples of such in the particulars which here follow. They are divided by the doctors into three classes: such as made beasts unfit to be offered (ch. 514 LEVITICUS.
For whatsoever man he be that hath a blemish, he shall not approach: a blind man, or a lame, or he that hath a flat nose, or any thing superfluous.

Or a man that is brokenfooted, or broken-handed,

20 Or crookback, or a dwarf, or that hath a blemish in his eye, or be scurvy, or scabbed, or hath his stones broken;

No man that hath a blemish of the seed of Aaron the priest shall come nigh to offer the offerings of the Lord made by fire: he hath a inequality of those members that are pairs: as when one of a man's eyes, or ears, or legs, was bigger than the other.

Ver. 10. Brokenfooted.] Though a man did not halt, yet, if his foot was so broken that it looked deformed, he was incapable to minister to the Divine Majesty; because it rendered him contemptible in the eyes of the people; at least not so graceful as the servants of the Most High were to be.

Brokenhanded.] Any fracture in the hand made a man more remarkably unfit than the foregoing blemish; because by this part all the Divine offices were to be performed.

Ver. 20. [Crookback.] The Hebrew word gibben properly signifies bent-backed; whether the bunch came from the luxurion of the back-bone, or from a swelling in the flesh.

A dwarf.] Who, besides that he looked despicably, was not able to reach up to the altar. The marginal translation may be justified from the Hebrew; for dok in that language signifies lean, or slender: but then the meaning must be, one whose flesh was wasted by a consumption. The Vulgar took it for one bleary-eyed; and the LXX. also thought it signified some disease in the eyes, if the Complutensian edition be right, where this word is translated ἵππος τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς. But other editions leave out the two last words; and it is uncertain what ἵππος signifies; but it might be, likely some ill-favoured spots or pustules in the face.

Blemish in his eye.] The Hebrew words tabaddul beeno signify one that hath a confused spot in the eye; which is called by the Chaldee paraphrasts, and by the Talmudists, chiliez and chaluzim, which is the very same with the Greek word σκαμνη, importing a concretion of a white humour (like to a hailstone), σκαμνη to σκαμνη, as Ephnean speaks, and Galen also (see Bochart, in his Hierozoineon, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 9). But this spot did not make a priest incapable to minister (as Selden observes, in the place above mentioned), unless it was a little prominent, which made the blemish more apparent.

A scurvy, or scabbed.] If of these words signifies a dry scurf or scab, the other a purulent.

His stones broken.] Is burnt, or hath a rupture, as some expound it. The LXX. translate it μωρόπως; which Procopius Gazeus understands an hernaphro-

A dwarf.] This general repetition is a farther confirmation, that all apparent blemishes of the same kind with these here particularly mentioned, made a man incapable to officiate at the altar. And, in the first place, the Hebrew doctors reckon five in the ears, besides the want of them: an example of which Josephus gives in the story of Hyrcanus the high-priest, whose ears Antigonus cut off, that, if he should return again, he might not resume his office (lib. i. De Bello Jud. cap. 11).

He hath a blemish.] This general repetition is a farther confirmation, that all apparent blemishes of the same kind with these here particularly named, excluded them from ministering at the altar. And there being some of them that were permanent, or perpetual (as the example of Barzilai, and others that were transient, which remained but for a time; no man that had a blemish; he shall not come nigh to offer the bread of his God.
22 He shall eat the bread of his God, both of the most holy, and of the holy.
23 Only he shall not go in unto the vail, nor blemish, though only of the latter sort, was to ministrer at the altar till it was gone.

He shall not come nigh] 1. e. The offerings made by fire before mentioned, which are here plainly represented as the meat that was served up to his table (see ver. 6). If any of them did presume to offer at the altar, there were different effects of their contumacy, according to the different sorts of their blemishes, which the Hebrew doctors divide into three classes, as I observed ver. 17. If any man having a blemish of the first sort ministered, it profaned the very sacrifice which he offered, and he was to be scourged.
The second sort did not vitiate the sacrifice, but the priest was to undergo the forenamed punishment.

The third sort was so incon siderable, that neither of these effects followed, upon his ministering who was blemished by them; as Mr. Selden observes (lib. ii.
De Success. in Pontif. cap. v. p. 234).

Ver. 22. He shall eat the bread] But, though such a priest might not offer any sacrifice, yet he might eat with his brethren of that part of the sacrificers which was given to them for their portion, which no man in his uncleanliness might do. Therefore these natural infirmities were not legal impurities, but only incapacities (as we speak) which disabled them from the performance of service.

Here again the sacrificers are represented as the provision made for the Divine Majesty (see ver. 6, 21).

Both of the most holy.] Such were the meat-offerings (ch. ii. 3, vi. 17), the sin-offerings (ch. vi.
25, 26), and the trespass-offerings (ch. vii. 1), see ch. xiv. 13. The shew-bread also was a most holy thing; and all such were to be eaten only by the male of the priest's family, in the holy place (Numb. xviii. 9—11, &c.).

Of the holy.] Such were the wave-breast and the heave-shoulder of the peace-offerings (ch. vii. 33, and

x. 14), and the first-fruits, and the tithes. But, though the peace-offerings of particular persons were among the less holy things, yet the peace-offerings of the whole congregation were most holy (see ch. xxviii. 20).
Ver. 23. Only he shall not go in unto the vail.] He was not to enter into the sanctuary to burn incense, or to trim the lamps, &c.

Nor come nigh unto the altar.] No, nor go to the altar of burnt-offering, which was in the court of the Lord's house; but he was to sit in the wood-room, where he was employed in picking out all the wood which had any worms in it, that it might be laid aside, and not carried to the altar, as Maimonides and others relate. He had also another employment (see ch. xiii. 9). If any man were so presumptuous, or so forgettable, as to minister notwithstanding the manifest blemish which was upon him, he fell under censure, and was punished according to the degree of his offence (as I observed before (ver. 21), out of Mr. Selden, who hath, in the place there mentioned, handled this more accurately than I thought it needful for me to do.

That he profane not my sanctuaries:] That he might not make others think meanly of the service of God; and consequently of God himself; who would have men, in their greatest perfection, minister unto him, to preserve in people's minds a sense of his most excellent being, unto whom they ministered. For which reason all the foregoing prohibitions were given against marrying such persons as had been viti rated, &c., and against mourning for the dead, that they might not "profane the name of their God" (v. 6), by doing as vulgar people did, or making themselves incapable to minister unto God, as they were when they were defiled. And thus Maimonides discourses upon this subject (More Nevoch. par. iii.
cap. 45). "God commanded his ministers should wear precious apparel, and that none should be admitted to the ministry who had any defect in his body; nay, who were deformed and ill-favoured reserved; because the vulgar do not judge according to men's true worth or beauty (which lie in the soul), but according to their outward appearance, in the comeliness of their bodies, and the richness of their garments; and therefore the end of all these things, was that God's house might be had in due honour and reverence."

My sanctuaries.] This word, in the plural number, relates to the two parts of the sanctuary; the court where the altar of burnt-offering stood (which was a holy place) and that which was properly called the sanctuary, wherein the altar of incense was; into neither of which a priest that had any blemish might enter; as was said before.

I the Lord do sanctify them.] I have set apart both those places for my service; and therefore, no man with a blemish shall be admitted into them, to perform any holy office there; yet they might come into the court, to eat with their brethren of holy things, but not in their priestly garments, which it was not lawful for them to use.

Ver. 24. Moses told it] They were all acquainted with these laws, because they were all concerned the service of God should be administered acceptably unto him.

CHAPTER XXII.

1 The priests in their uncleanness must abstain from the holy things. 6 How they shall be cleansed. 10 Who of the priest's house may eat of the holy things. 17 The sacrifices must be without blemish. 26 The age of the sacrifice. 29 The law of eating the sacrifice of thanksgiving.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
2 Speak unto Aaron and to his sons, that they separate themselves from the holy things of the children of Israel, and that they profane not my have a blemish, might eat of the holy things, yet he would have them know, that neither they, nor such as were unblemished, should presume to do it in their uncleanliness.

holy name in those things which they hallow unto me: I am the Lord.

3 Say unto them, Whosoever he be of all your seed among your generations, that goeth unto the holy things, which the children of Israel hallow unto the Lord, having his uncleanness upon him, that soul shall be cut off from my presence: I am the Lord.

4 What man soever of the seed of Aaron is a leper, or hath a running issue; he shall not eat of the holy things, until he be clean. And whoso toucheth any thing that is unclean by the dead, or a man whose seed goeth from him;

5 Or whosoever toucheth any creeping thing, whereby he may be made unclean, or a man of whom he may take uncleanness, whatsoever uncleanness he hath;

6 The soul which hath touched any such shall be unclean until even, and shall not eat of the holy things, unless he wash his flesh with water.

7 And when the sun is down, he shall be clean, and shall afterward eat of the holy things; because it is his food.

8 That which dieth of itself, or is torn with beasts, he shall not eat to defile himself therewith: I am the Lord.

9 They shall therefore keep mine ordinance, lest they bear sin for it, and die therefore, if they profane it: I the Lord do sanctify them.

10 There shall no stranger eat of the holy thing: a sojourner of the priest, or an hired servant, shall not eat of the holy thing.

May take uncleanness] See ch. xv. 7. Whatever uncleanness he hath] Suppose the lespy (ch. xiii. 45). These are two such fountains of uncleanness, mentioned.

Ver. 6. Shall be unclean, &c.] So the law was in the forenamed cases; as appears by the places above mentioned.

Ver. 7. When the sun is down, he shall be clean.] Having washed his flesh with water.

Shall afterward eat of the holy things.] God was so gracious, as not to keep a priest any longer in a state wherein he should want his necessary or comfortable sustenance.

Ver. 8. That which dieth of itself, &c.] This was forbidden before to all the Israelites (ch. xxii. 15), but made a priest no longer unclean than an ordinary man, because of the foregoing reason.

I am the Lord.] Who will have my ministers pure from all such pollutions. The remainder of which were, the uncleanness of the water of separation, as Maimonides speaks, ch. xix. 21, and of the great sacrifice of expiation, ch. xvi. 28, and of a menstruous woman, ch. xix. 9, and of a woman in childbed, ch. xii. 2. But nothing made men so unclean as the dead body, which is not only that head that touched it for seven days, but all that came into the house, and every thing that was in the house, where he died (Numb. xix. 11, 14), which was the reason of the foregoing law, that the high-priest should not go in to the dead body of his father or mother; nor any inferior priest be defiled for any, but their near relations (ch. xxxi. 1, 2, 11).

Ver. 9. Keep mine ordinances.] Observe this constitution, because I, who am their Lord, make it.

Lest they bear sin.] Be punished if they break it. Die therefore.] As Nadab and Abihu did; who presumed to break another law about holy things.

If they profane it!] By eating of the holy things in their uncleanness. The Lord doth justify them.] Separate them to my service; and by such constitutions teach them carefully to avoid all pollutions.

Ver. 10. There shall no stranger eat of the holy thing.] The holy thing here mentioned is that before named (ch. x. 13); and by a stranger he doth not mean one of another nation, but one that is not of the seed of Aaron, nor is not one of his family; for the word in the Hebrew is not nechir, which properly signifies a stranger as is not an Israelite, but zor, which signifies any one to whom a thing doth not belong; as holy things did not to those who were not at least part of the priest's family, though not of his race. For, that such might eat of them who were 2 X 11 But if the priest buy any soul with his money, he shall eat of it, and he that is born in his house: they shall eat of his meat.

12 If the priest's daughter also be married unto a stranger, she may not eat of an offering of the holy things.

13 But if the priest's daughter be a widow, or divorced, and have no child, and is returned unto her father's house, as in her youth, she shall eat of her father's meat: but there shall no stranger eat thereof.

14 ¶ And if a man eat of the holy thing unwittingly, then he shall put the fifth part thereof unto it, and shall give it unto the priest with the holy thing.

not of their race, provided they belonged to them as a part of their family, appears from the next verse.

Sojourner of the priest.] Who boards with him (as we now speak), or dwells in a part of his house (as some understand it), but hath a distinct family.

Hired servant.] Such were those who served by the hire of their service. Ch. xxi. 20, and after that they might dispose of themselves as they pleased.

Shall not eat] None of these might eat of the priest's portion (ch. x. 14; Numb. xviii. 11), because they were not members of his family.

Ver. 11. But if the priest buy any soul (i. e. person) with his money.] There were those of their own nation, who, by poverty, were compelled to sell themselves, or their children (ch. xxv. 20), and others they bought of other nations (ver. 44, 45, &c.), who, becoming proselytes to the Jews' religion, were permitted to eat of the priest's meat, because they became part of his family.

He that is born in his house.] They that were born of such purchased servants were their master's goods, and such a part of their family, that they left them to their children who succeeded them; and therefore, they also were allowed to eat of the meat of the priest.

Ver. 13. Married unto a stranger.] Unto one that is not of the family of the priests. She may not eat of an offering.] She lost her right to eat of any offering, when she did partake of while she remained a part of her father's family; for that entitled persons to this privilege; insomuch, that a priest taking a wife out of another family, she might eat of them, because she was one with him, and therefore had more right than a servant. But for the same reason, a priest's daughter, married to a stranger, might not eat of them, because she was gone out of his into another family.

Ver. 13. Be a widow, or divorced, and have no child.] If she had any children, they and she made another family; and they being begotten by a father who was not a priest, had no right to eat of the priest's meat. But if she was left without children, then she was accounted still one of her father's family, provided she returned (as it follows) to live with him.

And is returned unto her father's house.] To be a part of his family, as she was before she married (ch. x. 14).

She shall eat of her father's meat.] Have the same privilege she had when she was a virgin.

Newczas.] This seems, as I said, particularly to relate unto her children, if she had any; who, being begotten by one of another family, were looked upon as strangers (see ver. 10).

Ver. 11. If a man] Who hath no right to them.

15 And they shall not profane the holy things of the children of Israel, which they offer unto the Lord.

16 Or suffer them to bear the iniquity of trespass, when they eat their holy things: for I the Lord do sanctify them.

17 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

18 Speak unto Aaron, and to his sons, and unto all the children of Israel, and say unto them, Whosoever he be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers in Israel, that will offer his oblation for all his vows, and for all his free-will offerings, which they will offer unto the Lord for a burnt offering;

Eat—unwittingly.] Not knowing it to be a holy thing.

He shall put the fifth part thereof unto it.] Besides his sacrifice which he was bound to offer for his trespass (see ver. 15).

Give it unto the priest with the holy thing.] He could not give the priest the holy thing which he had eaten; but the meaning is, that he should make satisfaction for the wrong he had done to him, by paying him the true worth of the thing, and the fifth part more of its value (see ver. 16).

Ver. 15.] This seems to refer to the persons before named, none of which should presume to profane sacred things, by eating them when they did not belong to them. The priests seem also to be concerned in it, who were not to suffer them to eat such holy things; as it follows in the next verse. Or, if it entirely relate to the priests, the meaning is, they should not profane holy things, by eating them in their uncleanness (ver. 9). And one reason was, because the children of Israel, whose offerings these were, might be discouraged from bringing them to the Lord, when they saw them so profaned.

Ver. 16. Or suffer them] i. e. The people.

To bear the iniquity of trespass, &c.] To fall under the punishment which God will inflict for their trespass, in eating things which do not appertain to them. The marginal translation refers this also wholly to the priests, in this manner, "Or lade themselves with the iniquity of eating things that are profaned, and have committed such things, viz. in their uncleanness, and with such persons (it may be added) as ought not to eat of them. I the Lord do sanctify them."

These words seem to justify this last inter pretation (see ver. 9).

Ver. 17.] The following laws, no doubt, were delivered at the same time with the former: because they still concern the same matter.

Ver. 18. Speak—unto all the children of Israel.] For they were all concerned in the perfection of the sacrifices, as they were in the perfection of the priests that offered them (see ch. xxi. 24).

Whatsoever he be] The Hebrew doctrors say, that the phrase ish, ish (man, man, i. e. any man), is here used as it was ch. xviii. 6, to show that gentiles are comprehended under this law as well as Jews; as Mr. Selden observes out of the Gemara Babylon, Tit. Cholin (see lib. iii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4. p. 289).

Strangers in Israel.] They understand by strangers in Israel, such as they called "proselytes of the gate;" i. e. such as were recognised, and had renounced idolatry, and joined themselves to the God of Israel. R. Levi ben Gersam takes perfect proselytes to be here meant (whom they called "proselytes of righteousness"), yet not excluding the other.
19 Ye shall offer at your own will a male without blemish, of the beees, of the sheep, or of the goats.

20 But whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer: for it shall not be acceptable for you.

21 And whosoever offereth a sacrifice of peace offerings unto the Lord to accomplish his vow, or a freewill offering in beees or sheep, it shall be perfect to be accepted; there shall be no blemish therein.

22 Blind, or broken, or maimed, or having a wen, or scurvy, or scabbed, ye shall not offer these unto the Lord, nor make an offering by fire of them upon the altar unto the Lord.

Which he calls elsewhere eximii, singled out as most excellent (lib. iv. Georg. ver. 550).

"Quatuor eximios prestanti corporea tauros."

And, that they might be such, there was probatio victimarum, proof made of sacrifices, as Pliny speaks, following cap. viii. of this chapter. And Dr. Lightfoot gives a large account of it in his Temple Service, ch. 8, sect. 4.

Ver. 19. Ye shall offer at your own will] So these words are commonly understood; that the sacrifices both of the Jew and gentile, should be spontaneous, as well as without blemish; though they will bear another sense, as I observed, ch. i. 10.

A to male.] See ch. i. ver. 3, 10. All burnt-offerings were to be males; though peace-offerings might be females (ch. iii. 1, 6), and so might sin-offerings also (ch. iv. 32), but all without blemish. For, as God accepted only some kind of creatures (viz. beees, sheep, and goats, and no other of the herd), so he would have a choice to be made out of them, of the very best; as had been often before directed.

Ver. 20. Whosoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer.] This general rule is here repeated, because he is going to specify what creatures they should account blemished.

It shall not be acceptable] This seems to justify the exposition which I said might be given of that phrase in the foregoing verse, of your own will, or for your acceptance (see upon ch. i. 3).

Ver. 21. Whosoever offereth a sacrifice of peace offerings] Which were either to obtain blessings, or to give thanks for them when they were obtained.

To accomplish his vow.] It was usual to make such vows, for procuring from God what they desired, when they undertook a journey, or went to sea, or were sick, or in any danger, &c., an example of which we have in Jonah i. 16, where we read, the mariners in a storm offered a sacrifice to the Lord, and made vows; i. e. they vowed a sacrifice to God (for they could not sacrifice on ship-board), when he had brought them to a safe port. And so Cicero speaks of certain mariners, who being tossed in a tempest, vowed, if they gained their haven, Ei Dee, qui ibi esset, se vitulum immolaturas; "they would offer a calf to the god of that place." And Homer, in like manner, brings in the mother of Tlemachus, vowing perfect hecatombs unto all the gods, if she might obtain her desires (Odys. xvii. ver. 59).

Freewill offering.] This also was a peace-offering for obtaining blessings; not when they were in distress, I suppose, but in general to procure God's favour to them and theirs.

In beees, or sheep.] And likewise goats; for all these were allowed in peace-offerings (ch. iii. 1, 6, 12).

It shall be perfect to be accepted:] That was accounted perfect which wanted none of its parts, nor had any defect in any of them. The heathen themselves did not think any other would be accepted, and therefore made a careful choice of their sacrifices: as appears by those words of Virgil, lib. iv. Aeneid. ver. 57.

"Ec Mactani lectas de more bidentes."
23 Either a bullock or a lamb that hath any thing superfluous or lacking in his parts, that mayest thou offer for a freewill offering; but for a vow it shall not be accepted.

24 Ye shall not offer unto the Lord that which is bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut; neither shall ye make any offering thereof in your land.

25 Neither from a stranger's hand shall ye offer the bread of your God of any of these; because their corruption is in them, and blemishes be in them: they shall not be accepted for you.

26 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

27 When a bullock, or a sheep, or a goat, is brought forth, then it shall be seven days under his altar (see Grotius, lib. i. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 1, sect. 16, n. 3).

Ver. 25. Any thing superfluous] This word we had before (which we translate superfluous), ch. xxi. 18, but it properly signifies the inequality and disproportion that there is between these parts that are pairs, as the eyes or legs: and particularly when one of them exceeds its just bigness, e. g. when one leg is longer than it should be.

Lacking in his parts.] This word signifies just quite the contrary to the other; when one part is less, and more contracted than it should be; one leg supposed shorter than ordinary. So all the Hebrews understand their words, particularly Onkeles and Jonathan.

Ver. 26. The Lord spake unto Moses. A very learned person of our own takes these words for an exception to the foregoing general rule; that such defects as these two should not hinder the acceptance of a beast for a freewill offering, though not for a vow; and it must be acknowledged, that is the most plain and simple sense. But the Jews, as he observes, parted the foreleg from the carcase, supposed the otherwise, and will not have this offering to signify the sacrifice of such things at the altar, but the giving them to the priest for some sacred use; to be sold, for instance, for the reparation of the temple, for which they were accepted (see Dr. Ottram, lib. i. De Sacrificiis, cap. 9, n. 27).

Ver. 27. For a vow it shall not be accepted.] Freewill offerings were much different from vows, there being no obligation upon them to offer the former, as there was to offer the latter; and a less perfect creature would be accepted in the one case, though not in the other.

Ver. 28. Bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut.] That is, as the Hebrews interpret it (and so do the LXX. and the Vulgar), any beast whose testicles were compressed or bruised, &c. for these four, they used to castrate a lamb (for instance) and make it wether; and so they did with kids and calves, as Bochart observes out of Aristotle and others, in his Hierozoicen, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 46.

Neither shall ye make any offering thereof in your land.] The word offering is not in the Hebrew, and this passage may be thus exactly translated, "neither in your land shall ye make, or do." So the LXX.: the sense of which the vulgar expresses by adding the word this, i.e. the forementioned castration, either by compression or contusion, or any way; for Josephus saith, it was unlawful among them to geld any creature; which was prohibited to keep them from doing so; and the beasts were absolutely male. And these words suggested as much, being thus translated, "Neither in your land shall it be done" (see Selden, lib. vii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 3, p. 799).

Ver. 29. Neither from a stranger's hand.] By bennecher, "the son of a stranger" (as it is in the Hebrew), who is called (ch. xxv. 47) "a stranger and sojourner" (viz. a gentile that dwelt among them), is meant a pious man of another nation, who had renounced idolatry, and abstained from blood, and observed the rest of the precepts of the sons of Noah (as they called them), but was not circumcised, which would have obliged him to the whole law of Moses. Such persons, being worshippers of the true God, were permitted to bring him sacrifices to be offered at CHAPTER XXIII.

1 The feasts of the Lord. 3 The sabbath. 4 The passover. 9 The sheaf of first fruits. 15 The feast of Pentecost. 22 Gleanings to be left for the poor.

33 The feast of tabernacles.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, Concerning the feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my feasts.

Ver. 30. The same day, &c.] Because he had said before (ver. 30), and now repeats it again in the conclusion of this verse, I am the Lord: to whom they owed obedience; especially when he required they should reverently use all holy things.

Ver. 32. Neither shall ye profane my holy name:] This may refer either to what goes before (that they should not make him and his service contemptible, by offering such things as were defective, &c.), or be taken as a precept by itself. And then the name of God was profaned three ways (as Mr. Selden observes), besides the most grievous of all, by blasphemy. Either when a man, for fear of death, violated the Divine law; or when he contemptuously and wantonly broke any precept; or when a man of great note, for knowledge and piety, gave a scandal to others by doing such things, as were not perhaps directly against the law, yet made him lose all his authority (see lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Disi. Hebr. cap. 10).

But I will be hallowed] Either by the observation of his laws, or by punishing those who transgressed them: for so this phrase is used, ch. x. 3.

I am the Lord which hallow you.] Have separated you to myself, as a special people from all others, by laws different from theirs, and more excellent.

Ver. 33. That brought you out of the land of Egypt.] And moreover distinguished you from all others, by singular benefits; particularly by delivering you from the most grievous slavery, that I might make you a happy people.

I am the Lord.] When you remember my benefits, remember I am your sovereign, who expect your obedience.

Then it shall be seven days under the dam, &c.] They were not fit for food when they were not seven days old, and therefore not for sacrifice; which was the bread or food of God, as it is called, ver. 25, but this hath been sufficiently explained before, Exod. xxii. 30. I shall only add, that I have since observed that P. Cursus hath briefly expressed the sense of Maimonides, which I there represented (lib. iii. De Republ. Hebr. exc. 5), and that the gentiles were so far from offering creatures so young, that they thought them fittest for sacrifice when they were two years old; as appears from the words of Virgil before mentioned.

"Mactant lectas de more bidentes." Where Servius saith that bidentes were so called, because they were bieenes, two years of age; for it was not lawful to sacrifice those that were younger, nor those that were older.

Ver. 28. Whether it be cow or ewe, &c.] Lest the young one, saith Maimonides, should happen to be killed before the dam; which would have given the greater grief to her (More Nevech. par. iii. cap. 48). Any thing that looked like cruelty, therefore, was by this law banished from among them; for they might not so much as kill both the young and the dam on the same day, to offer them to God himself; of which he is here speaking.

Ver. 29.] He had mentioned freewill-offerings and vows before (ver. 21), and now briefly touches upon the third sort of peace-offerings (see ch. vii. 15, 16). Offer it at your own will.] Male or female; of the herd, or of the flock (ch. iii. 1, 7, 12). Or the meaning may be (as hath been often said), he shall offer it in such a manner as that it be accepted (see ch. i. 2).
3 Six days shall work be done: but the seventh day is the sabbath of rest, an holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein: it is the sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings.

4 ¶ These are the feasts of the Lord, even holy convocations, which ye shall proclaim in their seasons.

5 In the fourteenth day of the first month at even is the Lord's passover.

6 And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread unto the Lord: seven days ye must eat unleavened bread.

7 In the first day ye shall have an holy convocation: ye shall do no servile work therein.

easily translates these words in this manner: "The assemblies of the Lord (for the word concerning is not in the Hebrew) which ye shall proclaim for holy convocations, these are my assemblies" (see Religious Assemblies, ch. ii.). All that can be said for our translation is, that the day of atonement being a day of rest from all labour, it may go under the name of a feast, in opposition to working days.

Ye shall proclaim [Ver. 3. Six days shall work be done.] They were allowed all these for any sort of business, wherein they pleased to employ themselves.

Seventh day is the sabbath] See Exod. xx. 9, 10, xxxi. 15. This was the greatest of all solemnities appointed for assemblies, returning once every week; and therefore is set in the head of all the rest; from which it seems to be distinguished (ver. 37, 38). And accordingly in the next verse, having here mentioned this as a day by itself, he begins to reckon the feasts or assemblies of the Lord. And the reason why this day was made a Sabbath of rest, was, because God himself then rested from his works. In memory of which they were to keep this day free from all labour, that they might keep the feast of the world's redemption in their minds: or, as Maimonides phrases it (More Noevoch, par. ii. cap. 113), "a belief that nothing is coeaneous with God." Whence that saying of theirs (mentioned by Aben Ezra), "whosoever doth any work upon the Sabbath-day, denieth the work of the creation."

Ver. 5. In the fourteenth day] See Exod. xii. 18. [It even] See Exod. xii. 6.

Is the Lord's passover.] See Exod. xii. 27.

Ver. 6. The fifteenth day— is the feast of unleavened bread, &c. That is, then the seven days of eating unleavened bread were to begin (Exod. xii. 15).

Seven days ye must eat] See Exod. xii. 19, 20.

Ver. 7. In the first day] Exod. xii. 16.

Ye shall do no servile work therein.] Such days as these were not observed so scrupulously as the seventh day of every week, on which (as I observed before) they might not boil nor bake, i.e. prepare their meat; which on this day was allowed, as appears from the place last named in this verse. Nor might they stir out of their place, i.e. take a journey on the Sabbath (Exod. xvi. 29), but on this day they might: as appears from Deut. xvi. 7, where, having sacrificed the passover and eaten it on the fourteenth day at even, they have leave given them to go home the next morning, which was the first day of unleavened bread. For on this very day, betimes in the morning, they came out of Egypt, and travelled from Rameses to Succoth. By servile work, therefore, we are to understand their ordinary labours on other days, from which both they and their servants were to abstain on this day: which it was the custom of all...
8 But ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord seven days: in the seventh day is an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work therein.

9 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

10 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say nations to forbear, upon such great solemnities, as Strabo informs us (lib. x.), where he saith, κοινον τοιτο και τω Πολεμω και Βασιλεωι ειτε, το τας οροποιαι μετ των ανθρωπων περιηγας, "this is common both to Greeks and barbarians, to keep their holy days, with a festival remission of their labours."

Ver. 8. Ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord seven days. These were not merely idle times, but days for divine service; about which there is a particular direction given afterward (Numb. xxviii.), from the nineteenth to the twenty-fifth verse), where the sacrifices for every one of the seven days are prescribed. And though there is no mention of any particular work of the moral service of God upon these days, it was more than the spirit of that sanctification of the Sabbath day), yet the Jews did not so blind, but that they were able to perceive the spiritual service of God, by prayers, and praises, and hearing the law, and meditating upon God's works, was required on these days, especially on the Sabbath: which appears from Josephus and Philo, and divers others of their later times.

Seventh day is an holy convocation.] Exod. xii. 16. Ye shall do no servile work therein.] It was to be observed as the first day of the seven, that the feast might conclude as it began.

Ver. 9.] Though the following could not be yet practised; yet he would have them take a particular notice of it, as no less solemnly enjoined than the Sabbath itself.

Ver. 10. Speak unto the children of Israel.] They being all concerned in this precept.

When ye be come into the land:] In the wilderness they sowed no corn, and therefore could not be obliged by this precept till they came to Canaan: nay, till they had driven out the old inhabitants, and God had given them rest in the land of promise, the like crosses himself seems to expose it, Deut. xii. 10, 11.

And shall reap:] Begin to reap it, as it is explained, Deut. xvi. 9.

Then ye shall bring a sheaf.] Or a handful, as it is translated in the margin of our Bibles. And there was the very same custom among the heathen, to bring δριμος, "a handful of the new corn," to be offered to their gods; as Diodorus Siculus saith the practice was among the Egyptians.

Of the firstfruits:] There were several things comprehended under the name of firstfruits, which are commanded to be offered unto God (Exod. xxviii. 19). The Greeks have accurately distinguished them by previous names. Πρώτον γάρ απὸ τῶν πρώτων τῶν ανθρώπων, the first-fruits of men or of cattle, mentioned Exod. xii. Then πρωτοψαλται were the first corn that was ripe, or the first-fruits of trees, which they brought from the field, or from their plantations, before they ate any themselves. And then ἀνάκερα (which the Hebrews call teranomth, or tramath) were the first-fruits of their wine and oil (Numb. xviii. 12), and the first loaves or cakes made of their wheat, mentioned below, ver. 17 (see there).

Of your harvest:] Of barley-harvest, which began at the Passover, when they offered the firstfruits here mentioned; as wheat-harvest began at Pentecost, when they offered the firstfruits, mentioned ver. 17, as at the feast of tabernacles those of the vine, and unto them. When ye be come into the land which I give unto you, and shall reap the harvest thereof, then ye shall bring a sheaf of the firstfruits of your harvest unto the priest:

11 And ye shall wave the sheaf before the Lord, to be accepted for you: on the morrow after the sabbath the priest shall wave it.
LEVITICUS.

12 And ye shall offer that day when ye wave the sheaf an he lamb without blemish of the first year for a burnt offering unto the Lorp.

13 And the meat offering thereof shall be two tenth deals of fine flour mingled with oil, an offering made by fire unto the Lorp for a sweet savour: and the drink offering thereof shall be of wine, the fourth part of an hin.

14 And ye shall eat neither bread, nor parched corn, nor green ears, until the same day that ye have brought an offering unto your God: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations in all your dwellings.

15 ¶ And ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the sabbath, from the day that ye brought the sheaf of the wave offering; seven sabbaths shall be complete:

16 Even unto the morrow after the seventh sabbath shall ye number fifty days; and ye shall offer a new meat offering unto the Lorp.
17 Ye shall bring out of your habitations two wave loaves of ten拝 deals: they shall be of fine flour; they shall be baken with leaven; they are the firstfruits unto the Lord.

18 And ye shall offer with the bread seven lambs without blemish of the first year, and one young bullock, and two rams: they shall be for a burnt offering unto the Lord, with their meat offering, and their drink offerings, even an offering made by fire, of sweet savour unto the Lord.

19 Then ye shall sacrifice one kid of the goats for a sin offering, and two lambs of the first year for a sacrifice of peace offerings.

20 And the priest shall wave them with the bread of the first fruits for a wave offering before the Lord, with the two lambs: they shall be holy to the Lord for the priest.

21 And ye shall proclaim on the same day, that it may be an holy convocation unto you: ye shall do no servile work therein: it shall be a all sorts of sacrifices prescribed for the great solemnity of this day, he mentions the burnt-offering in the first place, because it was the principal, and offered next to the two loaves.

Ver. 19.] Next followed the sin-offering, which, for a particular sin of the congregation, was a bullock (ch. xviii. 14), but for the sins of the nation in general, only a kid of the goats: for, as Maimonides observes (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 40), the moreVideo Content is not available.

Two lambs—for a sacrifice of peace offerings.] Double the number to what was commonly offered; for this being a high day, all sorts of sacrifices (as I said before) were offered (burnt-offerings, sin-offerings, and peace-offerings) upon it, and in greater proportions (except the sin-offering) than on other days. And these were the only peace-offerings of the whole congregation of Israel, offered only at this one time of the year, and never else.

Ver. 20.] These sacrifices, with the trespass-offering for a leper (ch. xv. 12), were the only things that were waved about towards all the corners of the world. So Abarbinel upon this place: the waving was performed by the priest, who reached them out, upward and downward, this way and that way, towards the six quarters of the world, to show that the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof; or, as R. Levi ben Gersom speaks, that they might understand the providence of God is everywhere, above and beneath, in every corner of the world.

With the two lambs.] This seems to signify the forenamed burnt-offering and sin-offering were thus waved, as well as these peace-offerings; that is, some part of them all, in the name of the rest; for the priest could not wave the whole body of them, they were so heavy.

For the priest.] Who had not only the breast and the shoulder (as was usual); but all the flesh of these peace-offerings (their blood being sprinkled and their onwards burnt) was given unto him, to be eaten by the males among the priests, in the court of the sanctuary, even as the sin-offerings were: for these peace-offerings being burnt on honour of God, a greater number, both of lambs and other creatures, are required upon this solemnity.

One young bullock, and two rams.] In Numb. xxviii. 27, it is said, "two young bullocks and one ram," besides the seven lambs. Perhaps they were left to their liberty, either to bring one young bullock and two rams, or one ram and two young bullocks; or else those mentioned in Numbers were distinct sacrifices, besides those here mentioned: and so Josephus saith (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10), that there were offered upon this day three young bullocks, two rams (it should be three rams), and fourteen lambs; all which were offered, besides the morning and evening sacrifices.

They shall be for a burnt offering, &c.] There being... statute for ever in all your dwellings throughout your generations.

22 ¶ And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest, neither shalt thou gather any gleanings of thy harvest: thou shalt leave them unto the poor, and to the stranger: I am the Lord your God.

23 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

them from thence, as Maimonides speaks, par. iii. More Nevoch, cap. 43), and partly to thank him for giving them such fair hopes of completing their harvest, at least this were the case when the fruits of the earth were all gathered. "Ye shall do no servile work" It was to be observed, as the first and the last days of unleavened bread (ver. 7, 8), with such a rest, as made it little different from a Sabbath. And that great vision (as Maimonides calls it), at the giving of the law, lasting but one day, was the reason the memory of it was celebrated only for one day in the year. The feast of unleavened bread lasted seven days, for one day was not sufficient to make them sensible enough of the affliction they endured in Egypt. But, perhaps, one day only was appointed at Pentecost to be free from all servile work, because of the great business of wheat-harvest, which was then coming on, and could not permit them to be so much at leisure as they were when the fruits of the earth were all gathered. Then they kept a feast seven days (ver. 39), as they did at the beginning of barley-harvest, when the feast of unleavened bread was held: at which time harvest did not come on so fast as it did at Pentecost; for the first-fruits then were of green corn, parched, and dried, and offered to God, for the hope they had he would bring them to maturity.

Ver. 22.] This precept hath been sufficiently explained before (ch. xix. 9, 10), only the occasion of its repetition here ought to be observed, which is the mention of harvest and first-fruits, which in gratitude they then offered unto God, of whose goodness he would have them so sensible, as not to be unmindful of the poor; but to be such benefactors to them, that they might still receive more benefits from God.

Ver. 23. The Lord spake unto Moses.] These words are frequently prefixed to a new matter, though delivered at the same time with what went before.

Ver. 24. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Who (as I have often said) were all concerned to take note of this.

In the seventh month.] Such a Sabbath as those mentioned ver. 7, 8, 31, on which no servile work was to be done, as it follows in the next verse; for the seventh month was the first month of the year, according to the ancient computation, and continued so still to several purposes; particularly with respect to their jubilees, when they were to blow the trumpet, as they did on this day, which was the chief new moon in all the year, and the more illustrious, because it fell in the time when all the fruits of the earth were gathered.

A memorial of blowing of trumpets.] It is not easy to tell of what this blowing of trumpets was a memorial. Maimonides, in the place aforesaid (More Nevoch, par. iii. cap. 43), will have it to be instituted to awaken the people cut of sleep, and call them to repentance; being to put them in mind of the great day of expiation, which followed nine days after. This he explains more largely in his Jad Chazakah, in the treatise of Repentance (cap. 2), where he saith, "The sound of the trumpet is a sign to take off your drouseness, ye that sleep; and, being awakened, watch to your duty. Search and try your ways; remember your Creator, and repent. You, whom the vanity of the times hath led into a forgetfulness of the truth; who spend your days wandering after empty things, which profit you nothing; bethink yourselves, and take care of your souls. Let every one forsake his evil way, and his thoughts which are not good." And accordingly he saith in the same place, "the Israelites were wont to multiply alms and good works, and to apply themselves to the precepts (as his phrase is), from the beginning of the year, till the day of atonement, more diligently than at any other time; rising in the night to pray in their synagogues till break of day," &c. But, though this be very pious, I see no ground for it; no more than for what they say of commemorating the deliverance of Isaac: for why should not blowing of trumpets be ordered for a preparation to other solemn days, and in memory of other deliverances, as well as this of Isaac.

It seems more probable, that all nations making great shouting, rejoicing, and feasting in the beginning of the year, at the first new moon (as many have observed), hoping the rest of the year, by this means, would prove more prosperous; God was pleased to ordain this great rejoicing among his people, in honour of himself, upon the day of the first new moon which was to be repeated every first day of the month, that he might preserve them from the worship of the moon, and make them sensible that he alone gave the good years, and renewed his mercies daily, from month to month, upon them. Bonferrini imagines, that God put an honour upon this month, because it was the seventh: that as every seventh day was a Sabbath, and every seventh year the land rested, &c., so every seventh month of every year should be a kind of sabbatical month; there being more feats in this month than in any other month in the year.

But all this doth not explain what this blowing of trumpets was a memorial of, which I take to be the redemption of God's ancient people, which account it was, that they annually began their year at this time, as the eastern people do at this day. They acknowledged also God's goodness in blessing all the year past, and bringing them to the beginning of a new year, which they prayed him to make happy to them.

They began to blow at sunrise, and continued it till sunset. He that sounded the trumpet began with the usual prayer, "Blessed be God, who hath sanctified us with his precepts," &c., subjoining these words, "Blessed be God, who hath hitherto preserved us in life, and brought us unto this time." When all was ended, the people said, with a loud voice, these words of the Psalmist (Ps. lxxxix. 15). "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound: they shall walk, O Lord, in the light of thy countenance" (see Buxtorf., Synag. Jud. cap. 24).

Such blowing with trumpets was used by the gentiles; particularly in the solemnities they observed in honour of the mother of the gods: one whole day being spent in blowing of trumpets, as Julian tells us, in his fifth oration upon this subject, Ἱονία ἡ σύντομή τῆς παραλαμβανέται, p. 168.
Ye shall do no servile work therein: but ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Also on the tenth day of this seventh month there shall be a day of atonement: it shall be an holy convocation unto you; and ye shall afflict your souls, and offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord.

Ver. 25. Ye shall do no servile work therein.] It was a very solemn day, like the day of Pentecost (ver. 21), and others before noted, on which they might only provision for their meals (Exod. xii. 16), which were wont to be very liberal upon this day. And, among other dishes, they serve up to the table a ram’s head, in memory of that ram which was sacrificed in the room of Isaac, which they fancy was upon this day.

Ye shall offer an offering made by fire.] About which directions are given afterward (Numb. xxix. 2, &c.). For it was not to be a day of rest merely, but of religion.

Ver. 26.] The following precept is of great moment, which makes this preface to be set before it.

Ver. 27. On the tenth day] This hath been explained, ch. xvi. 29–31.

It shall be an holy convocation.] On which they were to assemble, to humble themselves before God; as it here follows.

Ye shall afflict your souls:] See ch. xvi. I shall only add, that the Jews fancy this solemn day of fasting was appointed, partly to avert those diseases which were wont to be rife in the autumnal season; and this day chosen rather than any other, that they might express their grief at that time, when the sin of the golden calf was committed.

Offer an offering made by fire.] A burnt-offering, about which directions are given in Numb. xxix. 8.

Ver. 28. Ye shall do no work in that same day.] See ver. 3, and ch. xvi. 31.

It is a day of atonement.] Set apart wholly for this work; which is at large described in ch. xvi.

To make an atonement for you.] First the priest made an atonement for himself and his family (ch. xvi. 6, &c.), and then for the people, and for the holy place, &c. (ver. 15, 16, 33).

Ver. 29.] The affliction here spoken of consisted chiefly in abstaining from all manner of food (as the Jews make account) from one evening to the next; in alluding, if any man aye to satisfy his appetite, that is, above the quantity of a day, he was in danger to be cut off; by the hand of God, I suppose: so they say, in Joma, cap. 8, n. 2. Besides which, there were four other mortifications; for no man was to put on his shoes, nor anoint himself, nor wash his face, nor enjoy his wife (see Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. 29).

Ver. 30.] The two great things required on this day, being to afflict themselves, and to rest from labour; they who transgressed either of these commands, are threatened to be cut off, and that by God himself, as this verse teaches us to expound the foregoing.

Ye shall do no manner of work.] This is repeated again, because it was a thing of such high importance, that they should wholly attend to the business of this great day, which was a day of humiliation and repentance, and making their peace with God. And, as the Jews themselves observe, there was always a day or two before the solemnity, in which they were to be in a state of suspense; no doing any thing or other: and besides, they were to afflict themselves for the sins of the whole body of the nation.

Ver. 32. Sabbath of rest.] As the weekly Sabbath was (ver. 3), when they did not merely rest from labour, but employed themselves in the Divine service; as (ver. 6) I observed they did on other Sabbaths of lesser strictness. And this the heathens themselves could discern, that the design of their festivals, which were days of ease and remission of labours, was to withdraw the mind from human employments, to doFFF

In the tenth day of the month at even,] They kept the high-priest on the even of the day of expiation from eating much, because it would make him sleepy, as they tell us in Joma (cap. 1, n. 4). Where our author observes, that the evening before is called the even of the day of expiation, because they began the fast before the setting of the sun; so that the whole evening belonged to the following Sabbath. By which these two places, ch. xvi. 29, where it is said they shall afflict their souls on the tenth day, and this verse, which saith on the ninth day, which seem to clash one with another, may be easily reconciled; for they began to afflict themselves in the conclusion of the ninth day, and ended the fast in the conclusion of the tenth (see Manasseh ben Israel, Quest. 4, ad Lev.

From even unto even.] This justifies what was just now said, that this day began in the even of the ninth day, and continued till the even of the tenth.

Your sabbaths.] From even to even, because no manner of work might be done on this day, no more than on the seventh or weekly Sabbath (ver. 31). And so it is called by the prophet, Isa. lviii. 13.

Ver. 33.] The same preface is prefixed to this, as to the rest, because it was one of the three greatest solemnities appointed by God in remembrance of his benefits (see ver. 12, 13).

Ver. 34.] It was to begin on the fifteenth day, and continue seven days, as the feast of unleavened bread did. The design of this feast is thus expressed by Maimonides, who compares it with the passover; which served, saith he (More Novoh, par. iii. cap. 49), to preserve the memory of all the miracles which 35 On the first day shall be an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work therein.

36 Seven days ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord: on the eighth day shall ye be a holy convocation unto you; and ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord: it is a solemn assembly; and ye shall do no servile work therein.

37 These are the feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, to offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord, a burnt offering, and a meat offering, a sacrifice, and drink offerings, every thing upon his day;

38 Beside the sabbaths of the Lord, and beside your gifts, and beside all your vows, and beside all your freewill offerings, which ye give unto the Lord.

39 Also in the fifteenth day of the seventh month, when ye have gathered in the fruit of the land, ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord seven days: on the first day shall be a sabbath, and on the eighth day shall be a sabbath.

God did in Egypt, out of which he brought them at that time; as the feast of tabernacles did to preserve the memory of the signs and wonders he did in the wilderness, where he afforded them his Divine protection under a glorious cloud, and preserved them without any houses, both in the cold of winter and heat of summer. In short, there are two ends mentioned in this chapter of the institution of this festival; one to give thanks for the fruits of the earth, which were then gathered (ver. 39), another, and the principal, in grateful remembrance that they dwell in booths forty years, and were brought into fresh habitations when they came to Canaan (ver. 42, 43).

Ver. 35.] It was to be observed as the day of Pentecost (ver. 21). And they every one carried in their hands the bough of some goodly tree, as the Hebrews understand the first words of ver. 40. Josephus, describing this festivity (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10), mentions, in the first place, boughs of myrtle.

Ver. 36. Seven days. The peculiar sacrifices, with their meat-offerings, which were to be offered on these seven days, are distinctly set down in Numb. xxix. from the thirteenth verse to the end, where it will be most proper to consider them.

Eight day shall be an holy convocation] See ver. 4. A liberal burnt-offering, with a meat-offering attending upon it, according to the appointment in Numb. xxix. 36, 37.

It is a solemn assembly.] This is a new word, which is not used hitherto concerning any of the feasts here mentioned; signifying, as we translate it in the margin, "a day of restraint," or rather, "a closing, or concluding day," for then the solemnity ended. And so this was the last, or the great day of the feast, as St. John calls it, ch. vii. 37. On which day they read the last section of the law, and so concluded the reading of the whole five books of Moses. And thence any great solemnity is called by this name of atzereth (Deut. xvi. 8). And so is the feast of Pentecost (which was kept in the end of seven weeks) called, by Josephus, by the same name of asorath (lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10). This, therefore, as it was the last, so it was the great day of the feast, as St. John calls it, ch. vii. 37. On which day they read the last section of the law, and so concluded the reading of the whole five books of Moses. And thence any great solemnity is called by this name of atzereth (2 Kings x. 20; Joel i. 14). This seems to me to be a far better account of this word, than that which the Jews had from the Arabic, who render it a day of detention; because, saith Abarbinel, they were bound to detain the feast to this day (whereas no other feast continued more than seven days), staying at Jerusalem till it was over; whence this day seems to him to be to the feast of tabernacles, as the day of Pentecost was to the passover; for as they were bound to count seven weeks from that time, and then made this fifth day a feast, so they are here commanded, after the seventh days of the feast of tabernacles, to stay and feast one day more. Others of them, as R. Solomon Jarebi, say this was as if a man, having been entertained by his friend seven days, should, to express greater kindness to him, be detained one day more.

Ye shall do no servile work?] But spend their time in feasting, mirth, and rejoicing, with thankful acknowledgments of God for their desired harvest, which see ver. 7, 8.

Ver. 37. These are the feasts (or assemblies) of the Lord.] This was the preface to them (ver. 4), and now is the conclusion, to make them the more observed.

To offer an offering, &c.] These offerings are particularly set down (as hath been noted all along) in the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth chapters of Numb., under the name of a sacrifice, seems here to mean a sin-offering; which is ordered, throughout these two chapters, together with burnt-offerings, upon all these festivals.

Ver. 38. Beside the sabbaths] i.e. Besides the sacrifices appointed upon all the Sabbaths in the year, which were not to be omitted, if any of the feasts here mentioned fell upon them. This seems here to mean a sin-offering, which is ordered, throughout these two chapters, together with burnt-offerings, upon all these festivals.

Beside your gifts.] Most understand by gifts, such presents as men made to God, beyond their first-fruits and tenths; but it may be thought only a general word, including the two particulars which follow, vows and freewill-offerings.

Ver. 39. Also in the fifteenth day, &c.] Here is no new injunction in the verse, but only an enforcement of what was said before, the very same days being appointed to be observed with those named, ver. 24. Therefore the Hebrew particle al should not have been translated also, but surely, or certainly, or truly, as we translate it in other places; particularly Gen. xxiv. 14, "Surely thou art my hone and my flesh."

Ps. x. 4. It is good to give thanks unto the Lord; to sing praises unto thy name, O Most High."

Thou hast been our habitation, and our place of defence in all generations.] These words give a reason of the repetition of the command, because there was something more designed in this festival than merely the remembrance of their condition in the wilderness; which was, to express their thankfulness to God for their desired harvest, which they had now gathered; for which cause, besides the seven days which were in commemoration of their dwelling in tents in the wilderness, there was an eighth added, to acknowledge the mercy of receiving the fruits of the earth.

Ye shall keep a feast—seven days.] This was the feast of tabernacles, which lasted all these seven days.

The first day shall be a sabbath. See ver. 35. On the eighth day shall be a sabbath.] In the institution of the feast of unleavened bread, it is said, "In the seventh day is a holy convocation, ye shall do no servile work therein;" i.e. it shall be a Sabbath (ver. 8), but here the eighth day hath that honour put upon it (not the seventh), being added to the festival for a peculiar reason, and therefore to be observed in a very solemn manner; for the feast of tabernacles fell in the time of vintage, when the fruits of the earth were, in a manner, all gathered (Deut. xvi. 13), from whence it is called by the name of the "feast of ingathering" (Exod. xxiii. 16), not because the whole feast was celebrated on this account, but because a principal part of it was kept on this score; viz. the eighth day, as the other seven days were in memory of these branches were used for the seven days preceding; whereas, they had no relation to this in apparent; for they did not dwell in tabernacles on the eighth day of this feast, but only on the seven preceding; which being ended, they returned to their houses, and kept this day there to another purpose, here named; for so it is expressly said, ver. 43, "Ye shall dwell in booths seven days;" which being over, a great solemnity continued to another purpose, and was kept after another manner, not in booths, but in their houses. So Maimonides, in his More Noechoh. (par. ii. cap. 43). "That we go from the feast of tabernacles to another solemnity, on the eighth day, it tends to make our joys perfect; which could not be done in tabernacles, but in large and spacious houses and palaces;" whereas they may still greater, God, as well as sung the praises of God at the temple, with trumpets and instruments of music; in which service some say those three Psalms were used, which have the title of Alphagathith (viz. Ps. vii. lxxxi. and lxxxv. For gath signifies a wine-press, and therefore they think these Psalms were sung in the time of the vintage. Certain it is, that the two last Psalms here, viz. vii. and lxxxi., are sung on the days of Booths, as the other two, viii. and lxxxv. which they celebrated God's wonderful providence over them; and, that they used to sing and shout at their vintage, is clear from Judges ix. 27; Isa. xvi. 9; Jer. xviii. 33; Hoses ii. 15; which the gentiles imitated; who, when they pressed their grapes, sang a song to Bacchus, which was thence called imagationem, the song of the wine-press" (see Scaliger, lib. i. Part. cap. 15).
And ye shall take you on the first day the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of

Now this being a time of such great rejoicing, in both respects, it led Plutarch into a fancy, that the Jews celebrated two feasts unto Bacchus at this time; for he writes, in his Symposia (lib. i. prob. 3), that in the midst of the vintage the Jews spread tables furnished with all manner of fruit, and lived in tabernacles, and sang praises of God together, and called the day which goes before the feast, "the day of tabernacles." And then, a few days after, saith he, they kept another festivity; which openly shows it was dedicated to Bacchus, for, they carried boughs of palms in their hands, &c., with which they went into the temple; the Levites (who he fancies were called so from fesos, which was the name of Bacchus) going before with instruments of music, &c. All which may very well incline us to think, that the gentiles corrupted this holy festivity (as they did other sacred institutions), and turned it into the profane Bacchanaulia; which is no improbable conjecture of J.e. Mich. Dillherrus, in his Dissert. De Mol. Gent. De Bacch. (see Scaliger, lib. iv. Part. cap. 5).

Ver. 10. Ye shall take you on the first day Then they began to build their booths, that they might dwell in them the rest of the feast. Boughs of goodly trees, &c. Some fancy that this is not a direction for the building of booths with these branches, but for the carrying them in their hands, as Josephus tells us, lib. ii. Antiqu. cap. 10. And they say these branches were called homannas, because they sang those words of the Psalmist as they marched along with these boughs in their hands, "Save now [in the Hebrew the word is hoon-nas], O Lord: O Lord, send now prosperity," Ps. cxvii. 25. And this is so rivetted in the minds of the Jews, that Alen the brook; and ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God seven days.

41 And ye shall keep it a feast unto the Lord.

Ezra makes it the opinion of the Sadducees to hold that they were not for any other use. But it is evident, from Nehemiah viii. 13, that they cut these branches to make booths, and not to carry in their hands; though it is likely that this might be thought a fit use for branches not in all times, especially after they were expelled out of their own land. It is not unlikely also that they celebrated this festival by singing of hosannas, among other tokens of rejoicing, praying for a happy new year, whose feast went a little before on the first of this month; whence the rabbins call this feast of tabernacles by the name of hosanna, and the last day of it they call hosanna rabba. And they repeat this often in their prayers at that time, as they tell us in their Minhagim (or books of rituals), saying,

"For thy sake, O our Creator, hosanna. For thy sake, O our Redeemer, hosanna. For thy sake, O our Seeker, hosanna."

As if they besought the blessed Trinity to save them, and send help to them. In short, they call the prayers they say at this feast, by the name of hosannahs, as Joh. Mich. Dillherrus hath observed, lib. ii. Electorum, cap. 20.

Boughs] The Hebrew word pri signifies fruit, as is noted in the margin of our Bibles; whence some have supposed that the branches of fruit-bearing trees, as the boughs of fruit-bearing trees; nay, the Jews fancy they were to be boughs with their fruit, as well as leaves on them. But Buxtorf made no doubt (in his sixteenth chapter of Synag. Judaeas), that the word is rightly translated a bough, whether without fruit, or with it, though in later editions of that book this passage be left out.

Goodly trees,] The Hebrew word haddar doth not merely signify that which is beautiful and goodly, but that which is large and well spread; as is observed by Hottinger, in his Simegra Orientale, lib. i. cap. 7, where he thinks these words may be thus exactly translated. "Take you the boughs of trees with broad leaves, such as the branches of palm-trees;" so is haddar a general word, and "branches of palm-trees" a special instance of a tree with spacious leaves, which were the fittest to be used, because they were best able to defend them, either from heat, or cold, or rain. Maimonides takes this word to signify the boughs of a particular tree, which he will have to be a citron: and the Jews are so possessed with this opinion, that, at this day, they fancy the feast cannot be celebrated without such branches; and therefore the Jews now in Germany send into Spain, and endeavour to get one every year with the pomcitrons on it; and, after the feast, they offer the citrus to their friends as a great present. Hottinger saith he had one presented to him at Heidelberg, that very year he wrote his book now mentioned (see Dr. Lightfoot, in his Temple of the Church, chap. 6, sect. 2, and Buxtorf. Synag. Jud. cap. 21).

Branches of palm trees,] With which Judea abounded, and was so noted for them, that in the ancient coins a palm-tree represented that country.

Boughs of thick trees,] Which were shady, and afforded a good shelter. The Jews take these for myrtles, which have very thick leaves and boughs, close one to another, though the leaves be small.

Willows of the brook,] If this translation be right, it is likely they served only to twine about the rest, and bind them together; and therefore, in Nehemiah viii. 15, no mention is made of them; their tabernacles not seven days in the year. It shall be a statute for ever in your generations: ye shall celebrate it in the seventh month.

42 Ye shall dwell in booths seven days; all that are Israelites born shall dwell in booths:

consisting of such boughs which were used only for the purpose of covering them. But the other:

Ye shall rejoice—seven days.] These were the seven days of the feast of tabernacles (as I noted before), which were spent in feasting, and other tokens of joy, with thanks to God for his great goodness, who had brought them out of the wilderness, where they had no fig-trees, vines, or pomegranates, into a country which abounded with fruitful trees of all sorts; which was the reason, Maimonides thinks, that Moses bids them take the boughs of the most goody trees wherewith to build their booths (More Nevoch. par. iii. cap. 43).

But of all the joys at this festival, none was comparable to that of drawing and pouring out water, concerning which the Palmists have this noted saying: If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink, &c., out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." John vii. 37, 38. But I have not met with any one that gives a tolerable reason of this custom at the feast of tabernacles; which I take to have been in memory of that water which followed them all the time they were in the wilderness, without which they had perished; and in thankfulness to God, that he had brought them into a "land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills," as well as into "a land of vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates," &c., as Moses speaks, Deut. vii. 7, 8.

Ver. 41.] He repeats it again, because it was of very great importance that they should keep in mind such a singular benefit as this, of their preservation in the wilderness.

It shall be a statute: For the end mentioned ver. 42. Ye shall celebrate it in the seventh month.] They came out of Egypt in the first month, and then began to dwell in tabernacles at Succoth (Exod. xii. 37), and, from that place, were conducted ever after under the cloud (Exod. xiii. 20, 21), which being in that month we call March, some may think it had been most proper to have kept this feast at that time of the year, and not in September. To which the Jews answer that in March summer began, when it was usual for people to dwell in booths, as more refreshing than houses: so that if they had kept this feast then, it would not have been known that they dwelt in booths by a singular command of God, and in memory of a Divine benefit; but men would have thought the season of the year led them to it. Therefore God appointed it in the seventh month, which is a time of cold or rain, when men commonly left their tabernacles, and betook themselves to their houses; that it might appear they did not go out of their houses into booths for their own pleasure, or from common custom, but by the Divine precept, in memory of a marvellous benefit: yet the fifteenth day of this month was appointed for the beginning of this feast, because it was upon the fifteenth day of the first month that they marched out of Bithyni and Succoth.

Ver. 43. Ye shall dwell in booths seven days:] They left their houses for seven days, and went into the fields, and pitched their tents there, or on their house-tops, or in their court-yards; as we read in Neh. viii. 17.

All that are Israelites born] Sick people were excepted; and the rabbins also freed women and little children from this obligation. If the rain likewise proved so great that they could not live there dry, and the cold so intense that it endangered their healths, they might all return to their houses.

Ver. 44. That your generations may know this] Expresses the end and intention of this feast, which was to preserve a memory in future ages of the goodness of God, and of the Divine protection which overshadowed them, and was a covering to them (when they had no houses), by that glorious cloud which went before them to conduct them. For all the forty years they were in the wilderness, it overspread them like a tabernacle, and defended them from the injury of the weather, and wild beasts; and all their enemies: they having no other shelter in that desolate place, but only this; and consequently, this feast was instituted to make them sensible how very happy they were in goodly cities and fine painted houses (as Maimonides speaks in the place above mentioned), when they came to the good land promised to their fathers, who wandered in a howling wilderness, without any certain dwellings-place.

And another feast was tacked to this, on the eighth day, on purpose to make them more sensible of the happy exchange of their condition from a wilderness into a land of corn, and wine, and oil, which they had plentifully gathered. Dr. Lightfoot, in his Harmony of the Evangelists, upon Luke iii. 40, hath another reason for the observation of this festival: for which, can see no ground, and therefore do not mention it, but refer the reader to the first volume of his works, p. 477.

When I brought them out of the land of Egypt.] For the very first place where they rested after their first day's march out of Egypt, was called Succoth (as I observed before); that is, tabernacles: because here they began to spread their tents, in which they lived ever after, for forty years. Nay, in the very land of Canaan, there were some who preferred tents before houses, as appears by that phrase we meet with so often, when any assembly or army was dissolved, "They went every man to his tent." And indeed, it was the most ancient way of living, for shepherds, and such as feed cattle (as Moses observes, Gen. iv. 20), and therefore no wonder it lasted so long among the Israelites, who originally were such people.

I am the Lord your God.] Whose commands ought to be observed, and whose benefits ought to be remembered.

Ver. 44. Moses declared—the feasts of the Lord.] So he was commanded to do, ver. 2, they being concerned, as much as Aaron and the priests, in keeping these holy solemnities in honour of the Lord.
CHAPTER XXIV.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 2 Command the children of Israel, that they bring unto thee pure olive oil beaten for the light, to cause the lamps to burn continually. 3 Without the vail of the testimony, in the tabernacle of the congregation, shall Aaron order it from the evening unto the morning before the Lord continually: it shall be a statute for ever in your generations.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1.] Directions having been given, after the setting up of the tabernacle, for the several sorts of sacrifices, very early in the morning there (particularly upon the great day of atonement) aAaron, his sons having been consecrated, and care taken that none of their posterity should minister before God, but such only as were without blemish; nor any other sacrifices be offered but such as were every way perfect; and only such feasts observed as are mentioned in the foregoing chapter: he proceeds now to give order for the daily service of God in the sanctuary, which was not yet settled, till the princes had made all their offerings, &c. (Numb. vii. 1, 2, &c., viii. 1.)

Ver. 2.] Command—that they bring unto thee.] The daily sacrifices were to be maintained at the public charge, and so were the incense and the lamps; and therefore it was proper to speak to all the people, in whom names the priests performed all these things, to take care they should be furnished with them (see Exod. xxx. 13, &c.).

Pure oil olive beaten for the light.] All this hath been explained, Exod. xxvii. 20, where this order was first given, and now is commanded to be put in execution. It is not improbable that the oil, to make it last longer, was taken from all dregs, passed through two strainers into the lamps; as Fortunatus Sesechus endeavours to make it out (Myrothec. i. Elaeochrys. Sacr. 10.)

Ver. 3.] Without the vail of the testimony, &c.] This is a short expression, which, in Exod. xxvii. 21, is delivered more fully, without the vail, which is before the Lord; and the lamps, which is before the Lord.

Shall Aaron order it? He or his sons, as it is explained in Exod. xxvii. 21.

From the evening unto the morning:] The Hebrew word boker properly signifies that part of the morning which is from break of day till sunrise; and the other word oratan, the evening, after sunset, till it be dark. Therefore, very early in the morning, and late at night, the priests were to look after the lamps.

Before the Lord continually.] For the lamps burnt on one side of the sanctuary, as the table stood on the other side with the shew-bread on it; and both of them before the Lord, i. e. before the ark of the testimony, where the Divine Majesty dwelt (Exod. xxv. 30, xxvi. 33).

It shall be a statute for ever.] See Exod. xxx. 7, 8.

4 He shall order the lamps upon the pure candlestick before the Lord continually.

5 ¶ And thou shalt take fine flour, and bake twelve cakes thereof: two tenth deals shall be in one cake.

6 And thou shalt set them in two rows, six on a row, upon the pure table before the Lord.

7 And thou shalt put pure frankincense upon each row, that it may be on the bread for a me-

Ver. 5. Take fine flour.] Of the best wheat.

Bake twelve cakes.] These are called "the bread of the presence" (which we translate shew-bread), in the place now named, Exod. xxv. 30, where see what I have noted. See Lightfoot's sect. (1 Chron. ix. 29, xxiii. 29), and were in number twelve, to represent the twelve tribes of Israel as continually before God, i. e. under the care of his gracious providence. Nor was this number diminished after the apostasy of ten tribes from the worship of God at the tabernacle; but still twelve cakes were set before the Lord, because there was a remnant of true Israelites among them (1 Kings xxx. 18), and this was a constant testimony against those apostates, and served to turn them back to the right worship of God at that place; where they were assured they and their sacrifices would be acceptable, and nowhere else: which made Abijah mention this to Jeroboam and the ten tribes, among other things that would induce them to remember of their forsaking God and his dwelling-place; where he tells them, "the priests, the sons of Aaron, minister; and the Levites wait on their business: and they burn unto the Lord, every morning and every evening, burnt-sacrifices and sweet incense: the shew-bread also set they in order upon the pure table; and the candlestick of gold, and the candlestick of gold, with the lamps thereof, to burn every evening;" &c. (see 2 Chron. xiii. 9—11, &c.).

Two tenth deals.] That is, two omers; for an omer was the tenth part of an ephah (Exod. xvi. 36). Where we likewise read, ver. 22, that every Israelite, while they were in the wilderness, gathered just this quantity against every Sabbath. On which day these cakes being set upon the table (Exod. xxv. 30, ver. 8), Dr. Lightfoot thinks, both the measure and the time were designed to put the Israelites in mind of their sustenance in the wilderness.

Ver. 6. Set them in two rows, &c.] One upon another, as the Hebrew writers expound it. Who say also, that they were set lengthwise cross over the breadth of the tabernacle, and that they were ten hands breadth long, and five broad, and seven fingers thick (see Dr. Lightfoot's Temple Service, chap. 14. sect. 5.)

Upon the pure table:] It was called pure, because it was overlaid with pure gold (Exod. xxv. 24), and, we may be sure, was kept very clean and bright.

Before the Lord.] Who dwelt in the most holy place, before which the bread was set.

Ver. 7. Pr. and frankincense.] The best that could be got, unmixed with any thing else. And there was no better in the world than their neighbouring countries afforded.

Upon each row:] On the top of each row of cakes there was set a golden dish, with a handful of frankincense therein.

That it may be on the bread.] Or, for the bread.
leviticus.

morial, even an offering made by fire unto the Lord.

8 Every sabbath he shall set it in order before the Lord continually, being taken from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant.

9 And it shall be Aaron's and his sons'; and they shall eat it in the holy place: for it is most holy unto him of the offerings of the Lord made by fire by a perpetual statute.

That is, offered unto God, instead of the bread; which was to be given to the priests, who waited on him at his table, for their portion.

For a memorial] For an acknowledgment of God, and of his sovereignty over them; and to beseech him to be always gracious to them (see ch. ii. ver. 27), and to represent also (as Conradus Pellegrinus understands it, that God was ever mindful of his people, and had a great love to them; for "the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears open to their prayers."

Offering made by fire] The frankincense being set upon the bread, they seem to be considered as one thing: part of which (with the meal-offering) was burnt upon the altar, and the other part to be burnt, brought, and given to the priests. Now, instead of the bread, which was the principal, the frankincense was burnt every week unto the Lord, when the bread was eaten by the priests. Which bread, it is evident, (ver. 9), is called "one of the offerings of the Lord made by fire," because this frankincense, which stood upon it all the week, was burnt, as an oblation to the Lord. The shew-bread was prepared the evening before; and then, on the Sabbath, four priests went in to fetch away the old leaves and frankincense that had stood there all the week before; and other four followed after them to carry new ones and frankincense in their stead; for two of them carried the two rows of bread (same as above), and the other two carried each of them a golden dish, in which the frankincense was set upon the bread (see Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple Service, chap. 11, sect. 5).

Being taken from the children of Israel] At whose charge they were provided, though prepared by the Levites (see Neh. x. 32, 33).

For a memorial] By virtue of that command (which they all had agreed to observe which required the shew-bread to be set before the Lord always (Exod. xxiv. 3, xxv. 30). Ver. 9. It shall be Aaron's and his sons';] Who, as God's servants, ate of the bread which came from his table.

But it in the holy place.] For the most holy things could be eaten nowhere else (see ch. iv. 26, 29).

It is in most holy] See ch. ii. 3, of this book.

Of the offerings—made by fire] It need not seem strange that this bread, which was not burnt upon the altar as meat-offerings were, should be reckoned among the offerings made by fire; for as the altar (where those meat-offerings were burnt) is called God's (Mal. i. 12), so this table, where the shew-bread stood, was really God's altar: insomuch that the bread, which was set upon it before him, was looked upon as offered unto him; and the frankincense set upon the bread, as a part of it, being really burnt, it may be called an offering made by fire.

Thus the gentiles also, as an excellent person of our own hath observed, thought tables, rightly dedicated unto their gods, to supply the place of altars. So Macrobius saith (lib. iii. Saturnal. cap. 11), it evidently appeared, by Papyrian's law, that those were vicem prestare patee mensam diatam, "a table consecrated might serve instead of an altar." Of which he gives an instance in the temple of Juno Populonia; and then proceeds to give a reason for it, because altars and tables, codem die, quo udeas ipse, dedici solent, being consecrated by the priests themselves." From whence it was that a table, hoc uita dedici, "dedicated in this manner," was of the same use in the temple with an altar (see Dr. Outram, De Sacrificiis, lib. i. cap. 8, n. 7).

Perpetual statute] As long as these sacrifices lasted. Ver. 10.] In the Hebrew the words run thus; "And there went out the son of the Israelite woman, and the son of the Egyptian woman, in the midst of (or, among) the children of Israel:" which last words signify, that, though his father was an Egyptian by birth, yet he was become a proselyte by religion; and was one of those (as it is probable) who went along with the Israelites when God brought them out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 38). So R. Solomon Jarchi, and the Targum, "among the children of Israel:" hence, saith he, we learn, that "he was a proselyte of righteousness." And Aben Ezra to the same purpose, "he was received into the number of the Jews." See a great many more in Mr. Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 1, numb. 2, where he observes, that it is the common opinion of the Jews, that they were the two children of whom Moses killed in Egypt (Exod. ii. 12).

This son of the Israelitish woman—and a man of Israel strove together] When God was delivering the foregoing laws unto Moses, this case seems to have happened. And the Jews say the controversy between these two was this: the former, looking upon himself as a right of birth by his father, or the name of his mother, endeavoured to set up a tent among the children of Dan, in that place where their tribe had pitched their tents; which was opposed by one of that tribe, who told him, the right of his mother would do him no service, unless his father had been an Israelite; for the law was (Numb. ii. 2), that every man of the children of Israel should pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house, which law, though given afterward, yet they supposed was the rule before; by which this man was condemned, by those that heard the cause, to be in the wrong.

Ver. 11. Blasphemed—and cursed.] Sentence being given against him, he uttered blasphemed words against God himself (perhaps of the Lord), and also cursed those judges that had condemned him.

The Jews commonly think, that this blasphemy was his pronouncing the peculiar name of God, which he heard at Mount Sinai when the law was given. But this is a mere fancy; for there were some names pronounced words uttered against God, as well as against the judges, as appears from ver. 15. And they themselves acknowledge, that a proselyte was guilty of death, whether he cursed by the proper name of God, or any other, as Mr. Selden shows (lib. ii. De 12 And they put him in ward, that the mind of the Lord might be shewed them.

13 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Bring forth him that hath cursed without the camp; and let all that heard him lay their hands upon his head, and let all the congregation stone him.

14 And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Whosoever curseth the name of the Lord, shall bear his sin.

15 And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the Lord, shall be put to death.

Jure N. et G. cap. 12). Pellicanus thinks it probable that this man mocked at the foregoing laws, which were delivered about the worship of God; and condemned God himself, when he was told by whose authority they were enacted.

They brought him unto Moses.] If the occasion of their strife was such as the Jews imagine, then Mr. Selden thinks it highly probable that the cause had been heard and judged by some of the lesser courts established by Jethro's advice (Exod. xviii. 21, 22), where the blasphemy had been so plainly proved, that he was convicted of it: but they, doubting about the punishment of so high a crime, referred the consideration of that to Moses, as the supreme judge.

His mother's name was Shelomith. ] I see no reason of mentioning the name of the woman from whom he was descended, but that all might be satisfied of the truth of this history.

Put him in ward. ] Committed him to prison, that he might be secured till his punishment was declared.

That the mind of the Lord might be shewed them. ] In the Hebrew the words are, "That it might be expounded to them (viz. by Moses), according to the mouth of the Lord," that is, as the Lord should declare the particulars concerning them. "And the matter was expounded to them, according to the sentence of the word of the Lord." For it is noted here, by a famous commentator among the Jews (as Mr. Selden observes in the place before mentioned, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 1), that God was consulted about this matter, "Because they did not know whether he was to die for this crime; or whether his judgment was to be expected from the hand of Heaven, or otherwise:" whence Jarchi says, "They did not know whether he was guilty of death or not." And so Theodoret, Q. xxxiii. in Lev. There was no law, as yet, about this matter: but there was a plain law, that whosoever cursed his father or mother should die. And from this law, it may be inferred that he was to be so punished, who cursed his heavenly Father; there being also another law against those that reviled the judges and rulers (Exod. xxii. 28). And therefore I take it, they only doubted what kind of death he should die, about which Moses consulted the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 13.] It is likely Moses went into the sanctuary to inquire of God, who, from the mercy-seat, pronounced the following sentence against him; and also made a perpetual law about this case, with some others.

Ver. 14. Bring forth him that hath cursed without the camp.] This is the sentence pronounced by the mouth of God, from whom they expected it. And, first, he orders the criminal to be carried forth out of the camp, as an unclean (Numb. v. 2, 3), nay, an accursed thing (Josh. vii. 21).

Let all that heard him.] Next, he orders the witnesses to be produced, who heard him speak the blasphemous words.

Put him upon his head.] This was a peculiar thing in this case, hands being laid upon no man's head condemned by the Sanhedrin, but only upon a blasphemer. By which ceremony they solemnly declared, that they had given a true testimony against him, and thought him worthy of the death he was condemned to suffer; and perhaps, prayed God, that all the punishment of this sin might fall upon this man, and not upon them, nor the rest of the people. And so the Jews tell us their manner was to say, "Let thy blood be upon thy own head, which thou hast brought on thyself by thy own guilt."

Let all the congregation stone him.] This was the last part of the sentence, that, when they that heard him curse had done all that was required, all the congregation should stone him; which is the same punishment the law inflicted on him that cursed his father or his mother (ch. xx. 9, see there).

Ver. 15.] Upon this occasion a new law is made, in express terms, against blasphemy.

Whosoever curseth his God.] Some of the Hebrews understand this of a gentile, who, having among them, and not yet solely made a proselyte of the gate, that, if he cursed the god which was worshipped in his country, he should die for it (see Selden, lib. ii. De Judæ Nat. et Gent. cap. ult.). And Procopius Gazaext extends the words to such persons as cursed the god they worshipped, though he were a false god: which is according to the common rule, that where we find these words, ib. ib. (man, man, which we well translate whosoever), they comprehend gentiles as well as Jews. But no doubt, this law particularly concerned the people of Israel; whom God intended by this law to preserve from such horrid impiety as is here mentioned.

Shall bear his sin.] Be stoned (see ch. xx. 9). If the word curseth be understood in the proper sense, Procopius well observes, that nothing could be more senseless than this sin, and upon that account deserved stoning; "for he that curseth his God, upon what God will he call to confirm his curse?" But the Hebrew word seems to import only speaking contemptuously of God (see Ver. 16). If he that blasphemeth—shall surely be put to death, &c.] It is uncertain, whether this be a higher degree of the sin mentioned in the foregoing verse, or only a repetition of the same law, with a more express declaration of the punishment he should bear for his sin. The Jews unreasonably understand it of him alone that expressed the name, i.e. the most holy name of God, as they say in Sanhedrin, cap. 7, number 13, where Jah. & Coch observes out of the Jerusalem Targum on Deut. xxxii. that it is thus explained, "Wo unto those that in their execrations use the holy name: which it is not lawful for the highest angel to express." But this is a piece of their superstition: the meaning undoubtedly is, that if any man reproached the Most High, he should die for it; but the more pronouncing his holy name could be no crime, when men might swear by it, though not take it in vain (Deut. vi. 13; Exod. xx. 7).

The congregation shall—stone him.] As they were ordered to do with the present offender (ver. 14).

As well the stranger, &c.] By stranger may be meant a proselyte, and such the occasion of this law: but the Jews extend it to Samaritans and gentiles; only they say, such were to be punished by the sword, and not by stoning.
17 ¶ And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death. 18 And he that killeth a beast shall make it good; beast for beast. 19 And if a man cause a blemish in his neighbour; as he hath done, so shall it be done to him; 20 Breach for breach, eye for eye, tooth for tooth: as he hath caused a blemish in a man, so shall it be done to him again. 21 And he that killeth a beast, he shall restore it: and he that killeth a man, he shall be put to death. 22 Ye shall have one manner of law, as well for the stranger, as for one of your own country: for I am the Lord your God.

23 ¶ And Moses spake unto the children of Israel, that they should bring forth him that had cursed out of the camp, and stone him with stones. And the children of Israel did as the Lord commanded Moses.

Ver. 17. He that killeth any man shall surely be put to death.] This law was given before, Exod. xxii. 12. And it is not easy to give an account why it is here repeated after the case of a blasphemer. Perhaps it was upon the occasion of the last words in the foregoing verse, "as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the Lord, shall be put to death." For, after the following laws, they are repeated again as a general rule (ver. 22), that no man might think it hard a stranger should be punished for blasphemy as much as an Israelite, when in other cases the same judgment passed upon them both. Procopius Gazaicus thinks a murderer is joined with a blasphemer, because they have the same mind and intention; the one desiring to destroy God, if it were possible, as the other doth his neighbour. "Therefore the law puts them together; just as on the contrary, when it commands the love of God, it couples with it the love of our neighbour." So he.

Ver. 18.] It was incongruous, as the same Procopius speaks, to annex unto the law against murder a law against other injuries. And concerning this, see Exod. xxi. 33, 34. For the Hebrew word behemoth, here used, signifies such domestic tame beasts as are there mentioned.

CHAPTER XXV.

1 The sabbath of the seventh year. 8 The jubilee in the fiftieth year. 14 Of oppression. 18 A blessing of obedience. 23 The redemption of land. 29 Of houses. 33 Compassion of the poor. 39 The usage of bondmen. 47 The redemption of servants.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses in mount Sinai, saying, 2 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land which I give you, then shall the land keep a sabbath unto the Lord.

Then shall the land keep a sabbath] Rest from being tilled, or sown, &c. (see Exod. xxiii. 11). Unto the Lord.] In obedience to him, and in honour of him. Some have understood the foregoing words, When ye shall come into the land which I give you, as if they were to begin the sabbatical year as soon as they entered into Canaan; which is very absurd; for so, not the seventh, but the first, would have been the year of rest. And that had been very inconvenient, if not destructive; the war making such great waste, no doubt, that provision would have been very scarce, if no care had been taken for the ensuing year. It is to be considered also, that the old store upon which they lived when they entered into the land of promise, was the fruit of the labour of the Canaanites, and not of the children of Israel. The meaning therefore is, that the seventh year after their entrance into Canaan, or rather, after they were settled, and had rest in it, they should let the land rest.

The only question is, when this year was to begin!
CHAPTER XXV.

3 Six years thou shalt sow thy field, and six years thou shalt prune thy vineyard, and gather in the fruit thereof;
4 But in the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land, a sabbath for the Lord: thou shalt neither sow thy field, nor prune thy vineyard.
5 That which groweth of its own accord of whether in the month of Tisri (which answers to our September), which was the ancient beginning of the year; or in Nisan (answering to our March), which was the ancient conclusion of it. Of this see Exod. xii. 9, the former still continuing the beginning of the year for civil things as this for sacred. Now there is great reason to think that this sabbatical year was to commence from September, when all their harvest was over, which began in March. Then they were not to sow, as they were wont to do in October, and the following months; but to stay till the harvest of this season the next year; for, if this year had been to begin in March, they could not have reap'd the harvest of the sixth year.

Ver. 3.] Exod. xxiii. 10. But what was allowed in other years, is forbidden in this.

Ver. 4. In the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land.] Or, unto the Lord, (as we translate it before,) that, when God gave the land to them, continued the proprietor of it (as he declares, ver. 23), and the Lord in chief, himself; of whom they held it by this tenure, that they should till it, &c., only six years together, for their own use; and in the seventh, let it lie in common, for such uses as he appointed. And it was for the honour of the Lord that this change came off, by the expression of it; for as appointed by Sabbath was an acknowledgment that they were his, so this sabbatical year was an acknowledgment that their land was his.

Neither sow thy field, nor prune thy vineyard.] By this he explains what he means by letting it rest. And these two words, sow and prune, comprehend all other things that were usually done about the fields or trees, as ploughing, digging, dunging, &c. And though a vineyard be only mentioned, yet it is plain, by Exod. xxiii. 10, that oliveyards are comprehended under the same law; and these are mentioned only as examples of all other fruit-trees, which were to be left in common as these were.

Maimonides seems to mean something too curious in what he saith upon this subject; for, inquiring why Moses mentions only these two things, sawing and pruning, his resolution is, that for these two, if men offended in them this year, they were punished with that scourging called malbut; but if they offended in any other sort of labours belonging to the culture of the fields, or of trees, they were not punished with the scourging of malbut (which was by a certain measure, not exceeding thirty-nine stripes), but with the scourging called mardut, i.e. of contumacy and rebellion, which was without number or measure. As, if a man dagged or ploughed his ground; if he gathered out the stones, or dunged it, &c.; if he planted trees, or grafted, &c.; he suffered the scourging of rebellion. And when men did this, he was not lawful in the seventh year to plant any tree, though it was not a fruit-tree; nor to cut off the dead branches; nor to make a smoke under them to kill the worms; nor to anoint young plants to preserve them from the bitings of birds, &c. If they did, they were liable to the scourging of mardut. Nay, he is so nice, as to say it was unlawful to sell to any man any instrument of husbandry in this year, as a plough, a yoke, a sieve, &c.; yet he allows them, when they were under the oppression of the gentiles, and bound to find provision for their armies, to sow so much as would maintain the ordinary uses of their families. Of this see Exod. xxv. 3, 5, 6, &c., where the use of things was admitted as a part of the sabbatical law, by way of exception. But, as has been said (sect. 1), the words, except in case of necessity, were not always understood as this, but sometimes as the law itself; which is the meaning of the latter part of Exod. xxv. 5. See where Maimonides observes on it.

Shall be meat for you.] This explains the prohibition of reaping any corn this year, or gathering any fruit, not to be meant absolutely; but only that they should not look upon any thing that grew this year as peculiarly theirs, because it grew in their ground, but let all be common to others as well as themselves.

For thee, and for thy servant, &c.] This, and the next verse, show that all the fruits of the earth were perfectly in common this year: for the very beasts were not excluded; and therefore, much less any man that dwelt among them, though he was uncircumcised. But it is very plain, likewise, that the owner of the other family were not permitted to take their share, but might gather for their daily use as well as others, only not lay up any thing separate for themselves.

Ver. 5. That which groweth of its own accord of the though the grapes of thy vine undressed: for it is a year of rest unto the land.

6 And the sabbath of the land shall be meat for you; for thee, and for thy servant, and for thy maid, and for thy hired servant, and for thy stranger that sojourneth with thee, 7 And for thy cattle, and for the beast that were present in the land.
are in thy land, shall all the increase thereof be meat.

8 And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years.

9 Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month, in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land.

10 And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family.

wild beasts might be driven out of their vineyards, &c. in this year as well as others, because they made such waste as would have very much damaged the owner for the future. As for all other tame creatures, the Jews (if we may believe Maimonides, cap. 7.), were so superstitiously careful they should have an equal share with themselves, that when there was no fruit any longer for the beasts in the field, they ceased to eat what they had gathered for themselves; and, if they had anything of it left, threw it out of their houses.

Ver. 8. Number seven sabbaths of years, &c.] Which, put together, made seven-nine years; as it follows in the rest of this verse. They began their first account (as Maimonides there observes) from the fourteenth year after their entrance into Canaan; for they were seven years in conquering the land, and seven more in dividing to every one their portion: so he, cap. 10., where he observes, they numbered seventeen jubilees from that time to their captivity in Babylon, which fell out in the end of a sabbatical year, and the thirty-sixth of the jubilee.

Ver. 9. Trumpet of the jubilee.] The word jobel (which we translate jubilee in the next verse) is not in the Hebrew; but the age, which, in the translation, is light Translated loud of sound: for the trumpet was blown after a different manner at this time, than upon other occasions, that every one might understand the meaning of it.

To sound.] In the Hebrew the word is, cause it to pass, that it might be heard everywhere throughout the land. So these words may be most literally translated, thou shalt cause to pass the trumpet loud of sound.

Tenth day of the seventh month.] This day was very fitly chosen, that this year might begin at the same time that a general atonement was made for the sins of the whole nation: for they would be the better disposed toуд to the public, to forgive their debts, when they craved pardon for their own.

Shall ye make the trumpet sound (or pass) throughout all your land.] This is repeated, to make them careful to awaken every one to this duty, by the sound of the trumpet at every door; there being an unwillingness in most people to part with their servants, and their lands, &c., which they had long enjoyed. And the Lord tells them: 'Know, saith Maimonides, that thou shalt sound, was bound to blow with a trumpet, and make this sound nine times, that they might fulfill these words of this precept, throughout all your land. By this means, as R. Levi Barzelonita notes, every one was the better inclined to hearken, when he saw it was a duty incumbent on the whole country, which all were to perform.

Ver. 10. Hallow the fiftieth year.] Distinguish it from all other years, by doing what follows. Maimonides fancies, that these two precepts of numbering seven sabbaths of years (ver. 8.), and of sanctifying the fiftieth year, were delivered only to the house of judgment; whose business, no doubt, it particularly was, to give notice of this year, and to cause the trumpet to be sounded, and all the following precepts to be observed (Schemitta ve Jobel, cap. 10., numb. 1).

Proclaim liberty Unto all servants, who were this year made free. Throughout all the land.] Even in all the highways, as Aben Ezra glosses, that every one might have notice.

Unto all the inhabitants.] That is, to all the children of Israel who were servants; or so poor, that they had sold their estates, as it here follows. From these words the Jews gather, that after the tribes of Ruben, Gad, and half of the tribe of Manasseh, were carried captive, jubilees ceased. They are the words of Maimonides in the forenamed treatise; for then "all the inhabitants of the land" were not in it. And therefore much more when they were all carried captive, they only numbered the rest of every seventh year without any jubilee.

It shall be a jubilee.] Whence this year hath the name of jubel, there are so many opinions, that Bochuart himself scarce knew which to follow. Josephus saith it signifies יול, "liberty;" and the LXX. and Aquila translate it ἡμέρα, "remission," having a regard to the thing, rather than the import of the word jobel, which never signifies any thing of that nature. D. Kimchi tells us, that R. Akiba, when he was in Arabia, heard them call a ram by this name of jobel; and thence some fancy this year was so called, because it was proclaimed with trumpets of rams' horns. But what if there were no such trumpets? as Bochuart thinks there were not, these horns being not hollow. See Hierozolom, par. j. lib. ii. cap. 45., p. 425, &c., where several other opinions are condemned. And lastly, it is well known that the trumpet which was used in the temple services, was that called jobel, from the peculiar sound which was made with the trumpet when this year was proclaimed. For the trumpet blowing for several purposes, viz., to call their assemblies together, to give notice of the moving of their camps, to excite soldiers to fight, and to proclaim this year; there was a distinct sound from the other, which the priests observed, that people might not be confounded, but have a certain notice what the trumpet sounded for. And this sound mentioned before (ver. 9.) was peculiarly called jobel, as Hottinger thinks, who considers a great many other opinions in his Alphabet, Diss. iii. wherein he follows Joh. Forsterus, who, near a hundred years before, observed that jobel, which we commonly translate trumpet (Exod. xix. 16., and other places), doth not properly signify itself, but the sound that it made. And when it is used absolutely alone, it signifies this year, which was called jobel, from that sound which was then made; as the feast of unleavened bread was called pesach, from the angel passing over them when he slew the Egyptians. The opinions of the Hebrew writers of the subject are collected and largely represented by Josephus de Veosin (lib. i. De Jubileae, cap. 1).

Return every man unto his possession.] Unto his field, or his house, which his poverty had forced him to sell: but now was restored to him without any price, because they were not sold absolutely, but only till this year. By which means the estates of the Israelites were so fixed, that no family could ruin
CHAPTER XXV.

11 A jubilee shall that fifteenth year be unto you: ye shall not sow, neither reap that which groweth of itself in it, nor gather the grapes in it of thy vine undressed.

12 For it is the jubilee; it shall be holy unto itself or grow too rich. For this law provided against such changes, revoking once in fifty years all alienation, and setting every one to his former occupation, and renewing his family, in a manner we shall hereafter consider, wherein he was at the first. By which means ambition was retrenched, and every man applied himself with affection to the improvement of his inheritance, knowing it could never go out of his family. And this application was the more diligent, because it was a religious duty, founded upon this law of God.

Return every man unto his family.] From which he had been estranged by being sold to another family, either by himself, or by his father, or by the court of judgment. So here are two parts of the liberty forenamed more expressly declared: their land, which was alienated, returned to the first owner; and such as were sold for servants into another family came home again to their own family, being freed from the servitude under which they lay, and returned again to the computable year of the Lord," as St. Luke calls it (ch. iv. 19), in the prophet Isaiah's language, wherein our blessed Saviour preached deliverance to all mankind. The Jews themselves are not so stupid as to think nothing further was intended, but only freedom from bodily servitude in this year of jubilee; for Abbarbinel himself, in his apocalypse, endeavours to discover something of a spiritual happiness. For the former part of the words now mentioned, "ye shall return every man to his possession," he saith, belongs to the body; but the latter part, "and every man unto his family," belongs unto the soul, and its return to God: so several others, whom J. de Voisin produces in the forenamed book, (cap. vi. to his family.) And, if our Dr. Lightfoot hath made a right computation, the last year of the life of our Saviour, who, by his death, wrought an eternal redemption, and restored us to our heavenly inheritance, fell in the year of jubilee, the very last that was ever kept. For, if we count from the end of the wars of Canaan, which was seven years after they came into it (and I do not know why we should not reckon the forty-nine years before and after, as Maimonides would have it), there were just fourteen hundred years to the thirty-thrid of Jesus Christ, that is, just twenty-eight jubilees. And it is the confession of the old book called Zohar, as he observes, that "the Divine glory should be freedom and redemption in a year of jubilees" (see Harmony of the New Testament, sect. 59, and Usatini Chronologia Sacra, cap. 13).

Ver. 11. A jubilee shall that fifteenth year be unto you.] It is a question, whether the year of jubilee was the year following the forty-ninth year; or, the forty-ninth was the jubilee; which, reckoning the foregoing jubilee for one, was the fiftieth year. Joshua assures, in the words which follow; and though a number of other great men, are of this last opinion, to avoid a great inconvenience, which otherwise would ensue, viz. that the forty-ninth year being the jubilean year, in which the land was to rest, if the next year to that had been the jubilee, two jubilaeal years would have come immediately one after another; for the land was to rest in the year of jubilee, as it here follows. One would have expected, therefore, that in the forty-eighth year there should have been a special promise, that the land should bring forth fruit for four years, and not for three only, as the blessing is promised every sixth year (ver. 21). Thus Jacobus Capellus reasons, in his Historia Saeta et Exotica ad A.M. 2549. But others think this objection not to be so great, as to make them deny the distinction; for the letter of this law, which saith, "ye shall hallow the fiftieth year," and here in this verse, "a jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you," Though a very learned man, P. Cuneus, thinks this of no great moment either way; for it is usual, in common speech, septimannum octodiem appellare (and Hospinian, in like manner, We call a week odium, "eight days," because we reckon together, Dominic, "both the Lord's days"). And the greatest writers anciently called an olympiad, which contained but the space of four complete years, by the name of Quinquennium (see lib. i. de Republ, Judeorum, cap. 6). Yet, besides the express words of the law, the consent of the Jews sways very much the other way; for these are expressly distinguished by the shevilita, or year of remission, and jubel, the year of jubilee, even then when these two solemnities succeeded each other; as I shall have occasion to observe on the next verse.

Ye shall not sow, neither reap] Because it was the sabbatical year (ver. 4, 5), as some will have it; from the observance of which they were not absolved, by the being the jubilee. But others think, as I observed, that the jubilee itself was a new sabbatical year.

Ver. 19. For it is the jubile:] He doth not say it is "the sabbath of the land," as he doth of the seventh year (ver. 6). Which makes for their opinion who think the jubilee was not the same with that, but a lower sabbatical year. For these are expressly distinguished by the shevilita, or year of remission, and jubel, the year of jubilee, even then when these two solemnities succeeded each other; as I shall have occasion to observe on the next verse.

It shall be holy:] Because it was the Lord's sabbath (ver. 3), separate from the common employments of other years; being dedicated to the uses expressed in this law (ver. 10), which are two; manumission of servants, and restitution of men to their ancient possessions: unto which some add a third, viz. remission of debts. But the Jews are of a quite contrary opinion; that in this the year of jubilee differed from the sabbatical year—that debts were remitted in the one, but not in the other. Whence those words of Maimonides, In the treatise I have so often mentioned (cap. 10, sect. 16). "In this the sabbatical year excels the jubilee, that it loosens debts, which the jubilee doth not; but the jubilee in this excels the sabbatical year, that it sets servants free, and restores possessions, which the other doth not. And the jubilee likewise restores possessions in the very beginning of the year; but the sabbatical year doth not release debts till it be ended."

Ye shall eat the increase thereof:] By plucking what they needed for every day's use; but not by reaping, and gathering, and laying up in barns.

Ver. 13. In the year of this jubilee ye shall return every man unto his possession.] This being the most remarkable thing belonging to the liberty of this year, it is therefore here again repeated. For it was so bour, or buyer ought of thy neighbour's hand, ye shall not oppress one another:
15 According to the number of years after the jubilee thou shalt buy of thy neighbour, and according unto the number of years of the fruits he shall sell unto thee:
16 According to the multitude of years thou shalt increase the price thereof, and according to the fewness of years thou shalt diminish the price of it: for according to the number of the years of the fruits doth he sell unto thee.

famous, that the heathens themselves took notice of it; insomuch, that Diodorus Siculus saith (lib. xi.) it was not lawful for the Jews τοις άνθρωποις τεκνων σκληρως, "to sell their own inheritances:" meaning, as Mr. Selden expounds it (Lib. De Success. ad Leges Hebr. cap. 14), to sell them quite, so as to alienate them for ever from their families; which is expressly forbidden (Deut. xxiii. 23) And so the Lucianics, as is observed by Aristotle in his Politi, were proscribed by their laws to sell their ancient possessions (see P. Cuneus, lib. i. De Repub. Jud. cap. 4).

Many reasons are given, by learned men, for this law among the Jews (see Menochius, lib. iii. De Repub. Hebrar. Quest. 3). The most obvious is, that by this law God fixed the Jews to the land of Canaan; since all their possessions were so entailed, that the right heir of any of them could never be wholly excluded from his estate; but it would entirely return to him after a certain number of years. And, by this means also, they preserved a distinct knowledge of their several tribes and families to which they belonged; for which end their genealogies were of necessity kept so carefully, that they might be able to prove their right to the inheritance of their ancestors. By which means, as Menochius notes, it was certainly known of what tribe and family the Messiah was when he was born. And M. Alix hath taken notice (which is worth observing), that God ordered things so, that they should have the means of preserving their genealogies, by making them to continue in captivity out of their own land for the space of two whole jubilees. For they were but seventy years in Babylon; in which short time their genealogies could not be easily confounded, especially since several who saw the first temple burnt, lived to see the second begin to be rebuilt. Two other reasons are most judiciously managed by Petrus Cuneus, lib. i. De Republ. Hebr. cap. 3, to which I refer the learned reader.

Ver. 14.] As Moses took care that the wealth of some should not oppress the poverty of others, by making the foregoing law, that a poor man should not lose his land for ever; so, in buying of a poor man's land, he would not have the rich man give less for it than it was worth; nor more than the poor man require more for it than its just value till the year of jubilee. The Hebrew doctors have formed a rule about this: that if a man bought any thing for a sixth part less than it was worth, or sold it for a sixth part more than it was worth, he was bound to restore that sixth part; but nothing at all if it were short of a sixth part, which the seller had damaged his neighbour. But if the difference was more than a sixth part, the buyer might rescind his contract, if the bargain was not quite finished, and require his money again. And the seller (if the damage was on his side) might at any time require the thing to be returned to him at the price for which he sold it (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2).

17 Ye shall not therefore oppress one another: but thou shalt fear thy God: for I am the Lord thy God.
18 ¶ Wherefore ye shall do my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them; and ye shall dwell in the land in safety.
19 And the land shall yield her fruit, and ye shall eat your fill, and dwell therein in safety.
20 And if ye shall say, What shall we eat the seventh year? behold, we shall not sow, nor gather in our increase:
21 Then I will command my blessing upon you.

Ver. 15. According to the number of years—thou shalt buy] They were to consider how many years were left after the jubilee, and consequently to purchase the profits of the remaining years till the next; for they could not, either by sale or any other contract, transfer plenum fundum dominium (as Cuneus speaks), "their full interest in the land" to any other man.

He shall sell unto thee:] He that sold the remaining term of years till the jubilee, was to consider, that every sixth year there was no fruit, and therefore he should demand nothing for them; but set his price only according to the number of the other years, not reckoning those.

Ver. 16.] This is added only to make what was said before plain, that the price should rise or fall, according as there were more or fewer years to come after the next jubilee. For example, Maimonides puts this case: if there be ten years to the jubilee, and a man buy another's field for a hundred pence; after which, the buyer having enjoyed it three years, the seller hath a mind to redeem it; he must then give to him that bought it of him seventy pence. In like manner, if the buyer have enjoyed it six years, the seller should have his hundred pence.

For according to the number of the years the fruits doth sell unto thee:] Therefore, if a man, saith the same Maimonides (cap. 11, num. 6), sell another a field full of fruit, and after two years would redeem it, he must not demand him to restore the field as he sold it, full of fruit, because it is said here, "according to the number of years till the next jubilee, and the commodities." (And in the foregoing verse, "according to the number of years after the jubilee") which shows the years only were to be considered in the redemption, and not the fruits.

Ver. 17. Ye shall not therefore oppress one another:] The seller by demanding too much, nor the buyer by giving too little.

But thou shalt fear thy God:] For nothing could be so powerful as the fear of God to restrain them from oppression, and to preserve an equality between the land to be sold and the price to be paid.

For I am the Lord your God:] Whose land this is, and whosoever favour you enjoy it.

Ver. 18. Ye shall do my statutes:] Which is the tenure whereby you hold this land of me.

Ye shall dwell in the land in safety.] And if you obey them, you shall not be disturbed in it by your enemies.

Ver. 19.] He encourages them in their obedience by a promise of plenty and abundance, as well as of safety and quietness in their possession.

Ver. 20.] To take away all distrust of his promise, he removes an obvious objection which might arise in their minds; that they might want food, if they neither sowed nor gathered in their increase in the seventh year, as he required.

Ver. 21.] This is the answer to the doubt they you in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years.
22 And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of old fruit until the ninth year; until her fruitful years be fulfilled: then ye shall eat of the old store.
23 But the land shall not be sold for ever; for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me.
24 And in all the land of your possession ye shall grant a redemption for the land:

might have of wanting sustenance, that he would bless them with such a plentiful crop in the sixth year, as should be sufficient for that and for the two following years. From which Petrus Cuneus thinks the argument very strong, that there were not two sabbatical years together, one in the forty-ninth, and another in the fiftieth year; for then the earth in the sixth year should have brought forth not for three years, but for four; which was never heard of in any country. Palestine, indeed, was a country, to which God afforded an extraordinary blessing, beyond the common laws of nature; yet, since there are no testimonies of so great and frequent a miracle in the book of God, we can therefore never believe this. The foregone, 1. De Repub. Heb. cap. 6. To which it may be replied, that this was not so frequent as he makes it, but only once in fifty years; and the reason why Moses here saith, the land should bring forth fruit for three years, and not for four, is, because he speaks only with respect to the common sabbatical years, (every seventh year,) not to the great sabbatical year, as theirs, or the forty-ninth; before which, God may very well be supposed to have blessed the earth with a larger crop than in any other preceding sixth year. Besides, though it is said they should not sow in the jubilee, (ver. 11,) yet it is not said they might not prune their trees, as it is of other sabbatical years, (ver. 4,) so that they might be dressed as in other common years, to yield a plentiful increase for their support in the succeeding year.

Ver. 22. Ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of old fruit until the ninth: Some have interpreted these words, as if they were to eat the old store till the fruits of the ninth year came in; and bring it as an offering to the sanctuary, which was his royal palace: and they were all his tenants, who held the land of him as long as he pleased; but were no more to him than the proselytes were to them. The land was his, and not theirs; and it is possible that the sale of the fruits of it, but had not the property (see Mr. Mede, p. 157.)

Ver. 24.] If any man whose poverty had forced him to sell his land, grew afterward so rich that he was able to redeem it before the year of jubilee, this law provides he should be permitted to do it, and the buyer could not refuse it. But then this was to be done honestly and truly; he was not to borrow money of another man to redeem it; no, nor sell other land to redeem that which he had sold before, which they looked upon as a fraud to the buyer. Therefore he had this right only in case he had grown rich since the sale; otherwise he was to stay till the year of jubilee, when it returned to him for nothing. So Cuneus out of the same Maimonides (lib. 1. cap. 2.)

Ver. 25. If thy brother be waxen poor, and hath sold away some of his possession, No man, if we may rely upon the same Maimonides, might sell his house or his field till the time of jubilee, unless poverty compelled him to do it. For it was not lawful to sell it, that he might lay up the price of it in his coffers; or exercise merchandise; or buy goods, servants, or cattle; but only buy necessary provision with it. But if any man did transgress, and employed the money otherwise, the sale notwithstanding was held to be good.

Then shall he redeem that which his brother sold. Here is a further enlargement of this liberty; that if any of his near relations would redeem the land he had sold (though he was not able to do it himself,) he should be allowed: for the design of Moses in this law was not to oppress the poor, but to prevent oppression here.

Ver. 26.] In the Hebrew it is, "his hand hath attained and found sufficiency:" which justifies the limitation the Jews put upon this (as I observed, ver. 24), that he should not have the right of redemption, unless he was grown able to repurchase it since the sale of it.

Ver. 27.] This was the manner of the redemption: they counted how many years were gone since the sale; and if there remained just so many more to the 23 But if he be not able to restore it to him, then that which is sold shall remain in the hand of him that hath bought it until the year of jubilee: and in the jubilee it shall go out, and he shall return unto his possession.

20 And if a man sell a dwelling house in a walled city, then he may redeem it within a whole year after it is sold; within a full year may he redeem it.

30 And if it be not redeemed within the space of a full year, then the house that is in the walled city shall be established for ever unto the Lord: however the houses of the Levites in the cities of their possession may be redeemed.

21 But the houses of the villages which have no wall round about shall be counted as the fields of the country: they may be redeemed, and they shall go out in the jubilee.

32 Notwithstanding the cities of the Levites, and the houses of the cities of their possession, may the Levites redeem at any time.

33 And if a man purchase of the Levites, then the house that was sold, and the city of his possession, shall go out in the year of jubilee: for as much as the jubilee is his, and he bought it throughout his generations: it shall not go out in the jubilee.

31 But the houses of the villages which have no wall round about shall be counted as the fields of the country: they may be redeemed, and they shall go out in the jubilee.

32 Notwithstanding the cities of the Levites, and the houses of the cities of their possession, may the Levites redeem at any time.
the houses of the cities of the Levites are their possession among the children of Israel.
31 But the field of the suburbs of their cities may not be sold; for it is their perpetual possession.

35 ¶ And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee; then thou shalt relieve him: yea, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner; that he may live with thee.
36 Take thou no usury of him, or increase:

however, they were to be restored to that tribe at the jubilee.

For the houses of the cities] It is plain by this, that in the foregoing words he speaks of the houses, and not of the cities themselves.

Are their possession] They were of the same nature with the land that other tribes had; which could not be alienated for ever. For they having no other possessions that could be sold, but houses, it was reason these houses should return to their owners at the jubilee, as other men's possessions did (ver. 10). Ver. 31. But the field] See Numb. xxxiv. 4, 5. May not be sold] As their houses might be; but if any man bought them, the bargain was immediately void. The tradition among the Jews (as Maimonides says in the same place), was, that not to be sold in this place, signifies not to be changed; so as to turn a suburb into a field, or a field into a suburb; but fields, suburbs, and cities, were to continue perpetually in the same state.

For it is their perpetual possession.] Their fields were to be always in their own hands. And the reason why houses might be sold, when the fields could not, seems to be this: because the houses belonged to particular Levites, who might alienate them for a time, and not suffer much by it; but the fields of the suburbs were common to the whole body of the Levites, who would have been undone if they had wanted pasture for their flocks, which were all their substance. Some indeed fancy that these suburbs were enclosed, and every family of them had its several possessing; but as there is no proof of this, so, had it been thus, such families could not, without great inconveniency, have wanted their lands for the feeding of their flocks.

Ver. 35. If thy brother be waxen poor.] In the Hebrew it is, "When his hand faileth;" so that he is not able by his labour to support himself and his family.

Then thou shalt relieve him:] By bestowing alms upon him (as the Jews interpret it), not by lending him money; though the following words seem to incline this way (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6).

Yes, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner:] By a stranger, they understand a proselyte of righteousness, and by a sojourner (as Mr. Selden there observes, out of Jerach and Abarbinel, p. 694.) They say Hyrcanus was the first that began proselyeth, "to entertain strangers of other countries," by building hospitals for their reception.

That he may live with thee.] Have a comfortable subsistence by the relief of charitable people; for every Jew, they were bound to contribute something towards it; and this was to prevent their selling themselves, as some did, through extreme poverty (ver. 39).

Ver. 36. Take thou no usury of him, or increase:] Though these are promisingly used, yet the next verse seems here to expose usury to signify that which is taken for corn, fruits, or goods. They that would see more of these two words, neseek and taribith, may consult Salmasius De Usuris, where he hath largely discussed of them. I shall only further observe, that this precept follows the other of relieving poor people by alms very fitly; because it is as great a charity unto some to lend them money without usury, as it is to give freely unto others (see notes on Exod. xxii. 25: Deut. xxxiii. 19).

But fear thy God.] Last he that is so good to thee shall punish thee for thy inhumanity towards the poor; of whom he hath a care as well as thee.

That thy brother may live with thee.] This is repeated, to show that by these laws God intended to provide for the poor such a comfortable subsistence in their own country, that they might not be tempted to forsake it, and therewith perhaps forsake their religion.

Ver. 37.] Some thought, if they lent money freely they might receive more than they lent of other things; therefore, the latter clause of this verse was added, to prevent such oppressions as St. Jerome mentions; who says, some would lend a neighbour ten bushels of corn, suppose, in winter, to receive fifteen bushels at the next harvest.

Ver. 38. I am the Lord your God, &c.] Who have obliged you with far greater blessings than I command you to bestow upon others.

To give you the land of Canaan.] Under such covenants as have been mentioned.

To be your God.] To preserve you in the possession of it in peace and plenty, if you keep these covenants (ver. 18, 19).

Ver. 39. If thy brother be sold unto thee.] Some were sold by the court of judgment, when they had committed theft, and were not able to make satisfaction; of whom the Hebrews interpret that place, Exod. xxii. 2, &c. Others were sold by their parents (ver. 7, 8, or 9, v. 19) But they were sold themselves, being reduced to great poverty, notwithstanding the alms that had been bestowed upon them, and the money or goods that had been freely lent them. And of such the Hebrew doctors understand these words; and say, it was not lawful for a man to sell himself till his poverty was extreme, and he had nothing at all left, but must preserve his life by the price which was given for him. Thus Maimonides explains in these words: "A man might not sell himself to lay up the money which was given for him; nor to buy goods; nor to pay his debts; but merely that he might get bread to eat. Neither was it lawful for him to sell himself, as long as he had so much as a garment left." See Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7. Where he observes, that the court of judgment might not sell a thief of their nation to any but to a Hebrew; not to a proselyte of either sort; much less to a mere gentile. But if a Hebrew sold him to a proselyte, or to a gentile (which he was admonished not to do), the bargain was good, but he was to be redeemed by his kindred, or by the people; as it here follows, ver. 45, 49. Which other
LEVITICUS.

40 But as an hired servant, and as a sojourner, he shall be with thee, and shall serve thee unto the year of jubilee: 41 And then shall he depart from thee, both he and his children, with his bread and shall return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers shall he return, 42 For they are my servants, which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: they shall not be sold as bondmen.

43 Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour; but shalt fear thy God.

people imitated, who derived their laws from Moses; particularly the ancient Indians (as Huetius observes out of Diodorus) whose philosophers commanded that none of their nation should submit themselves to servitude (Dennistone. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 6.). Thou shall not compel him to serve as a bondservant. As a slave which they bought of other nations, or took in their wars; over whom they had an absolute dominion (as they had over their goods, or cattle), and might bequeath them and their children to their sons and posterity forever (Ver. 45, 46), or sell them and their children at their pleasure. Ver. 10. But as an hired servant. They were to treat him gently; as they did those who let out their service for wages, for a certain time, and then were at their own disposal again. He shall be with thee. Some of the Jews have carried this very far in speculation. For thus they said upon this place in Jalkut: "Let him be with thee in meat and drink; so that thou do not eat bread of fine flour, and he of bran; nor thou drink old wine, and he new; nor thou lie on a soft bed, and he upon straw." But it is not likely that this was their practice. Shalt serve him unto the year of jubilee. Beyond which time it was not lawful to keep him in service: for in the very beginning of this year, all such servants were immediately dismissed. Which made the year of jubilee such a time of joy, that for nine days together, before it began, these servants kept a kind of Saturnalia, in prospect of their approaching happiness. For, as Maimonides saith in the latter end of the second chapter, "Sat havye, from the beginning of the year until the day of atonement, servants were neither dismissed, nor yet served their masters, but they did eat, and drink, and made merry; wearing garlands on their heads. And when the day of atonement came, the Sanhedrin commanding the trumpet to be sounded, all servants immediately went whether they pleased; as lands were restored to their first owners." Ver. 41. Then shall he depart from thee. His master to whom he was sold might keep him till the jubilee: whereas he that was sold by the court of judgment might go free, if he pleased, in the seventh year of release (Exod. xxi. 2). Both he and his children. He that bought a servant of the court of judgment, was bound to maintain his wife and children, if he had any, with meat, drink, and clothes; and yet they were not bound to serve him: much less did they remain servants, when their father's and mother's servitude was at an end; as Mr. Selden observes in the forenamed place: and therefore it is more reasonable in this case that he and his children should go out together. Shall return unto his own family. From which he was gone, while he remained a servant. Unto the possession of his fathers. If any was befallen him since his servitude.

44 Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shalt ye buy bondmen and bondmaids.

45 Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they beget in your land: and they shall be your possession.

46 And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever.

Ver. 42. For they are my servants. &c.] A good reason why they should not be treated like slaves: because they were all redeemed by God out of the service of the heathen, for them to bring into a state of perfect liberty. They shall not be sold. Not publicly, and in the common place of sale, or in the street, but privately, and in a way of honour (as the Jewish phrase is). So Maimonides, alleged by Mr. Selden, in the forenamed place, p. 705. But the plainest sense is, they should not be used like slaves, while they continued in their service; though by law they had the use of their persons in all bodily employments, yet their bodies or persons were not theirs, and therefore they might not use them as they pleased. So it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 43. Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour. As Pharaoh did over all the Israelites (Exod. L 13, 14), or other, the Israelites were wont to do over their servants of other nations; but gently use their service in such employments as would not be unworthy of them if they were freemen. But shalt fear thy God. Remembering that they were all slaves in Egypt, and delivered by his wonderful goodness; which was thankfully and reverently to be acknowledged.

Ver. 46. Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids—shall be of the heathen. If they would have any slaves, they were to be such of other nations, as were sold to them, or were taken by them in their wars. Whence the very name of mancipia came, as the Roman lawyers tell us, quasi mons capti: and the name of servus also, which signifies one who was saved, when he might have been killed. Round about you. He doth not say in the midst of thee: for they were bound to destroy the people of Canaan. Of them shall ye buy bondmen. If they had need of their service. But it does not appear that they had any great number of them; nor had they any great occasion for them, in being themselves as laborious, and breeding their children to look after their land and their cattle (in which their estates chiefly consisted), and being also so very numerous in a small country.

Ver. 43. Of the children of the strangers—of them shall ye buy. Whether they were perfect proselytes by circumcision, or only proselytes of the gate (as Mr. Selden observes, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 8.), their children were not exempted from being made slaves, if they sold them to the Hebrews. Of their families. If any of their family or kindred, as the LXX. translate it, had begot children in Judea, and would sell them, the Jews might make a purchase of them, and make them slaves, as below.

They shall be your possession. Become your proper goods, and continue with you as your lands do, unless they have their liberty granted to them. And the first sort of proselytes obtained it three ways; either by purchasing it themselves, or by their friends; but over your brethren the children of Israel, ye shall not rule one over another with rigour.
CHAPTER XXV.

47 ¶ And if a sojourner or stranger wax rich by thee, and thy brother that dwelleth by him wax poor, and sell himself unto the stranger or sojourner by thee, or to the stock of the stranger's family:

48 After that he is sold he may be redeemed again; one of his brethren may redeem him:

49 Either his uncle, or his uncle's son, may redeem him, or any that is nigh of kin unto him of his family may redeem him; or if he be able, he may redeem himself.

50 And he shall reckon with him that bought or by being dismissed by their master, by a writing under his hand; or in the case mentioned in Exod. xxi. 26, where the loss of an eye, or a tooth, by the master's severity, serve only for examples of other maims, which procured such a servant his liberty. But the second sort of proselytes did not obtain their liberty, if we may believe the Hebrew doctors, by this last means, but only by the first two. And the year of jubilee gave no servants of either sort their liberty.

V. 46. Ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children.] To whom they might bequeath the very bodies of them and their children.

51 If there be yet many years behind, according unto them he shall give again the price of his redemption out of the money that he was bought for.

52 And if there remain but few years unto the year of jubilee, then he shall count with him, and according unto his years shall he give him again the price of his redemption.

53 And as a yearly hired servant shall he be him from the year that he was sold to him unto the year of jubile: and the price of his sale shall be according unto the number of years, according to the time of an hired servant shall it be with him.

54 If he be strong enough to rule over his master, then his master shall not defraud his hired servant of his price.

55 According to the time of an hired servant shall he be with him; or, if they did not, he was to be redeemed at the charge of the country; and that, though he sold himself a second time, after he had been redeemed. But if he sold himself a third time, they looked upon him as unworthy of redemption, unless it were merely to save his life (see Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7). But the fifty-fourth verse seems to suggest, that they were not bound to redeem him; though they might, if they pleased, and his master could not refuse it.

One of his brethren may redeem him.] This Redeemer (saith R. Bechai) is the Messiah, the Son of David, of the tribe of Judah: which I mention to show, that the Jews thought there was something more Divine couched under this law of the jubilee (as I observed, ver. 10), than the very letter of it imported. Though the truth is, they wretchedly mistook the Messiah: for the same R. Bechai (speaking of this section of the law) saith, “It contains a sign and a hope to Israel of redemption from the captivity of the four monarchies;” as if the Messiah should have nothing to do, but to put them in possession of their own country, and to make them lords of the world.

55 Here the persons are named by whom his redemption might be made; which, in short, was by any man of his family.

He may redeem himself.] If, after his sale, an estate fell to him, whereby he became able to redeem his liberty.

56 That no injury might be done to his master, they were to compute how long he had served him, and how long he had still to serve, and what price was paid for him; and then, according to the number of years gone and to come, he was to make his demands: which is the meaning of the following words, “And the price of his sale shall be according to the number of years.”

57 According to the time of an hired servant] The labour and services that he had done him was to be valued, as they would do that of a hireling (who wrought for so much by the day or the year), and deducting from that the price which was given for him, the remainder was the price of this redemption.

58 If he had served but a few years, and there were many to come before the jubilee; then there was less to be deducted from what his master gave for him, and the price of his redemption was higher. But if there remained “but few years unto the year of jubilee” (as it follows in the next verse), then less was to be given for his redemption, because he had had his service a long time.

59 If he was a hired servant?] His master was to treat him as a hired servant, who let out his service for wages by the year; and that both with respect to the price of his redemption, and to his usage with him: and the other shall not rule with rigour over him in thy sight.

54 And if he be not redeemed in these years, then he shall go out in the year of jubilee, both he, and his children with him.

while he remained in his service: as appears by the next words.

The other shall not rule with rigour over him] Use him harshly and severely: for one Israelite was not permitted to use another in that manner (ver. 43), and therefore much less was it to be suffered from a stranger.

In thy sight.] If they observed any such rigorous usage, they were to endeavour to get it remedied by the authority of the magistrate.

Ver. 54. He be not redeemed in these years, &c.] If neither his kindred nor country redeemed him, nor he was able to redeem himself (ver. 49), from the time he was sold to the year of jubilee, he was to stay till then; when he went out, as others did, without paying any thing for his liberty. By which it is evident that he had not the benefit of the seventh year of release, as Hebrew servants had who served Hebrew masters.

For it had been unequal, if Hebrews sold to proselytes had been discharged from their service so soon, when the children of proselytes sold to Hebrews (ver. 45) were to be their inheritance for ever. It was more reasonable (and therefore so here enacted), that the Hebrews sold to proselytes should not be free till the year of jubilee, unless they were redeemed by themselves or their friends. By which law also they were made more careful not to sell themselves to strangers.

He, and his children with him.] It seems a proselyte was bound, when he bought a Hebrew servant, to maintain his family while he served him; as the Hebrews were bound to do, when they bought one of their own nation (ver. 31).

Ver. 55. And if any Hebrew servant have them serve with rigour nor beyond the year of jubilee, because they were his servants by a peculiar title, being redeemed by him from the Egyptian bondage, where they were held a long time in cruel servitude (ver. 38).

I am the Lord your God.] Your sovereign, who will be ever kind to you, while you serve and obey me.

CHAPTER XXVI.

1 Of idolatry. 2 Religionsness. 3 A blessing to them that keep the commandments. 14 A curse to those that break them. 40 God promiseth to remember them that repent.

I Ye shall make you no idols nor graven image, neither rear you up a standing image, neither shall ye set up any image of stone in your land, to bow down unto it: for I am the Lord your God.

CHAP. XXVI. Ver. 1. Ye shall make you no idols] This precept hath been often mentioned: but being now to enforce all his precepts by the most solemn promises and threatenings, he repeats the principal thing upon which all depended, which was, that they should keep close to the worship of him, the only God, and abhor all idolatry, which he knew would corrupt their manners.

The Hebrew word idol hath been observed before (ch. xix. 4), to express contempt: signifying the idols (as we translate it) which the heathen worshipped, to be mere empty vanities, things of nought, as we speak; and therefore to be rejected with disdain, rather than any way regarded.

Nor graven image.] The Hebrew word pe'el signifies the image of any thing hewn out of wood or stone (see Exod. xx. 4). These images the gentiles did not worship, till they were dedicated and consecrated with certain rites and ceremonies (which were very various, according to the difference of the deities, and the superstitions of several countries), by which consecration they imagined their gods were invited to be present in these images and statues; otherwise they were not so stupid as to worship wood and stone.

Neither rear you up a standing image.] The Hebrew word matsu'bh, is translated by the LXX. στήλη, "a pillar," as we also translate it in the margin. And if we translate it statue or standing image, we are not to understand by it the figure of a man, or of any other creature; but, as the Hebrews seem rightly to take it for any work, or altar, in wood, which is erected and set up for sacred assemblies to be held thereat, though they be to the true God. So Maimonides (as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6), who saith, this was the custom among idolaters, to erect such statues to their gods. And so Pausanias saith (in his Achaeis), that in ancient time among the Greeks universally, άγαλμα έγαλμα έγαλμα, "stone images, instead of images, had Divine honours paid to them" (see Maimonides De Cultu Stell. et Plan. cap. 6, sect. 8). These were the most ancient monuments of all other; and being plain and simple, might be thought to be less tempting and inviting, than those images which had the figure of men, or other creatures; yet, even these God forbids to his whatsoever, because he would have no representation of himself to whatsoever, though it might seem to have no danger in it. These were they which the Greeks called ζάρια (see upon Gen. xxviii. 19, and Selden De Diis Syris, Synag. 2, cap. 1).

Neither—any image of stone.] There was greater reason they should not set up Zara Makhibth, which signifies carved or figured stones that had pictures cut in it, as the Hebrews understand it (see Maimonides in the place before named, and Dionysius Vossius's notes upon him). And Mr. Selden observes, also, it was unlawful to set up these in their land (as Moses here speaks), though it were without the temple; and it was no more permitted to a proselyte than to an Israelite. If any man did make such statues, he was bitten.

Possibly this may signify such images as were common among the Egyptians in aftertimes; which were not representations of their gods, but were full of symbols and hieroglyphics, expressing some of the perfections of their gods. These God would as little allow among his people as any of the former; such caution he used to prevent this sort of idolatry, by image-worship.
Ye shall keep my sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary: I am the Lord.

If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them:

Then I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit.

And your threshing shall reach unto the vintage, and the vintage shall reach unto the sowing time: and ye shall eat your bread to the full, and dwell in your land safely.

And I will give peace in the land, and ye shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid: and I will rid evil beasts out of the land, neither shall the sword go through your land.

To bow down unto it:] Though they did not worship it, but only worship God before it. I am the Lord your God.]

Who admit of no such things where I am worshipped (Exod. xx. 4).

Ver. 2.] See ch. xix. 30, where there is the same precept: which seems to be here repeated, because, if they kept his sabbaths, they would preserve them from idolatry, being appointed for the worship of the Creator of all things: especially if they had such a sense of his Divine majesty as warranted reverence in them, even to his sanctuary.

Ver. 3. If ye walk in my statutes.] If the regard you have to my majesty make you obedient to my laws.

Ver. 4. Rain in due season.] Here follow the promises of all things that men naturally most desire for their happy living here in this world. And first he assures them they should have fruitful seasons, which depended upon rain in due time (Jer. v. 24). For Canaan was not a country like Egypt, which was watered and make fertile by the overflowing of their river; but without rain was quite barren.

The head shall yield her increase.] Corn for the use of men; and grass for the cattle.

The trees of the field shall yield their fruit.] Which was very various, every one knows, such as figs, pomegranates, dates, apples, &c. which he promises they should never want.

Ver. 5. Ye shall eat your bread to the full.] This is a promise of such plenty of corn, that before they could have reaped it all, and threshed it out, the vintage would be ready, and call for their labour about it; and before they could have pressed out their wine, it would be time to sow again: as much as to say, they should have such abundance, that they should have season time enough to receive and lay up one blessing before another came upon them.

Ye shall eat your bread to the full.] Have no want of any sort of provision (which is comprehended under the name of bread), but as much as you can desire: which promise may seem to have a peculiar regard to the command lately given, ch. xxv. 4, 11, though there he took care to secure them by a special promise, that they should not want in those years (ver. 20, 21), and therefore much less in any other.

Dwell in your land safely.] Plenty would have been little satisfaction to them, if they had been in danger to lose it, or to be disturbed in it; and therefore he promises to defend and protect them in the secure enjoyment of it (see ch. xxv. 15, 19).

Ver. 6. Ye shall not git evil beasts out of the land.] There shall be no insurrections or seditions in your country, which are wont to arise from poverty and discontent: for this seems to relate to peace among themselves; as the latter end of the verse, to freedom from the desolations their enemies might make among them.

None shall make you afraid.] It is a promise to preserve them from housebreakers and robbers.

I will rid evil beasts out of the land.] Which (as it will appear from ver. 22) made lamentable havoc when they increased, and were let loose upon them: but these promises to extirpate, if they would be obedient, either by hindering their breed, or making them devour one another, or driving them out of their own country.

Neither shall the sword go through your land.] Their enemies should not be able to penetrate their country, to make any ravage there.

Ver. 7.] This supposes their neighbours might invade their country, but should fail in their attempt, and be driven away with shame.

Ver. 8. Five of you shall chase an hundred, &c.] That is, a few shall be too hard for a great multitude; as it proved in the conquest of Canaan: insomuch that Joshua saith (ch. xxii. 10), "One man of you shall chase a thousand." Which was fulfilled in the days of Gideon, who, with three hundred men, put to flight a vast army (Judg. vii. 22).

Your enemies shall fall before you.] Which commonly made a greater slaughter in their flight than was made in the battle.

Ver. 9. Ye shall have respect unto you.] The reason of which great success (as well as of the plenty before mentioned), he would make them sensible, was God's great kindness and favour towards them, as the reward of their obedience. This Joshua most thankfully acknowledges, ch. xxiii. 9.

Multiply you.] Make you a populous, and consequently a powerful nation.

Establish my covenant with you.] Keep it inviolably, and most certainly perform it (see Gen. vi. 15).

Ver. 10. Ye shall eat old store.] Have a great deal of old corn left when the new is come in.

Bring forth the old:] Have so much of it left, as to want room for it when the new is to be laid up.

Ver. 11. I will set my tabernacle among you.] This is the great promise of all, that his tabernacle, wherein he dwelt among them, should remain and abide with them: for it was set already among them; but now he promises it should be fixed; that is, his Divine presence should continue with them.

My soul shall not abhor you.] I will not cast you off, because of your offences; for which I have appointed an expiation.

Ver. 12. I will walk among you.] Conduct you from place to place, all the time you are in this wilderness. For he dwelling in the tabernacle, in the cloud of glory which covered it; when that cloud was taken...
I am the Lord your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt; that ye should not be their bondmen; and I have broken the bands of your yoke, and made you to go upright.

But if ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments; and if ye despise my statutes, or if ye shall not hear unto all these commandments, but that ye break my covenant:

I also will do this unto you; I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart: and ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it.

And I will set my face against you, and ye shall be slain before your enemies: they that hate you shall reign over you; and ye shall flee when none pursueth you.

And if ye will not yet for all this hearken unto me, then I will punish you seven times more for your sins.

And I will break the pride of your power; and I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass:

up, the ark presently moved to go before them, and led them to the next station, where they should pitch their tents, Numb. x. 11, 12 (see Exod. xxv. 8). This is given as the reason why they should keep their camp from all impurities (see Deut. xiii. 12—14).

Will be your God.] Bring you to the land of Canaan; and there continue with you, and bless you as my peculiar people.

I am the Lord your God, which brought you forth] I will not leave my own work imperfect; but as I delivered you from the Egyptian slavery, so I will continue to preserve your liberty and happiness.

That ye should not be their bondmen.] Remain any longer their slaves, as they intended to make you for ever:

I have broken the bands of your yoke.] When you could not deliver yourselves, I set you free from the heavy burdens which oppressed you.

Made you go upright.] They were so loaded with insupportable burdens in Egypt, that they could not look up, but hung down their heads with heaviness; till God, by setting them free, made them go out from the midst of them with dejection, but with cheerful countenance. For that is the meaning of making them go upright; as freemen, not bowed down with oppression, but lifting up their heads for joy at their deliverance (see Exod. xiv. 8).

Ver. 14. After the promise of these extraordinary blessings, as the reward of their obedience, he threatens them with extraordinary plagues and calamities, if they were disobedient. And as nothing moves us more powerfully than hope of some good, or fear of some evil; so there are no greater blessings in this world than those which God's promises gave them hope to enjoy, nor greater evils than those of which his threatenings put them in fear. But such is the Divine goodness, he always offers mercy before he proceeds to judgment, and mingles judgment with mercy, before he proceeds in rigour of justice, which will appear in the following threatenings.

Ver. 15. If ye shall despise my statutes.] They were not thus wicked at the first; but disobedience to God's commands (mentioned in the foregoing verse) proceeded to a contumacious neglect of them; and that in time to an abhorrence of them.

So that ye will not do all my commandments.] Though often admonished by his prophets; whose messages they not only rejected, but slighted and despised.

But that ye break my covenant.] By forsaking him, and falling to idolatry. For that was the principal thing in the covenant, that they should have no other God but him alone.

Ver. 16. I also will do this unto you.] I will alter the method of my providence towards you.

I will even appoint over you.] Or, as it is in the Hebrew, upon you; causing the following diseases to seize upon them (as the phrase signifies) and arrest them; that they might feel the heavy displeasure of Him, whose laws they set at naught.

Terror, consumption, and the burning ague.] It is not certain what diseases are comprehended under these words; especially the first, behalah, which we translate terror. But, coming from a word importing haste and precipitancy, it takes me to signify the falling sickness; whereby people are so suddenly surprised, that they sometimes fall into the fire by which they are then consumed. The second word, parashah, is very slightly translated. For the second sokephoth is by Kimchi and a great many others understood to signify a consumption, or a hectic fever; though R. Solomon and some others seem to take it for a dropsey; for he says it is a disease that puffis up the flesh, or (as David de Pomis) makes it to break out in blutches (see Bochart in his Hierozoic, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 14). As for the last word, chaddachoth, it coming from a word denoting great heat, may well be translated a burning fever.

Consume the eyes.] Make you look ghastly.

Cause sorrow of heart.] Take away all the comfort of life.

Ye shall sow your seed in vain.] Next to bodily sickness, he threatens them with the incursions of their enemies; which was a higher punishment than the former, according to that of David, it is better to fall into the hands of the Lord, than into the hands of men. Here also it is observable, he doth not threaten the worst that their enemies might do to them; but first, he threatens them with the diseases; and adds after, and makes a scarcity among them; and in the next verse, speaks of delivering them to be slain by them.

Ver. 17. I will set my face against you.] Be extremely angry with you (see ch. xvii. 10).

Ye shall be slain before your enemies.] The neighbouring nations oftimes made great slaughter of them, and conquered them; as we find in the book of Judges; and in the beginning of the first book of Samuel.

They that hate you shall reign over you.] And grievously oppressed them (Judges iv. 3, vi. 2, &c.). This made them very contemptible; and was a just punishment of their contempt of God's laws.

Ye shall flee when none pursueth you.] Lose all your courage strange opposite to the promise, ver. 7, 8.

Ver. 18. If ye will not yet for all this hearken.] If by these sore punishments they were not reclaimed from their idolatrous practices, he threatens to send greater.

Then I will punish you seven times more.] The number seven is used for an indefinite multitude, and therefore here signifies a great increase of their plagues; which, by their continued provocations, became more and more grievous than in former ages.

Ver. 19. I will break the pride of your power.] That power wherein you glory. Which some understand of the sanctuary; which in the days of Eli was for-
And your strength shall be spent in vain; for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruits.

And if ye walk contrary unto me, and will not hearken unto me; I will bring seven times more plagues upon you according to your sins.

I will send wild beasts among you, which shall rob you of your children, and do saken of the ark of God's strength (as the Psalmist calls it). 1 Sam. vi. 9, 11. But it seems rather to relate to their numerous forces, which at the first were everywhere victorious; but, after sundry defeats in foregoing times, were in the days of Saul reduced to such straits, that they hid themselves in caves, and pits, and thickets, &c., and there was not a sword or a spear to be found in any of their hands (save Saul's and Jonathan's) when they should have fought with their enemies (1 Sam. xiii. 7, 22).

I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass.] The one, he means, should afford no rain, and the other, for want of moisture, bring forth no fruit; which must needs make a sore famine among them.

Ver. 20.] This is a further description of that calamity; when, after all their labour in ploughing and sowing their land, or digging and dunging their trees, they brought forth nothing for their wild beasts: we read in Scripture of such famines, wherein man and beast were ready to perish; particularly 1 Kings xvii. 1, 13, xviii. 15; 2 Kings viii. 1.

Ver. 21. If ye walk contrary unto me.] Go on in your idolatrous courses, directly contrary to my commandments (ver. 17, 18, 22). Be obedient to the admonitions of his prophets, whom he sent to call them to repentance.

I will bring seven times more plagues upon you.] As their sins increased, so did their plagues; for these that follow are more dreadful than the foregoing. And it was a high aggravation of their sins, that they would take no warning by the severe punishments which God inflicted upon their forfathers. This augmented his plagues upon succeeding generations; which, as Dr. Jackson speaks, usually run by the scale of sevens; so that if we call the literal meaning to a strict arithmetical account, these latter plagues were nine-and-forty times heavier than the former. But it is more than probable, that the number of the plagues was a round number, which annulled the exactness of the computation; yet denoting a very great increase of their punishments, beyond what had been in preceding times.

It ought to be observed, that there is in the margin another rendering of the first words of this verse ("If ye walk contrary to me"), which some follow; "If ye walk at all adventures with me:" that is, live carelessly, as if you had no regard at all to me; I will have as little regard to you, or concern for you. But the ancient translations go the other way.

Ver. 22. I will also send wild beasts, &c.] If the terrible famine would not work upon their stubborn hearts, no more than the forenamed sicknesses and wars (ver. 16, 17, 18, 20), then he threatens they and their cattle should also be made food for the wild beasts. The principal of which were lions, unto which the depopulation and devastation of countries are ascribed in Scripture; particularly in the prophet Jeremiah (ch. ii. 15, iv. 7), where the Assyrians and Nebuchadnezzar are here compared to lions, because by these fierce beasts were sometimes laid desolate the land, and the inhabitants of it, the very singlet by singlet, were devoured by them. We read of no other that killed the people planted in Samaria by the king of Assyria, instead of the Israelites, whom they carried away captive (2 Kings xvii. 23). And God threatened to destroy the remnant of Moab by the same means (Isa. xv. 9). But there were worse than wild beasts also to do this execution (Jer. v. 6). As bears, who killed two-and-forty children at one time (2 Kings ii. 24). Serpents and cockatrices (Jer. viii. 17). And in general, that prophet threatens the destruction of Judea by such creatures (Jer. xv. 3). Nor are examples wanting in other histories of such calamities; one monument of which continues still in the church. For the solemn prayers in Rogation week were first instituted (as Sidney relates) by Mamertus, bishop of Vienne, in France, for this reason among others, that wolves and other wild beasts did very great mischief in those parts (see Sirmundus, in lib. vii. Epist. 1). Nay, some countries have been so infested with smaller creatures, as serpents, particularly Spain, by reason, that they left nothing untouched; being noxious not only to roots and seeds, but subverting whole towns, which were undermined by them. And in the neighbouring islands, called Baleares, they were so plagued with them, that they were forced to petition Augustus to send soldiers to defend them from these little animals (see Bochartus, in his Phaenomena, lib. iv. cap. 114).

Your high ways shall be desolate.] For travellers would not venture into the highways, for fear of the wild beasts, and because of the scarcity of people to give them entertainment. It is observable, that this plague is directly opposite to the blessing promised unto their obedience (ver. 6), where he saith, I will make thee grassy and fruitful, I will give thee a land full of fruits. And such was the case, and is the case in the present state of the most backward parts of the world, particularly in parts of Africa, America, and some other countries.

But we speak of the short and fleeting duration of this state, and the want of those luxuries which are enjoyed in other parts of the world. For, as this was a plague, so it was a curse, to be so far removed from the original blessedness of the earth. And this is to be observed, that wherever there was an obstruction of the grace of God, there was a defect in our blessing. And this is no matter for wonder, because without the word of God, no great progress can be made in the way of salvation. And it is observable, that in those parts of the world, where the Christian religion is generally despised, there are none of those advantages which are enjoyed in some parts of the world, in common with the whole rest of the world. And this is to be observed, that wherever there was an obstruction of the grace of God, there was a defect in our blessing. And it is observable, that in those parts of the world, where the Christian religion is generally despised, there are none of those advantages which are enjoyed in some parts of the world, in common with the whole rest of the world.
when ye are gathered together within your cities, I will send the pestilence among you; and ye shall be delivered into the hand of the enemy.

26 And when I have broken the staff of your bread, ten women shall bake your bread in one oven, and they shall deliver you your bread again by weight: and ye shall eat, and not be satisfied.

Ver. 26. Broken the staff of your bread. Taken away its power to nourish you (as Bechard expounds it), or rather, taken bread itself from you, which the Chaldee renders acorns (ver. 10). If they either wanted corn to make bread, or their corn had no heart in it (as we speak), either way they would be starved.

Ten women shall bake your bread in one oven. That is, there shall be such scarcity, that a small oven shall be sufficient to bake bread for ten families, i.e. for a great many, and of the number ten in Scripture signify (1 Sam. i. 8; Job xix. 3).

Deliver you your bread again by weight. Distribute to every one in the family a certain quantity; not enough to satisfy them, but only (as we speak) to keep body and soul together. So it follows: Ye shall eat, and not be satisfied. Never have creatures of life, as acorns, been made to crave the more to eat: so Pellicanus glosses, who thus concludes his notes on these verses, Hae sunt arma Dei contra insensatos, &c., "These are the weapons of God against stupid wretches; which no wicked man can evade, when God in anger begins to fall upon them. Let no man, though ever so great and rich, hope to be safe from the hand of the Lord, who can kill kings by worms and lice when he pleaseth."

Ver. 27. If ye will not for all this hearken unto me. If all these plagues have no better effect upon you than the former (see ver. 21, 23, 24).

Ver. 28. Then will I walk contrary unto you. His indignation rises proportionable to their offences: for now, as he hath said, he will set his face against them (as he speaks, ver. 17), but proceed against them, in fury; by such punishments as should quite ruin them.

I will chastise. The very manner of speech expresses anger and indignation: being as if he had said, I will make you know who it is that you have despised (ver. 10). This word \\

27 And if ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk contrary unto me;
28 Then I will walk contrary unto you also in fury; and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins.
29 And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat.
30 And I will destroy your high places, and cut down your images, and cast your carcases those expressed by hickethi, I will smile or punish you (ver. 21).

Seven plagues for your sins. If we should by a literal account multiply the number of plagues mentioned ver. 24, seven times, the threatening here would amount to this: that their rebellion, not amended by so many plagues, but continued still from age to age (notwithstanding all the corrections inflicted on them for their reformation, ver. 23), should in conclusion be punished on them five hundred and seventy-seven times more severely than at first (ver. 18). But the simple sense is, that their obstinate contempt of his laws should be punished with new and more grievous plagues. Which was fulfilled, as our Dr. Jackson observes (book i. on the Creed, ch. 29), in their captivity, in the days of Manasseh, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah: and again in the time of Ptolemys, the first under Antiochus Epiphanes. For these latter calamities were at least seven times greater (both for extent and duration) than the former persecutions, which they suffered from the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and Syrians. By all which, and by what follows, it plainly appears, that these threatenings were a kind of prediction. For Moses evidently foresees, that they would not be converted by what he said and did before (Deut. xxxi. 27, 29), and consequently that these threatenings, in case of disobedience, would turn into prophecies. Unto every one of which their history exactly answers; as the book of Deuteronomy will give me occasion to show more fully.

Ver. 29. Ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, &c. This is the very almost calamity that could come upon a people: and yet (as Conradus Pellicanus observes) it is put before the throwing down of their high places and images, &c. As if the devouring of their children (such was their incredible lust after idols) would seem a less evil to them than the loss of their images. This was fulfilled among the Israelites in the siege of Samaria by the enemy, and by starving, 2 Kings v. 26. But the destruction of the enemy in the time of Zedekiah was terrible, and among these places the siege of Jerusalem before the Babylonian captivity (Lam. iv. 10), and in the last siege by Titus, as Josephus relates (lib. vii. De Bello Judaeico, cap. 8).

Ver. 30. I will destroy your high places. Where they were wont to worship their idols, according to the manner of the heathen; who built temples, and altars, and offered sacrifices to their gods, upon mountains and high hills; especially such as were shaded with trees. Insomuch, that the Indians in Philostra tus call the high mountain Caucasus, Σωπός Αρχαίος, "the house of the gods." And the ancient Persians (as Herodotus saith in his Clio, cap. 131), εἰσὶ τὰ Πελοποννησία τὰ ἐρωτ ὄροι διάλυντο, "going up to the top of the highest mountains," there offered sacrifices to Jupiter, and cast the whole circle of the heavens by that name. And in the island Naxus the highest mountain was also consecrated to him; as from his worship on Mount Athos he is called Άσκες in Hesychius. They that would see more of this matter, may look into Cuperus's Apologetis Homer. p. 15, 16, &c. And the reason of their choosing these places for their worship was, because they thought their sacrifices would be more acceptable there than in upon the carcasses of your idols, and my soul shall abhor you. 31 And I will make your cities waste, and bring your sanctuaries unto desolation, and I will not smell the savour of your sweet odours. 32 And I will bring the land into desolation: and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it; valleis. For, as Lucian himself saith, they thought themselves in such high places to be nearer to their gods, and so should more easily obtain audience, τοις ἐν τοίχοις ὕψιστοι εἶχαν τῶν θεῶν (lib. De Dea Syc.,) and Tacitus saith the same in the last book of his Annals.

How much the Israelites were inclined to follow the notions of the world in this, appears too plainly by their history; which shows that high places were frequented in the reigns of their kings and princes, as well as of their bad. Yet, they were so fond of them, that when they could not go to them, they offered upon the tops of their houses (Jer. xiii. 13, xxvii. 39; Zeph. i. 5).

54 « And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste. 33 Then shall the land enjoy her sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemies' land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her sabbaths. 34 As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; that I can bear with you no longer. This is directly opposite to his promise, if they would be obedient, ver. 11, "My soul shall not abhor you." because it did not rest in your sabbaths, when ye dwelt up them.
36 And upon them that are left alive of you I will send a faintness into their hearts in the lands of their enemies; and the sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them; and they shall flee, as fleeing from a sword: and they shall fall when none pursueth.
37 And they shall fall one upon another, as it were before a sword, when none pursueth; tioned in the foregoing chapter. Dr. Hammond hath another notion of the word, which we translate enjoy (see note g. upon Ps. cii. p. 504).

Ver. 35. As long as it hath desolate it shall rest.] Lev. xxvi. 44. “Faintness shall be upon all the peoples.”

Ver. 36. Upon them that are left alive of you] This imports that the body of the people should be desolate.

Send a faintness into their hearts] Where their spirits sunk under their present miseries.

Sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them:] And yet they were condemned to live in continual dread of more miseries. For the Hebrew word we translate faintness signifies softness, which could not support the weight of their affliction. As at this last phrase imports such a timourousness as should make their life always uneasy to them, and such a cowardice as should render them vile and despicable. And so they are noted at this day to be mean-spirited and faint-hearted: it being scarce ever heard that a Jew listed himself for a soldier, or engaged in the defence of the country where he lives.

They shall flee—and fall when none pursueth.] Fancy the tribes never returned to their own land: which made them start and run away, may, fall into a swoon, when there was no danger. Such terrors the heathen themselves have observed, in men of an evil conscience, who are afraid of their own shadow, as they say of Orestes.

Ver. 37.] They shall fall one upon another.] As people and nations, when they made too much haste, and ran confusedly; or the foremost hinder the flight of those that follow (Jer. xlvi. 16).

As it were before a sword.] For fear of the sword; as this Hebrew phrase certainly signifies, and is so translated in the margin of our Bibles, Isa. xxi. 15, and xxxii. 8 (see Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. c. 34).

Ye shall have no power to stand] Being so timorous as to flee when there were none (as it goes before), they could not stand before them when they appeared.

Ver. 38. Ye shall perish] Die with grief, or by diseases, poverty, oppression, and hard usage.

Your enemies shall eat you up.] Insomuch, that the tribes never returned to their own land: but either perished by hunger and bad accommodations; or were swallowed up (as we say) into the body of another nation.

Ver. 39.] With grief and sorrow, and sad reflections upon the miseries into which their sins, and the sins of their fathers, had thrown them: insomuch that death was more acceptable to them than life (Jer. viii. 3).

Also in the iniquities of their fathers] Especially those of Manasseh king of Judah, whose wickedness was so great, that the zealous reformation which his grandchild made could not turn away “the fierceness of God’s great wrath against them” (2 Kings xx. 27).

Ver. 40.] If they shall confess their iniquity.] Though Moses had been above three times as long in recounting the plagues, which he either foresaw, or feared would come upon them for their sins, than in the blessings which he promised should follow their obedience: yet he plainly shows, that the blessings would have far excelled the curses, had not their disobedience hindered. For after all these dreadful calamities were come upon them, he concludes with a most gracious promise, that God would restore them to their own land, from whence they were expelled, if they truly repented of those sins which were the cause of it.

He means, by “confessing their iniquities, and the iniquities of their fathers,” &c., acknowledging them with such unfeigned sorrow as wrought repentance; without which he gave them no hope of deliverance. And it is well observed by a great divine of our own, that if, without confession of their fathers’ iniquities, they could not be absolved from their own, their fa-which they trespassed against me, and that also they have walked contrary unto me; 41 And that I also have walked contrary unto them, and have brought them into the land of their enemies; if then their uncircumcised hearts be humbled, and they then accept of the punishment of their iniquity:
42 Then will I remember my covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land.
43 The land also shall be left of them, and shall enjoy her sabbaths, while she lieth desolate without them: and they shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity: because, even because they despised my judgments, and because their soul abhorred my statutes.
44 And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, either will I abhor them, to destroy them utterly, and to break my covenant with them:
for I am the Lord their God.
45 But I will for their sakes remember the covenant of their ancestors, whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt in the sight of the heathen, that I might be their God: I am the Lord.
46 These are the statutes and judgments and

Ver. 44. Yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies,] He would not have them utterly despair of mercy, even after a new punishment, which hath now continued many ages. For this promise is not yet fulfilled: as Dr. Jackson observes, book i. on the Creed, ch. 31, sect. 9.
I will not cast them away,] As we see at this very day they are not destroyed utterly, but remain a great body in several countries; after above sixteen hundred years’ expulsion from their own land.

To break my covenant with them,] Never more to own them for my people.
I am the Lord their God,] I still continue to have a peculiar right to their obedience, as they have to my kindness, if they will return to their duty.

Ver. 45. I will for their sakes remember the covenant, &c.] The meaning cannot be, that God would be so gracious for their sakes who were so very wicked; but, as the words in the Hebrew are, he would “for them (i.e. for their good and advantage) remember the covenant of their ancestors, whom he had brought forth out of the land of Egypt; that is, once more deiver them from their miserable condition, and restore them to his favour, that he may be their God.
And that great man (now mentioned on the foregoing verse) observes, “That the continuation of their plagues seems so much interrupted, and the plagues themselves so much mitigated in the last age (since the gospel hath been again revealed), as if their misery were almost expired, and the day of their redemption drawing nigh.” But then they must first confess “their iniquity, and the iniquity of their fathers and of their masters;” and Moses speaks of “a hard heart,” for which there was no cure, but such remarkable judgments, as evidently carried in them the marks of a Divine hand:
when which they saw, and submitted to it, he gives them hope of deliverance.

They then accept of the punishment,] Patiently bear it, as their just deserts; and acknowledge they do not deserve to be delivered from it.

Ver. 43. Then will I remember my covenant] See Exod. iii. 6. He promises to restore them to their own land; according to the covenant made with their forefathers, that he would give it them for an everlasting possession. For to remember a covenant, or promise, in Scripture language, is, to perform it, and make it good; as in the promise made to Abraham, which was remembered by Isaac; and which is not merely a constraint of God, but the voice of God, and makes it in the name of all the people; among whom, no doubt, there were many that heartily joined with him; and then followed their wonderful restoration in the reign of Cyrus; of which we read, Ezra i. &c.

I will remember the land.] Repeals it with his former inhabitants, &c. See 2 Chron. xxxvi. 22, 23.
where this immediately follows the relation he had made of the land being laid desolate.

Ver. 43. The land also shall be left of them, &c.] This verse is very obscure; unless we take it to speak of a new expulsion out of their own land, after their reduction to it. And then the next words,

They shall accept of the punishment of their inquity,] Must be interpreted, “after they had acccepted,” or “though they had accepted,” &c. This made their sin the more provoking; that they offended God again, when he had so graciously forgiven them, and delivered them from a dismal captivity.

Because they despised my judgments,] Returned to the same name for which they had been formerly expelled (ver. 15). This was fulfilled by degrees, by the successors of Alexander, and at last by the Romans.
laws, which the Lord made between him and the children of Israel," Onkelos, the famous Chaldee interpreter, hath, "between his Word and the children of Israel," which Theodoret Hacquart produces, among other places, to prove, that in those paraphrases the Word of the Lord signifies no more than αὐτός, "himself." Which, though it be true in some places, yet in others, as I have observed before, it cannot have that signification; particularly in Ps. cx. 1, where the Hebrew words are, "The Lord said unto my Lord," which are thus expounded by Jonathan, "The Lord said unto his Word," where it can signify nothing, but another Divine person. And so Onkelos might intend it here; that the Lord made all these laws between his eternal Word and them.

CHAPTER XXVII.

1 He that maketh a singular vow must be the Lord's.
2 The estimation of the person. 9 Of a beast given by vow. 14 Of a house. 16 Of a field, and the redemption thereof. 28 No devoted thing may be redeemed. 32 The tithe may not be changed.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
2 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When a man shall make a singular vow, the persons shall be for the Lord by thy estimation.
3 And thy estimation shall be of the male from twenty years old even unto sixty years old, even thy estimation shall be fifty shekels of silver, after the shekel of the sanctuary.
4 And if it be a female, then thy estimation shall be thirty shekels.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1.] Some religious people, it is possible, were touched with such a sense of what Moses had now delivered, in the foregoing promises and threats, that they thought of giving themselves wholly unto God, or of vowing some of their goods to him: and therefore he gives Moses further directions for the regulating of such vows.

Ver. 2. Singular vow.] And, first, if any man vowed himself, or his children, wholly to the service of God in the tabernacle, he directs what was to be done in that case. Which he calls a singular or extraordinary vow; and by Philo is called κυρίαν μεγάλαν, "the great vow:" it being a wonderful piece of devotion (as the word σέβηλθ in the Hebrew imports), because men were desirous to help God's priests in the meanest ministry; such as bringing in wood, carrying out ashes, sweeping away the dust, and such like.

The persons shall be for the Lord by thy estimation.] The meaning would have been more plain, if the words had been translated just as they lie in the Hebrew, "According to thy estimation, the persons shall be for the Lord." For this immediately suggests to one's thoughts, that the service of the persons themselves thus devoted, was not to be employed in the tabernacle; but a value set upon them by the priest, and that to be employed for the Lord, i.e. for holy uses; for repairing the sanctuary, such loose, or any thing belonging thereto. The reason why God would not accept the persons themselves, as they desired, but the value of them, for his service, seems to be, because there was a sufficient number of persons peculiarly designed for all the work of the tabernacle; which he would not have encumbered by more attendants there than were needed.

Ver. 3. Thy estimation shall be.] That the priest might not either overvalue or undervalue any person, the rates are here set down which he should demand for their redemption.

If the male from twenty years old even unto sixty years old:] For at twenty years of age (saithProcpius Gazeus) men begin to be fit for business, and continue so till sixty; when it is time to leave it off. Thy estimation shall be fifty shekels.] That this one rule should serve for all men, though of different qualities, Philo thinks was fit for several reasons, which he gives in his book of Special Laws: the principal is, because God regarded only the vow, the value of which was equal, whosoever made it, whether a great man or a poor.

Shekel of the sanctuary.] See Exod. xxx. 13.

Ver. 4. If it be a female,—thirty shekels.] Women could not be so serviceable as men, and therefore were valued at a less rate: for all that they could do was, to spin, or weave, or make garments, or wash for the priests and Levites.

Ver. 5. If it be from five years old even unto twenty.] It appears by this, that, though a child of five years old could not make a vow, yet his parents might solemnly devote one of that age to God; and it did oblige them to pay what is here required for the use of the sanctuary.

Male twenty shekels, and for the female ten.] Less is required than for those above twenty, because their life was more uncertain; and they were less capable to do any service, before they came to their full growth.

Ver. 6.] Before a child was a month old, it seems, it was not capable to be devoted to God; but then it might. And still less was demanded as the value of them; because children so small were very weak and imperfect, and the price therefore set accordingly. But the words may be understood, not of children that were a month old, but that were in the first month of their life: and Samuel we find was devoted to God before he was born.
CHAPTER XXVII.

8 But if he be poorer than thy estimation, then he shall present himself before the priest, and the priest shall value him; according to his ability that vowed shall the priest value him.

9 And if it be a beast, whereof men bring an offering unto the Lord, all that any man gave of such unto the Lord shall be holy.

10 He shall not alter it, nor change it, a good for a bad, or a bad for a good: and if he shall at all change beast for beast, then it and the exchange thereof shall be holy.

Ver. 7. From sixty years old and above; if it be a man—fifteen shekels. They are valued much less after sixty than before (ver. 3), because their service then was little worth, and their life likely to be short.

For the female ten] The Hebrews think it observable that in their society, even women were valued almost double to females: but now, in old age, they are made almost of equal value: for old women continue very serviceable in many things, when old men are not; whence they have a saying, "An old woman in a house is a treasure in a house."

Ver. 8. If he be poorer] If he be not able to pay according to the value, it is not a sacrifice.

He shall present himself before the priest,] Who was then in attendance at the tabernacle; for he doth not speak of the high-priest, but of the lower.

The priest shall value him;] According to the best information he could get of his ability; as it here follows.

According to his ability that vowed] He was to examine his condition; and accordingly set such a rate upon him as he might be able to pay, without undoing his family.

Ver. 9. If it be a beast,] Now he proceeds to the second case; which was, when any man vowed to give God a beast of some sort or other.

When men bring an offering] And first he mentions the common beasts, such as God accepted at his altar; as these are explained by the opposite unclean beast (ver. 11).

All that any man giveth] Whether to be sacrificed or not.

Shall be holy.] Set apart for God's service, according to the nature of his vow; to be offered at the altar, as the so expressed it; or to be given to the priests and Levites, if that was his desire; or to be sold for the service of the tabernacle, if it was left at large.

Ver. 10. He shall not alter it, nor change it. Some think these words, alter and change, are two expressions of the same thing. But the first word may signify, that he should not alter it for any other beast, or thing: and, the second, that he should not change it for any beast of the same kind: but that very beast which was vowed, was to be given to the uses intended; and no other accepted in his stead, though it were really better.

A good for a bad, or a bad for a good.] If men had been left to their liberty, either to give unto God the beast they had vowed, or another in its room, they might have given a bad instead of a good, as Maimonides observes, which had been a great profaneness. But supposing those that were truly religious would have brought a good instead of a bad (that is, one much fitter and more valuable), God would not suffer it, because he would preserve a reverence to things offered unto God, that he should return to common uses, though a better thing was substituted in its room. If any man did change what he had vowed, though it were for the better, he was to be beaten, as Maimonides saith in his treatise on this subject (cap. 1).

If he shall at all change beast for beast, &c.] The man was to be beaten, and both the one and the other beast was to become God's. Which the Jews understand in this place as Maimonides (in another place of his work), that if he changed the beast he vowed twice or thrice, nay, a thousand times, they all became holy; and he was also to suffer the punishment of stripes for every one of them.

Ver. 11. And if it be an unclean beast,] Some comprehend under this, such beasts as, though in themselves clean, had some blemish in them, which rendered them unfit for sacrifice. But, as they could not be offered in sacrifice, so one would think it was not lawful to vow them either to that or any other holy use.

He shall present the beast before the priest.] That he might consider the worth of it.

Ver. 12. He shall not alter it.] Of a great price or a small. He was not allowed to exchange it for a clean beast; both because it was dedicated to God, and because that exchange might have been a great damage to the priest: many unclean beasts being of greater value than some clean; a horse or a camel, for instance, of greater price than a sheep or a goat.

As thou valuest it,]—so shall it be.] He directs his speech to the priest, as Maimonides, cap. 1, 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 11, &c., observed; that he may attend and make upright judgment; because that was to be the value of it, which the priest determined it to be worth.

Ver. 13. If he will at all redeem it] It was in the man's choice, either to leave the beast with the priest, or to pay him the money at which he had rated it.

If he shall add a fifth part thereof.] If he chose the latter, it was a sign he thought it worth more than the price which the priest had set upon it, who could not understand the value of it so well as himself. And every man, as Maimonides observes (More Nocehi, par. iii. cap. 46), regarding his own advantage, and inclining naturally to save what he can; if a beast were not rated at its just value, he that had vowed it would be disposed rather to redeem the beast than let the priest have it. Which is the reason that God orders he should in this case pay a fifth part more than the priest set upon it, that he might be sure to give the full value.

Both this and the foregoing law was to preserve that from being vile and cheap, which bore the name of God (as he there speaks), and was consecrated to his uses.

Ver. 14. When a man shall sanctify his house] By vows or to God's service; for of such sanctifying he speaks in this chapter: and this is the third case about vows; which commonly consisted in promising to give the house of God some part of their possessions either to be kept for sacrifices, or to be kept for some sacred uses; whence came those vast treasures which were in the house of God, mentioned 1 Chron. xxvi. 26—29; for they were 15 And if he that sanctified it will redeem his house, then he shall add the fifth part of the money of thy estimation unto it, and it shall be his.

16 And if a man shall sanctify unto the Lord some part of a field of his possession, then thy estimation shall be according to the seed thereof: an homer of barley seed shall be valued at fifty shekels of silver.

17 If he sanctify his field from the year of jubilee, according to thy estimation it shall stand.

18 But if he sanctify his field after the jubilee, then the priest shall reckon unto him the money according to the years that remain unto the year of the jubilee, and it shall be abated from thy estimation.

19 And if he that sanctified the field will in any wise redeem it, then he shall add the fifth part of the money of thy estimation unto it, and it shall be assured to him.

20 And if he will not redeem the field, or if he have sold the field to another man, it shall not be redeemed any more.

21 But the field, when it goeth out in the jubilee, shall be holy unto the Lord, as a field devoted; the possession thereof shall be the priest's.
22 And if a man sanctify unto the Lord a field which he hath bought, which is not of the fields of his possession;
23 Then the priest shall reckon unto him the worth of thy estimation, even unto the year of the jubilee: and he shall give thine estimation in that day, as a holy thing unto the Lord.
24 In the year of the jubilee the field shall return unto him of whom it was bought, even to him to whom the possession of the land did belong.
25 And all thy estimation shall be according to the shekel of the sanctuary: twenty gerahs shall be the shekel.

26 | Only the firstling of the beasts, which should be the Lord’s firstling, no man shall sanctify it; whether it be ox, or sheep: it is the Lord’s.
27 And if it be of an unclean beast, then he shall redeem it according to thine estimation, and shall add a fifth part of it thereto: or if it be not redeemed, then it shall be sold according to thy estimation.
28 Notwithstanding no devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the Lord of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord.

no inheritance in the land (Numb. xviii. 20). See him, lib. ii. De Republ. Hebr. cap. 19, and his Annotations upon this place. But these seem not to be solid reasons why the priests should not enjoy this land themselves: for though they were not to have any inheritance in the division of the land of Canaan, yet if any fell to them by the means now mentioned (God was but very seldom, since men were very careful to preserve their inheritances), God doth here bestow such land upon his priests; who might possess it if they pleased, because they had it in God’s right; or else sell it (ver. 20), and keep the money to their own use.

Ver. 22. If a man sanctify—a field which he hath bought. And consequently could enjoy only till the year of jubilee; when it was to return to the family of whom he purchased it.

Which is not of the fields of his possession. No part of his paternal inheritance (as that mentioned ver. 16), but bought of the priests, to whom it was fallen by a vow; or of him to whom the priests had sold it.

Ver. 23. The priest shall reckon unto him the worth. Set a value upon it, according to his judgment.

Even unto the year of the jubilee. With respect to the number of years, between the time of the vow and the year of jubilee.

He shall give thine estimation in that day. Presently put the price of the field he hath set upon it, without the addition of the fifth part (as Menochius well observes in the place before mentioned), which he, who redeemed his paternal inheritance, was bound to pay over and above the price at which the priest esteemed it (ver. 19). For this was not so much worth as that, being but for a term of years, till the jubilee.

As a holy thing. As a thing devoted unto God, instead of the land, which was redeemed with this money.

Ver. 24. | Not unto him who bought the field, and then vowed it to God, but unto the hereditary owner; which is the meaning of the next words, even unto him to whom the possession of the land did belong.

Ver. 25. | Full weight, according to the standard kept in the sanctuary (see Exod. xxx. 12, and ch. xix. of this book, ver. 39).

Ver. 26. | Only the firstling of the beasts. By vowing it to be a whole burnt-offering, or a peace-offering unto the Lord; as Maimonides expoundeth it. The reason was, because no man could lawfully vow that which was not his own, as the firstlings were not; they being the Lord’s already, as it follows in the end of this verse.

The same reason held (as Maimonides likewise observeth) in all things belonging to God, as tithes. Yet they devised ingeniously enough (as he speaks) a way to give these firstlings to God by a new obligation, and yet not offend, as they imagined, against this law; for they interpret these words of firstlings already brought forth: no man might sanctify such; but while they were in the womb, they might; saying, “I vow that lamb (suppose) which my ewe goes with to be a whole burnt-offering to God, if it be a male;” but they could not vow it for a peace-offering, because no man could alter any thing for his own profit.

Whether it be ox, or sheep. | Under these two are comprehended all other kind of creatures, whose firstlings belonged to God.

It is the Lord’s. Numb. iii. 13, viii. 17. For this reason no man was to presume to vow such things; it being a kind of mockery to make a present of that to another which was his own before (see Mr. Mede concerning this verse, p. 512).

Ver. 27. | If it be of an unclean beast. Most understand this of the firstling of an unclean beast. Against which there is this objection, that such things were before ordered to be redeemed, not with money, but with a lamb (Exod. xiii. 13). Therefore it seems more reasonable to understand this of the firstlings of such an unclean beast, which a man hath redeemed (ver. 13), but afterwards devoted to God; which he might do; for, after the redemption, it was become his own again.

He shall redeem it. At the rate thou shalt set upon it.

Shall add a fifth part. | As was ordained before in the like case (ver. 11).

If it be not redeemed, then it shall be sold. Any other man might buy it, at that rate the priest had set upon it; and the money was applied to holy uses.

Ver. 28. | No devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the Lord. Nothing that was devoted by that sort of vow, which was called cherem (as the word is here in the Hebrew), with a curse (as the word implies) upon themselves and others, if the thing was not employed according to their vow.

Both of man and beast, &c. | All manner of things which might be sanctified to the Lord, by the forementioned simple vow, might be thus devoted and consecrated to him by a cherem, i. e. beasts and houses, and lands, and even men themselves, as far as they had power over them; for that is meant by those words, all that a man hath (see the next verse).

Shall be sold or redeemed. | For this was the peculiar nature of this sort of vow; that the thing devoted by it should remain irreversibly and unalterably to the use unto which it was devoted; for the person who was occurred to, applied it to any other use than that to which it was consecrated.

Every devoted thing. | Of this kind.

Is most holy. | Other things devoted by a simple vow were holy (ver. 9, 10, &c.), but these were most holy, so that none might touch them but the priests; and they were so strictly applied to the Divine service,
29 None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death.
30 And all the tithe of the land, whether of that they could not be alienated, either by sale, or redemption, or commutation, or donation, or any other way (see Mede, p. 160).

Ver. 29. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed:—Some learned men have, from these words, asserted, that parents and masters amongst the Jews, had such a power over their children and servants, that they might devote them to death and so kill them; only the sentence of the priest was to concur, to whom every devoted thing fell as his portion. This is maintained by Ludov. Capellus, and confuted by Mr. Selden, ib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Disciplina. Hebr. cap. 6, where he judiciously observes, that this power would have Judges xxii. 34, intertrenched upon the sixth commandment, if private men might have, at their pleasure, thus disposed of their children and slaves. And, in the next chapter, he explains the sense of this verse; and proves, indeed, that there may be a cherem (mishabdam) of men, or from amongst men, as well as of beasts; but this word hath four several senses amongst the Hebrews. First, it signifies a sacred gift itself, which was devoted to God, or to holy uses; and so it signifies in the foregoing ver. 28. Secondly, it signifies that which was devoted to perdition and utter destruction, either by the right of war, or upon the account of capital enmities: an example of which we have in Jericho, Josh. vi. 17, where the whole city was a cherem devoted to the Lord, and did not contain anything that was consecrated to the use of men; and therefore of their enemies; yet so, that the metals were made a cherem of the first sort; that is, sacred to the Lord and his holy uses. And thus the great Sinhedrin (called in Scripture the whole congregation) might devote these to be a cherem, who, going to the wars, did not obey orders, and perform the charge laid upon them. An example of which we have Judges xxi. 41, I omit the other two for brevity’s sake (of which there are examples, Josh. vi. 26; Ezra x. 8; Acts xxii. 12, 11, 21, see Selden, ib. cap. 7, 8), because the cherem here mentioned by Moses is of this second sort: for it is evident that the cherem of the first sort, mentioned ver. 28, was of such things, over which they had an entire power, to dispose of them at their pleasure. And therefore in these two words, both of man and beast, the Hebrews understand of their slaves, whether men or women (who were Cannaunites, or gentiles, or others), who were in their power as much as their beasts, to give away or to sell. But to take away their life, or to give them to be slain, was not in their power: but all the effect of this cherem was, that the whole right which they had to the service and use of such slaves, was transferred by him that devoted them to the service of the priests and sacred uses (see Selden in that book cap. 9, p. 518, &c.). But though they might not devote their servants to death, yet they might their enemies, before they went out to war with them; and such of their own people also as did not observe the military laws, when they were in the army, were punished with death, as we have Num. xxxi. 2. Upon which account also, the inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead were slain (Judges xxi. 9, 10), for violating the solemn public cherem, pronounced against those that came not up to Mizpeh (ver. 5). And this is the cherem spoken of in this verse (see Selden, cap. 10). For as for the cherem, whereby a man was execrated, it did include many curses, and made him execrable, so that no man might come near him; but did not touch his life, as he there shows, p. 590, Ver. 30. All the tithe of the land,—is the Lord’s: It is holy unto the Lord.

31 And if a man will at all redeem ought of his tithes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof.
CHAP. XXVII.

32 And concerning the tithe of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under of which was, as Mr. Calvin well observes, not that the priest should get more than his due, by the man who desired to redeem his tithe, but that the man might not make a gain of the priest. For it is seldom seen that a husbandman desires to pay money rather than his tithe; unless he propound some considerable advantage to himself.

Ver. 32. Tithe of the herd, or of the flock.] Every one knows, that by the "tithe of the herd" here is meant calves, and by the flock is to be understood lambs and kids (Jer. xxxiii. 16, &c.), because these are those young ones that were brought forth that year; the same cattle not being again tithed every year. And he speaks of clean beasts, which were allowed in sacrifice; for tithe was not paid of other beasts; but their first-born only was the Lord's. This tithe was paid to God every year, as a eucharistical sacrifice, which was the benefit they received from God by their cattle.

Even of whatsoever passeth under the rod.] This expresses the manner of this tithing, which, if we will believe the Jews, was thus: they were all brought into a sheep-cot (saith Maimonides, in his Treatise of First-born, cap. vii. in the beginning), in which there was a large number of sheep and goats. They, but not the tithe, were to suffer no more than one to come out at once. Their dams being placed without, and the gate opened, the young ones were invited by their bleatings to press to get out to them; and as they passed by, one by one, a man who stood at the gate with a rod, coloured with ochre, told them in order; and when the tenth came, he made it: if it was male or female, sound or not, he marked it with his rod, and said, "Let this be holy in the name of the tenth." And this account R. Solomon and others give of this matter; of which notion they are so fond, that R. Bechai (upon Numb. xxvii), makes Jacob (who vowed tithe of all that God should give him) to have democratized his children on this manner, beginning at Benjamin and stopping at Levi, or the tenth, and so on; that all the rest would be under the rod, and have as much of the burden of the tithe, as if they were to pass under the rod. Where Kimchi notes it is the same phrase with this in Leviticus, and as much as to say, "As he that telleth his sheep holdeth a rod in his hand, and telleth them one by one, and brings out the tenth for the tithe; so will I number you, and the sinners shall perish," &c.

The tenth shall be holy.] That is, saith Maimonides (in his forenamed treatise called Bechoroth), the fat and the blood of them was offered at the altar; and then the owners ate the flesh anywhere in Jerusalem, as they did the lesser holy things. For the priests had no portion of them, but all the people to eat as did the paschal lamb. If there was any blemish in them, whether before or after the tithing, then they might be eaten in any place. And so Bartenora (as Dr. Outram observes, lib. i. De Sacrificiis, cap. 11), "we do not find in the whole law that any part of the tithe was given to the priests. So a great many other of their doctors, who beforehand supposed that Moses did not reckon these among the twenty-four gifts (for so many they make the whole number of them) which were bestowed upon the priesthood. But as there is nothing else in Scripture to warrant this, which now the prescribes how these tenths should be avoided, but only declares that they are holy to the Lord; so this very phrase, I should think, sufficiently signifies that they belonged to the Lord's ministers; and if not entirely to the priests, much less entirely to the owners of them (before they were the Lord's); but if they were to eat them at Jerusalem, as the Jews imagine, the Levites might have their share, and the stranger and other poor people, as they were to have in their second tithe of corn, wherewith they made feasts there (Deut. xiv. 27—29).

Ver. 33. He shall not search whether it be good or bad.] It is not easy to give an account why God required so punctually the tenth calf, goat, or lamb; but though it were never so lean or blemished, he did not suffer the tithing to be searched, unless it were to avoid all disputes, strife, and contention. There are those, indeed, that think the reason was, because in those ages this was looked upon as so sacred a number, that it mystically denoted God, whose Divine perfections, providence, and bounty they were thought to acknowledge, who gave the temple, the Law, and the other relations of the people. And, therefore, that sold the cherUVuns given to the priest, ver. 28 (Bechoroth, cap. 6, sect. 5).

Ver. 34. These are the commandments, which the Lord commanded.] That is, these moreover were added to the foregoing commandments, before they removed from the wilderness of Mount Sinai (see ch. xxv., xxxv. &c.); for having said before, in the conclusion of the foregoing chapter, that the law required for the priests, and the Levites, and all the judgments, and laws which the Lord made, &c., which respect all that preceded in this book, the commandments here spoken of can relate to nothing more but the laws delivered in this chapter about vows, and devoted things, and tithes.

Which laws ought not to be passed over, without serious consideration; for men may be concerned in them. And therefore I desire you to mark them, that the very same pious inclinations have ever been in all good Christians, which Moses here supposes (in the former part of this chapter) would be in the Jews, to devote some part of their goods, their houses, or lands to the service of God; which became sacred things, and were to be employed to no other use but that. The very first Christians had so much of this spirit in them, that they sold all their possessions and goods, and let every one that needed have a share of them (Acts ii. 45, iv. 35); because the whole number of believers attended to nothing else but the service of Christ; and the apostles being furnished with what was to go and propagate the gospel in all the world. Where, as soon as the Christian religion prevailed in any place, immediately there were the like voluntary oblations made, in such a proportion, as served not only for the support of the service of God in that church, but helped to maintain the Christians at Jerusalem, who had left their estates to the further the first preaching of the gospel. This we find in a great number of places; but it may sufficient to say, that the feasts of charity were maintained out of these oblations.

By which it is apparent that they took themselves to have the very same obligations upon them in this matter, which the Jews formerly had; and therefore it is no wonder that tithes came in time to be devoted for the maintenance of God’s ministers. For it is senseless to imagine, that the gospel which constrained them to give up themselves to God, should not constrain them, with the same freedom of mind, to give some of their goods (as Moses here supposes the Jews would do) for the maintenance of his service. And it is as unreasonable to think that they did not move them to give the ministers of God as honourable a maintenance, as had been allowed under the law of Moses.

Which required, besides the tenth here mentioned, another tithe of the remainder to be spent in sacrifices at Jerusalem, of which the Levites had their share, as I observed in Deut. xiv. 22, 28. To which, if we add the first-born with all sin-offerings, and the priest’s share of peace-offerings, and the skins of the sacrifices (which alone made a good revenue, as Philo observes), and likewise all such consecrations as are mentioned in this chapter, the Levites’ cities and suburbs, it will easily appear it could not be so little as a fifth part of the fruit of the land which came to their share.

It was the reason we find no such certain rate determined by the gospel, as was by this law, is, because there was no need of it; and for the same reason there was none, for a good while, settled by the church; all the revenues belonging to it, which served for all sorts of pious uses, arising from the devotion and oblations of the people, which were more than enough for God’s service. This was visible in the beginning of our religion, when the first Christians far outdid any thing that had been done under the law. And they could not imagine, that they who succeeded them would fall so short as not to offer sufficient for God’s service; though not so much as they had done, because there could not be the same necessity. And so Mr. Selden himself observes that this reason is given by Aquinas, why nothing was decreed in councils, or publicly promulgated by the fathers in the first ages, concerning giving of their goods, and adorning churches; because there was no necessity of it: the religious devotion, the love of Christians to such things ultra sesuante, “being very fervent, and abounding of its own accord.”

And when love began to wax cold, so that they found it needless to make laws about such things, they could not think fit to order less for the settled mainnance of God’s service than the tenth (besides all voluntary oblations), which had been the part most eminently limited under the law of nature, long before the law of Moses. See Irenæus, lib. iv, cap. 31, where he saith, Christians, having greater hopes, could not give less than they did in former times, when their hope was lower.

I shall add but continued, in these days, to bring offerings into the treasury of the church; and that the intention of them was, that they might have communion with the church in all its services; for when men fell off from Christianity, they cast out their offerings, in token they had no communication with them.

And I end all with the words of Conradus Pellicanus upon the thirtieth verse of this chapter: which will show the sense of the first reformers in this matter. “All the tithe is the Lord’s, and remains so for ever, &c; and therefore tithes are to be paid by Divine and natural right, and religiously expended, according to his appointment, &c.” And if tithes should not be sufficient for the maintenance of those who ought to be sustained in the church, at the public charge, the ninths, or the eighths, ought of necessity to be raised by the judgment and consent of the church; for the law of charity dictates this, and the excellent, irreprehensible ordinance of God: which charity binds more strongly in the evangelical law than in the Mosiacal; insomuch as the church ought to be more perfect than the synagogue; and charity than fear.” THE FOURTH BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED NUMBERS.

This Book is called by the name of Numbers in our language; because it begins with an account of the numbering of the people in the beginning of the second year after they came out of Egypt; though it contains a great many things besides that; particularly, another numbering of them (chap. xxvi.) towards the conclusion of their travels in the wilderness: for this book comprehends a history of about thirty-eight years, though most of the things related in it fell out in the first and in the last of these years; and it doth not appear when those things were done, which we read of about the middle of the book, from the fifteenth to the twentieth chapter.

CHAPTER I.

1 God commandeth Moses to number the people. 5 The princes of the tribes. 17 The number of every tribe, the Levites are exempted for the service of the Lord.

I AND the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the tabernacle of the congregation, on the first day of the second month, in the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt, saying,
2 Take ye the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, after their families, by the house of their fathers, with the number of their names, every male by their polls;
3 From twenty years old and upward, all that are able to go forth to war in Israel: thou and Aaron shall number them by their armies.

In the wilderness] Where they had continued near a full year (as appears by comparing Exod. xix. 1, with this place), and shortly after this removal from it (ch. x. 11).
In the tabernacle] From whence the Lord delivered those laws which we read in the foregoing book (see on Lev. i. 1), and now seems to have admitted him into the tabernacle, whereas before he only spake to him out of it.

On the first day of the second month.] All that is related in the foregoing book, seems to have passed in the first month of the second year after their coming out of Egypt, in the beginning of which the tabernacle was set up (Exod. xi. 2, 17), and in the middle of it the passover was kept; as appears by this book (ch. ix. 1, 2, &c.).
Ver. 2. Take ye the sum.] There had been a muster, as we may call it, of the people, before the tabernacle was erected (Exod. xxx. 12), and consequently some months before this; for it was in order to a contribution, which every one was to make towards that holy work (Exod. xxxviii. 26), whereas this was for the better disposing of their camps about the tabernacle now that it was set up; and for their more regular march when they removed from Mount Sinai, which they were to do shortly.

Of all the congregation] Who alone were numbered; all except the Levites; but none of the mixed multitude that came with them out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 38).

After their families.] It appears by Josh. vii. 16, 17, &c. that the several tribes of Israel were divided into families, and those families into households, and those households had every one of them a head or chief, who is called the father of it. There were seventy of these families in all; but some tribes had more, others fewer, according to the number of souls (as they are called); that is, persons who were in each when they went down into Egypt (Gen. xlvi. 27).
By the house of their fathers.] Every family, as I said, being distributed into houses (which we now call families); these houses were denominated from their chief, whom they called their father; for no houses were denominated from the mother, as Jews say.
Number of their names.] The names of every person, in the several houses, were set down and registered, that they might be the better known.
Every male by their polls.] But no women; for the reason which follows.
Ver. 3. From twenty years old and upward.] Which was ever after this the age when men were thought fit for war.
All that are able to go forth to war.] One would think by this they were not to number very aged and decrepit people, because they were no more able to go to war than women and children, and those under twenty years old. And if we may believe Josephus (lib. ii. Antiq. cap. 9), after fifty years old, men were not bound to pay the half-shekel which was due in such musters; and therefore we may reasonably think were excused from going to war, unless they had a mind themselves.
4 And with you there shall be a man of every tribe; everyone one head of the house of his fathers.

5 ¶ And these are the names of the men that shall stand with you of the tribe of Reuben; Elizur, the son of Shedeur.

6 Of Simeon; Shelumiel the son of Zuri-shaddai.

7 Of Judah; Nahshon the son of Amminadab.

8 Of Issachar; Nethaneel the son of Zuar.

9 Of Zebulun; Eliab the son of Helon.

10 Of the children of Joseph; of Ephraim; Elishama the son of Amminihud; of Manasseh; Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur.

11 Of Benjamin; Abidan the son of Gideoni.

12 Of Dan; Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai.

13 Of Asher; Pagiel the son of Ocran.

14 Of Gad; Eliasaph the son of Deuel.

15 Of Naphtali; Ahira the son of Enan.

16 These were the renowned of the congregation, princes of the tribes of their fathers, heads of thousands in Israel.

Thou and Aaron] Who had the highest authority in the nation.

Shall number them by their armies.] This seems to import, that, in taking the account of them, they distributed them into certain troops or companies, out of which were formed regiments (as we now speak), and greater regular bodies, which composed several armies. We do not read this was required in the former part of the case (Exod. xxiv.), that being for another end, as I now observed; not for their more orderly march in their remove from Mount Sinai. And here I cannot but take notice, what a vast difference there was between this method and that rude way which Cæcrops, the first king of Attica, after the Ogygian flood (which happened about the time of Moses), took to know the number of his people; which the Greek writers says, was by requiring every one of them to bring a stone, και διδασκαλίαν εἰς τὸ μέτρον, “and throw it down before him;” which he counting, found them twenty thousand. So the scholiast upon Pindar (Od. ix.) and others in Meursius De Regibus Atheniens. (lib. i. cap. 7).

Ver. 5. [With you shall there be a man of every tribe;] Whom they were to take for their assistants.

Every one head of the house of his fathers.] The LXX. and the Vulgar understand this to signify the principal persons in each tribe, who were best acquainted with every family and household in that tribe. And so it is expounded, ver. 6, and many think these were the first-born in the tribe: but there is an objection against it, that Nahshon, who was named for the tribe of Judah (ver. 7), was not descended from the first-born of that tribe; for Pharez was not Judah’s eldest son, Selah being before him, who had children, as we find in ch. xxvi. of this book (ver. 20). Besides, when the principals of the tribes are reckoned up again (ch. xxiv. of this book), in the last year of their abode in the wilderness, none of them are derived from these men here mentioned, but from others: and therefore these were the most eminent men in the several tribes, upon a different account; either for wisdom or valor, or some other excellent quality.

Ver. 5. [That shall stand] Be assistants.

Ver. 6. [With Moses and Aaron.] Of the tribe of Reuben; Elizur.] There is little to be observed concerning these tribes, but that they are here placed not in the order of their birth, but of their mothers who bare them. First, the children of Leah, who are all reckoned in the same order wherein they were born of her (ver. 6—9). Then the children of Rachel (ver. 10, 11), and after them the children of the two handmaids, in the four following verses; where (ver. 12) Dan is set first, he being the first-born of Bilhah, whom Rachel gave Jacob for his wife (Gen. xxx. 5), but then the next that follow are not reckoned according to the order of their birth; for Naphtali, who was born next, is placed the last; and the youngest son of Zilpah placed before the eldest; for which we cannot now discern the reason, though it is likely it was upon the account of some pre-eminence or other which they had gained; as Ephraim, the youngest son of Joseph, is mentioned before Manasseh the eldest (ver. 10), because Jacob had given him the precedence, when he blessed them before his death (Gen. xlviii. 19).

Ver. 6. [Of Simeon; Shelumiel.] There is less to be observed concerning these princes than the last; but of them the greatest men of each tribe; for whatsoever the import of them may be in the Hebrew language (which Chytreus and others have endeavoured to make out), it signifies nothing to us: only most of them show how much God was in the thoughts of those who imposed these names on their children; for Eldad signifies “my God is the rock,” and Shelumiel is as much as “God my peace,” or “God my rewarder,” and Zuri-shaddai, “my rock omnipotent,” or “all-sufficient,” &c.

Ver. 14. [Son of Deuel.] So he is called also, ch. vii. 42, and yet in the second chapter (ver. 14), he is called the son of Rencel; for these two letters, daleth and resh, are very often changed, the one for the other; so rav in Deut. (Gen. x. 5), is reckoned for ion in (Gen. x. 1). 6, as, on the other hand, Dodanim (Gen. x. 4) is called Rodanin (1 Chron. i. 7), and it is to no purpose to heap up more examples there are of this.

Ver. 16. [These were the renowned] The Hebrew word keruim signifies properly men called or named; that is, who had the honour to be named by God to this employment; which made them more noble than they were before. But without this respect to their nomination by God, this word signifies in general, famous men, as we translate it (ch. xvi. 2, xxvi. 9), or renowned (Ezek. xxviii. 23). Accordingly the Vulgar translates it, most noble.

Princes of the tribes] As appears more plainly from the noble offerings which each of them made for the dedication of the altar (ch. vii.).

Heads of thousands] Men not only of great authority; such as Jethro advised Moses to take to his aid in governing the people (Exod. xviii. 21), but the highest of that rank; being chief commanders over all the thousands that were in their several tribes; under whom, no doubt, were many inferior officers of great account; who had their particular employment; and sary to submit themselves to the government of some supreme power, with several subordinate rulers under it. In which Israel excelled all other nations, being under the government of God himself, who appointed Moses immediately under him, with several others, as we here find; to assist him; for it is truly observed by Xenophon, that καὶ ἔστωσαν ὅτε ἐγὼ πρῶτος, “nothing is either so fittable for men, or so becoming, as good order;” and, on the contrary, nothing so mischievous, or unseemly, as confusion. Now order is nothing else but the apt disposition of every thing in its proper place, for certain ends and uses. Accordingly among men nothing is more necessary, than that every one should know and 17 And Moses and Aaron took these men which are expressed by their names:
18 And they assembled all the congregation together on the first day of the second month, and they declared their pedigrees after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, by their polls.
19 As the Lord commanded Moses, so he numbered them in the wilderness of Sinai.
20 And the children of Reuben, Israel’s eldest son, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, by their polls, every male from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war;
21 Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Reuben, were forty and six thousand and five hundred.

22 Of the children of Simeon, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, those that were numbered of them, according to the number of the names, by their polls, every male from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war;
23 Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Simeon, were fifty and nine thousand and three hundred.

24 Of the children of Gad, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war;
25 Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Gad, were forty and five thousand six hundred and fifty.

26 Of the children of Judah, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war;
27 Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Judah, were three score and fourteen thousand and six hundred.

28 Of the children of Issachar, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war;
29 Those that were numbered of them, even

(ch. x. 11), they finished this work in so many days or less.

Ver. 20. By their generations.] The word generations seems to be larger than families, as that is than houses, comprehending every family in that tribe; as families comprehend every household, and household comprehends every person therein. So the meaning is, all that were descended from Reuben, according to their several families; and houses in these families; and persons in those houses.

Ver. 21.] Some have observed, that this tribe was one of those which had the smallest number of men in it; in which they think was fulfilled the prophecy of Jacob, who foretold that Reuben should not excel (Gen. xlii. 4). But I do not look upon this as solid; for there were several tribes, which all this time had fewer persons in it than this; particularly the children of Joseph (whom Jacob compared to a fruitful bough, Gen. xlix. 22), were very much fewer (see below, ver. 33, 35). Gad also, Benjamin and Asher, were fewer in number than Reuben; who, in this regard, excelled five tribes.

Ver. 23. Simeon.] He had six children when they went down into Egypt, and Reuben but four; which is a plain reason of the greater increase of this tribe than the former.

Ver. 24. Gad.] It is probable that this tribe is therefore mentioned next, though descended from a handmaid, because they were to encamp and march together with Simeon under the standard of Reuben; and as is ordered in the next chapter, ver. 14.

Ver. 25. Gad.] He had more sons than Simeon (Gen. xlii. 16, 17), when they came out of Egypt; and yet fewer descended from him, by many thousands, than there did from Simeon; of which the reason doth not appear.

Ver. 27. Judah.] It may be justly thought that Jacob’s prophecy concerning the power and strength of this tribe (Gen. xlii. 8, &c.) began already to be fulfilled, they being far more numerous than any other.

Ver. 23. Issachar.] There is a plain account why this tribe and Zebulun are mentioned next to Judah, because they two marched under his standard (ch. ii.
of the tribe of Issachar, were fifty and four thousand and four hundred.
30 ¶ Of the children of Zebulun, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war;
31 Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Zebulun, were fifty and seven thousand and four hundred.
32 ¶ Of the children of Joseph, namely, of the children of Ephraim, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war;
33 Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Ephraim, were forty thousand and five hundred.
34 ¶ Of the children of Manasseh, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war;
35 Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Manasseh, were thirty and two thousand and two hundred.
36 ¶ Of the children of Benjamin, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war;
37 Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Benjamin, were thirty and five thousand and four hundred.
38 ¶ Of the children of Dan, by their gene-

4, 5, 7). It may be observed also, that these two tribes were more numerous than many others who had more children when they came out of Egypt.
Ver. 32. Ephraim.] He had the pre-eminence given him (Gen. xviii. 19); and therefore is here placed before him.
Ver. 33. Ephraim.] Though they were hitherto but few in comparison with some other tribes, yet in this the prophecy of Jacob was fulfilled (Gen. xlvi. 19, 20), that they were more fruitful than Manasseh, there being above eight thousand persons more in this tribe than in the other (ver. 35).
Ver. 35. Manasseh.] This was now the smallest tribe; but before they got to Canaan they grew very numerous, being increased above twenty thousand (ch. xxvi. 34).
Ver. 37. Benjamin.] Though Benjamin had more children than any of the rest of his brethren, when they went down into Egypt (Gen. xlvi. 21), where it appears he had ten sons), yet his tribe had the fewest men in it of all other, except Manasseh.
Ver. 39. Dan.] On the contrary, Dan, who had but one son when they went down into Egypt (Gen. xlvi. 23), grew to a greater number than any other tribe, except Judah. So variously did the Divine providence work in fulfilling the promise to Abraham, of multiplying his seed.
Ver. 41. Asher.] The growth of this tribe was not proportionable to that of some other, considering how many children Asher had at their going down into Egypt. But they increased near twelve thousand more before they got out of the wilderness (ch. xxvi. 47).

Ver. 43. Naphtali.] The great increase of this tribe is alleged by Bochartus, to justify his interpretation of Gen. xlvi. 21, by altering the punctuation of the words. But I have there observed, that five other tribes were more numerous than Naphtali when this account was taken of them.
Ver. 44. These—were numbered.] This is the account that was taken of the number of men in each tribe.
Which Moses—numbered.] See v. 3, 4, &c. Each one was for the house] Who could the better judge to what tribe every one belonged.
Ver. 45, 46. So were all those that were numbered, &c.] By which it appears there was not one man dead since their last numeration (seven months ago), when they were taxed for the tabernacle; for they were at that time just so many as are here mentioned (Exod. xxxviii. 26). As for Nadab and Abihu, they were of the tribe of Levi, who are not here reckoned; and the man that was stoned for blasphemy (Lev. xxiv.) was not of Israel, by the side of his father.
Ver. 47. But the Levites—were not numbered.] There was no account taken of them among the other tribes; but it is likely they were not comprehended in the former number (Exod. xxxviii. 26), being the persons who took the account (ver. 21), and had before they consecrated themselves to the Lord (ch. xxxiii. 39).
After the tribe of their fathers] Is a Hebraism, for CHAPTER I.

48 For the Lord had spoken unto Moses, saying, 49 Only thou shalt not number the tribe of Levi, neither take the sum of children among the children of Israel:
50 But thou shalt appoint the Levites over the tabernacle of testimony, and over all the vessels thereof, and over all things that belong to it: they shall bear the tabernacle, and all the vessels thereof; and they shall minister unto it, and shall encamp round about the tabernacle.
51 And when the tabernacle setteth forward, the Levites shall take it down: and when the tabernacle is to be pitched, the Levites shall set it up: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.
52 And the children of Israel shall pitch their tents, every man by his own camp, and every man by his own standard, throughout their hosts.
53 But the Levites shall pitch round about the tabernacle of testimony, that there be no wrath upon the congregation of the children of Israel: and the Levites shall keep the charge of the tabernacle of testimony.
54 And the children of Israel did according to all that the Lord commanded Moses, so did they.

Encamp round about the tabernacle.] As a guard until it: they being like to the legions about the palace of a great king, to secure and defend it from violence or rudeness. Which was the reason that they did not march under any of the standards of the other tribes: because they were to make a camp by themselves; the order of which is directed in the same third chapter. And for the same reason they were not to go to the wars; because their camp was to attend upon the tabernacle, the house of God.

Ver. 51.] When the Israelites removed to a new station, the tabernacle was taken in pieces, that it might be the more easily carried from place to place: in which the Levites were to be employed; and likewise in putting it together again, when it was to be set up, where they rested in their journeys; as is more fully ordered in the fourth chapter, where the manner of taking it down and setting it up again is directed; and every one's office about it, whether priests (for they had some hand in it) or Levites, exactly appointed.

The stranger.] Who is not of this tribe, though an Israelite.

That cometh nigh.] To perform any of the forenamed offices.

Shall be put to death.] As a presumptuous person, in meddling with that which doth not belong unto him. The author of Schebet Jechudah extends this to all strangers, who worshipped strange gods; and saith there was a golden sword hung up in the gate of the temple, with inscription, 'The stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.'

Ver. 52. The children of Israel.] The rest of the tribes before mentioned.

Shall pitch their tents, &c.] In the order prescribed in the next chapter.

Ver. 53. The Levites shall pitch round about the tabernacle.] As is directed ch. iii., where they are ordered to make a camp near the tabernacle, within the other camp of the Israelites.

That there be no wrath upon the congregation.] To prevent the other camp of the Israelites from coming too nigh the tabernacle; whereby they might have incurred God's displeasure.

The Levites shall keep the charge of the tabernacle.] That is, therefore they were to be a constant guard about it: that no man might approach nearer than God allowed, and so bring heavy punishments upon himself and upon the congregation.

Ver. 54. Did according.] Consented to all that is here required, and did accordingly.
CHAPTER II.

The order of the tribes in their tents.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying,
2 Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house: far off about the tabernacle of the congregation shall they pitch.
3 And on the east side toward the rising of the sun shall they of the standard of the camp of Judah pitch throughout their armies: and Nahson the son of Amminadab shall be captain of the children of Judah.
4 And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were threescore and fourteen thousand and six hundred.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1.] The just number of days that were spent in taking the forenamed account of the people is uncertain; but this verse (ch. i. 19), but that being finished, now order is given for their encamping under their several standards. And it is directed to Aaron as well as Moses; though the order for numbering them was directed to Moses only (ch. i. 1), Aaron having by that first order been joined with him in taking the account of them.

Ver. 2. Every man—shall pitch by his own standard.] By the banner of that tribe to which he was joined by the following order.

With the ensign of their father's house: Every family and household had their particular ensigns, beside that great banner under which they encamped and marched; it being pitched and carried (as will appear) in the midst of them. How these banners and ensigns were distinguished one from another, we have no certain knowledge. The later Jews say (particularly Aben Ezra upon his place), that Judah carried in his standard the figure of a lion, and Reuben the figure of a man; Ephraim of an ox, and Dan of an eagle, for which I can see no ground. For though Judah was the eldest born of the patriarchs, the only reason he was chosen for the other is very absurd: with which I shall not trouble the reader, but only observe, that there is not one word of any such thing in their ancient writers; no, not in the whole body of the Talmud, as the famous Bochartus assures us. And it is not likely that they, who so lately smarted for making the golden calf, would adventure to make any other images, and expose them to the eyes of all the people. Nor is it imperious to observe, that when Vitellius in after ages was to march against the Arabians through Judea, the great men of the nation met him, and besought him to march another way: the law of their country not allowing images (such as were in the Roman ensigns) to be brought into it. So Josephus relates, lib. xviii. Antiq. cap. 7, for which one can see no reason, if their ancestors in the wilderness had, by the command or allowance of Moses, carried an eagle in any of their standards (see Bochart in his Hieroz. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 5). It is more probable, if there be room for conjecture in this matter, that the name of Judah might be embroidered in great letters in his standard, and of Reuben in his, and so of the rest: or they were distinguished by their colours only, as now our regiments are.

For far off about the tabernacle At such a distance as

5 And those that do pitch next unto him shall be the tribe of Issachar: and Nethaneel the son of Zuar shall be captain of the children of Issachar.
6 And his host, and those that were numbered thereof, were fifty and four thousand and four hundred.
7 Then the tribe of Zebulun: and Eliaab the son of Helon shall be captain of the children of Zebulun.
8 And his host, and those that were numbered thereof, were fifty and seven thousand and four hundred.
9 All that were numbered in the camp of Judah might show their reverence to the tabernacle; and that there might be another camp of the Levites within them, who made a nearer enclosure about it, in the same form with the camp of Israel, which was quadrangular. This distance of the camp of Israel from the tabernacle, is reasonably judged (by Josh. iii. 4) to have been two thousand cubits; that is, a mile.

Ver. 3. On the east side] These are two expressions (after the manner of the Hebrews) for the same thing. Or kedna, which we here translate on the east, may be translated on the fore-part, viz. of the tabernacle: which was towards the sun's rising.

Shall they of the standard of the camp of Judah pitch] These had the most honourable post (as we now speak) of all others; pitching before the most holy place, where Moses and Aaron had their station in the camp of the Levites (ch. iii. 8S). And therefore the LXX. translate the first words of this verse thus, τα χαρακτήρια της πώσως και των σταυρομετριών των τού ταρτέρναλος: or, they that encamp first towards the east shall be the &c.

Throughout their armies] They being, as we read before (and as the next verse tells us again), threescore and fourteen thousand and six hundred men, were divided into several bodies (such as we now call companies, and regiments, and brigades), under their several officers: for which the Hebrews have no name but that of army or host.

Nahshon] He who was employed as the principal person in that tribe to help to take the number of them (ch. i. 7).

Shall be captain] Their commander-in-chief, or general, as we now speak.

Ver. 4.] Hitherto Moses had set down the words that God spake to him: but these are his own words, which he intermixes all along with those of God's.

Ver. 5.] These now are the words of God; ordering what tribes should pitch under the standard of Judah.

Shall be the tribes of Issachar.] He and Zebulun were two of the sons of Leah, as well as Judah: and therefore their tribes are fitly placed under the standard of the tribe of Judah, as likely to agree well together.

Nethaneel] It may be noted once for all, that the commanders-in-chief of the several tribes, were those very persons who were chosen to take the number of them: which shows they were men of eminence among them; as I observed, ch. i. 4.

Ver. 6.] These are the words of Moses, which to the end of the chapter (as I noted before) are inter-Judah were an hundred thousand and fourscore thousand and six thousand and four hundred, throughout their armies. These shall first set forth.

10 ¶ On the south side shall be the standard of the camp of Reuben according to their armies: and the captain of the children of Reuben shall be Elizur the son of Shicuel.

11 And his host, and those that were numbered thereof, were forty and six thousand and five hundred.

12 And those which pitch by him shall be the tribe of Simeon: and the captain of the children of Simeon shall be Shelumiel the son of Zuri-shaddai.

13 And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were fifty and nine thousand and three hundred.

14 Then the tribe of Gad: and the captain of the sons of Gad shall be Eliasaph the son of Reuel.

15 And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were forty and five thousand and six hundred and fifty.

16 All that were numbered in the camp of Reuben were an hundred thousand and fifty and one thousand and four hundred and fifty, throughout their armies. And they shall set forth in the second rank.

Spersed with the orders that God gave for the forming of their camps.

Ver. 9.] This was the greatest body of all other; which had the honour to be placed just before the oracle, as the strongest guard to it: the tribe of Judah lying in the midst, and the tribes of Issachar and Zebulun on each side of his standard; unto which all their ensigns were in some sort of subjecteness.

Throughout their armies.] This great body was divided into several smaller companies; for which they had no other name (as I observed before) but that of armies.

These shall first set forth.] When they removed from one station to another, this camp marched first. For they commonly went eastward; in which quarter this camp was pitched (ver. 3).

Ver. 10. On the south side shall be the standard of the camp of Reuben] There is nothing to be observed concerning this camp, but that the tribe of Reuben had the honour to pitch in the midst of it; and the tribes of Simeon and Gad lay on either side of him under his standard or banner: just as Issachar and Zebulun did on either side of Judah. And there was an assumed congruity in it; Simeon being his next brother, and Gad the eldest son of Zilpa, the handmaid of their mother Leah (Gen. xxx. 10, 11).

Ver. 16. In the second rank.] That is, when they removed, the three tribes that were pitched on the east marched first under the banner of Judah (as was said before, ver. 9), and then followed these three that lay on the south side under the banner of Reuben.

Ver. 17. Then the tabernacle—shall set forward] After the forenamed camps the tabernacle was to follow, between those two that went before, and the camp of Ephraim and the camp of Dan that came after. So they did not march as they pitched; for then there was a camp on each side of the tabernacle: whereas when they marched there was none on the sides, but two camps went before it, and two followed it.

In the midst of the camp.] Not entirely in the midst: for it appears by the tenth chapter of this book, ver. 17, that after the first camp under the standard of Judah was gone forward, the tabernacle was taken down and carried by the sons of Gershon and Merari between the camp of Judah and that of Reuben, which next followed; and then the sanctuary set forward, borne by the Kohathites (ver. 21), who marched exactly in the midst, between the standards of Judah and Reuben and the standards of Ephraim and Dan.

As they encamp, so shall they set forward.] This may refer either to the Levites, the sons of Kohath; that, as they lay encamped on the same side of the tabernacle that the standard of Reuben did, so they should immediately march after them. Compare ver. 10 of this chapter with ch. iii. 29. Or to the two camps forenamed; that they should march in the same order wherein they lay encamped: Judah, for instance, in the midst of Issachar and Zebulun, before and behind him, or on each side of him.

Every man keeping his place which was assigned him, under the standard to which he belonged; that there might be no disorder among them.

Ver. 18. ] There is little to be noted here, but that Ephraim is plainly preferred before his brother, as he was in Jacob's blessing (Gen. xlvi. 19, 20), and that the two tribes which encamped under his standard, viz. Manassch (ver. 20), and Benjamin (ver. 22), are fittingly joined with him: they being all descended from Rachel.

Ver. 21. Camp of Ephraim were an hundred thousand and eight thousand] This was the smallest body of all the four.

In the third rank.] And therefore, though they lay on the west side in their encampment, yet when they 3 B 25 ¶ The standard of the camp of Dan shall be on the north side by their armies: and the captain of the children of Dan shall be Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai.
26 And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were three score and two thousand and seven hundred.
27 And those that encamp by him shall be the tribe of Asher: and the captain of the children of Asher shall be Pagiel the son of Ocran.
28 And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were forty and one thousand and five hundred.
29 ¶ Then the tribe of Naphtali: and the captain of the children of Naphtali shall be Ahira the son of Enan.
30 And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were fifty and three thousand and four hundred.

It is, thus, were all these persons disposed under their several standards; whose number was taken by Moses and Aaron, with their associates (ch. i. 44, 45).
Ver. 33. But the Levites were not numbered] And consequently did not belong to any of these standards, being to make another camp by themselves, (ch. i. 47, &c.).
Ver. 34. As they gave in their names when they were to be numbered (ch. i. 54), so they now joined together under such standards as God appointed.
So they pitched by their standards, &c.] Each tribe encamped under the standard that was assigned to them; and they also marched, when they set forward, in such order as is here directed. Some order, no doubt, had been observed before, both when they rested and when they marched (see Exod. xii. 18), but it was not so exact and regular as this form, into which they were now cast by God himself, nor can we think it was so strictly observed.
The Jews say that this camp made a square of twelve miles in compass about the tabernacle; as Dr. Lightfoot hath observed, in his Cent. Chorog. exviiith, and J. Wagenseil more lately, in his annotations upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. i. sect. 51, where several of them say, that the camp was three parasits in compass: and a parasit was four miles.

CHAPTER III.

1 The sons of Aaron. 5 The Levites are given to the priests for the service of the tabernacle. 11 instead of the firstborn. 14 The Levites are numbered by their families. 21 The families, number, and charge of the Gershonites, 27 of the Kohathites, 33 of the Merarites. 38 The place and charge of Moses and Aaron. 40 The firstborn are freed by the Levites. 41 The surplus are redeemed.

1 These also are the generations of Aaron and Moses in the day that the Lord spake with Moses in mount Sinai.
2 And these are the names of the sons of Aaron; Nadab the firstborn, and Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar.

CHAP. III.
Ver. 1. These also are the generations of Aaron and Moses] Being now to give an account of the Levites, who had not been numbered with the rest of the children of Israel, he sets down the descendants of the principal persons among them: viz. Aaron (whom he puts in the first place, because he was the eldest brother, and his posterity were advanced to the dignity of priests) and Moses; whose posterity were only ministers to the priests, as all the common Levites were. It may seem, indeed, at first sight, as if he gave an account only of Aaron's posterity (ver. 2), but if we look further to ver. 27, 28, we shall find the posterity of both here numbered in the family of the Amramites, of which both Aaron and Moses 3 These are the names of the sons of Aaron, the priests which were anointed, whom he consecrated to minister in the priest's office.

4 And Nadab and Abihu died before the Lord, when they offered strange fire before the Lord, in the wilderness of Sinai, and they had no children: and Eleazar and Ithamar ministered in the priest's office in the sight of Aaron their father.

were: Amram being their fathers, from whom the genealogy of the children of Moses is derived (1 Chron. xxiii. 13, 14, &c.), through their generations; as here those of Aaron.

Concerning the word generations, see Dr. Hammond on the first of St. Matthew, note a.

In the day that the Lord spake unto Moses, This circumstance seems to be particularly specified, because at that time Nadab and Abihu (who are mentioned in the next verse) were both alive, and very eminent persons (Exod. xxiv. 1, 9, 10), though they were now dead, at this numberling of the Levites.

Ver. 3. These are the names of the sons of Aaron, &c.] There seems no necessity of setting down the names of Aaron's sons, they not being here to be numbered. But it was of great concernment to have the distinction between the priests and the Levites, their offices being very different; and therefore Moses here sets down who belonged to the one, and who to the other.

Ver. 3. These are—the sons of Aaron.] See Lev. viii. 30.

And he consecrated] In the Hebrew, "whose hand he filled" (see Exod. xxviii. 41, and xxix. 9). To minister in the priest's office.] He would have it noted, that Aaron's posterity were solemnly consecrated to a higher office than the rest of the tribe of Levi, who were to be their servants: the very name of ephod carries dignity in it; signifying sometimes a prince, as well as a priest. Accordingly the priests had a very little service imposed upon them, but their chief business was to draw near to God, to present him with the blood, and the fat, and some part of the sacrifices which might be killed by other persons. This shows that they were God's favourites; insomuch that some sacrifices were divided between him and them: and it was the same thing, whether they were of the same tribe or not. The Levites were not the priests: and those things are said to be given to God which were put into their hands, though they never came to the altar: which is an evidence of the near relation they had to the Divine Majesty, which the Levites had not; for they could not come nigh to offer any thing to him, no more than the rest of the Israelites, but were employed in inferior service about the tabernacle, that the priests might wholly attend to the service of God at the altar.

Ver. 4. Nadab and Abihu died] A little after their consecration (Lev. x. 1, &c.). They had no children;] Which is here recorded, that all posterity might know there were none to be admitted to the office of priesthood, but such as could derive their genealogy from Eleazar or Ithamar. If the other had left any sons, they would have inherited their father's office before Eleazar; as Maimonides observes out of Siphre (see Schickhardt's Jus Regium, cap. vi. Theor. xx.).

Eleazar and Ithamar ministered—in the sight of the Lord.] The T. X. rightly translate it, "together with their father," which was the high-priest; or else, he lower priests under him: and so were all their sons; which it is likely they had in good number: for they are appointed (ver. 35) for the guard of the tabernacle towards the east. And thus the taimans Hierosol, in the title concerning Fastign, saith, that Moses appointed eight classes of priests: four of the family of Eleazar, and as many of Ithamar; which continued till the time of Samuel the prophet, and David, who admitted many more (see Selden De Success. in Pontif. cap. 1).

Ver. 5. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,] Bring the tribe of Levi near, and present them before Aaron the priest, that they may minister unto him.

Ver. 6. Bring the tribe of Levi near.] They had consecrated themselves to God by a noble act, mentioned Exod. xxxii. 29, which procured them this blessing to be presented to God, and consecrated to him in a solemn manner, for such services as he should assign them. So this word, bring near, signifies to offer them unto God: as they were, ch. viii. 10, 11.

Before Aaron the priest.] In his presence. That they may minister unto him.] Unto Aaron and the rest of the priests, who were the immediate ministers of God; and the Levites were given to minister unto them: which they did many ways; especially while they remained in the wilderness, where they had a peculiar charge (which otherwise would have been incumbent on the priests), not only to guard the tabernacle, and keep a watch night and day about it; but also to take it down, and to carry it, when they removed, and to set it up again when they rested; as we read in the following part of this chapter, and in the next. When they came into the land of Canaan, and were settled there, they had less to do of this kind: but as the charge of the tabernacle still lay upon them, as it had done before, so did other works in the courts of the Lord's house, and in the chambers where they waited on the priests; which are particularly mentioned in 1 Chron. xxiii. 28, 29, &c. And in David's time their work was still more increased; and he appointed those priests to be over the Lord, and to play upon several sorts of instruments (1 Chron. xxv.), which they did morning and evening (1 Chron. xxiii. 30). Porters, perhaps, there were before, who stood at the several gates of the tabernacle, as afterward of the temple; and are said therein "to minister in the house of the Lord" (1 Chron. xxvi. 12), as also guards of the treasury of God's house, and of things dedicated to him (ver. 30). But as he increased the number of them, so he settled them in their courses, that there might be a constant attendance with greater ease. As for those of them that were made judges and officers, not only in matters concerning the Lord, but in the service of the king (as we read there, 1 Chron. xxvi. 22, 29), it no more concerns what is said of them here, than what follows there (ver. 31), that "there were found among them mighty men of valour" (see upon ver. 10).

Ver. 7. They shall keep his charge.] It highly concerned Aaron in particular, and the whole congregation in general, that the tabernacle should be well guarded: and this was the Levites' great business at first; but what was this charge from off their hands, by attending that service, which all of them were bound to perform.

Before the tabernacle.] This exactly expresses in what their ministry consisted; which was not performed in 8 And they shall keep all the instruments of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the charge of the children of Israel, to do the service of the tabernacle.

9 And thou shalt give the Levites unto Aaron and to his sons: they are wholly given unto him out of the children of Israel.

10 And thou shalt appoint Aaron and his sons, and they shall wait on their priest's office; and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.

the tabernacle (where the priest only officiated in the holy place, as the high-priest in the most holy), but before it, in the external part of it, where they assisted the priests in their service.

To do the service [Such service as I have mentioned before (ver. 6)].

Ver. 8. They shall keep] By guarding them, and keeping a continual watch about them.

All the instruments [Every thing belonging to it].

To do the service [By which service at the tabernacle they took upon them the charge; which otherwise was incumbent on the whole congregation, who were to take care that the holy things were kept both safe and secure, and also separate to the sacred uses to which they were appointed.

These words, which are often repeated ("to do the service of the tabernacle"), are to be carefully noted; because the Levites did not serve in the tabernacle (which belonged only to the priests), but served the tabernacle, by guarding it, and taking it down, and carrying it, &c. as was said before.

Ver. 9. Give the Levites unto Aaron and to his sons:] They were first presented unto God (ver. 6), and God bestowed them as a gift upon the priests (see ch. viii. 19).

They are wholly given unto him] To attend upon the priests, and to obey their orders; for which they paid them nothing, but they were to do it freely, being given to them to be their servants by God, who paid them their wages.

Unappointed Aaron and his sons.] Or, then shalt appoint them to wait on their priesthood: which he had shown before was very different from the Levitical office; but, to make them more mindful of their dignity, he repeats it again; that Aaron and his sons alone should officiate as priests, viz. in offering sacrifices; in setting the bread upon the holy table: looking after the lights, and burning incense; which they were to perform in their own persons, and not appoint any others, as their deputies, to do them: for none of these things could be performed by the Levites, whose business it was to look after the fine flour of which the bread was made; to prepare it, and the frankincense which was to be burnt; and abundance of such like things, which are particularly mentioned 1 Chron. iv. 27—29, 21, 62. But they could not make the anointing oil, or the sweet perfume, mentioned Exod. xxx. 23, 34, for they were most holy; and therefore, the priests only could compound them.

The stranger.] By stranger is meant any one (though a Levite) that was not of the sons of Aaron, who are not allowed to approach unto God.

Shall be put to death.] God himself sent out a fire to consume Korah and his company, who presumed to offer incense, being but bare Levites, and not priests (ch. xvi.).

Ver. 11.] To make the matter more clear, he further tells Moses the reason, why he took the Levites from among the children of Israel to be his after a peculiar manner.

Ver. 12. I have taken the Levites] Take notice of the reason why I have taken the Levites from among the rest of the Israelites (ver. 9), for it is by my order and appointment.

Instead of all the firstborn] To make an exchange with them for all their firstborn, which I have heretofore chanced as my own, and now take the Levites in their stead.

The Levites shall be mine:] As all the first-born were, which now shall be theirs, and the Levites be mine.

Ver. 13. Because all the firstborn are mine:] By a special right, which is mentioned in the next verses.

For on the day that I smote all the firstborn] The title whereby he laid a claim to all the firstborn was, that great miracle (as R. Levi of Barcelona calls it) which he wrought, when he destroyed all the firstborn of their neighbours in Egypt, and touched not one of theirs. By which sparing mercy he acquired a just right to them; and by that solemn dedication which he then commanded to be made of them unto his uses (Exod. xiii. 2, 12, 13).

I hallowed unto me all the firstborn] He separated them unto himself, by sparing them, when he killed all other first-born, but only theirs.

Mine shall they be:] Both by that act of his own, and by the act of the children of Israel, whom he commanded to separate them unto him (Exod. xiii. 2, and xxii. 29), they became God's. By which it appears, that he had not a peculiar right in the first-born, more than in any other of their children, till their coming out of Egypt. And therefore, the taking of the Levites to be his, instead of the first-born, is no argument that the first-born had hitherto been the priests who ministered unto God, till this exchange of them for the Levites. So our learned Dr. Lightfoot seems to infer, in his notes upon this passage; "The first-born (saith he) had been priests till the consecration of the Levites; but now that function must be confined to that tribe." In which words (with due respect be it spoken to that excellent man's labours) there are several misconceptions. For, as the passage was not now confined to this tribe, but to one family in this tribe (that of Aaron), so it was not confined to it upon this occasion; but he and his sons were consecrated before this exchange of the Levites for the first-born, who were now given to minister unto them, but had nothing to do with the priesthood; no more than the first-born, for whom they were exchanged; that peculiar right which God had in the first-born being since their coming out of Egypt. Upon all which considerations, we may look upon this exchange as an argument rather that the first-born were not priests in former times than that they were; as the Jews fancy, and as many have suggested from this very taking of the Levites to be God's portion in their 14 And the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, saying, 15 Number the children of Levi after the house of their fathers, by their families: every male from a month old and upward shalt thou number them.
16 And Moses numbered them according to the word of the Lord, as he was commanded.
17 And these were the sons of Levi by their names: Gershon, and Kohath, and Merari.
18 And these are the names of the sons of Gershon by their families: Libni, and Shimei.
19 And the sons of Kohath by their families: Amram, and Izehar, Hebron, and Uzziel.
20 And the sons of Merari by their families: Mahli, and Mushi. These are the families of the Levites according to the house of their fathers.
21 Of Gershon was the family of the Libnites, stead. For so Menochius himself (lib. ii. De Repub. Jud. cap. 1) asserts from this very place, Jud sacerdotum in Levitas translatum, et eoa loco primogenitum appellatum qui sub deprehendit, "that the right of priests was transferred to the Levites, and they were accepted instead of the first-born, to whom that right belonged." In which there is not a word of truth, but only that the Levites were accepted instead of the first-born; who had the same right to the priesthood that the Levites had; that is, none at all. For Aaron, who may take whom I please to be employed in my service; and think it reasonable that those whom I spared, when I slew the Egyptian first-born, should be mine.

Ver. 11. The Lord spake unto Moses] There was some reason, no doubt, why Moses alone is commanded to take the number of the Levites upon this occasion (as he alone did, ver. 16), when Aaron is joined with him in numbering the Israelites (ch. i. 3), and in numbering the Levites themselves who were fit for service (ch. iv. 2, 41, 45), may, the chief of the Israelites assisted therein (ver. 46). And it is most probable he alone was employed to take this account, because Aaron was a party in it; the money that was to be paid for so many of the first-born as exceeded the number of the Levites, being given to him and to his sons (ver. 45).

In the wilderness] This command immediately followed the other, in the two preceding chapters, before they departed from the wilderness of Sinai; where they had been ever since God delivered the law to them from that mountain.

Ver. 15. Number the children of Levi.] Just as they had numbered the rest of the children of Israel (see ch. i. 2). Only those they numbered from twenty years old and upward; but the Levites from a month old and upward.

Every male from a month old] The reason of this difference was, that this was the age at which they were to redeem their first-born (ch. xviii. 16), in whose stead the Levites were to be given unto God (see ver. 40 of this chapter).

Ver. 16. Moses numbered them] This charge was committed to him alone (ver. 10), and he alone (as I there observed) performed it.

Ver. 17. These were the sons of Levi] The same account we had before (Gen. xlvii. 11; Exod. vi. 18).

Ver. 18. Sons of Gershon] The same is said Exod. vi. 17.

Ver. 19. Sons of Kohath] They are mentioned in the same order, in Exod. vi. 18, 19.

Ver. 20. These are the families of the Levites] Vol. i. 1–72 and the family of the Shemites: these are the families of the Gershonites.

22 Those that were numbered of them, according to the number of all the males, from a month old and upward, even those that were numbered of them were seven thousand and five hundred.
23 The families of the Gershonites shall pitch behind the tabernacle westward.
24 And the chief of the house of the father of the Gershonites shall be Eliasaph the son of Lael.
25 And the charge of the sons of Gershon in the tabernacle of the congregation shall be the tabernacle, and the tent, the covering thereof, and the hanging for the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.
26 And the hangings of the court, and the curtain for the door of the court, which is by the

These were the principal families in this tribe; from whence the several households, and the persons in them, were derived.

Ver. 22. The families of the Gershonites shall pitch behind the tabernacle westward.] Where the most holy place was; and where they under the standard of Ephraim lay, in the great camp of Israel (ch. ii. 18), between whom and the tabernacle this part of the camp of Levi pitched.

Ver. 24. The chief] The commander-in-chief, as we may style him, or the principal officer in this part of the camp of the Levites, was Eliasaph the son of Lael; but of what family he was, whether of the Libnites or Shemites, is not related.

Ver. 25. The charge] That which was committed peculiarly to their care.

In the tabernacle] In the things belonging to the tabernacle; for none went into it but the priests alone.

Shall be the tabernacle,] Not the boards, and pillars, and bases of it (for they belonged to the eave of the tent of Merari, ver. 39), but the ten curtains, which were the inward hangings of it, and are called the mishkan, or tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 1, and see the next chapter of this book, ver. 25).

The tent,] The outward curtains of goats' hair, which are called ohekol, the tent (Exod. xxvi. 7, 12).

The covering thereof,] The neshin, as the Hebrews call it, or the covering of the tent, were the rams' skins and badgers' skins, which lay outmost of all, upon the curtains of goats' hair (Exod. xxvi. 14).

The hanging for the door] The outward veil, mentioned Exod. xxvi. 36, for the inward veil, which hung before the most holy place, was the charge of the Kohathites.

Which is by the tabernacle,] Or, as the Hebrew particle al may be translated, is over, or upon the tabernacle, &c. that is, this curtain at the door and the hangings of the court compassed the tabernacle, and the altar of burnt-offerings (which stood at the door of it, Exod. xl. 19), round about; so that they were not exposed to common sight: for these Gershonites had nothing to do with the altar itself, which was the charge of the Kohathites (ver. 31).

The cords of it] This seems to refer, not merely to the curtain for the door of the court, but to all that NUMBERS.

27 ¶ And of Kohath was the family of the Amramites, and the family of the Izharites, and the family of the Hebronites, and the family of the Uzzielites: these are the families of the Kohathites.

28 In the number of all the males, from a month old and upward, were eight thousand and six hundred, keeping the charge of the sanctuary.

29 The families of the sons of Kohath shall pitch on the side of the tabernacle southward.

30 And the chief of the house of the father of the families of the Kohathites shall be Elizaphan the son of Uzziel.

31 And their charge shall be the ark, and the table, and the candlestick, and the altars, and the vessels of the sanctuary wherewith they minister, and the hanging, and all the service thereof.

32 And Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest shall be chief over the chief of the Levites, and have the oversight of them that keep the charge of the sanctuary.

went before, viz. the cords whereby those hangings were stretched out, and fastened by pins to the wood-work of the tabernacle: for the cords of that belonged to the custody of the sons of Merari (ver. 37), and we find pins and cords, as well for the tabernacle (that is, the hangings) as for the court, i.e. the boards, &c. (Exod. xxxv. 18).

For all the service] Of this part of the house of God, as appears from ver. 31 and 36, where this is repeated with respect to the other parts of it.

Ver. 37. Of Kohath was the family of the Amramites, &c.] He was the second son of Levi, and had as many more families sprung from him as from the eldest; among which was the family of the Amramites, of which were Moses and Aaron.

Ver. 38. In the number of all the males, &c.] Though there were four families of the Kohathites, and but two families of the Amramites, yet the latter were as numerous as they, within eleven hundred.

Keeping the charge] Of what belonged to the holy place, which was committed to their charge, as it follows afterward; and they were instructed in it betimes.

Ver. 29. Kohath shall pitch—southward.] Between the tabernacle and the standard of Reuben (ch. ii. 10).

Ver. 30. The chief—shall be Elizaphan.] There was a commander-in-chief appointed over this body of the Levites, who was chosen out of the youngest family of the Kohathites. But it is observable, there were no standards belonging to any of these bodies, they being designed for other service, and not for war.

Ver. 31. Their charge shall be the ark, &c.] The sanctuary, as was said before (ver. 28), being committed to their custody, the particulars are here mentioned, which were the most precious of all the holy things, with which the Kohathites had the honour to be intrusted, though a younger family than those depending on the Gershonites. Moses and Aaron were of it, being of the family of the Amramites; which is the reason why the Kohathites are reckoned first in the next chapter (ver. 2): and that of the forty-eight cities given to the Levites by Joshua, almost half of them fell to their families (Josh. xxi. 4, 5).

33 ¶ Of Merari was the family of the Mahliites, and the family of the Mushites: these are the families of Merari.

34 And those that were numbered of them, according to the number of all the males, from a month old and upward, were six thousand and two hundred.

35 And the chief of the house of the father of the families of Merari was Zuriel the son of Abihall: these shall pitch on the side of the tabernacle northward.

36 And under the custody and charge of the sons of Merari shall be the boards of the tabernacle, and the bars thereof, and the pillars thereof, and the sockets thereof, and all the vessels thereof, and all that serveth thereto.

37 And the pillars of the court round about, and their sockets, and their pins, and their cords.

38 ¶ But those that encamp before the tabernacle toward the east, even before the tabernacle of the congregation eastward, shall be Moses, and Aaron and his sons, keeping the charge of the sanctuary for the charge of the children of Israel; and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.

The altars.] Both the altar of burnt-offerings and the altar of incense.

The vessels] See Exod. xxv. 29, xxxvii. 16.

The hangings.] That is, the vail before the most holy place, for all other hangings were under the care of the Gershonites (ver. 25, 26), wherein the ark was wrapped, when they carried it (ch. iv. 5).

All the service thereof.] Whatevery belonged to this part of God's house (see ver. 29), and the particulars are mentioned in the next chapter, ver. 7, 9, 14.

Ver. 32. Eleazar—shall be chief over the chief.] There was one officer in chief set over each of these great families; of the Gershonites (ver. 31), of the Kohathites (ver. 30), and the Merarites (ver. 32). And over all these chiefs there is now appointed a supreme chief (who was to govern them as they governed those under them), and that Eleazar, who was more than Levi, being the eldest son of Aaron, the high-priest. Have the oversight] But, more particularly, Eleazar was to supervise those that had the sanctuary under their care; that is, all the Kohathites and Elizaphan their chief (ver. 20).

Ver. 33. Of Merari, &c.] Nothing is observable of these, but that they were the fewest in number, being thirteen hundred less than the children of Gershon (see ver. 22).

Ver. 35. These shall pitch—northward.] Opposite to the Kohathites, between the standard of Dan and the sanctuary (ch. ii. 25).

Ver. 36. Concerning all the things mentioned in this, and in the next verse, see Exod. xxvi. 15, 16, &c. xxxvii. 10—12, &c., and the next chapter of this book, ver. 31, 32.

Ver. 37. Their cords.] These are different from those before mentioned, ver. 27, as I noted there.

Ver. 38. But those that encamp before the tabernacle] Where the entrance into it was.

Even before the tabernacle—northward.] He would have this station observed, as much excelling the rest. Shall be Moses, and Aaron and his sons.] There were but three bodies of the Levites, descended from the three sons of Levi (ver. 1), and therefore none left to guard this side of the tabernacle, but Moses 39 All that were numbered of the Levites, which Moses and Aaron numbered at the commandment of the Lord, throughout their families, all the males from a month old and upward, were twenty and two thousand.

40 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Number all the firstborn of the males of the children of Israel from a month old and upward, and take the number of their names.

41 And thou shalt take the Levites for me (I am the Lord) instead of all the firstborn among the children of Israel; and the cattle of the Levites instead of all the firstlings among the cattle of the children of Israel.

and Aaron, and their families; who lay between the standard of Judah and the tabernacle (ch. ii. ver. 3), which was the most honourable post, as I there noted: where the priests were with great reason placed, together with the chief governor of all, Moses; because the other was the holy place, that none might go into it but themselves.

Keeping—of the sanctuary.] Of the entrance into it.

For the charge of the children of Israel;] Which it concerned every one of the children of Israel should be kept sacred (see ver. 7). The stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.] No man that was not of their number, or of Aaron (though a Levite) was, upon the peril of his life, to enter into the sanctuary; of which they had the charge (see ver. 10).

Ver. 39. All that were numbered of the Levites, which Moses and Aaron numbered.] This looks like a contradiction to the observation I made, ver. 14, 16. But Aaron's numbering here, in all probability, is only agreeing that this was a true account which Moses took of the tribe of Levi. For Moses still continues to be alone concerned in numbering the first-born of the children of Israel, for whom they were to be exchanged (ver. 40, 42).

Were twenty and two thousand.] If the particular sums before mentioned (ver. 22, 38, 34) be put together, they amount to three hundred more than twenty and two thousand. Therefore it is a reasonable conjecture, that the three hundred are omitted in this account, because they were the first-born of the Levites themselves; and upon that score belonging to God already (by the law in Exod. xii. 2, xxxiv. 20), could not be exchanged for the first-born of other tribes, and substituted in their stead, as other Levites were. It is very observable here also, that the Levites were the fewest in number of any tribe; being but two-and-twenty thousand three hundred, from a month old and upward: when some tribes were twice, nay, thrice as many (see ch. i. 27), not reckoning children, but only men from twenty years old and upward. In which the Divine wisdom was evidently very conspicuous, which so ordered it, that this whole tribe might be dedicated to him; whereas, if it had grown proportionably to the rest, there would have been more Levites by far than the first-born of all the tribes.

Ver. 40. The Lord said unto Moses.] To whom alone this command is directed, as I observed above.

Neither all the firstborn of the males] The first-born males were to be a month old, before their parents were bound to redeem them: if they died before, they were not to pay any thing for them. Which depends upon another law, Lev. xii. 4, 6, where if a woman brought forth a male, besides the seven days of her separation, she was to stay three-and-thirty days more before she went unto the sanctuary: at which time the child being to be presented to God, it appears that he acknowledged them for his when they were a month old. Yet they distinguish between the time when the redemption money was due, and when it was offered. This latter was deferred till the mother was abroad again: but it was due, and the father obliged to pay it, as soon as the child was a month old. So Const. L'Empereur observes out of Maimonides, upon Bava kama, cap. vii. sect. 6.

Take the number of their names.] That their number, and that of the Levites, might be compared one with the other; for the reason we have here.

Ver. 41. Thou shalt take the Levites—instead of all the firstborn.] God had taken them before, as we read, ver. 12, by declaring his will to Moses about it. And now he commands Moses to declare his will to the people, and actually to make this exchange; after he had taken the number, both of the first-born and of the Levites. For he had authority to take which he pleased, being the Lord's. The cattle of the Levites, &c.] Not that they should be sacrificed, or taken from the Levites; but that they should be accounted God's cattle; they being the cattle of the Levites, who were his entirely: and therefore were presented unto him, as the Levites were; but still continued in their possession by his allowance, and their encouragement in their service (see ver. 45).

Ver. 42. Moses numbered—all the firstborn.] But we do not find that he numbered the firstlings of their cattle, or the cattle of the Levites; because the exchange of them was not made in particular, by substituting one for one; but generally, by substituting all the cattle of the Levites, instead of all the firstlings of the Israelites' cattle.

Ver. 43.] It may appear something strange, that, from above six hundred thousand men (reckoning from twenty years old and upward, ch. i. 46), there should not be more than this number of first-born sons; till it be considered, that thus many were born since the slaughter of the Egyptian first-born (which was not numbered above a year ago), after which time all the first-born of Israel became God's; but not those that were born before: for so the law is, Exod. xiii. 2. "Whatsoever openeth the womb (i.e. hereafter) both of man and beast, shall be mine."

Ver. 44. The Lord spake unto Moses.] Still he is the person solely employed in this business.

Ver. 45.] How the riders numbered both the Levites and the first-born, now he bids him take those two-and-twenty thousand Levites instead of so many first-born. As for the cattle, they were not numbered, as I observed before, but exchanged in the lump, as we speak. The Levites shall be mine.] I think it is remarkable that he doth not add, "and their cattle shall be mine also." For he did not take their cattle from them.
the two hundred and threescore and thirteen of the firstborn of the children of Israel, which are more than the Levites; 47 Thou shalt even take five shekels apiece by the poll, after the shékél of the sanctuary shalt thou take them: (the shekél is twenty gerahs;) 48 And thou shalt give the money, wherewith the odd number of them is to be redeemed, unto Aaron and to his sons.
49 And Moses took the redemption money of when they became his; but left them the use of them, who still enjoyed them in his right.

I am the Lord.] This exchange is made by my authority, who am the Lord, both of them and all they have.

Ver. 46.] There being two hundred threescore and thirteen first-born more than there were Levites, they are directed, in the next verse, what to do about them.
For there could be no exchange of Levites for them, since there was not a sufficient number to be taken in their stead.

Ver. 47. Five shekels apiece by the poll.] This was the price of redemption ever after, as appears from ch. xviii. 16. For it had been lately constituted the value of a man-child, from a month to five years old, in Lev. xxvii. 6.

Aaron and the shékél of the sanctuary, &c.] See Exod.
xxx. 13, &c. The only difficulty in this matter was, to determine which of the first-born should be re-demed by paying this money, and which should be exchanged for the Levites. For every one of the Israelites, no doubt, was desirous rather to have his first-born redeemed by a Levite, than by paying five shekels; and yet some of them must be put to this expensive way of being Levites enough to answer for them all. The Jews think (particularly R. Solomon) that there was no way to satisfy this doubt like that by drawing of lots, which was done in this manner. Moses, saith the forenamed doctor, took two-and-twenty thousand scrohls of parchment, and wrote in them these words, a son of Levi; and two hundred and seventy and three more, wherein he wrote five shekels; and then putting them all together in an urn, and shaking it to mingle them, he commanded every one of the first-born to come, and put in his hand, and draw out a schedule: and to him that drew out one of the former sort, he said, "A Levite hath redeemed thee;" but to him that drew out one of the latter, he said, "Pay thy price." And thus they tell the story also in the Gemara Babylon. tit.
Sanhedrin, which is probable enough; unless we suppose the congregation to have redeemed the two hundred seventy-three first-born out of a common stock; which was a shorter way, but not so Divine as the other.

Ver. 48. Thou shall give the money, unto Aaron and to his sons.] Which was but reasonable; because the Levites being given to them by God (ver. 6, 7), the money that was paid to make up what was wanting in their proportion to the first-born belonged to them likewise.

Ver. 49. Moses took the redemption money of them.
To whom the lot fell, having five shekels written upon it.

Them that were redeemed by the Levites.] The first-born were redeemed by the Levites as far as their number would reach; the rest, who were more than the Levites, were redeemed by money.

Ver. 50. A thousand three hundred and threescore and five shekels.] Five times two hundred seventy and three make just this number.

Ver. 51. Moses gave the money, unto Aaron and to his sons.] Which was a rule observed in future generations (ch. xviii. 15, &c.).

According to the word of the Lord.] This is so oft repeated, to show how faithful a servant Moses was;
who did nothing but by the Divine order, and omitted nothing that was commanded him.

Aaron, saying,

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. The Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron.] They being both of them concerned to see this carefully executed, he speaks to both; and they took others to their assistance (ver. 34, 46).

Ver. 2. Take the sum of the sons of Kohath.] They are first mentioned, being employed in the most honourable work; as I observed before (ch. iii.
31).

Ver. 3. From thirty years old and upward.] In this work, to which they are appointed, they were not employed till they came to thirty years of age; but among the sons of Levi, after their families, by the house of their fathers,

3 From thirty years old and upward even un-they were admitted to attend at the tabernacle, and do other service, at the age of five-and-twenty; as we read, ch. viii. ver. 25. Which places the Jews (in the Gemara Babylonica upon the title Cholín) reconcile with this, after this manner: they were admitted to learn their duty at five-and-twenty, and to minister at thirty. And so Aben Ezra upon Num. viii.
"They were probationers, and might do some service at five-and-twenty years old, but not do all:" for they might wait upon the tabernacle, but not bear the ark. And that is the exact truth; they were admitted to minister to the priests at five-and-twenty, but were not put upon this laborious work here mentioned, till CHAPTER IV.

til fifty years old, all that enter into the host, to do the work in the tabernacle of the congregation.

4 This shall be the service of the sons of Kohath in the tabernacle of the congregation, about the most holy things:

5 ¶ And when the camp setteth forward, Aaron shall come, and his sons, and they shall take down the covering vail, and cover the ark of testimony with it:

6 And shall put thereon the covering of badgers' skins, and shall spread over it a cloth wholly of blue, and shall put in the staves thereof.

7 And upon the table of shewbread they shall spread a cloth of blue, and put thereon the seat (which was the covering of the ark), over which the Shechinah was. But that being removed in the cloud, when it was taken up from the tabernacle; not only Aaron, but his sons also might come into the most holy place, without any irreverence; that which made it so holy (viz. the glory of the Lord) being gone out of it for the present; so that there was no danger in approaching to the ark where it was wont to rest.

They shall take down the covering vail.] Whereby the holy place was parted from the most holy; which is always meant by the word parocheth (as I showed upon Exod. xxvi. 31), which is here used; and though the word masach be added to it, which constantly signifies the outward veil at the entrance of the sanctuary; yet it is plain that the inward veil, which was at the entrance of the most holy place, is here intended: for the other was committed to the care of the Gershonites (ver. 25).

Cover the ark—with it.] By this it is evident they went into the holy place, unto the very ark, over which they threw this covering.

Ver. 6. Shall put thereon the covering of badgers' skims. Not any of those wherewith the tabernacle was covered (Exod. xxvi. 14), but a covering made on purpose for this use, to defend the ark from the injury of the weather when they carried it on their shoulders.

Spread over it a cloth wholly of blue.] Or, of perfect blue. This was the third covering of the ark; which, till it was laid upon it, the Levites might not approach. And since the tabernacle was the image of things in the heavens (as not only the apostle, but the Jews themselves say), the ark in particular being a figure of the celestial throne of God; it is not an unreasonable conceit of R. Bechay, that this blue-coloured cloth was intended over it as a emblem of the skies, which are spread like a curtain between us and the Majesty on high.

Put in the staves thereof.] It is not said they shall put them in the rings; for they were never to be taken out of them (Exod. xxv. 15). Nor do the Hebrew words signify that they should put them in; but it should be translated, "put the staves thereof," that they might be laid on their shoulders: So Aben Ezra interprets it; which seems to me the most simple exposition: or, fit and dispose them, under the covering, that they might be laid on their shoulders: or, order them so in the rings (which is Chuskan's explication), that they might fall into the two notches, which were in the staves, to keep the ark from sliding up and down.

Ver. 7. Spread a cloth of blue.] It is not said wholly of blue, as it is of the former; which shows it was of something a different colour.

Put thereon the dishes.] Upon which the bread was set.

The spoons, and the bowls.] See Exod. xxv. 29.

The continual bread] i. e. The bread which stood continually in the presence of God.

Shall be thereon?] Even when the table was carried from place to place; which shows that they provided this bread (according to the order, Exod. xxv. 30), they had sufficient strength for it; which was at thirty years of age, when they were able to carry burdens: for by that word their work is described (ver. 15, 19, 21, 31, 47). For though some things, which they were charged withal, might be put into wagons, yet the ark and the most holy things were to be carried upon their shoulders, though they marched never so far (ver. 15, and vii. 9). When the and, indeed, were named in the temple, which was a fixed place, and therefore was no longer to be carried up and down, then (as D. Kimchi observes upon 1 Chron. xxiii.) king David appointed them to enter upon their office at twenty years old; there being also other great work to be performed in his time, for which they were fit at that age. And so it continued even till the return from Babylon, as Selden

i. 8 (see Selden De Success, in Pontifex. lib. ii. chap. 4); and Lightfoot in his Temple Service, ch.
vi. sect. 1).

Even until fifty years old.] Beyond which age they were not bound to do any service, but only to minister with their brethren in the tabernacle (ch. viii. 25, 29).

All that enter into the host.] Or, into the war. fare. For their watching continually, as a guard, about the tabernacle (ch. iii. 7, &c.), made them a sort of military, who were encamped, as appears by the foregoing chapter, about the tabernacle for its security.

Besides which, there was other work which might make their service as laborious as a soldier's life is, and give it the name of entering into the host; which manner of speaking St. Paul uses unto Timothy, 1 Tim. i. 18, where he exhorts him to wear a good warfare.

To do the work in the tabernacle.] They did not perform any work in it, but about it (such as here follows), unless we understand by the tabernacle, the outside court, into which they went to minister unto the priests.

Ver. 4.] The next verses explain what this service was;
or, if the word about (in the latter end of the verse) were quite left out, the sense would be more clear—"this shall be the service of the sons of Kohath, &c. the most holy things;" that is, the ark, as Aben Ezra expounds it. And his interpretation may be justified from ver. 19, 20, in the latter of which it is called the holy, and in the former the holy of holy:
so, as it is here in the Hebrew: for it was the "most holy of all other holy things" in the tabernacle; and gave the name to the place where it stood, of holy of holies, or the most holy place. And this made the service of the Kohathites the most honourable of all other, and is the reason they are mentioned first.

Ver. 5. When the camp setteth forward.] Which it did not do till the cloud was taken up, and removed from off the tabernacle (Exod. xl. 36, 37; Numb. x. 11).

Aaron shall come, and his sons.] While the cloud rested upon the tabernacle, and the glory of the Lord filled the house, none but Aaron might come into the most holy place where the ark was, and that but on one day in the year; and then, after he had filled it with incense, which made a cloud before the mercy-dishes, and the spoons, and the bowls, and covers to cover withal: and the continual bread shall be thereon:

8 And they shall spread upon them a cloth of scarlet, and cover the same with a covering of badgers' skins, and shall put in the staves thereof.

9 And they shall take a cloth of blue, and cover the candlestick of the light, and his lamps, and his tongs, and his snuffdishes, and all the oil vessels thereof, wherewith they minister unto it:

10 And they shall put it and all the vessels thereof within a covering of badgers' skins, and shall put it upon a bar.

11 And upon the golden altar they shall spread a cloth of blue, and cover it with a covering of badgers' skins, and shall put to the staves thereof:

all the time they were in the wilderness. And it was not hard to procure so much corn from their neighbours, bordering upon the wilderness, as would be sufficient for this purpose, and for others, which I shall note in their proper places; particularly from the land of Midian, where Moses' father-in-law lived; which was not far from Sinai (as appears from Exod. iii. 1), where they were at present.

12 And they shall take all the instruments of ministry, wherewith they minister in the sanctuary, and put them in a cloth of blue, and cover them with a covering of badgers' skins, and shall put them on a bar.

13 And they shall take away the ashes from the altar, and spread a purple cloth thereon:

14 And they shall put upon it all the vessels thereof, wherewith they minister about it, even the censers, the fleshhooks, and the shovels, and the basons, all the vessels of the altar; and they shall spread upon it a covering of badgers' skins, and put to the staves of it.

15 And when Aaron and his sons have made an end of covering the sanctuary, and all the vessels of the sanctuary, as the camp is to set forward; after that, the sons of Kohath shall come

Ver. 12. They shall take all the instruments of the ministry.] I do not see what can be meant by these, but the holy garments which Aaron and his sons put on in the time of their ministration. For all other things have been already mentioned; and these are called the clothes of service, Exod. xxxi. 10, where they are immediately mentioned after all the forenamed furniture of the tabernacle.

Put them upon the golden altar. Here they put them, which he had the candlestick, and the altar of incense (ver. 9, 11).

Put them on a bar.] By this it appears that the Hebrew word mot, which we translate a bar, signifies a broad instrument for carriage; such as I have described, ver. 10.

Ver. 13. Take away the ashes from the altar.] Of burnt-offering; which was never cleansed from its ashes (Lev. vi. 10, 11), but then especially when it was to be removed. What they did with the fire, which was always to burn upon it (Lev. vi. 12, 13), is not here related; but we may suppose it was carried upon the grate, which had rings on purpose, that it might be carried separate from the altar (see Exod. xxvii. 11, 12).

Spread a purple cloth thereon.] As being a holy thing, though not of such sanctity as those before named.

Ver. 14. Put upon it all the vessels thereof, &c.] That they might be carried with it.

The censers. Here the censers are put first, which are mentioned last in Exod. xxvii. 3, where this word is translated firepans. Others understand it by tongs, because he names only those things upon which the sons of Aaron were to put a covering; and this, it is likely, was carried without one.

Staves of it.] Exod. xxvii. 6, 7, and xxxviii. 6, 7.

Ver. 15. When Aaron and his sons have made an end, &c.] This work was to be performed by them alone, and the Levites were not to meddle with any of these things till they had done.

The sons of Kohath shall come to bear it.] For all the forementioned things, belonging to the sanctuary, were to be carried by them, even the ark itself; which they carried so, that all the people might see it went along with them. For the rings being fastened to the bottom of the ark (see Exod. xxv. 12), when the staves were on their shoulders it appeared on high: to represent, saith R. Bechai, Him that is most highly exalted over all. The priests, indeed, might carry the ark, being more than Levites (Deut. xxxi. 9), and accordingly we find, that, upon extraordinary occasions, they did; as when they went over Jordan (Josh. iii. 14), and when Jericho was besieged (ch. vi. 6); some think also, when David, as he fled from Absalom, sent the ark back (2 Sam. xv. 29). But it appears very probable, that they alone were here meant; and especially since, when he brought it from the house of Obed-edom, he not only employed the Levites in it, but declared none else ought to bear it (1 Chron. xv. 2, 15, 27). He bade the priests indeed, as well as the Levites, sanctify themselves for this work: for “ye (saith he to the priests, ver. 12) are the holy things of the Levites;” but they seem to have been present, only to see the Levites perform their charge; and to accompany the ark, as David himself did.

But they shall not touch any holy thing, lest they die.

Some imagine they were not to touch these things at all; they were covered by the priests: but it is more likely that even then they were not to touch them, but only the staves, or the bar, wherein they were carried; especially the ark, which is here principally meant by the holy thing (the word any not being in the Hebrew), whose staves only they touched, and lifted it up by putting them upon their shoulders.

These things are the burden of the sons of Kohath.

When it was removed; for at other times they had no charge of them, their burden, as, ver. 4, they are called their service, to show the nature of their service, which required the strength of grown men (ver. 3).

Ver. 16. To the office of Eleazar—pertaineth the oil.

It is commonly thought, that he is required to carry this, and the other things that follow in this verse, himself: but, if all things be considered, it will appear more reasonable to think that he, who was the chief of all the chiefs over the Levites (ch. iii. 32), is peculiarly required to see the Kohathites did their duty: for, though they had a chief over them, whose work it was to inspect them (ch. iii. 30), yet God thought good to appoint Eleazar to superintend both him and all under him in these weighty concerns: and so the words may be interpreted out of the Hebrew.

The oversight of Eleazar: the son of Aaron the priest shall be the oil, &c. And there is the greater reason thus to understand it, because the oil-vessels are before committed to the Kohathites (ver. 9), and consequently the oil itself; which could not be carried but in the vessels.

Sacrifice-incense.] Mentioned Exod. xxx. 34.

Daily meat-offering.] See Exod. xxix. 40, 41.

Anointing oil.] Exod. xxx. 25, &c. These were not named before; but it is here laid upon Eleazar, to see that they were as carefully carried by the Kohathites as any other things belonging to the sanctuary.

Ver. 17.] The things before mentioned, especially the ark, were so sacred, that he repeats the admonition he had given about the danger of irreverence to it: which he here represents in a frightful manner.

Ver. 18. Cut ye not off.] Do not by your negligence occasion the destruction of a great many persons.

The tribe of the families of the Kohathites.] A considerable part of the tribe of Levi, viz. the family of the Kohathites, who were near a third part of it.

Ver. 19. But thus do unto them.] Proceed in this manner, to prevent so great a mischief as their destruction.

When they approach unto the most holy things.] Come to take up the ark: which is meant by the holy of holies (see ver. 4).

Aaron and his sons shall go in.] And cover the ark, and the rest of the things within the sanctuary; as is before directed.

Appoint them every one to his service.] And then allot to every one his share in this work; that is, to carry such particular things, as they think most proper for them.

Ver. 20. But they shall not go in to see.] They might go in to the most holy place, when not only the glory of the Lord was removed, but the ark and the mercy-seat, upon its removal, were covered by the priests (for then the place where they lay covered was no longer holy); but they might not come in to see the priests cover them; which was to be done before they approached.

When the holy things are covered.] In the Hebrew it is in the singular number, when the holy, or holy thing is covered, i. e. the ark, as the Jews generally understand it; and that with great reason, as any one may be satisfied, who will take the pains to compare 1 Kings viii., 2, with 2 Chron. v. 9. Where that which in the former place is called the holy, in the latter is called the ark.

Lest they die.] They might not, under pain of death, either see it when it was covered, or touch it afterward (ver. 15), but only carry it in the manner there described.

Ver. 21. The Lord spake unto Moses.] He was principally concerned in this, but Aaron was also joined with him, to see the execution of what is here required (ver. 1, 19, 34).

Ver. 22. Take also the sum of the sons of Gershon, &c.] The eldest son of Levi (ch. iii. 17), who, though they were employed in lower services, were to account it an honour to serve about the tabernacle.

Ver. 23. All that enter to perform the service.] I do not understand why this should not be translated as ver. 2, into the host. For it is the very same phrase...
24 This is the service of the families of the Gershonites, to serve, and for burdens.
25 And they shall bear the curtains of the tabernacle, and the tabernacle of the congregation, his covering, and the covering of the badgers' skins that is above upon it, and the hanging for the door of the tabernacle of the congregation,
26 And the hangings of the court, and the hanging for the door of the gate of the court, which is by the tabernacle and by the altar round about, and their cords, and all the instruments of their service, and all that is made for them: so shall they serve.
27 At the appointment of Aaron and his sons shall be all the service of the sons of the Gershonites, in all their burdens, and in all their service: and ye shall appoint unto them in charge all their burdens.
28 This is the service of the families of the sons of Gershon in the tabernacle of the congregation in the Hebrew, both here and there: only here more emphatical by doubling the word for host: and therefore may, very properly, be translated in this place, "that enter in to war the warfare." For the service of the Gershonites was more burdensome than the former, though they were fewer in number (ver. 36, 40).

Ver. 24. This is the service of the Gershonites. Which were only two (ch. iii. 18, 21).
To serve, and for burdens. To serve, when the tabernacle rested; and to carry burdens, when it removed (see ver. 47).

Ver. 25. Bear the curtains. The ten fine curtains, which were the inward hangings of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 1, 2, &c.). Which, I suppose, were taken down as well as carried by the Gershonites: because nothing is said here of Aaron or his sons being employed, to make them ready for carriage.

And the tabernacle. Not the boards of the tabernacle, which were the charge of the children of Merari (ver. 31), but the eleven curtains of goats' hair which covered the boards (see Exod. xxvi. 7, 8, &c.).
The covering of the badgers' skins. The outward covering of all, which was of rams' skins dyed red, and badgers' skins (as we translate it, Exod. xxvi. 14).

Hanging for the door. Which is described, in the conclusion of the same chapter (Exod. xxxvi. 36).

Hanging for the door. See Exod. xxvii. 16. Which is by the tabernacle. The sense would have been more plain, if the particle of, which we translate by, had been translated upon, or over; for the court encompassed both the tabernacle and the altar (Exod. xl. 6—8).
Their cords. Which were employed in fastening those hangings.

All the instruments. The brazen pins, I suppose, mentioned Exod. xxvii. 19.
All that is made for them. And whatsoever else belonged to them (see ch. iii. 20).
So shall they serve. Or, in that shall they serve.
Ver. 27. At the appointment of Aaron, &c. In the Hebrew it is, at the mouth of Aaron, &c. I. e. according to their order, every one of the Gershonites were to apply themselves to such services as they directed: for God had given the Levites to them to be their ministers, and keep their charge (ch. iii. 6, 7).

Appoint unto them in charge all their burdens. The word here for appoint seems to import, that the priests gave them a particular, as we speak, of what they were to do; that they might neither forget nor mistake; for it is, the same word that is used in the beginning of this book (ch. i. 3) for numbering the people; and so it is used here, ver. 34, 47, 48. Therefore the sense here is different from the above, viz., that the priests should be appointed over their own several duties, and that there should be no mistake.

Ver. 28. Their charge shall be under the hand of Ithamar. That is, under the direction and conduct of Ithamar: for though the Gershonites had a chief of their own (ch. iii. 24), yet Ithamar was to inspect both him and them, and see they did not neglect their duty. Thus Eleazar was set over the Kohathites (ver. 16).

Ver. 29. As for the sons of Merari, thou shalt number them. Which were but two (ch. iii. 33), as those of Gershon were.

Ver. 30. Every one that entereth into the service. The words in the Hebrew are the very same with those, ver. 3, which we translate enter into the host (see there).

Ver. 31. This is the charge. The most cumbersome things fell to their charge; which here follow.

Boards of the tabernacle. See Exod. xxvi. 15, &c.
Barsthereof. See there, ver. 26, &c.
Pillars thereof. See in the same place, ver. 32, and xxxvi. 36.

Sockets thereof. These belonged both to the boards of the tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 19, 21, 25), and to the pillars (Exod. xxvi. 32, xxxviii. 37).

Ver. 33. Pillars of the court. Exod. xxvii. 10—12.
Their sockets. See there.
Their pins. Ver. 19, and ch. xxxviii. 20.
Their cords. Exod. xxxviii. 18, xxxix. 40.

By name ye shall reckon the instruments. The priests (particularly Ithamar) were to give them an inventory of those things; expressing by name every pin, and to what use, and in what place it is served; because otherwise such small things might have been lost, if they had not taken a special care of them; and they might not have been able to set up the tabernacle again when they rested, for want of them.
Chapter IV.

Ver. 33. This is the service of—Memit.] In taking down and carrying the tabernacle.

Under the hand of Ithamar] Who had the oversight both of the Gershonites and the Merarites; as Eleazar had of the Kohathites (ver. 16, 28).

Ver. 34. Moses and Aaron and the chief of the congregation] They took to their assistance the very same men, I suppose, who were employed in numbering all the children of Israel (ch. i. 4, 16, 17).

Numbered the sons of the Kohathites] Having assigned to them their particular charge, they now proceed to number them; as God commanded (ver. 2, 3).

Ver. 35. Every one that entereth into the service] Or as we translate it (ver. 32), entereth into the host.

Ver. 36. Of the whole number of males descended from Kohath (compare this with ch. iii. 29), there was a fourth part, and better, that were fit for service.

Ver. 37. All that might do service] Such service as is particularly mentioned from ver. 4 to ver. 16.

Ver. 38. Sons of Gershon.] He proceeds in the same order to number them, which he observed in giving them their charge; beginning with the children of the second son of Levi, and then going back to the eldest.

Ver. 39. From thirty years old and upward, &c.] This verse is the very same with ver. 35.

Ver. 40. Two thousand and six hundred and thirty.] A third part and a little more of their males were fit for service. Compare this with ch. iii. 22.

Ver. 41. Of all that might do service] Such service as is described from ver. 24 to ver. 29.

Ver. 42, 43.] These two verses are the same with ver. 38, 39.

Ver. 44.] It is very remarkable, the descendants from the youngest son of Levi (ch. iii. 17), which had the fewest males in it of a month old and upward, had the most robust men fit for service; for here are above half (compare this with ch. iii. 31) of the whole number of males grown up to thirty years of age; which was a singular providence, the heaviest burden of service.

Ver. 45. These are they that were numbered of the families of the sons of Gershon, of all that might do service in the tabernacle of the congregation, whom Moses and Aaron did number according to the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses.

Ver. 46. These be those that were numbered of the families of the sons of Merari, whom Moses and Aaron numbered according to the word of the Lord by the hand of Moses.

Ver. 47. From thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old, every one that entereth into the service, for the work in the tabernacle of the congregation.

Ver. 48. Even those that were numbered of them after their families, were three thousand and two hundred.

Ver. 49. These be those that were numbered of the families of the sons of Merari, whom Moses and Aaron numbered according to the word of the Lord by the hand of Moses.

Ver. 50. All those that were numbered of the Levites, whom Moses and Aaron and the chief of Israel numbered, after their families, and after the house of their fathers.

Ver. 51. From thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old, every one that came to do the service of the ministry, and the service of lying upon them who were to carry the burdens, &c., of the tabernacle; not indeed upon their shoulders, but in wagons; which they were to lead after they had taken them down, and unload when they were to set them up again; and for that reason had more wagons allowed them than their brethren the Gershonites (ch. vii. 7, 8).

Ver. 52. These be those, &c.] Who were principally employed in this business.

By the hand of Moses.] To whom the command is expressly directed (ver. 21).

Ver. 53. Whom Moses and Aaron and the chief of Israel numbered.] For they took in others to their assistance (ver. 34), which is here repeated, to show that there was more in the business than the Levites; they being witnesses of every tribe that they proceeded impartially, and did not favour the Levites, who were their brethren.

Ver. 54. Every one that came to do the service of the ministry, and the service of the burden] The first of these ("the service of the ministry") one would think related to their serving the priest when the tabernacle was standing; and the latter ("the service of the burden") to their carrying the tabernacle when it was taken down, and removed; and so I expounded those words, ver. 24. But he mentioning here only those that were numbered from thirty years old, I think, upon further consideration, that there is no regard in these expressions to the service they did to the priests in the tabernacle. The word burden is, in the Hebrew, that which they were admitted at twenty-five years old (see ver. 5), but only to the service mentioned here in this chapter, which relates altogether to the taking down and carrying the tabernacle. And therefore these must be looked upon as two phrases for the same thing; the former of which is not exactly translated; for there is nothing of ministry in the Hebrew; but the latter ("the service of the burden") to every one that cometh to serve the service of the ministry, and the service of the burden, or carriage." For it is the same word, which, being joined with work, we translate servile (Lev. xxiii. 7, and other places).

48 Even those that were numbered of them, were eight thousand and five hundred and fourscore.

Ver. 48. Eight thousand and five hundred and fourscore.] If the three sums, mentioned ver. 36, 40, 44, be put together, they amount exactly to this sum in the whole.

Ver. 49. They were numbered by the hand of Moses.] By the assistance of Aaron and others (ver. 1, 24, 36).

Every one according to his service, and according to his burden.] I observed before (ver. 47), that service and burden are two expressions of the same thing. For though the sons of Kohath had the noblest part of the work, yet their employment is called both a service and a burden, ver. 19, as that of the Gershonites is, ver. 24. For which service all the tithes of the country of Canaan were given to them, and continued to be theirs when this kind of service ceased; as it did when the temple was built; for then there were no burdens to be carried on their shoulders (as Josiah speaks, 2 Chron. xxxv. 3), but their duty was changed, 49 According to the commandment of the Lord they were numbered by the hand of Moses, every one according to his service, and according to his burden: thus were they numbered of him, as the Lord commanded Moses.

even by David before the building of the temple; who made them singers, and keepers of the treasury, as well as porters at the gates of God’s house: and likewise judges and other officers in the country; as we read in I Chron. xxvi. But the alteration in their service made no alteration in the wages allotted to them; for they still enjoyed all the tithes.

As the Lord commanded Moses.] This is so often repeated (ver. 37, 41, 45), that all posterity might reverence these ordinances as Divine institutions, and not merely human appointments. And so we are to look upon all these laws, as wise orders made by the Sovereign of the world, for the better government of that people, whom he had taken for his own peculiar. And it argues a very profound spirit in those (as Conr. Pelficens here observes) who can admire and praise these De Fœsis, and such-like books, and have no regard at all (if they do not ridicule them) to these sacred writings, which are of such venerable antiquity.

CHAPTER V.

1 The unclean are removed out of the camp. 5 Restitution is to be made in trespasses. 11 The trial of jealousy.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Command the children of Israel, that they put out of the camp every leper, and every one that hath an issue, and whosoever is defiled by the dead:

3 Both male and female shall ye put out, without the camp shall ye put them; that they defile not their camps, in the midst whereof I dwell.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1.] It is not said when this was spoken which here follows; but it is likely immediately after the foregoing commandments, upon which it had some dependence.

Ver. 2. Put out of the camp every leper.] There were three camps (as Maimonides, and a great many others mentioned by Mr. Selden, observes, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 1, n. 5), the camp of the Shechinah, or of the Lord, viz. the sanctuary with its courts, which are called the “tents of the Lord” (1 Chron. xxxi. 32) and next the camp of the Levites, who, with Aaron and his sons, made a camp about the tabernacle (cf. infra this book), and then the camp of Israel (ch. ii.), which encompassed them all. Answerable to these, when the temple was built, they reckoned the temple itself from the east gate to be the camp of the Lord; and the camp of the Levites, to be from the entrance of the house of the temple of the Lord to that east gate of the temple; and the camp of Israel they thought extended from the entrance of Jerusalem to the mount of the house of the Lord. Now lepers were so unclean, that they were not admitted into any of these three camps, but shut out of them all (see Lev. xiii. 46). But he that had an issue (Lev. xv. 2), was only shut out of the first two camps, the camp of the Lord, and the camp of the Levites; but he might be in the camp of Israel. And he that

4 And the children of Israel did so, and put them out without the camp: as the Lord spake unto Moses, so did the children of Israel.

5 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

6 Speak unto the children of Israel, When a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the Lord, and that person be guilty:

was “defiled by the dead” (Lev. xxvi. 1), was only excluded from the first, the sanctuary, but not from the other two (see Drusius also upon ch. iv. 25).

Ver. 3. Both male and female.] For women had issues (for instance) as well as men (Lev. xiv. 2, 19 &c.

That they defile not their camps.] The camp of Israel consisted of four camps (and therefore he speaks in the plural number), that of Judah, that of Reuben, that of Ephraim, and that of Dan (Numb. ii. 3, 10, 18, 25). Which would have been so defiled, if they had suffered these unclean persons to stay among them, that none would have been fit to go to the sanctuary.

In the midst whereof I dwell.] By his special presence in the sanctuary, which was encompassed by these camps; out of reverence to which, such unclean persons were to be kept at a greater distance than other men and women.

Ver. 4.] There was an order for this before; particularly for putting out the lepers (Lev. xiii. 46), which could not be put in execution till the camp was formed, as now it was.

Ver. 5.] It is uncertain when this was spoken; but I see no reason why we should not think it was at the same time with the other things here mentioned.

Ver. 6. Shall commit any sin that men commit.] In the Hebrew the words are plainly these, “shall commit any sin of man”; that is, against his neigh-7 Then they shall confess their sin which they have done: and he shall recompence his trespass with the principal thereof, and add unto it the fifth part thereof, and give it unto him against whom he hath trespassed.
8 But if the man have no kinsman to recompense the trespass unto, let the trespass be recompensed unto the Lord, even to the priest; beside the ram of the atonement, whereby an atonement shall be made for him.
9 And every offering of all the holy things of the children of Israel, which they bring unto the priest, shall be his.
10 And every man's hallowed things shall be his: whatsoever any man giveth the priest, it shall be his.
11 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
12 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, If any man's wife go aside, and commit a trespass against him, 13 And a man lie with her carnally, and it be priests who waited in their courses at the tabernacle; all of which could not officiate at the same time, but some at one time, some at another; this law determines, that the particular priest who performed the office of sacrificing, should have to himself that part of the holy things which fell to the priest's share; and it should be holy, that people might not take away the holy things from the Temple. Thus L'Empereur (upon Bama kama, cap. 3, sect. 12) expresses these words better than any I have met withal.

Ver. 10. Every man's hallowed things shall be his.] As the former verse speaks of the holy things of the children of Israel in general, so this, of what any particular person offered; which still with greater reason was made to be a rule to the priest. Thus we see the reason of this: for it is possible a man should offer a priest nothing but the holy things; that is, the tithe of what he used to have, according to Isa. v. 10.

Whatever any man giveth the priest, it shall be his.] These words are only a fuller explication of this law (as the same L'Empereur observes), that the rest of the priests might not be divided among the holy things from him that offered them, under pretence that they belonged to the whole sacerdotal order. For though they were delivered unto him, yet it was, they might say, that they should be divided among the whole classes then in attendance. So some things were (ver. 2), and therefore this law is added to prevent their extending their claims to the whole of these offerings, when a man divided not as he ought, "he shall have nothing but the holy things;" that is, the tithe of what he used to have, according to Isa. v. 10.

Ver. 11.] There is so little connection between this and the foregoing laws, that it is not easy to give a reason why it is here placed. All that I can say is, that Moses having spoken concerning frauds, from the suspicion of which men were to purge themselves by an oath (ver. 6), he here takes occasion to mention the greatest case that could happen of that nature; which was, when a man was accused of adultery, concerning which God gave him the following order.

Ver. 12. If any man's wife go aside.] Being private for some time, with another man; whose company her husband had charged her not to keep alone; and therefore is suspected by him to be an adulteress.

For it is certain, that, by a wife that goeth aside (whom the Hebrews from hence call סדה), is not meant one that hath certainly committed adultery; but is, with some reason, suspected of that crime. And therefore it is a rule among the Jews, "The bitter waters never are used but in a dubious case."

And commit a trespass against him.] And thereby hath very much offended him.

Ver. 13. And a man lie with her carnally.] As her husband hath cause to suspect; he having (as I said before) admonished her not to be with such a man in private: that is, to give him no cause of jealousy.

So Abarbinel rightly expounds a man's "lying with her carnally," of her husband's opinion and suspicion and the next verse justifies this exposition.
It be hid from the eyes of her husband,'] There being no clear evidence, but only conjectures, that she is Scripture, for such a sluggish temper, as a man cannot shake off.

By this it appears, that if the process was begun in some court below (as the Jews affirm), the cause was removed to Jerusalem (where only they could sacrifice when the ark of God's presence was settled there), and brought before the great Sanhedrin: who, putting her husband out of the court (as they say in the next section of the aforenamed Mischna), and having the woman alone by herself, endeavoured first by striking a terror into her, and then by giving her good words, to persuade her to tell the truth saying,
"Dear daughter, perhaps thou wast overtaken by drinking too much wine, or wast in a frolic humour, or carried away by the heat of youth, or by the example of evil neighbours come, confess the truth, for the sake of His great name, which is described in the most sacred ceremony ; and do not let it be Abarbinel expounds it, "the Scripture intimates that this sacrifice was brought by the husband for the sake of his wife for he had done nothing that needed a for there is nothing said to make us look upon this as an expiatory sacrifice; but the true intention of it was (as Wagenseil well observes, Annot. in Mischna Sota, cap. 2, p. 349) to supplicate the Divine Majesty that he would be pleased to clear the woman's innocence if she were causelessly suspected ; or otherwise discover and punish her guilt.

of this kind (see Lev. ii. 15). For though that mentioned Lev. V. 11, was to have no oil nor frankincense though the sheaf mentioned Lev. xxiii. 10, was of barley, yet it was sifted, and, besides, oil and frankincense were used with it ; which are here forbidden.

splendour (as his word is) to be wanting to such a woman's sacrifice, because of the baseness of her behaviour, with the occasion of it; as if she had been told (to stir her up to repentance), "because of the filthiness of thy actions, thy oblacion is more imperfect than others" (More Nechoth. par. iii. cap. 46).

But none, I think, hath given a better account of this than St. Chrysostom (Orat. v. adv. Judeos), because the woman was loaded with sorrow, and heavy accusation; she would no judgment of the people be hazarded.

But another very learned person thinks, with more reason, the priest, whose lot it was to attend at that time in his course, is here meant (see Mischna, cap. 1, Sote, sect. 5, annot. 8, Wagenseil).

Shall bring her near.] Rather "bring it" (that is, her offering) near to the altar at the door of the tabernacle.

Set her] Rather "set the offering;" for she is ordered to be set before the Lord afterward (ver. 18).

Before the Lord.] At the altar, which was at the door of the tabernacle (see Lev. i. 3). At the east gate of the temple, saith the Mischna, which was called the gate of Nieenor; for there women also after child-bed were unclean, and the lepers cleansed. τος τιμωρον τα

Ver. 17. The priest shall take holy water.] From the laver; for no water was holy, but that which was made so by the laver; as the Jews say in Jalkut. Therefore Onkelos, instead of holy water, hath water from the laver.

An earthen vessel.] Which had never been employed to any other use (as the Mischna saith), and contained about a pint of our measure. This I take to have been appointed, as a further expression of the vileness of her condition; for the reasons which the Jewish doctors give of it are not to be regarded. The best that I have observed is, to declare that she should be broken in pieces, like that earthen vessel, if she was guilty of that which she denied.

Of the dust.] Another token of vileness; this being the serpent's food.

That is in the floor of the tabernacle.] To make her afraid of the judgment of God. For if there were no dust in the tabernacle, they were to fetch it from some other place (as Maimonides relates their practice, Hilleoth Sota, cap. 4), and lay it upon the floor of the tabernacle; and then take it and put it into the water.

Put it into the water.] Sprinkle a little of it upon the water (that it might be more easily drunk), but so much, that it might be plainly seen. For there were three things, the Jews say, of which a less quantity was not admitted than might be seen, viz. this dust, and the ashes of the red heifer (ch. xix. 17), and the spittle, in which she would be present, except only her brother's wife (Deut. xxv. 9). But if the priest put the dust into the vessel first, and then poured the water upon it, he did not do amiss; as the Jews say in the ancient book Siphi (see Wagenseil upon Mischna Sote, cap. 2, sect. 2, annot. 11, 12).

It hath been observed by some, that such ways of trial were in the hands of God, and that if they could be proved to have been as ancient as Moses's days, it would make it probable, that this was ordered by God, to divert the Jews from following the superstitious of other nations to make this discovery, and bring them to appear before him at his tabernacle, and there use such rites as were of his appointment (see our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. iii. Dissert. i. cap. 2, p. 353, &c.).

Ver. 18. The priest shall set the woman before the Lord.] At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation; where a great many women, who were called together on purpose, stood about her; "that they might be taught not to do after her lewdness" (as the prophet Ezekiel speaks, ch. xxii. 18). As many doctors also as I have placed in my notes, except only her maids and domestic servants, who were put out, lest they should disturb her mind too much; as Mr. Selden interprets the words of the Mischna, about this matter (lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 15). Which another very learned man (J. Wagenseil) interprets the quite contrary way, "lest her mind should place any hope in them" (cap. 1, sect. 6, annot. 6, &c. Sota).

Uncover the woman's head.] He was to strip her of all her head attire (as the manner was, if we may believe Philo, in all judicial proceedings), to loose her hair, and tear her garments down to her breast; which he bound about her (as the Jews say) with an Egyptian cord. And if she had any gold or jewels, or other ornaments about her, they were all taken from her: and she was clothed with a black garment. All which were plain tokens of her lamentable condition.

Put the offering—in her hands.] After he had put it into a frying-pan, under which he held his own hand (Lev. ii. 7), and at the same time held in his other hand the bitter water; which he showed her.

Which is the jealousy offering?] Offered purely upon the account of her husband's jealousy; as he told her.

The priest shall have in his hand the bitter water.] So called, because they put wormwood, or some such thing into it, and give it a bitter taste; as Maimonides and the ancient rabbins fancy. But the later doctors say, nothing was mixed with this water but dust; and yet it became bitter in the mouth. So Nachman and others. But the most probable account of all others is, that this water was called bitter, from its direful effects upon the body of the woman, if she was 19 And the priest shall charge her by an oath, and say unto the woman, If no man have lain with thee, and if thou hast not gone aside to uncleanness with another instead of thy husband, be thou free from this bitter water that causeth the curse:

guiltiness. To which exposition Jacob Abendana inclines; (see Wagensen on the Mischna Sota, cap. 3, sect. 5, annot. 1.)

That causeth the curse.] “Or rather, “which was given thee as curses,” and dreadful imprecations: blotted out with the bitter water; (ver. 21, 23) as R. Bechai expounds it.

Ver. 19. The priest shall charge her by an oath.] Adjure her to tell the truth in the manner following.

If no man have lain with thee, &c.] If thou art innocent of that whereof thou art suspected.

But because of this bitter water, &c.] It shall have no ill effect upon thee.

Ver. 20. But if thou hast gone aside, &c.] Art guilty of adultery.

Ver. 21. Then the priest shall charge the woman with an oath of cursing.] This is no new adjuration; but only another part of that which began ver. 19, and is continued in this verse. But these three verses contain the entire form of the language; which the priest was to pronounce in a language which the woman understood, as the Jewish doctors observe; otherwise, how could the woman answer Amen? as R. Isaac saith in Siphri; exactly according to the apostle’s doctrine, 1 Cor. xiv. 16. And the priest was to signify to her, that this proceeding was merely to satisfy her husband’s jealousy, by discovering the truth. Thus this whole matter is related by the author of Ez. Hechajim (an incompable MS., as Wagensen calls it, who hath it in his possession):—"The priest pronounces this curse in a language which she understands; and signifies to her in the vulgar tongue, that these things are going on in the presence of the jealous of her, she having been secretly with one whose company he forbade her to keep: and then saith in a tongue familiar to her, ‘If no other man hath lain with thee but thy husband, &c., be thou free from these bitter waters, &c., but if thou hast been false to him, &c., let the Lord make thee a curse, &c. Unto which the woman was to answer, Amen, Amen.” By which words she not only consented to what the priest said, but made the same imprecation upon herself.

The Lord make thee a curse] So that when men would imprecate any evil to another, they should say, “Let that befall thee which befall such a woman;” as Rasi expounds it.

An oath among thy people.] A form of exclamation, and the aforesaid MS. expounds it: or, as Rashi will have it, when men called God to witness, they should say, “If I swear falsely, let God punish me, as he did such a woman.” These expositions were tacitly supposed in the oaths among the pagans, as our great Selden shows at large, lib. ii. De Synod. cap. 11, p. 461, &c., where he observes that of Porphyry, that the ancients Indians had their Λήγεσθαι, “like of probation, or trial;” and in his Marnora Arundelliana (p. 92), there is this form of imprecation in the league between the city of Smyrna and Magnesia. Ἐπικύραω, μύτι, Ξ' ἡμι-, ἐπικύραωτε δέ, ἔλαυναι καὶ στόχον γίνει, τι ἢ μοι, “Let it be well with me, if I swear truly; but if falsely, let destruction be both to myself and to my posterity.” And at this day there is a custom in the kingdom of Siam to determine dubious cases, giving a lump of rice impregnated (as my author speaks) with curses to a man to eat. Which if he can swallow without vomiting, he carries the curse; and his friends carry him home in great triumph, &c. So Jodocus Schoutenius, who was director of the East India Company there, 1636.

When the Lord doth make thy thigh to rot, and thy belly to swell.] When they see the dreadful effect of this water in the rotting of thy thigh, after thy belly is swelled. For the swelling of the belly, it appears by the next verse, preceded the rotting of the thigh.

Such imprecations were in use in Homer’s time, it appears by Agamemnon’s prayer; wherein he calls Jupiter, and all the rest of the gods, to bear witness of his sincerity; wishing them to send a multitude of pains and ills upon him if he forsook himself. (Hliad. xix. ver. 264, 265.

Vers. 22. And this water.] Or, For this water, &c.] If thou art guilty, it shall produce the following effects.

To make thy belly to swell.] By the belly the Jews understand the womb, and the bowels, which swelled till they burst.

Thy thigh to rot.] By her thigh is meant the secret parts of her body, as Chasikuni observes on this place. And both Bochartus and Heinius have given many arguments, that the imprecation in this place was formed in his Hieroezio, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 15, and the latter in Aristarch. Sac. cap. 1. And thus we read, in the passion of SS. Perpetuam et Felicis, that when Perpetuam was thrown to the beasts, and lay on the ground, the beast drew back her coat, which was torn from her side, ad velamentum femoris, “to cover her thigh from being seen;” pudoris magis memor quam doloris, “having a greater sense of modesty than of pain.” (p. 32, edit. Oxon.)

The Mischna here observes, not impatiently, “with what measure men mete, it shall be measured to them again;” for in the very part that offended, she suffered for her crime. I noted before (ver. 17) that there were such ways of trial anciently among the Gentiles, and I am not to think they were all later than the times of Moses, who did not ordain these rites to keep the Jews from following their customs, but they rather imitated what was practised among the Jews. Particularly Bochartus observes, out of Philostratus, there were wars in Cappadocia, sacred to Jupiter, which were very sweet and pleasant to the gods, who were innocent and aware truly, but quite contrary to those who were persecuted; whose eyes, hands, and feet were presently seized and infected with blotches and filthy ulcers, θεραται και, which is the very disease here mentioned, if we believe Josephus, who saith the woman’s belly swelled by the dropsy, till at last it burst. And Phi-23 And the priest shall write these curses in a book, and he shall blot them out with the bitter water:
24 And he shall cause the woman to drink the bitter water that causeth the curse: and the water that causeth the curse shall enter into her, and become bitter.
25 Then the priest shall take the jealous woman to Lostratus adds, that the whole body of such people grew consumptive; nor could they stir from those waters, but there they lay deploiring their misery. (See Boehart. lib. i. Canna, cap. 28, p. 589, 590.) Which agrees so perfectly with what the Jews say of this bitter water, that it is most likely this story of the Cappadocian is but an apocryphal version of the same.

For we understand, from the way in which the priests found out secret crimes, that several secret crimes, were invented by the Greeks from this example (Demonst. Evan. proposit. iv. cap. 11, n. 12). Many authors have collected several sorts of trials of this kind; and lately Gul. Saldemes, in his Otia Theologica, Exercit. v. n. 24, 25. But above all, see Huetius's Questions Ahetnetae (lib. ii. cap. 13, n. 22), where he gives a large account how far this rite of trying women's chastity by drinking this water was spread amongst the most barbarous nations.

The woman shall say, Amen, Amen.] The word Amen is doubled, to express her full consent and her earnest desire that God would deal with her according to her deserving. The Mischna will have the first Amen refer to those words, The Lord make thee a curse; and the second to the next words, And an oath among thy people; so that she prayed God both might come upon her if she were guilty. We may as well say, that one of these Amens relates to the first part of the adjuration (ver. 19), and the other to the second part (ver. 21). Or, as Abbarinah deems, she being here being a double curse, that her belly should swell, and another that her thigh should rot, she said a double Amen, praying both might befall her if she were guilty. And, as the Talmudists understand it, they were an imprecation upon herself. For so they say in Schvainot; Whosoever saith Amen to an oath (or curse), seems to pronounce the oath or curse within his own mouth. See Wagensell, upon Mischna Sotar (cap. 3, sect. 5, annot. 3), where he produces a great deal more out of the Scripture itself, in confutation of the opinion of our learned Fuller, who, in his Miscellanea, affirms, that Amen is only an asseveration, but never a form of swearing.

Ver. 25. The priest shall write these curses.] Several opinions are related in the Mischna, concerning the words, and some would have to begin at ver. 19, If no man have lain with thee, &c., and to continue to this verse. But others think they began at those words, ver. 21, The Lord make thee a curse and an oath, &c., and that the last words were omitted, the woman shall say, Amen, Amen. Which of these opinions is the true, neither the Gemara nor Maimonides say.

In a book.] Every scroll of parchement, wherein any thing was written, the Jews call sepher, a book: in which, it hath been commonly said, the name of the woman was written, together with the curse; but there is nothing either in the Scripture or in antiquity to countenance this.
in which case it was all thrown among the ashes. See Selden in the place above named: where he also observes, that if she confessed the fact, or her husband would not have her drink, or either of them died before she drank, or a witness of the adultery appeared, she never had the benefit of the marriage-bed, the whole sacrifice was burnt, and not only a memorial thereof. All which is in the Mischna, sect. 3, 4.

Afterward shall cause the woman to drink the water. The sacrifice therefore was first offered; though the Mischna says, that if the priest gave her the water to drink first, and then presented the offering, he did not make amiss.

Ver. 27. When he hath made her to drink] By this it appears he might force her to drink, if she would not do it by persuasion.

Then it shall come to pass, &c.] These effects here mentioned, presently followed: for she grew pale, and her eyes were ready to start out of her head, &c. so that they cried out, "Carry her forth, carry her forth; lest she defile the court of the temple," by dying there, as the Mischna saith, cap. 3, sect. 4. The adulterer also, if we may believe the Jews, died the same day and hour: nay, his belly swelled, as hers did: and his secret parts rotted, as the author of Ez. Hechajim saith, in Wagenseil upon Sota (cap. 5, sect. 1), where he adds, that all this came to pass in cases wherein he was charged. In the same kind: for if he had at any time defiled the marriage-bed, then this water had not these effects upon his wife, though she had been faulty. Which the Gemara also affirms.

Ver. 28. If the woman be not defiled—then she shall be free.] Receive no harm at all by drinking the water there.

Shall conceive seed.] If she was barren before, she became fruitful after this trial, and also bare a man-child (if we may believe the Jews), and had easy labour. Her beauty also increased, her health was confirmed, and if she had any disease it was cured. They observe also, that if, after she was thus cleared, she kept, wheras she was defiled, her husband suspected, and by his renewed admonition had required her not to be in private with him, this potion was not repeated; but she was dismissed from being his wife, without any dowry: but if she kept company with any other person privately, after admonition to the contrary, this potion might be repeated, as often as she offended with new lovers. Thus that MS. Ez. Hechajim, so highly commended by Wagenseil, who also adds, that in case her husband put her away after her acquittal, and she married another man, who had the same ground of jealousy that her former husband had, because of her familiarity with the same person whom he had forbidden her to keep company withal, her husband might bring her to a new trial by this water: and so might as many husbands as she should marry one after another, if she gave the like occasion of jealousy.

Ver. 29. This is the law of jealousies.] Whereby God declared himself to be privy to the most secret sins, and to be both the preserver of conjugal faith and chastity, and the protector of innocents: and provided that man and wife should live happily together, by keeping men from cruel and furious proceedings against their wives when they entertained a jealousy of them (willing them to commend the case to God), and by continuing wives in their duty out of dread of this punishment; which was so terrible (as Selden saith) that they feared God more than eternal God: and he be jealous over his wife, and shall set the woman before the Lord, and the priest shall execute upon her all this law.

ver. 7. And so the Jews here commonly understand it, "if the man be guileless from iniquity." For thus the rule is expressed in the Gemara, upon the fifth chapter of Sota: "When the husband is free from iniquity (i.e. from adultery), then the water tries his wife; but if be be not free (i.e. be himself also guilty of adultery), then the water hath no power to try her:" that is, produces none of the effects before mentioned. And so the author of Ex. Hachajim, in Wagenseil upon Sota (p. 593), concludes from these very words, That the bitter water then only had power, when the man was free from the sin of which he suspected his wife; and gives this as the reason why, in the latter end of the second temple, this way of trial ceased, and was quite taken away by the Sanhedrin; because the number of adulterers was then so great, that the water had no effect; according to those words of the prophet Hosea (ch. iv. 14), "I will not punish your daughters when they commit adultery." &c. For that is another rule of theirs, "When adulterers were multiplied, the bitter waters ceased;" i.e. there was no trial by them (see Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Heb. cap. 15, p. 108). Yet the Jews seem to have continued in after ages, since their temple was destroyed, some form of dreadful imprecations, in their synagogues, for the discovery of truth in doubtful cases. For St. Chrysostom says, he himself saw a very modest, good Christian woman, brought by a senseless fellow (who also had the name of a Christian) into a Jewish assembly; whom he would have compelled to take their oath, πειρὰς δὲ αὐτοῖς αιτία προμαγώσας, "concerning some things wherein he desired satisfaction:" from which the woman being rescued, by St. Chrysostom's assistance, when he examined the man about it, how he came to forsake the church, and resort to their Sanhedrin; his answer was, "That he had been told by many, φασκωμείας τοῖς ἕκας γνωμώμοις ὥρας ἔνας, that there were more horrible adjurations among them than Christians." (Homil. i. adv. Judæos). Which, no doubt, arose from the direful effects of this adjuration here prescribed, if the woman was guilty of what she was suspected.

CHAPTER VI.

1 The law of the Nazarites. 2 The form of blessing the people.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 2 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When either man or woman shall separate themselves to vow a vow of a Nazarite, to separate themselves unto the Lord:

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1.] This law very properly follows the foregoing (about women suspected of adultery), as a remedy against all such sins; by abstaining from wine, and all other incitements to lust; and by devoting themselves, for some time, in a peculiar way to the service of God. And there seems to be a plain opposition between a woman professing herself a Nazarite, and forbearing wine, and the care of her hair; and a woman that loved company, and was entangled in the love of other men besides her husband.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Who were all concerned in this law.

When either man or woman:] For women as well as men might make this vow, if they were at their own disposal, and not under the power of their parents, or husbands, by whose authority this vow might be disannulled (ch. xxx. 4, 5, &c.).

Shall separate themselves] The Hebrew word japhhi signifies the doing something extraordinary, beyond the common rate of other men; and therefore Fores tersus hath well translated it, when a man or woman "shall vow a singular vow."

Tu vow a vow of a Nazarite.] The Hebrew word nazar, which signifies in general to separate, in the conjugation naphal (as they call it) signifies to separate from others, by a profession of some special act of religion. Wherefore Nazar signifies one that, beyond the common prescription of the law, deviates, not his goods, but himself to God in a peculiar kind of sanctimony. So Philo, who calls this μύσχων εἰκών, "the great vow:" because he that makes it, devotes not his corn, or beasts, &c., but his own self unto God; τῇ περίφημῳ γὰρ τὸ μεγαλότον αἰτίος τοῖς ιεστὶν αἰτίω.

31 Then shall the man be guileless from iniquity, and this woman shall bear her iniquity.

3 He shall separate himself from wine and strong drink, and shall drink no vinegar of wine, or vinegar of strong drink, neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes, nor eat moist grapes, or dried.

"For every man is to himself the greatest possession he hath."

To separate themselves] To separate themselves for some time to a higher measure of purity than other men practised, that they might attend to the service of God. From whence this vow was called, separation unto the Lord. For they who observed it were holy, saith Maimonides; yes, were placed, for the present, in the dignity of the high-priest as to sanctity: being forbidden to pollute themselves for their father or mother, as it follows afterward (More Nev. par. iii. cap. 48). The Jewish doctors are wont to be so curious in marking every word, and scrupulously adhering to it, that it is something strange they should allow a father the liberty to separate his child to be a Nazarite without its consent; when the text expressly speaks of those who separate themselves. But so the Mischna determines in Sota (cap. 3, sect. 8), and it allows this liberty to the father, though not to the mother; though we find Hannah vowing Samuel to be a Nazarite before he was born, 1 Sam. i. 10, 11 (see Wagenseil on that place, annexed, &c.).

Ver. 3. He shall separate himself from wine.] In this consisted one part of the special sanctity of Nazarites; that, by abstinence from wine, or any thing that was intoxicating, they might the better attend to the study of the law, or other exercises of religion.

Strong drinks.] As wine was made of grapes, so was a liquor made of other fruits: see, &c. (see Lev. x. 9). To which add, that other authors call the juice of dates, as well as grapes, by the name of wine. Nay, Pliny saith, that precipua vinum, "the choicest wines," were made of those dates called cariota, which grew about Jericho; though they were iniqua capitii, "hurtful to the head," from whence... they had their name (lib. xiii. Nat. Hist. cap. 4). With great reason, therefore, such intoxicating liquors were forbidden to those who set themselves apart to attend on God, during the time of their separation. Which justifies, in part, what Maimonides saith, that the Nazarites were advanced to the dignity of priests, who might not drink any wine, or strong drink, in the time of their ministration to God in the sanctuary.

And shall drink no vinegar of wine, &c.] For that had the same effect with wine and strong drink, of which it is said.

grapes. [l. c. Secondary wine; which was made by maceration of grapes in water, after the juice had been pressed out to make wine. Pliny speaks of various kinds of it (lib. xiv. Nat. Hist. cap. 10).

Nor eat moist grapes, or dried.] Which might have stirred up their appetite after wine, or heated their blood; and indisposed them for the service of God, to whom and against whom, the Nazarites were set apart. This was at least for thirty days: but it appears by St. Paul it might be for a week only: unto which he limited the time of his δυνατων, as it is called in Acts xxii. 26, 27. For every one might vow for what time he pleased.

Eat nothing that is made of the vine tree.] No paste, nor sauce, that had any of the juice or infusion of the grapefruit in it.

From the kernels even to the husk.] Which might give the smallest tincture to any thing into which they were put.

All this caution seems to be intended to instruct those, who give themselves wholly unto God’s service, to be so sober and abstemious in the use of wine and strong drink; and to have their hair and beard the bane of true piety. For amat Spiritus Sanctus sieca cerda, as Grotius admirably observes upon Luke 1.15, “The Holy Ghost delights in dry souls.”

Ver. 6. There shall no razor come upon his head.] Nor was his hair to be cut with scissors, or any other instrument; but he was to let the locks of his hair grow, as it is in the conclusion of this verse. This made such persons look majestically and venerably, without any expense. For, as Agesilas speaks in Stobaeus, το μασκαν τω χυμων το δεκαπαντατων, “to let one’s hair grow long, is the cheapest ornament.” Besides, neglect of the hair was proper to those who renounced, for the present, all manner of pleasure (as the Nazarites did), and betook themselves to a severer sort of life. Such persons not only let their beards and their hair grow, but wore a hairy garment, which the Hebrews called addarath. Such a one John Baptist wore, as Elijah did before him, whose mantle is called by this name (1 Kings xix. 19), and who is said himself to have been a hairy man (2 Kings i. 8). From the Nazarite, or the habit of a prophet and a Nazarite was the same (see him on Matt. iii. 4).

6 All the days that he separateth himself unto the Lord he shall come at no dead body.

7 He shall not make himself unclean for his father, or for his mother, for or his brother, or for his sister, when they die: because the consecration of his God is upon his head.

But Moses himself seems, in the next words, to give the plainest reason of this matter.

Until the days be fulfilled.] It was a token he had kept himself pure from all legal defilements: for if he had not, he must have shaved his head (ver. 9), as they did who were cleansed from their leprosy (Lev. xiv. 8, 9).

Shall let the locks of the hair of his head grow.] This law, in which consists the second part of their Nazarite-ships, some fancy to have been translated from the Egyptians, into the religion of the Hebrews. Which was the opinion of S. Cyril of Alexandria, lib. xvi. De Adorat. where he saith, that Moses, knowing how hard it would be to bring the Israelites from the ill customs they had learned in Egypt, most wisely instituted the like rites to those that were in use there, to the intent they might not perform such worship any longer to demons, but to the Lord of all. Precopius and Jerome, and others, have attributed this place with various grace to the ancients: silici, in nympha vel montans vel aquatiles incisionem, comes nutriment. Lex itaque mala damnation consuetudini dempta, ad Deum hon- psum transvers. The sense of which is, “that the Greeks let their hair grow in honour of the nymphs; and therefore the law, to abolish that wicked custom, and to commend the Nazarite for his piety, commanded him to let them grow. To which I should readily subscribe, if there were any proof that this rite of consecrating their hair to demons was so old among the Egyptians and Greeks as the times of Moses. It is far more probable, that the original of this custom among the gentiles was from this law of the Nazarites. So Hen. Lindenbrogrin, very well observes upon these words of Cen-

Ver. 5. He shall come at no dead body.] This was a third part of this religion, not to touch a dead body, nor be in the house where a dead body was, nor accompany it to the grave (see ch. xix. 11—12). For such defilements by the dead made men unclean seven days, so that they might not approach to the house of God; and therefore, that the Nazarites might always be fit to attend upon his service, he would have them avoid this defilement.

Ver. 7. He shall not make himself unclean for his father, &c.] In this he was superior to the ordinary priests, who might be defiled for such near kindred (Lev. xxi. 2, &c.), and was equalled to the high-priests (as I observed before, ver. 2, out of Maimonides), who might not (Lev. xxi. 11).

Because the consecration of his God is upon his head.] His hair upon his head, which was unshorn, was a sign (as the word is) of the worship (as the word is) of God. Which hair also was consecrated to him, when the days of his separation were
CHAPTER VI.

8 All the days of his separation he is holy unto the Lord.

9 And if any man die very suddenly by him, and he hath defiled the head of his consecration; then he shall shave his head in the day of his cleansing, on the seventh day shall he shave it.

10 And on the eighth day he shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons, to the priest, to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation:

11 And the priest shall offer the one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering, and make an atonement for him, for that he fulfilled. For in this unshorn hair seems to have consisted the principal part of Nazaritishness.

Ver. 8. He is holy] By a peculiar vow, and therefore was not to come near a dead body.

Ver. 9. [If any man die very suddenly] Either by violence, or an apostasy, or any other way. And the case was the same, if he chance to light upon a dead body of any kind.

He hath defiled the head of his consecration.] The consecration of his head; that is, his hair. For though he could not help his being so suddenly surprised, yet he was defiled by being where a dead body was; and consequently the hair of his head, which had been consecrated to God, was defiled also; and therefore could not be offered to him, and burnt in his honour.

Then he shall shave his head] His Nazaritishness was interrupted by this defilement, so that it could not proceed further; but, after the usual purification, was to be begun anew; by shaving off this polluted hair, and letting new hair grow instead of it. By this it appears that Moses here speaks only of such as made this vow for a limited time; for perpetual Nazarites, who were consecrated to God for all their life, were never shaven, whatsoever defilement they contracted.

On the seventh day] For so many days uncleanness by the dead lasted (ch. xiv. 11), and the seventh day was the day of cleansing from that uncleanness (ver. 13). All other legal uncleannesses polluted a Nazarite so soon as he came near them; but divination, as other men used in those cases: but this alone polluted him so as utterly to put him out of that state; which, as it here follows, was to be begun again.

Ver. 10.] The very same sacrifice which was offered for one that had been defiled by a running issue (Lev. xv. 14).

Ver. 11. The priest shall offer] As in the forenamed case (Lev. xv. 15).

And make an atonement] Which was to be done before the burnt-offering would be accepted.

For that he sinned by the dead,] He had not properly sinned; but contracted a legal uncleanness, by touching a dead body, or being where it was. Which, though it was against his will, yet was a defilement in the account of the law; and a kind of sin, because it was a breach of a ceremonial law, and therefore thus to be purged. The reason of which, and such like precepts, Abarbinel observes (in his preface to the book of Leviticus, ch. iv.), was only this; to make men very cautious how they contracted any defilement; as the Nazarite might do in the time of his separation, and put himself to much trouble. Which is the foundation of a famous saying among their wise men: "Diligence begets caution; and caution, purity; and purity, holiness and sanctity."

Hallow his head] Consecrate his hair after the Lord, after his head hath been shaved.

Ver. 12.] This is a further explication of what was said just before, in the end of the foregoing verse: that from the eighth day he shall begin to compute the time of his Nazaritishness, for so many days as he at first vowed unto the Lord.

Bring a lamb] Which was to be offered even for ignorant offences, by the law made before (Lev. v. 15). The days that were before] His defilement by the dead unawares.

Shall be lost.] Shall not be reckoned, as the LXX. have it, but go for nothing (as we speak), though they were so many that he had almost fulfilled his vow. If, for instance, he had vowed to be a Nazarite for a whole year, and in the twelfth month happened upon a dead carcass, all the foregoing eleven months were lost, and he was to begin his year's vow again: and this, so often as such an accident happened, if it were before the time that his vow was completed. Which may seem very hard, if we do not seriously consider the intention of it; which was, to oblige them to the strictest care to preserve themselves holy and pure in all things; as they were plainly taught to be, by the watchful diligence they were bound to use, to avoid this legal defilement here mentioned. For none could absolve them from this vow, till it was fulfilled in the exactness that is here required. For, as they tell the story in the Talmud, Queen Helen having taken a vow upon her for seven years, by coming into the holy land was engaged for seven years more; and being defiled towards the latter end of the time, was obliged for another seven years; which was twenty-and-one years in all (see Dr. Lightfoot of the Temple, ch. 18).

Because his separation was defiled.] His first separation was defiled by a dead body; which made it necessary he should begin a new one. It might happen also that he might die, before he had fulfilled the time he had vowed to be a Nazarite. In which case, Maimonides saith, any of his sons might go on where he left, and at the end of the days which his father had vowed, offer the sacrifices here appointed, and be shaved in his stead (so the Mischna Sote, cap. 3, sect. 8). But Maimonides acknowledges there is no foundation for this in Scripture; but it rests wholly upon tradition (see Wagenseil on that place, annot. 4).

Ver. 13. This is the law of the Nazarite.] Of putting an end to his Nazaritishness.

When the days—are fulfilled.] At the end of the time he vowed to continue in this state.

He shall be brought] By the priest.

Unto the door] That the sacrifices here prescribed might be offered for him.

Ver. 14. He shall offer] i. e. The Nazarite was to present these following offerings unto the Lord: for the priest's offering them is not mentioned till ver. 16. One he lamb—and one ece lamb, &c.] Here are all sorts of offerings, which he was obliged to make in the conclusion of his Nazaritishness. A burnt-offering, blemish for a burnt offering, and one ewe lamb of the first year without blemish for a sin offering, and one ram without blemish for a peace offering.

15 And a basket of unleavened bread, cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, and wafers of unleavened bread anointed with oil, and their meat offering, and their drink offerings.

16 And the priest shall bring them before as an acknowledgment of God's sovereign dominion. A sin-offering, imploring pardon for any omissions of which he might have been guilty during this vow; and a peace-offering, in thankfulness to God, who had given him grace both to make, and to keep, and to fulfill this vow.

Ver. 15. A basket of unleavened bread, &c.] Besides the forementioned sacrifices, here are three oblations more prescribed to complete his thankfulness: of which see Exod. xix. 2. Their meat offering, and their drink offerings.] This seems to relate to the burnt-offering and peace-offering before named (ver. 14), with an addition, to have their proper meat-offering and drink-offering; besides the basket of unleavened bread, with the cakes and the wafers: see Lev. vii. 12; Num. xv. 2, 3, &c. Where these accessory offerings are ordered to accompany the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, though sin-offerings had none.

Ver. 17. He shall offer the rams—[with the basket of unleavened bread.] And the cakes and wafers, which accompanied the peace-offering, that nothing might be wanting to complete the feast which was to be made upon them.

The priest shall offer also his meat offering, &c.] By this it appears, that these were distinct from the basket of unleavened bread, &c., as I observed, ver. 15.

18. The Nazarite shall have the head of his separation] i.e. The hair of his head, which was consecrated to God, shall be shaved off, that it may be presented unto him. For having now fulfilled his vow, his hair was holy; it not having been defiled, as that hair was which he shaved off before (ver. 9).

19. At the door] That it might be publicly known he had ended his vow.

And shall take the hair] His hair which was consecrated to the Lord. Put it in the fire] Where it was burnt.

Which is under the sacrifice of the peace offerings.] In the court of the women (as they tell us in Middoth, cap. vi. 8), or at the back of the Nazarites; in which they boiled their peace offerings, and, having polished their hair, put it under the pot where the sacrifice was boiling; which, as L'Empe- reur there observes out of Abarbinel, was offered out of joy, that their vow was fulfilled; and therefore they put their hair to be there burnt, as a testimony that their Nazariteship was at an end, and that they had no further obligation to let their hair grow, in observance of this law. And accordingly to this account, that question is resolved which many have made: whether the Nazarite's hair was to be burnt with holy fire (viz. that on the altar), or with common: for it was burnt with that which was under the pot, or caldron, in which the peace-offerings were boiled, which was common fire. And, indeed, it had been unseemly to burn hair upon the altar, it being God's table, where his meat was set before him; for it would have been to plait it in locks, that they might, at a certain time, cut it off, and devote it to some of their gods; that, in all likelihood, the Israelites would have followed their superstition, if God, to prevent it, had not instituted a way of doing what the rest of the world did, without their idolatry. For the directions which God here gives about it, are manifestly opposite to all way of the gentiles. For the Nazarites are here directed to cut their hair (when the time of their separation was completed) at the door of the tabernacle, where it was also to be burnt; whereas the gentiles hung their hair, when they had cut it, upon trees; or consecrated it to rivers (as I observed, ver. 5), or laid it up in their temples, there to be preserved. The Hebrew Nazarites also are required to offer various sacerdotal sacrifices, when they cut their hair; of which we rarely read any thing among the gentiles: and all the time of their separation were to drink no wine, nor eat grapes, &c., which was not known among the heathen. From whence it is, one may think, that they are so often put in mind of the Lord, in this law of the Nazarites; who are, as it were, a sort of seers. For there is no more probable, that the "consecration of his God" is said to be upon his head (ver. 7), and all the days of his separation he was "holy to the Lord" (ver. 8), unto whom he "consecrated the days of his separation" (ver. 12), to put them in mind, that, though they used this rite, which was common to other nations, yet it was in honour of the Lord only, whom they acknowledged to be the author of health, and strength, and growth: for the devil also had his Nazarites, as appears from Hosea ix. 10. All this is said, and much more, with a specious show of truth, by a most ingenious and learned friend of mine, now with God, in his excellent book, De Legibus Hebraorum Ritualium, &c., lib. iii. Dissert. 1, cap. 6.

But these are two things wanting to make this opinion probable. First, none can tell how the world came by such a custom of letting their hair grow for sacred uses, unless they had it from Moses; who tells us whence he derived it, viz., from God; who appointed this rite for such reasons as then were plain, but now, perhaps, do not appear to us. Besides, Secondly, there is not the least evidence that this custom was so old as Moses's time; which to me seems not likely, but rather that it was derived, among the gentiles, from an imperfect knowledge of what is here ordained by Moses. For the chief part of this Nazariteship consisting in letting their hair grow, and the Lord, and shall offer his sin offering, and his burnt offering:

17 And he shall offer the ram for a sacrifice of peace offerings unto the Lord, with the basket of unleavened bread; the priest shall offer also his meat offering, and his drink offerings.

18 And the Nazarite shall shave the head of his separation at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall take the hair of the head

For the directions which God here gives about it, are manifestly opposite to all way of the gentiles. For the Nazarites are here directed to cut their hair (when the time of their separation was completed) at the door of the tabernacle, where it was also to be burnt; whereas the gentiles hung their hair, when they had cut it, upon trees; or consecrated it to rivers (as I observed, ver. 5), or laid it up in their temples, there to be preserved. The Hebrew Nazarites also are required to offer various sacerdotal sacrifices, when they cut their hair; of which we rarely read any thing among the gentiles: and all the time of their separation were to drink no wine, nor eat grapes, &c., which was not known among the heathen. From whence it is, one may think, that they are so often put in mind of the Lord, in this law of the Nazarites; who are, as it were, a sort of seers. For there is no more probable, that the "consecration of his God" is said to be upon his head (ver. 7), and all the days of his separation he was "holy to the Lord" (ver. 8), unto whom he "consecrated the days of his separation" (ver. 12), to put them in mind, that, though they used this rite, which was common to other nations, yet it was in honour of the Lord only, whom they acknowledged to be the author of health, and strength, and growth: for the devil also had his Nazarites, as appears from Hosea ix. 10. All this is said, and much more, with a specious show of truth, by a most ingenious and learned friend of mine, now with God, in his excellent book, De Legibus Hebraorum Ritualium, &c., lib. iii. Dissert. 1, cap. 6.

But these are two things wanting to make this opinion probable. First, none can tell how the world came by such a custom of letting their hair grow for sacred uses, unless they had it from Moses; who tells us whence he derived it, viz., from God; who appointed this rite for such reasons as then were plain, but now, perhaps, do not appear to us. Besides, Secondly, there is not the least evidence that this custom was so old as Moses's time; which to me seems not likely, but rather that it was derived, among the gentiles, from an imperfect knowledge of what is here ordained by Moses. For the chief part of this Nazariteship consisting in letting their hair grow, and consecrating it unto God, the gentiles took it to be a piece of great devotion, μὴ ἀπεικονίσω τω παλαιῷ ταξικοφρασίας, &c., as Theodoret speaks, Quest. xxviii. in Levit. "not to cut off their children's hair, but let it grow, and, after a certain time, to cut it off in order to appease the demons." Many authors have written much of this custom; for which there was a certain day appointed at Athens, viz., the third day of the feast called Ἀκαριών, which day was called ἐκρατίζως, because then the hair of their grown children was shorn off, and sacrificed to Diana (see Petr. Castellanus, in his Synagomata De Festis Graecorum; where he quotes a passage out of Hesychius (p. 94), who says, that before they cut off their hair, they brought a measure of wine, which they offered to Hercules, and then all that were present drank of it: which is some imitation of the drink-offering here mentioned by Moses, which was offered at the completion of their Nazarite vows. And Grotius and Horæus have made it plain, that the Attic laws were derived from Moses, that I cannot doubt but this custom also flowed from the same fountain.

And, if we must give an account of the reason of this institution among the Hebrews, I think that of Maimonides is better than this, against which I have excepted; viz., that this law about their hair was made in opposition to the opinion of the ancient idolaters, called Zabiti, who held all things which were separated from the body to be impure; as the hair, the nails, and the blood. From whence all barbers among them were accounted impure persons, because they cut men's hair, and let blood; and who, according to this law of Moses, was held to sacrifice to the Lord, and was to wash himself in pure water afterwards; as he shows, More Nevovchim, par. iii. cap. 47.

Ver. 19. Take the sodden shoulder] The left shoulder, which he was to take out of the pot as it was boiling; for the right shoulder (which is called the heave-shoulder in the next verse) was the priest's portion, by a law made before this (Lev. vii. 32, 33).

One unleavened cake—and one unleavened wafers.] The basket of unleavened bread was ordered to be offered before (ver. 17), and now he orders one of the cakes and one of the wafers (mentioned with the bread, ver. 15), to be put into the hands of the Nazarite; the rest being burnt, I suppose, upon the altar.

Put them upon the hands of the Nazarite.] That he might give them to the priest, in token of his thankfulness to him for his pains.

After the hair—is shaven.] And his vow, in a manner, completed; as it was immediately after these things were presented unto God.

Ver. 20. The priest shall wave them] Both the sodden shoulder and the cake and wafers.

For a wave offering.] See Lev. vii. 30, 31. The wave bread and heave shoulder.] These were the priest's portion out of all peace-offerings, as I observed before, from Lev. vii. 34; but in this peace-offering he had, moreover, the other shoulder, vowed, and of his offering unto the Lord for his separation, beside that that his hand shall get: according to the vow which he vowed, so he must do after the law of his separation.

22 That and the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

23 Speak unto Aaron and unto his sons, saying, On this wise ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them,

24 The Lord bless thee, and keep thee:

25 The Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee.
CHAPTER VII.

1 The offering of the princes at the dedication of the tabernacle. 10 Their several offerings at the dedication of the altar. 89 God spake to Moses from the mercy seat.

1 And it came to pass on the day that Moses had fully set up the tabernacle, and had anointed it, and sanctified it, and all the instruments thereof, both the altar and all the vessels thereof, and had anointed them, and sanctified them;

2 That the princes of Israel, heads of the house of their fathers, who were the princes of the tribes, and were over them that were numbered, offered:

3 And they brought their offering before the Lord, six covered wagons, and twelve oxen; a wagon for two of the princes, and for each one an ox; and they brought them before the tabernacle.

4 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

Were over them that were numbered,] This evidently shows that this offering of the princes was after the numbering of the people.

Offered:] In the order that is set down in this chapter.

Ver. 3. They brought their offering.] The LXX. translate the Hebrew word korbanam, τῷ κορβανῷ, their gift, or their present," which they made to God; which consisted of several things, for divers uses.

Before the Lord.] i. e. At the door of the tabernacle; as it is explained in the end of the verse.

Six covered wagons, and twelve oxen.] In the first place they made a present for the service of the tabernacle itself; that such parts of it as were most cumbersome might be more conveniently carried; and that they might be free from dust, rain, or hail. The wagons were covered; being not ordinary carriages, but such as were used by great persons. So the LXX. understood it, who translate the Hebrew word tzabbim, by λαμπρήν, the wagon, and chariots then used, so Hesychius tells us (as learned men have observed) it signifies such wagons as illustrious men and women used; and that they were covered above.

A wagon for two of the princes.] This shows plainly enough, that they were sumptuous, and had, perhaps, rich coverings; in that two of the great men joined in the present of one wagon.
CHAPTER VII.

5 Take it of them, that they may be to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation: and thou shalt give them unto the Levites, to every man according to his service.

6 And Moses took the wagons and the oxen, and gave them unto the Levites.

7 Two wagons and four oxen he gave unto the sons of Gershon, according to their service:

8 And four wagons and eight oxen he gave unto the sons of Merari, according unto their service, under the hand of Ithamar the son of Aaron the priest.

9 But unto the sons of Kohath he gave none: because the service of the sanctuary belonging unto them was that they should bear upon their shoulders.

10 ¶ And the princes offered for dedicating of the altar in the day that it was anointed, even the princes offered their offering before the altar.

11 And the Lord said unto Moses, They

Ver. 10. The princes offered.] They brought the offerings, which they desired might be presented unto God.

For dedicating of the altar.] The Hebrew word chanuach, which, in one place of the Pentateuch, signifies simply to begin to use, or enjoy a house (Deut. xx. 6), here, and in several other places, signifies the first application or dedication of any thing to sacred uses, or to the Divine service; to which it had been designed and consecrated. And this was done with some certain solemn words and actions, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 13, n. 1, and cap. 15, n. 3. And so, among the Latins, the word inductio, when applied to sacred things, signifies, to the first application or dedication of any thing; as, in the Aeneid, vi. And both civil and sacred initiations were accompanied with great joy and gladness. But this is not to be understood, as if the dedication of the altar was the setting of it apart, and sanctifying it for the service of God (which had been done before, and seven days spent therein, Exod. xxi. 27, Lev. vii. 11), but, in the words of the beginning, the beginning to use it, after it had been so sanctified.

In the day that it was anointed.] At the time that it was set apart; and all other things ordered for the safeguard of the tabernacle (see ver. 1).

Even the princes offered.] Presented their gifts (as the LXX. translate it), which they desired God would accept upon this great and solemn occasion.

Before the altar.] At the door of the tabernacle, near unto which the altar stood (Exod. xvi. 5), for he speaks of the altar of burnt-offerings.

Ver. 11. The Lord said unto Moses.] Here again Rasi observes, that Moses would not receive their offering till he knew the mind of God; who directed in what manner and order their gifts should be offered to him.

Each prince on his day.] This made the dedication a very long solemnity, which continued twelve days. When these twelve days began, it is not easy to determine; but it seems to me a very reasonable computation, which Fortunatus Seusechus hath made of this whole business, Myrothee. Sacr. Eleochrysm. lib. ii. cap. 71, where he supposes, that the tabernacle being erected the first day of the first month of the second year, after they came out of Egypt, seven days were spent in the consecration of it and of the altar, &c. And on the eighth day Moses began to consecrate Aaron and his sons, which lasted seven days longer. Then the fifteenth day of that month was the first day of unleavened bread, while God commanded (as we read here, Ex. xix.), to be observed in the first month, and lasted till the two-and-twentieth. The rest of the month we may well suppose was spent in giving, receiving, and delivering the laws mentioned in the book of Leviticus. After which, on the first day of the second month, he began to number the people, according to the command in the beginning of this book, which may be supposed to have lasted three days. And then on the fourth the Levites were numbered: on the next day we may suppose they were offered to God, and given unto the shall offer their offering, each prince on his day, for the dedicating of the altar.

12 ¶ And he that offered his offering the first day was Nahashon the son of Amminadab, of the tribe of Judah:

13 And his offering was a silver charger, the weight thereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them were full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:

14 One spoon of ten shekels of gold, full of incense:

15 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:

16 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:

priests: on the sixth day they were expiated and consecrated (as we read in the next chapter); and on the seventh day their several charges were parted among them (of which we read ch. iv.). After which the princes, he supposed, began to offer upon the eighth day of the second month, for the dedication of the altar, which lasted till the nineteenth day inclusively: and on the twentieth day of this month they removed (as we read x. 11, 12) from Sinnai to the wilderness of Paran.

Ver. 12. He that offered his offering the first day] By God's order, no doubt.

Was Nahashon] He held the principal place among the Israelites, being the nasi, the prince or captain (as we translate it, Numb. ii. 3) of the children of Judah, who had slain Nahash. And yet he alone, of all the twelve great men here mentioned, is not called nasi, prince of Judah, as all the rest are called princes of their tribes (ver. 18, 24, 30, &c.), but simply Nahashon of the tribe of Judah. The Jews give several reasons of it; but perhaps it was, because he offered first, which was honour enough; and there needed no more to be said of him.

Ver. 13. His offering was one silver charger, &c.] It appears by the metal that this charger and bowl were of, that they were for the use of the altar of burnt-offerings in the outward court, for all the vessels of the sanctuary were of gold. And I take this charger (or broad dish, or platter) to have been offered, for receiving the flesh which was offered at the altar, or the fine flour for the meat-offerings. And the bowl received the blood, or was used for pouring out wine.

Both of them were full of fine flour] Which was to attend upon the burnt-offering and the peace-offering, mentioned ver. 15, 17. See ch. iv. 7, where I observed, it was not difficult to procure this fine flour in the wilderness.

Ver. 14.] Both the metal of which it was made, and that which was in it, show this spoon was for the use of the golden altar in the sanctuary: which may incline one to think, that both altars were now dedicated; that is, first began to be used for the service of the whole congregation (see ver. 89).

Ver. 15. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb] There are so many sacrifices mentioned here and in the two following verses (no less than twenty-one in all), that, together with the silver and gold plate, they look like too great a present to be made out of one man's private estate: and therefore some have thought, that the rest of the great men of the tribe of Judah, joined with him in their contributions towards it; and that it was offered in his own and their names.

17 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Nahashon the son of Amminadab.

18 ¶ On the second day Nethaneel the son of Zuar, prince of Issachar, did offer:

19 He offered for his offering one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:

20 One spoon of gold of ten shekels, full of incense:

21 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:

For a burnt offering.] This is first mentioned, as being the most ancient sort of sacrifice, long before we read of any other; and being an acknowledgment of God's sovereign dominion over all.

Ver. 16.] This in all likelihood was first offered, though the other be first mentioned. For in the next chapter we find the burnt-offering enjoined in the first place; but the sin-offering offered before it (ch. viii. 9, 12). The like I observed before (ch. vi. 16, see there).

Ver. 17.] These sacrifices were more numerous than the burnt-offering or the sin-offering; because the priests, and the princes, and as many of the people as they invited, had their share of them, and feasted before the Lord upon them, with great rejoicing: which custom, as Mr. Selden observes, flowed from the gentiles, who dedicated their altars, and temples, and statues, &c., with much ceremony; and the ancient Greeks, ναυτιθετουσι έπιγείους, "with more sumptuous sacrifices." See lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 14, num. 3, where he also shows, how they were dedicated among the Romans with plays, and feasting, and public largesses: and at last their feasts became anniversary, as the feast of dedication among the Jews was, after the times of Antiochus (num. 6, 7). In which feast there was αναρασιον, "illuminations" (as we now speak), by setting up of candles, or lamps, in token of joy (cap. 13, num. 9).

This was the offering of Nahashon] And was the pattern which all the rest followed. Their offerings were thus distributed, to be offered on several days, that confusion might be avoided; and that every tribe might distinctly express their devotion to God, and be graciously accepted by him; and the solemnity be made the more remarkable, by continuing it so long as twelve days. For which reason the feast of dedication, after Matthias had purged the temple and the altar, after the profanation of them by Antiochus, was kept eight days by the Jews in following times; and this Parasa (as they call it) of the law, from ch. v. 29, to ch. viii. 4, of this book, was wont to be read at that feast; as the same Mr. Selden observes (cap. 16, n. 7). As among the Romans, he observes (cap. 14, n. 7), there was a feast of like nature kept six days.

Nethaneel—did offer.] This tribe, and Zebulun, being under the standard of Judah, are the next that offer. And so they proceed in the same order; Reuben, and those under his standard, offering next; because they encamped next to them (ver. 30, 36, 42, &c.).

Ver. 19. He offered—one silver charger, &c.] It may be observed, once for all, that there is no difference in 22 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:
23 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Nethaneel the son of Zuar.
21 ¶ On the third day Eliab the son of Helon, prince of the children of Zebulun, did offer:
25 His offering was one silver charger, the weight wherein was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:
26 One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense:
27 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:
28 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:
29 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Eliab the son of Helon.
30 ¶ On the fourth day Elizur the son of Shedeur, prince of the children of Reuben, did offer:
31 His offering was one silver charger, the weight of an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:
32 One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense:
33 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:
34 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:
35 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Elizur the son of Shedeur.
36 ¶ On the fifth day Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai, prince of the children of Simeon, did offer:
37 His offering was one silver charger, the weight wherein was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:
38 One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense:
39 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:
40 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:
41 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai.
42 ¶ On the sixth day Eliasaph the son of Deuel, prince of the children of God, offered:
43 His offering was one silver charger of the weight of an hundred and thirty shekels, a silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:
44 One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense:
45 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:
46 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:
47 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Eliasaph the son of Deuel.
48 ¶ On the seventh day Eliashama the son of Ammihud, prince of the children of Ephraim, offered:
49 His offering was one silver charger, the weight wherein was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:
50 One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense:
51 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:
52 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:
53 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Eliashama the son of Ammihud.
54 ¶ On the eighth day offered Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur, prince of the children of Manasseh:
55 His offering was one silver charger of the weight of an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:
56 One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense:
57 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:
58 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:
59 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur.
60 ¶ On the ninth day Abidan the son of the offerings of these princes; but all offered plate of equal weight, and an equal number of sacrifices, without the least variation: either by common agreement, or by the Divine appointment; that the vanity of vying one with another might be prevented; and none might brag of their outdoing their brethren; and all might be confident that they were equally interested in the altar, and accepted by the Divine Majesty.
Ver. 24. Eliab] Here it may be observed, that Moses thought fit to set down distinctly, and at length, the offerings of the princes of every tribe (as he doth Vol. I.—75 here, and in the following part of this chapter), though they were the very same, without any difference; that an honourable mention being made of every one apart, none might think themselves in the least neglected.
Ver. 30. Elizur] There is nothing new to be noted of him, or any of the rest; because the same thing is repeated, for the reason foregoing.
Ver. 48. Eliashama] This solemnity was not interrupted by the Sabbath; but the offerings continued then, as upon other days.
Gideon, prince of the children of Benjamin, offered:

61 His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shkel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:

62 One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense:

63 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:

64 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:

65 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Abidan the son of Gideon.

66 ¶ On the tenth day Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai, prince of the children of Dan, offered:

67 His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shkel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:

68 One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense:

69 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:

70 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:

71 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai.

72 ¶ On the eleventh day Pagiel the son of Ornan, prince of the children of Asher, offered:

73 His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shkel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:

74 One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense:

75 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:

76 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:

77 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Pagiel the son of Ornan.

78 ¶ On the twelfth day Abira the son of Enan, prince of the children of Naphtali, offered:

79 His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shkel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering:

80 One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense:

81 One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering:

82 One kid of the goats for a sin offering:

83 And for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Abira the son of Enan.

84 This was the dedication of the altar, in the day when it was anointed, by the princes of Israel: twelve chargers of silver, twelve silver bowls, twelve spoons of gold:

85 Each charger of silver weighing an hundred and thirty shekels, each bowl seventy: all the silver vessels weighing two thousand and four hundred shekels, after the shkel of the sanctuary:

86 The golden spoons were twelve, full of incense, weighing ten shekels apiece, after the shkel of the sanctuary: all the gold of the spoons was an hundred and twenty shekels.

87 All the oxen for the burnt offering were twelve bullocks, the rams twelve, the lambs of godly admonitions, &c. This is a profitable allegory (saith he) of this history: and we need not seek for one more ingenious. As for those who highly value the allegorical sense of all these things, habent aliqui qui gustui suo consulent et curiositatem; "they may find other commentators to please their taste, and satisfy their curiosity."

Twelve chargers of silver, &c. In these and the following words the whole sum of the obligations and sacrifices is set down by Moses; that every reader, in all future times, might see without the trouble of casting up the account how devout and generous their ancestors were.

Ver. 87. For the burnt offering were twelve bullocks, &c. Whether there were any prayers made for a gracious acceptance of the sacrifices, which should be hereafter made on this altar, we are not told. But the sacrifices themselves were in the nature of supplications; and it is likely, they that offered them made their humble petitions with them. And so the gentiles always did at the dedication of their temples or altars: an instance of which is observed out of Gruter, by Fort. Scaccabus and by Selden, in these words: Hanc tibi aram, Jupiter Opt. Max., dico dedicac, uti sis volens propitius mihi collegisque meis, &c. Which is a dedication of an altar to Jupiter, with a prayer that he would be gracious to him that the first year twelve, with their meat offering: and the kids of the goats for sin offering twelve.

And all the oxen for the sacrifice of the peace offerings were twenty and four bullocks, the rams sixty, the he goats sixty, the lambs of the first year sixty. This was the dedication of the altar, after that it was anointed.

So And when Moses was gone into the tabernacle of the congregation to speak with him, then he heard the voice of one speaking unto him from off the mercy seat that was upon the ark of testimony, from between the two cherubins: and he spoke unto him.

(Exod. xli. 33, 34), from whence God spake to him (Lev. i. 1), and told him he would appear (i. e. reside constantly) in the cloud upon the mercy-seat (Lev. xvi. 2). Now here he relates how God appeared and communed with him from thence; which was by a voice that he heard of one speaking to him, as he stood in the outward part of the sanctuary. So the Jews understand it; particularly R. Solomon, who thinks that Moses only entered into the sanctuary, and, standing in the very entrance of it, heard the voice speaking to him "from between the two cherubins;" which was very clear and strong: but went no further than into the sanctuary, where Moses alone at that time was. So they observe in Siphri, as Buxtorf notes in his Histor. Areæ Fœderis, cap. 15.

He spake unto him.] With an audible voice: and so distinctly, that the perceived and understood every word. Which Abarbanel thinks God vouchsafed for this reason; that, as he visibly represented to him in the mount the pattern of the tabernacle, so he might, when he had gone down there, prolonging to it, whereby the form and figure of every particular was imprinted on his mind, and he was the better able to give directions how to make them exactly; so he being to write in his law all that God required them to do, he delivered and every thing to him in an audible voice; that he might set down in these books the very words and phrases by which he heard with his ears from the mouth of God, as plainly as if he had described them from some ancient volume.

To which I cannot but add, that this audible articulate voice from God, which was perceived by human ears, represented God as if he were incorporate; and may well be looked upon as an earnest of that great mystery, "God manifested in the flesh," who in the fulness of time became a man, and spake to all the Jews familiarly in their own language.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 How the lamps are to be lighted. 5 The consecration of the Levites. 23 The age and time of their service.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 2 Speak unto Aaron, and say unto him, When thou lightest the lamps, the seven lamps shall give light over against the candlestick.

CHAP. VIII.

Ver. 1.] When this was spoken is not certain. If Moses went into the tabernacle immediately after the princes had offered (ver. 59 of the foregoing chapter), it may be thought he then spake these things to him. But both this, and what follows concerning the Levites, seem rather to have been delivered after the order for giving to them the priests, and settling their several charges (ch. iii. and iv.). But some other things intervening, which depended upon what had been ordered concerning their camp, and that of the Israelites (see ver. 4), Moses omits this, till he had set down them, and some other matters, which he had received from God (see ch. vii. 11).

Ver. 2.] When thou lightest the lamps.] At the same time the public service of God began at the altar of burnt offerings (of which he spake in the foregoing chapter), the setting on the shew-bread, offering incense, and lighting the lamps, were begun in the sanctuary. The last of these is here only mentioned: but it supposes the other.

The seven lamps shall give light over against the candlestick.] Upon the table which was over against the candlestick; as the Vulgar Latin very well explains it; which is rather a paraphrase upon these words than a translation of them, in this manner: "When thou lightest the seven lamps, let the candlestick be set up on the south side" (for so it was ordered, Exod. xxvi. 35), and so Moses set it (ch. xl. 24), "and let the lamps look towards the north, over against the table of shew-bread," see Exod. xxv. 37, where there is the like obscure expression, but to this sense. And this verse may be translated exactly out of the Hebrew, "When thou settest up the lamps, the seven lamps shall shine before the face of the can-3 And Aaron did so; he lighted the lamps thereof over against the candlestick, as the Lord commanded Moses.

4 And this work of the candlestick was of beaten gold, unto the shaft thereof, unto the flowers thereof, was beaten work: according unto the pattern which the Lord had shewed Moses, so he made the candlestick.

5 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

6 Take the Levites from among the children of Israel, and cleanse them.

7 And thus shalt thou do unto them, to cleanse them: Sprinkle water of purifying upon them, and let them wash their all their flesh, and let them wash their clothes, and so make themselves clean.

8 Then let them take a young bullock with his meat offering, even fine flour mingled with oil, and another young bullock shalt thou take for a sin offering.

9 And thou shalt bring the Levites before the tabernacle of the congregation: and thou shalt gather the whole assembly of the children of Israel together:

10 And thou shalt bring the Levites before the Lord: and the children of Israel shall put their hands upon the Levites:

11 And Aaron shall offer the Levites before the Lord, for an offering of the children of Israel.

Gather the whole assembly] The Hebrew words, col adath, which we translate the whole assembly, frequently signifies all the elders of Israel; as in ch. xv. 4, xxv. 7, and xxxv. 13. And it cannot well have any other sense in this place, as appears from the next verse.

Ver. 10. Bring the Levites before the Lord.] Present them to him at the altar.

The children of Israel] The elders of the people mentioned in the foregoing verse. For all the children of Israel could not possibly do what is here enjoined; but some of them in the name of the rest; and none so proper as their rulers and governors, who were their representatives.

Shall put their hands upon the Levites:] As men used to do upon their sacrifices; which signified the devoting of that beast to God, by him who laid his hand on it at the altar, for such purposes as he brought it. And this was done by private men in their burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings, as well as in their sin-offerings (see Lev. i. 4, ch. iii. 2, and viii. 12): but the Jews observe, that the whole congregation laid their hands only upon the sin-offering that was offered for them (Lev. iv. 15). Therefore the Levites are here to be considered under that notion; as is manifest from ver. 19, where God is said to have given them to Aaron, &c., "to make an atonement for the children of Israel." For the Levites being given to God instead of the first-born, by the sanctification of which first-born to God (as it is called, Exod. xii. 1), the whole family was sanctified, and their sin, after a sort, expiated; the offering of the Levites after this manner to God, was to have the same effect that the offering of the first-born had; viz. the sanctification and atonement of the children of Israel.

Ver. 11. Aaron shall offer the Levites before the Lord.] The Hebrew words are more significant; "Aaron shall wave the Levites before the Lord, for a wave-offering," &c. I have often observed before, that this waving or agitation to and fro before the altar (of which, see Exod. xxix. 24), was a solemn consecration of a thing to God, as a sacrifice; and therefore the Levites were presented unto him, under the same consideration as the first-born were. But it was impossible for Aaron to wave them, as he did some parts of a sacrifice: and therefore, it is probable that he lifting up his hands, and turning about to all sides (as he did when he offered a wave-offering), they, at his command, imitated the same motion; and so were offered up to God, and became wholly his (see ver. 21).

That they may execute the service of the Lord.] Or, as it is more significantly in the margin, "that they may be to execute," &c. Which expresses the intention of this "waving them before the Lord," that being wholly given up to him, they might become...
CHAPTER VIII.

rael, that they may execute the service of the Lord.
12 And the Levites shall lay their hands upon the heads of the bullocks: and thou shalt offer the one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering, unto the Lord, to make an atonement for the Levites.
13 And thou shalt set the Levites before Aaron, and before his sons, and offer them for an offering unto the Lord.
14 Thus shalt thou separate the Levites from among the children of Israel: and the Levites shall be mine.
15 And after that shall the Levites go in to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation: and thou shalt cleanse them, and offer them for an offering.
16 For they are wholly given unto me from among the children of Israel; instead of such as meet to execute that service to which he appointed them at his house.

Ver. 12. The Levites shall lay their hands upon the heads of the bullocks: This being evident, from ver. 19, that the Levites were considered as an expiatory sacrifice; and yet, not being to be devoted to death (no more than the first-born were), these two sacrifices, one for sin, the other a burnt-offering, were substituted in their stead. Upon which, therefore, they were to lay their hands, that the sin, which the children of Israel laid upon them (ver. 10), might be transferred to these beasts, by laying their hands upon them, to be actually sacrificed unto God, by shedding their blood.

One for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering. The burnt-offering was mentioned first, ver. 8, being the most ancient of all offerings, from the beginning of the world: but the sin-offering is offered first, to make the other acceptable. And so it was when Aaron was consecrated (Lev. viii. 14, 18), and when he offered for himself (Lev. ix. 8, 12), and for the people (ver. 15, 16), and (to name no more) in the consecration of Ezra (ch. vii. 19).

To make an atonement The sin-offering properly made the atonement; and the burnt-offering declared its acceptance.

Ver. 13. Set the Levites before Aaron.] As they were brought before the Lord, because they were to be given unto him (ver. 9), so now they were set before Aaron and his sons, because they were given by God to them (ver. 19).
Offer them for an offering] Or, as it is in the Hebrew, "and wave them for a wave-offering unto the Lord." Some imagine, that as Aaron woved them before (ver. 11), so now they were in like manner waved by Moses. But it seems to me more probable that the meaning is, they being waved, &c. should be set before Aaron and his sons, and presented to them as God's gift, according to his order (ch. iii. 9). And so these words ought to be translated "after thou hast waved them for a wave-offering:" that is, after Aaron, by his order, had waved them; and thus the like words must be understood, (ver. 15 (see there).

Ver. 14. Thus shalt thou separate the Levites.] By the forementioned purification (ver. 7) and oblation (ver. 10, 11).
The Levites shall be mine.] They became his, by this solemn oblation of them to him (ver. 11).

Ver. 15. Shall the Levites go in?] To the court of the tabernacle, where they were to attend upon the open every womb, even instead of the firstborn of all the children of Israel, have I taken them unto me.
17 For all the firstborn of the children of Israel are mine, both man and beast: on the day that I smote every firstborn in the land of Egypt I sanctified them for myself.
18 And I have taken the Levites for all the firstborn of the children of Israel.
19 And I have given the Levites as a gift to Aaron and to his sons from among the children of Israel, to do the service of the children of Israel in the tabernacle of the congregation, and to make an atonement for the children of Israel: that there be no plague among the children of Israel, when the children of Israel come nigh unto the sanctuary.
20 And Moses, and Aaron, and all the congregation of the children of Israel, did to the priests, and assist them in their ministry, and in taking down the tabernacle when it was to be removed.
To do the service] In the court of the priests, where the altar of burnt-offering stood: for into the sanctuary itself none but the priests entered: and there was no ministry there in which the Levites were to assist.
Thou shalt cleanse them, and offer them.] Or rather, "after thou hast cleansed them, and offered," &c. according as was directed, ver. 7, 11.
Ver. 16. For they are wholly given unto me.] God commanded them before to be taken from among the children of Israel (ch. iii. 45), and now they are given to him. The word is repeated twice in the Hebrew, given, given (which we translate wholly given), because the children of Israel had devoted them to him, by laying their hands on them (ver. 10), and Aaron had waved them as a wave-offering to the Lord (ver. 11).
Instead of such as open every womb.] See ch. iii. 12, 13.

Ver. 17. All the firstborn, &c.] Exod. xiii. 2.
Ver. 18.] By the exchange mentioned ch. iii. 2, 13, 45. Ver. 19. I have given the Levites, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are more emphatical, "I have given the Levites given," &c. that is, the Levites, which are given unto me (ver. 16), I have given unto Aaron and his sons (ch. iii. 9).
To do the service.] See ch. iii. 7. The Vulgar Latin translates it, "to serve me for the children of Israel," i.e. to do them service by assisting the priests in offering sacrifice for the people.
In the tabernacle.] See ver. 15.
To make an atonement.] Not by offering sacrifice, for that was the work of the priests alone; but by being offered themselves, in the nature of an expiatory sacrifice unto God, as they were presented before (ver. 10, 12). For though they were not slain at the altar, as sacrifices were, yet might expiate, as the scape-goat did; which was sent away alive into the wilderness, after it had been presented unto the Lord, as these Levites were (Lev. xvi. 7, 10).
That there be no plague.] As there would have been if any man had presumed to officiate in the house of God, but such as were in this manner, taken by himself to minister there.
When the children of Israel come nigh.] To worship God, and to bring their sacrifices to be offered at his altar.
Ver. 20. Moses—and all the congregation.] i.e. the elders of the people (ver. 9, 10).
Levites according unto all that the LORD commanded Moses concerning the Levites, so did the children of Israel unto them.

21 And the Levites were purified, and they washed their clothes; and Aaron offered them as an offering before the LORD; and Aaron made an atonement for them to cleanse them.

22 And after that went the Levites in to do their service in the tabernacle of the congregation before Aaron, and before his sons; as the LORD had commanded Moses concerning the Levites, so did they unto them.

Did to the Levites, &c.] Separated them to God from the rest of the Israelites, as he had directed (ver. 14).

Ver. 21. The Levites were purified.] According to the order given, ver. 7.

Aaron offered them as an offering.] Or rather, "waved them a wave-offering," &c., as I observed, ver. 11. To which may be added, that it is likely some of the Levites were thus waved in the name of all the rest: for there being two-and-twenty thousand of them (ch. iii. 39), one cannot well conceive how that should have been otherwise.

Aaron made an atonement for them.] See ver. 12.

Ver. 22. Went the Levites in to do their service?] According to the directions given ver. 15.

Before Aaron, and before his sons.] In their presence, and by their direction.

Ver. 23.] After the foregoing commands, he gave him further instructions.

Ver. 24. This is it that belongeth unto the Levites.] Add this to what hath been said about them.

From twenty and five years old and upward they shall go in.] Then they might begin to take the custody of the tabernacle upon them, and to be doorkeepers, to keep out strangers and such as were unclean; but not to load the wagons, and do such like work of burden, till they were thirty years of age (see ch. iv. 3).

To wait upon the service.] In the Hebrew the words are, "to war the warfare of the tabernacle;" which is a phrase often used before, ch. iv. 3, 23, &c., and there applied to these that carried the tabernacle; which they might not do till thirty years of age.

Thus, Abarimel notes, that there is nothing said of their learning, but of their service or ministry; and therefore at twenty-five years old they began that part of the service which consisted in the custody of the tabernacle.

Ver. 25. They shall cease waiting upon the service.] In the Hebrew, "shall return from the warfare of their service;" i.e., be discharged from their function, and no longer burdened with any laborious work, as that of carrying the tabernacle was.

Shall serve no more.] In such manner of work.

Ver. 26. But shall minister.] This ministry is explained in the following words, "to keep the charge," that is, to take care of the tabernacle, unto which they were to be contiguous.

In the tabernacle.] See ch. iv. 3.

Shall do no service.] In the Hebrew, "serve no service;" that is, do no laborious work (as was said before), their age beginning to require ease and rest; and therefore no ministry was required of them, but what they might well perform without pains and labour.

Thus shall they do unto the Levites touching their charge.] Appoint them their ministries, according to these rules, which were observed after the ark of God was settled, and there was no occasion to remove it any more; when David, therefore, instead of carrying the ark and the tabernacle (for which there was then no further occasion), appointed them to be singers in the temple, and porters, &c., for which they were fit at twenty years of age; but continued their employment no longer than till fifty (as the Jews tell us), when their voice began to decay. Whence that observation of Abarimel upon this very chapter: "Age makes Levites unfit for service, not blemishes in their bodies, not by age: but such persons should be set at rest; not by age: but for priests continued their service as long as they lived; and though they did not begin it till twenty years of age, yet no law of God forbade them to begin sooner.

CHAPTER IX.

1 I And the LORD spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the first month of the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt, saying,

23 And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,

24 This is it that belongeth unto the Levites: from twenty and five years old and upward they shall go in to wait upon the service of the tabernacle of the congregation:

25 And from the age of fifty years they shall cease waiting upon the service thereof, and shall serve no more:

26 But shall minister with their brethren in the tabernacle of the congregation, to keep the charge, and shall do no service. Thus shall thou do unto the Levites touching their charge.
2 Let the children of Israel also keep the passover at his appointed season.

3 In the fourteenth day of this month, at even, ye shall keep it in his appointed season: according to all the rites of it, and according to all the ceremonies thereof, shall ye keep it.

4 And Moses spake unto the children of Israel, that they should keep the passover.

5 And they kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the first month: even in the wilderness of Sinai: according to all that the Lord commanded Moses, so did the children of Israel.

Ver. 2.] Aaron having been lately consecrated, and having offered all sorts of sacrifices for himself and for the people; and God having declared his acceptance by fire from heaven (Lev. viii. and ix.), God commanded the people should keep the passover; which he had lately solemnised was one of the feasts of the Lord (Lev. xxiii. 5). But the first order for the observation of it, being: "when ye came to the promised land" (Exod. xii. 25), they might thence conclude, there lay no obligation upon them to keep it here in the wilderness: and therefore, by a special precept, they are required to keep it (when the year was come about to the time of its first observation), that the memory of so singular a benefit might not presently slip out of their minds (see Exod. xiii. 5).

Ver. 3. In the fourteenth day. So it was ordained.

Exod. xii. 6; Lev. xxii. 5.

According to all the rites of it. With unleavened bread, and bitter herbs, and the other rites mentioned Exod. xii. 9, 10.

According to all the ceremonies. If there be any difference between ceremonies and rites. I should think this belongs to their eating it in haste, with their loins girt, shoes on their feet, and staves in their hands (Exod. xii. 11). Unto which they were not bound, when they came into the land of Canaan, when they were no longer travellers: but it is likely, were observed here in the wilderness, when they were an encamped condition.

Ver. 4. Keep the passover. According to all the rites and ceremonies belonging to it.

Ver. 5. They kept the passover. It was not hard to procure so much flour as would serve to make unleavened bread for that even, from some of their neighbours about the wilderness, ch. vi. 7.

In the wilderness of Sinai. Where they rested almost a whole year; but after they removed from thence were so uncertain in their motions from place to place, that they did not circumcise their children, who consequently could not eat of the passover: and therefore we never read of its being kept after this during their forty years' stay in the wilderness; nor would they have been obliged to refrain from it now, without this special command. Yet their doctors say, that this is written by Moses, as a reproach to the Israelites, that they observed no passover in the wilderness, but this one alone. Yet there are Christian writers, who deliver it as the opinion of the Hebrews themselves, that they kept another passover, a little before they came to the wanderings in the wilderness, viz. in the first month of the year wherein Miriam died (see Selden De Synod. lib. ii. cap. 2. n. 1).

So did the children of Israel. They kept the passover on the fourteenth day at even; but perhaps did not keep the feast of unleavened bread for seven days following. For here is no mention of that: and it had not been easy to provide so much bread, the want of which was supplied by manna.

Ver. 6. Certain men, who were defiled by the dead body.

And by a late law (for there is nothing about this in the original law of the passover, Exod. xii.), no unclean person might eat of holy things (Lev. vii. 38).

On that day. On the fourteenth day of the first month, at even, when the rest kept the passover who were not defiled.

They came before Moses—on that day. On the very day that the passover was kept.

Ver. 7. These men said unto him. Though they came before them both, whom they found sitting together: yet they supplied themselves to Moses only, as the supreme judge in such singular cases: for the judges, which were constituted by the advice of Jethro, could not resolve this hard question; and therefore they restored to Moses, unto whose judgment all difficult cases were reserved (Exod. xviii. 22, 25, see Selden, lib. ii. De Synod. cap. 1. n. 7).

It we are defiled. [We are defiled] should have been excluded out of the camp (according to what was ordained ch. v. 2.) and consequently kept from coming with such questions, or about any other business to Moses. But it must be considered, that when this happened, the law now mentioned was not given: for this was in the first month of the second year; and the second month, when the camps were formed.

Wherefore are we kept back? It was against their will that they were defiled by the dead body of a man (which perhaps they were bound to bury), and therefore they expostulate with Moses about their being debarred the liberty which others had; pleading, that it was not the fault of the people, but of the dead, but rather their unhappiness; and therefore, why might they not challenge a right in this sacrifice, as well as others, seeing they had not forfeited it by any other voluntary guilt?

That we may not offer an offering. The passover is called the "Lord's sacrifice," because it was to be killed, and its blood sprinkled (which shows it was eaten by God's commandment, in a grateful remembrance of an exceeding great benefit; which shows it to be an eucharistical sacrifice. For though the first sacrifice in Egypt was to procure deliverance to them, and to avert the evil which fell on the Egyptians by the destroying angel: yet, after it was a Thanksgiving to God's special favour to them: of which there was a commemorative commemoration made in their paschal rite (Exod. xii. 26, 27).

In his appointed season. For if they did not perform all this service now, they knew it was not lawful to be done at any other time.

Ver. 8. Stand still. Or, wait here a while. In
¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

10 Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If any man of you or of your posterity shall be unclean by reason of a dead body, or be in a journey afar off, yet he shall keep the passover unto the Lord.

11 The fourteenth day of the second month at even they shall keep it, and eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs.

which words Moses himself acknowledges the difficulty of the case; which he could not resolve, till he had first consulted the Divine Majesty about it. Which may teach judges not to be ashamed to confess their ignorance, and take advice on matters dubious; as the Jerusalem Targum here observes. But I see no such ground for the other part of his observation on this verse; that there being four difficult causes brought before Moses, in two of them he made haste to determine; but in the other two he was slow. Those of the first sort were this, and that of the daughters of Zelophehad (ch. xx.); these he judged presently, because they were pecuniary matters; but the other two (viz. about him that blasphemed; and about him that was slow on the Sabbath-day, Num. xv.) being capital causes, he took longer time to judge; for he put them in ward till the mind of the Lord was known: to teach those that succeeded him in the office of judges, to make quick despatch in money matters, but to proceed slowly in capital causes. But, as this was not contracted any thing to do with it, he did not appear to have took as much time to understand the mind of God in it, as in the other two about blasphemy and Sabbath-breaking: for he went in to consult with him, as he did also in the case of Zelophehad's daughters, whose cause he brought before the Lord (ch. xxxvii. 5).

[For hear what the Lord will command] These words seem to signify, that Moses might go into the holy place when he pleased to inquire of God; where God spake with him in an audible voice (ch. vii. 89), whenever he desired satisfaction about any doubt. So Abarbinel, who in this foresakes the Talmudists: for they fancy, that because God called to Moses, and then spake to him out of the tabernacle (Lev. i. 1), he could never go into the holy place, but when he was called. Which was true only at that time, when the glory of the Lord had newly filled the tabernacle; so that he durst not come into it, till he was invited; but was not a general rule to be observed in all his colloquies with the Divine Majesty (that he should wait till he had a singular call to come to him); for it is plain, by this place, that he went in to speak with him, whenever he had occasion.

Ver. 9.] He brought this case before the Lord, as his manner was in such doubts, and the Lord gave him the following answer; which was to be a rule, not only to these present inquirers, but to all posterity.

Ver. 10. [If any man of you—shall be unclean] From hence the Jews observe, that this is a law concerning particular persons only; not concerning all the people, or the major part of them. For, as the Mischna saith in the title Pesachim (cap. 7), if all the people, or the greater part, or the priests, had contracted any defilement, they ought notwithstanding to keep the passover, even in that defilement. But if the lesser part only were defiled, then they that were clean ought to keep it in the first month, and they that were defiled in the second. This they ground upon the very first words of this law (ver. 6), "there were certain men;" and upon these, "if any man of you—shall be unclean." This doctrine follows, out of ancient tradition, that "there were some private persons, who were adjourned to the second passover; but if the generality should be defiled by the dead, they were not to be so adjourned, but to sacrifice in that uncleanness." A great deal more to the same purpose may be seen in the forenamed Mr. Selden, lib. ii. De Synodr. cap. 1, n. 3.

[By reason of a dead body.] This case is mentioned instead of all other of like nature. For there was the same reason for those who were unclean by a leprosy; for women in child-bed, or that were menstruous, or those that had a running issue, or had touched a dead carcass. And this some of them ground upon ver. 13, where, speaking of those who should keep the passover, it is said in general, the man that is unclean; so therefore, he that was any way unclean might not keep it. Or be in a journey afar off.] Out of his own country (for it could not be kept anywhere but in Jidea, Deut. xvi. 2), or at such a distance that he could not reach the tabernacle upon the day appointed. In the Mischna, indeed, this derech rechoxhlah, as we said before, was defined to be fifteen miles from Jerusalem, or the place where the tabernacle was. Whence Maimonides saith, "If any man on the fourteenth day of the month Nisan, at sunrising, was fifteen miles or more from Jerusalem, this was a remote way; but if he was not so far from it, he was not comprehended in this reasons; for he might have at Jerusalem time enough in the afternoon to keep the passover that evening; though he went but a slow pace, and that on foot. But I do not take this to be a reasonable explication. Philo hath determined the distance a great deal better, according to the interpretation I mentioned at first, lib. iii. De Vita Mosis, where he saith, the second passover was permitted, τας μεσάς, Χρυσός ἐκπολέμησες ἡγούμενοι, &c. "To such were hindered by their travels into countries a great way off, from sacrificing with the rest of their nation. For it was not their fault that they were deprived of this honour; especially considering that so small a country as Jidea could not contain such a populous nation, but sent out colonies into many places." As for those who were only fifteen miles from Jerusalem, they might easily have come to the feast, if not on the fourteenth day, yet the day before; and if this distance had been a good reason to excuse their absence, most of the nation might have stayed away without any danger.

Yet he shall keep the passover] When that uncleanness is gone, and he is returned to his own country again.

Ver. 11. [The fourteenth day] They had a whole month's time given them, to dispose themselves and their affairs, so that they might be able to keep it.

Eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs.] Those Jews who are called Kârites, as Mr. Selden observes in the place before named (n. 7), expressly say, that they were not bound in the second month passover unto this more; to eat the lamb with unleavened bread and bitter herbs: but they were not obliged to keep the feast of unleavened bread seven days, because they might do it in the passover of the first month: for the unclean are only prohibited from being the principal Passover, but not to keep the feast of unleavened bread.

If the same persons that could not keep it in the 12 They shall leave none of it unto the morning, nor break any bone of it: according to all the ordinances of the passover they shall keep it.
13 But the man that is clean, and is not in a journey, and forbeareth to keep the passover, even the same soul shall be cut off from among his people: because he brought not the offering of the Lord in his appointed season, that man shall bear his sin.
14 And if a stranger shall sojourn among you, and will keep the passover unto the Lord; according to the ordinance of the passover, and according to the manner thereof, so shall he do: ye shall have one ordinance, both for the stranger, and for him that was born in the land.

15 ¶ And on the day that the tabernacle was reared up the cloud covered the tabernacle, namely, the tent of the testimony: and at even there was upon the tabernacle as it were the appearance of fire, until the morning.
16 So it was always: the cloud covered it by day, and the appearance of fire by night.
17 And when the cloud was taken up from the tabernacle, then after that the children of Israel journeyed: and in the place where the cloud abode, there the children of Israel pitched their tents.
18 At the commandment of the Lord the children of Israel journeyed, and at the commandment of the Lord they pitched: as long as the cloud abode upon the tabernacle they rested in their tents.
19 And when the cloud tarried long upon the tabernacle many days, then the children of Israel

Ver. 16. So it was always.] All the time of their continuance in the wilderness (see Exod. xiii. 21). The cloud covered it by day. The word by day is not in the original: it being the manner of the Hebrew language to omit a word sometimes in one part of a sentence, which the other part necessarily supplies; as in Ps. lxxxiv. 11, “One day in thy courts is better than a thousand;” i.e. in any other place. And Ps. cxi. 7, “a thousand shall fall at thy side (i.e. on thy left hand), and ten thousand at thy right hand.”

The appearance of fire by night.] As the dark side of the cloud appeared by day over the holy place, when they had need of no other light but that of the sun; so the bright part appeared every night, and that like fire: when the cloud, by reason of darkness, could not be seen, nor be serviceable to them for their direction (see Exod. x1. 38).

Ver. 17. When the cloud was taken up.] Or went up from off the tabernacle, which it before covered, and appeared higher in the air. From hence to the end of the chapter it gives an account of their removal from Mount Sinai, and the reason of their staying a longer or shorter time in those places to which they removed, all the time of their travels in the wilderness.

Then after that the children of Israel journeyed.] They took down the tabernacle, when the cloud was gone up from off it (Exod. x1. 10). And they journeyed. And followed the cloud, which went before them, and led them to the place where they were to rest (Exod. xiii. 21).

Where the cloud abode.] Where it stopped its motion, and stood still.

Pitched their tents.] Set up the tabernacle, and encamped round about it.

Ver. 18. At the commandment of the Lord.] The motion of the cloud was an indication of the Divine pleasure, that they should move also, and go towards another station: which they did, and went on as long as the cloud moved.

They pitched.] For when the cloud stood still, that was a Divine direction to them to stand still also, and there to fix the station where the cloud stood; which, as soon as the tabernacle was set up again, came down and settled upon it, in its wonted place, over the tent of the testimony (ver. 15).

As long as the cloud abode—[they rested.] And as long as the cloud rested immovable, in that new place to which it had conducted them, they likewise rested in tents round about it.

Ver. 19. When the cloud tarried long.] As it some kept the charge of the Lord, and journeyed not.

20 And so it was, when the cloud was a few days upon the tabernacle; according to the commandment of the Lord they abode in their tents, and according to the commandment of the Lord they journeyed.

21 And so it was, when the cloud abode from even unto the morning, and that the cloud was taken up in the morning, then they journeyed: whether it was by day or by night

22 Or whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, that the cloud tarried upon the tabernacle, remaining thereon, the children of Israel abode in their tents, and journeyed not: but when it was taken up, they journeyed.

23 At the commandment of the Lord they rested in the tents, and at the commandment of the Lord they journeyed: they kept the charge of the Lord, at the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses.

times did: for Maimonides reckons that they stayed eighteen years in one place.

Then the children of Israel kept the charge of the Lord: This phrase is used here something different from the same it hath, ch. iii. 25, 28, &c., signifying their obedience to God in fixing their abode there, where the cloud rested, till it moved again, though, it rested never so long.

Journeyed not.] This is the explication of the foregoing words, "they kept the charge of the Lord;" not daring to stir without the conduct of God, though sometimes they stayed so long in a place, that, no doubt, it was very irksome to those who were very desirous, if not impatient, to be in the land of promise. This is an instance of some regard they had to the Divine Majesty; though they did not fear and reverence him so much as they ought to have done; which appeared by their frequent mutinies and disobedience, mentioned in the following story.

Ver. 20.] If they had a desire to rest awhile longer in some station which was very convenient for them; yet, upon the motion of the cloud, they took down their tents and moved also.

Ver. 21. And so it was, when the cloud—was taken up in the morning, then they journeyed.] That is, if it did not stay a whole day in a place, but settling, in the even upon the tabernacle, it was taken up the next morning; yet they followed its motion. This is a great instance of their obedience in this particular: for, having rested but one night, they might be weary, and very unwilling to take down their tents and the tabernacle, and travel again the next morning.

Whether it was by day or by night] This is a further instance of their being perfectly guided by God in this matter; that, though they were at rest in their beds, yet, if notice was given of the motion of the cloud, they rose up and went after it. For they were sensible their safety depended upon the protection and guidance of this cloud.

Ver. 32. Or whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, &c.] These words may seem superfluous (saith Maimonides, par. iii., More Nevohim, cap. 50) unto those who do not consider the intention of Moses in this relation; which was, to confute the conceit of profane people, who imagined the reason of the Israelites staying so long in the wilderness was, because they lost their way. For the Egyptians, he saith, in his days, still called the wilderness, in which they travelled, the wandering desert; fancying the Israelites here bewildered (as we speak), and could not find their way out; but wandered like men in the dark, backward and forward; not knowing which way to turn themselves; therefore the Scripture punctually shows that all their removals (which were irregular), and the time they rested in any place (which was very unequal, being sometimes for eighteen years, sometimes only for one day, or one night), were all ordered by a special direction of God. For which cause all the circumstances of their motion are reckoned so particularly by Moses. Which shows, also, that the way from Horeb to Kadesh-harna (on the borders of the land of Canaan) was a plain, known, and beaten road, of about eleven days' journey; which it was not easy for them to miss. And therefore the cause of their going about, and of their staying forty years in the wilderness, is that which Moses relates.

Ver. 23. At the commandment of the Lord they rested, Every day by is the usual recitation of what goes before (see ch. ii. 34, iv. 49, vi. 21); and here was the more necessary, because it gives an account of a most material thing, their long stay in the desert, through which God thought fit to lead them (Exod. xiii. 17, 18).

They kept the charge of the Lord.] Moved or rested according to the direction which God gave them.

At the commandment of the Lord] See ver. 18.

By the hand of Moses.] By his ministry, who told them they were to be guided in their motions by the cloud. And therefore they expected no other commandment but that, the Lord being in that cloud, and telling them what they should do. And when it did move, no question, it was so leisurely, as that they, their children, and cattle might follow it with ease, and be able to take their necessary refreshment.

It is observable, that in all these verses 18, 20, 23, where it is said they journeyed or rested at pi (at the mouth), which we well translate "at the commandment of the Lord," Onkelos renders it "at the mouth (or commandment) of the Word of the Lord:" which Word he takes to have given to Moses all the commandments he received; for so he translates those words, Exod. xxv. 22. "And there will I meet thee by these; and I will prepare (or appoint) my Word to thee there," to deliver, that is, the Divine oracles and answers to him.
CHAPTER X.

1 The use of the silver trumpets. 11 The Israelites remove from Sinai to Paran. 14 The order of their march.

20 Hobah is intreated by Moses not to love them.

The blessing of Moses at the removing and resting of the ark.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Make thee two trumpets of silver; of a whole piece shalt thou make them: that thou mayest use them for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camps.

3 And when they shall blow with them, all the assembly shall assemble themselves to thee at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

4 And if they blow but with one trumpet, then the princes, which are heads of the thousands of Israel, shall gather themselves unto thee.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1.] This commandment concerning the trumpets, it is very likely, was given before, but not mentioned now, when there was an occasion for one principal use of them, viz. the removal of their camp (ver. 11).

Ver. 2. Make thee two trumpets.] There were several sorts of trumpets, of different form, among the ancients, as Eustathius shows upon Homer's Iliad Σ. p. 1138, where he mentions six: the second of which was στρογγύλος, "turned round" like a ram's horn, which, he adds, the Egyptians used (it being found out by Osiris) when they called the people to their sacrifices; ξυνωται δι' αὐτού πρὸς θυσίαν καλούντες τούς ὑλόνων δι' αὐτού. It was called in their language χρυόν. Now in this Moses opposed the Egyptians (which they would do well to take notice of, who make their customs to be of the greatest antiquity); for those which he here ordered to be made were long, such as we use at present. So Josephus tells us, in whom there is a large description of them, lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 11, where he saith they were a cubit long, and narrow, like a pipe; but wider, as ours are, at the bottom.

Though only two be now ordered for present use, it did not hinder their making more hereafter: when Nebuchadnezzar and people also were multiplied; see 2 Chron. v. 12, where, in Solomon's time, there was a hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets. And Josephus mentions a vast number more (lib. viii. Antiq. cap. 2).

Of silver.] These being sacred trumpets, as Josephus frequently calls them, it was fit they should be made of this pure metal; which gave them also a shiller sound.

Of a whole piece.] As he did the candlestick (Exod. xxxv. 31), which made them the more fine, and apter to give a certain and distinct sound.

Use them for the calling of the assembly, &c.] These are the two great uses for which they were designed: out of which some think a third is added (ver. 9, see here). It is certain that in ver. 10, another use of them is assigned.

Ver. 3. When they shall blow.] i.e. The priests (ver. 8).

Shall blow.] With an equal and continued sound.

With them.] With both the trumpets, as appears from ver. 4.

All the assembly shall assemble.] By this kind of sound with both the trumpets, the people understood that the whole congregation was called to meet together.

At the door.] Which seems to have been the usual place where they assembled; and made their meet-

5 When ye blow an alarm, then the camps that lie on the east parts shall go forward.

6 When ye blow an alarm the second time, then the camps that lie on the south side shall take their journey: they shall blow an alarm for their journeys.

7 But when the congregation is to be gathered together, ye shall blow, but ye shall not sound an alarm.

8 And the sons of Aaron, the priests, shall blow with the trumpets; and they shall be to you ing the more solemn, because it was before the Lord.

Ver. 4. If they blow but with one trumpet, then the princes, &c.] If only one trumpet made the sound before mentioned, it could not be intended to summon only the princes of Israel to attend Moses. Shall gather themselves.] At the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, as was said before.

Ver. 5. When ye blow an alarm.] When they did not simply blow with a long, even, and plain blast; but with an interrupted, and a broken or trembling sound: which had, as the Jews say, a plain note before, and another after, which otherwise might be confounded: and to explain it by a tare-tom-tara; but that word (as Dr. Lightfoot observes) signifies a blast, which put the quavering sound before and after, and the plain note in the midst; which is contrary to the Jewish description of it (see Temple Service, ch. 7, sect. 2). Hottinger makes no other distinction between the foregoing sound (ver. 3), called tekiah, and this, called teruah; but that the former was equal, and this was quick and concise (Anaelct. Dissert. iii. p. 152).

Then the camps that lie on the east parts shall go forward.] viz. If this alarm was blown only once (as appears from ver. 6), then the hosts that were under the standard of Judah began to march (see ch. ii. 3). Ver. 6. When, it was intended the second time, &c.] Having ceased for a while, if the alarm was blown again, then those tribes which were under the standard of Reuben (ch. ii. ver. 10, 11, &c.) began to move, who lay on the south side.

They shall blow an alarm for their journeys.] That is, they shall blow a third and fourth alarm, for the moving of the other two standards. So the LXX. rightly explains it, in so many words at length: "Ye shall blow an alarm the third time, and the camps that lie towards the sea (i.e. on the west side) shall take their journey; and ye shall blow the fourth alarm, and they that lie towards the north," &c. In what order the camp of the Levites moved, is related afterward, ver. 17, 21.

Ver. 7. Here is a manifest distinction between plain blowing and sounding an alarm; which were for different purposes, and accordingly to be used (ver. 3, 5).

Ver. 8. The sons of Aaron—shall blow.] None else were permitted to use them, either for calling the assembly together, or for their march, or at their feasts: because God would have the greater regard paid to the sound which was made by his ministers: as he himself called upon them to attend his summons.

They shall be to you for an ordinance for ever.] These trumpets shall be used by you, not only while for an ordinance for ever throughout your generations. 9 And if ye go to war in your land against the enemy that oppresseth you, then ye shall blow an alarm with the trumpets; and ye shall be remembered before the Lord your God, and ye shall be saved from your enemies.

you stay in the wilderness, but in future ages, as long as you are a nation.

Ver. 9. If ye go to war in your land against the enemy, &c.] This is thought to be a third use of the trumpets; viz., to give battle to their enemies. Which may be confirmed from ch. xxxi. 6, and from 2 Chron. xiii. 12. But this doth not exclude another meaning; which is, that they called the people together to fast and pray to God before they went out to battle. For it is certain that a fast was proclaimed by blowing of the trumpet (Joel ii. 15, &c.). Which justifies what Maimonides says in TaNaKh, that they blow the trumpet, not only when they were in danger from their enemies, but in all other distresses, by famine, or pestilence, &c. For he makes this blowing with the trumpets in this place, to be the same with that precept, Ps. l. 14, "Call upon me in the day of trouble" (More Nevech, par. ill. cap. 36). The only obs. that I entertain is this: viz., that (yea, that is very ancient) is, that Moses speaks here of blowing an alarm with the trumpets; which was not used (ver. 7) for calling the assembly together, but for the motion of the camps (ver. 5). Yet one cannot conceive how they should be gathered together to make an army to fight with their enemies, by some sort of sound with the trumpet (see Jue. iii. 32; v. 34), and being so, it is highly probable they called upon God by prayer and fasting for good success; as the latter part of this verse intimates. Besides, these silver trumpets seem to have been used only at the sanctuary; and other trumpets were used when they went to war. For at the siege of Jericho, the priests blew with horns, not with these silver trumpets. Therefore, in these verses, when it is said they called them to the sanctuary to pray to God before they went to war; and that by blowing an alarm, whereby they understood the meaning of the summons. And if we may believe the Jews, they used, when the temple was built, to blow an alarm every morning at the opening of the gates of it; particularly in the time of Hesta (as Dr. Lightfoot observes in the place above named); for which, though there was no express command, yet it was grounded on this reason, that the Levites, who were God's host, as they are often called in this book (ch. iv. 3, &c., viii. 21), might be awakened to come and attend their service in the house of God.

Ye shall be remembered before the Lord] He will be merciful to you, and grant your request; as the next words explain it.

Ye shall be saved] Which is to be understood with this condition, "that they turned to him with unfeigned repentance;" which was the proper intention of their prayer and fasting.

The closing words, in the year of your gladness.] Here is the fourth use of these trumpets, which were blown when they rejoiced for the good success, suppose of their arms, or any other great deliverance; like that mentioned Esther ix. 19, when they feasted upon the peace-offerings, which were then offered. And thus it was when Solomon built the temple (2 Chron. v. 12, vii. 6), and at the laying of the foundation of the new temple after the captivity (Ezra iii. 10), and at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 37, 35).

10 Also in the day of your gladness, and in your solemn days, and in the beginnings of your months, ye shall blow with the trumpets over your burnt offerings, and over the sacrifices of your peace offerings; that they may be to you for a memorial before your God: I am the Lord your God.

In your solemn days,] Mentioned in Lev. xxiii., which were proclaimed by sound of trumpet (see there, ver. 2); and there were great feasts upon many of them, at which the Levites, the poor, and the widows were supplied (Deut. xvi. 11; Lev. viii. 10, 12). But they were not all festivals which are there mentioned; for one of those solemn days was a fast, viz. the great day of atonement. And therefore the Hebrew word modeh should rather be translated days of assemblies, as our Mr. Thorndike observes; who (in his book concerning the Service of God at religious Assemblies) notes, that Moses here distinguishes those times as assemblies for observing the new moons. First, "The day of your gladness;" which signifies solemnities to be celebrated with cheerfulness of heart, i.e. feasts. Then, "The solemn days of assemblies" (as he translates it); containing, besides these, assemblies for humiliation, as the day of atonement. And lastly, "The beginnings of your months;" to which was a peculiar service appointed (ch. xxviii. 11).

In the beginnings of your months,] On the new moons, which the Jews observed, not like those other festivities and days of assemblies, upon which they abstained from all servile work; but with special sacrifices, which God appointed to be offered to him upon such occasions. The first of these was the month of Abib, in the year B.C. 1378. On this day, when the moon first became visible to the Jews, they were to begin the celebration of the Passover. Then, "The day of atonement," which was celebrated in the 10th day of the 7th month, with all solemnity of blowing with trumpets (Ps. lxxvi. 3). And they were the more careful to observe the new moons, because their great festivals depended upon them; though they are not reckoned among their festivals or solemn assemblies (Lev. xxvii.), but only the first day of the seventh month was a memorial of blowing of trumpets (ver. 24), which gave occasion, perhaps, for observing the new moons in the year. And there being no express command for observing the first day of the month, but only for peculiar sacrifices upon it, and blowing of trumpets, some argue from thence, that, in the most ancient times, before the law of Moses, new moons were observed with festival joy (it being plain that they were so in the days of Hesta). For Hesta (as Dr. Lightfoot observes) had it as certain, that the Levites, who were God's host, as they are often called in this book (ch. iv. 3, &c., viii. 21), might be awakened to come and attend their service in the house of God.

And it is manifest the Jews were so observant of the new moons, that they seem to have regarded them next to their Sabbath, as times of religious worship of the Divine Majesty (2 Kings iv. 23; Isa. lxi. 23; Amos viii. 5). And thus I find, that among the Athenians (whose laws are observed by many to have been derived from Moses), the first day of the month was Festum νιερον, as Plutarch speaks, "a most holy day!" and yet it was not a festival; nor was it consecrated to any particular god, but unto all. And there was a law, τας ουσινυας των ανθρωπων, "that they offer sacrifices upon the first day of the month;" when they went up to the aereopolis (as Demosthenes tells us) to pray for the public security of the state, and for their own private happiness (see Sam. Petius in his Comment. in Leges Atticae. lib. i. tit. 1, p. 85).
CHAPTER X.

11 ¶ And it came to pass on the twentieth day of the second month, in the second year, that the cloud was taken up from off the tabernacle of the testimony.
12 And the children of Israel took their journeys out of the wilderness of Sinai; and the cloud rested in the wilderness of Paran.
13 And they first took their journey according to the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses.
14 ¶ In the first place went the standard of the camp of the children of Judah according to their armies; and over his host was Nahshon the son of Amminadab.
15 And over the host of the tribe of Issachar was Nethaneel the son of Zuar.
16 And over the host of the tribe of Zebulun was Eliab the son of Helon.
17 And the tabernacle was taken down; and the sons of Gershon and the sons of Merari set forward, bearing the tabernacle.
18 ¶ And the standard of the camp of Reuben set forward according to their armies; and over his host was Elizur the son of Shedeur.
19 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Simeon was Shelumiel the son of Zuri-shaddai.
20 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Gad was Eliasaph the son of Deuel.
21 And the Kohathites set forward, bearing the sanctuary: and the other did set up the tabernacle against they came.
22 ¶ And the standard of the camp of the children of Ephraim set forward according to their armies; and over his host was Eliashama the son of Ammihud.
23 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Manasseh was Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur.
24 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Benjamin was Abidan the son of Gideoni.
25 ¶ And the standard of the camp of the children of Dan set forward, which was the remnant of the burnt offerings;] Especially the morning sacrifice; at the offering of which the trumpets began to sound (2 Chron. xxix. 27).
26 Ver. 11. On the twentieth day] After their coming out of Egypt, as appears from ch. i. 1.
27 "The cloud was taken up] In taken that they might begin to move, as the cloud did (ch. ix. 17).
28 "From off the tabernacle] i. e. The most holy place, over which it resided (ch. ix. 15).
29 Ver. 12. Took their journeys] After the cloud was taken up, it stood still for some time, till they had taken down the tabernacle, and packed up their own tents and household-stuff. Or else, while those under the first standard moved, they took down the tabernacle; but still the three tribes which first moved, upon the going up of the cloud, must have some time allowed to take up their own tents, &c.
30 Out of the wilderness] Where they had stayed nearly a year.
31 "The cloud rested] After three days' motion (ver. 23).
32 "In the wilderness of Paran] Where they had settled themselves, which was the midway between the Red Sea and the land of Canaan; and, from the graves of those that lusted, was called Kibroth-hattaavah (ch. xi. 33, xxxii. 16), where they stayed a month; and from thence went to Hazeroth; and were still in the wilderness of Paran (ch. xii. 16).
33 Ver. 13. They first took their journey] In the Hebrew the words are, "they journeyed at the first;" i. e. at their first removal; which was this.
34 According to the commandment] Not whether they pleased themselves, but according as God had before directed, when the cloud was taken up; and in such order as he appointed (see ch. ix. 18); and there seems to have been a special direction, by an express command, for this first removal (Deut. i. 6, 7).
ward of all the camps throughout their hosts: and over his host was Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai.

26 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Asher was Pagiel the son of Ocran.

27 And over the host of the tribe of the children of Naphtali was Ahira the son of Enan.

28 Thus were the journeyings of the children of Israel according to their armies, when they set forward.

29 ¶ And Moses said unto Hobab, the son of Raguel the Midianite, Moses' father in law, We are journeying unto the place of which the Lord said, I will give it you: come thou with us, and we will do thee good: for the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel.

30 And he said unto him, I will not go; but I will depart to mine own land, and to my kindred.

31 And he said, Leave us not, I pray thee; forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness, and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes.

32 And it shall be, if thou go with us, yea, it shall be, that what goodness the Lord shall do unto us, the same will we do unto thee.

33 ¶ And they departed from the mount of the Lord three days' journey: and the ark of

To my kindred.] With whom all men love to live and die.

Ver. 31. He said.] i. e. Moses replied.

Leave us not, I pray thee.] Do not persist in that resolution, but be persuaded to go along with us.

Forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness.] He being a borderer upon this wilderness, was well acquainted with every part of it, and the better able to advise them how to secure their camp (for the cloud only served to direct them where they should go), and to point out to them the safest and best retreats from the people, on all sides, that might be injurious to them; which made Moses so earnest with him to stay with them, while they had such need of his assistance.

Thou mayest be to us instead of eyes.] To give them advice and counsel in any difficulty they might meet with in the wilderness; and to the end of the journeyings, where they stayed; or to direct them how to provide themselves with such things as they wanted: for he, having lived long thereabouts, could not but understand the neighbouring countries. The LXX. understand this passage, as if he desired him to continue to be what he had been hitherto in the wilderness (viz. a good adviser, like his father Jethro), assuring him, they would look upon him as an elder; and it is, have him great respect.

Ver. 32. If thou go with us.] Not only stay with us, while we are here in the wilderness, but go along with us into Canaan.

Yea, it shall be.] Depend upon it.

That what goodness the Lord shall do unto us, the same will we do unto thee.] Give thee some part of the possession of the land where they stayed; or to direct them how to provide themselves with such things as they wanted: for he, having lived long thereabouts, could not but understand the neighbouring countries. The LXX. understand this passage, as if he desired him to continue to be what he had been hitherto in the wilderness (viz. a good adviser, like his father Jethro), assuring him, they would look upon him as an elder; and it is, have him great respect.

Ver. 33. They departed from the mount.] viz. Horhob, in the wilderness of Sinai, where they had stayed a long time (Deut. i. 6).

Three days' journey.] They travelled three days before the cloud settled again upon the tabernacle; though it stood still sometimes (but did not descend) to give them time for necessary refreshment, and for sleep (see ch. xi. 1).

The ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them.] It is said, ver. 21, that the sanctuary was carried between the first two standards and the last two: i. e. in the midst of the camp, as we expressly read, ch. ii. 17, which Abarbinel thinks is to be understood of all their journeys but only this. That was the constant order of their march; first went the ark of the covenant of the Lord; next the tabernacle, of the congregation; then followed the standard of Ephraim; and last of all, that of

Which was the rereward of all the camps? The Hebrew word measeph (which we translate was the rereward) comes from a word which everywhere signifies to gather together, or collect. And therefore is here understood; and the whole sentence thus rendered: "Then set forward the standard of the camp of Dan, gathering to it all the camps throughout their hosts:" or, "according to their armies," as we here translate the last part of these words (ver. 14, 18, 32). So Forsterus translates it; the meaning being, that all the rest of the people, who were not a part of these five before-mentioned camps, all under twenty years old (who were "not able to go forth to war"), together with the mixed multitude that came with them out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 35), and all the unclean persons, who were shut out of the camp (ch. v. 2), came after this hindermost standard of the children of Dan.

Ver. 29. Thus were the journeyings.] In this order they marched, when they removed from one station to another.

Ver. 29. Moses said unto Hobab.] His wife's brother, as Theodoret understands it.

The son of Raguel the Midianite.] The son of Jethro, priest of Midian; for Raguel and he are thought by many to be the same person (Exod. ii. 18; iii. 1); or one was the father, and the other the son, and Hobab was the grandson of Raguel.

Moses' father in law.] These words may either refer to Raguel, who is supposed to be Jethro; and then it is rightly translated father-in-law; or they may as well refer to Hobab, and be translated brother-in-law; for so the Hebrew word denotes sometimes a kindred relation; and therefore before the mentioned camps, among these people, who were sojourning (Josephus), there was a man who (according to the sense of the words) was related to Moses.

We are journeying, &c.] i. e. To the land of Canaan; for thither God intended to have brought them shortly after this removal; as appears from Deut. i. 6, 7.

Come thou with us.] See ver. 32.

For the Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel.] Promised to bestow a noble country upon us for our inheritance.

Ver. 30. I will not go.] This was his present resolution, till Moses had further persuaded him.

But I will depend to mine own land.] Which he was loth to leave, merely in hope of what the Israelites had not yet in possession.
the covenant of the Lord went before them in the three days' journey, to search out a resting place for them.

34 And the cloud of the Lord was upon them by day, when they went out of the camp.

Dan. But now, in their first removal, God did them the honour to appoint the ark to go before them, in the front of all the camps; as he did when they passed over Jordan (Josh. iii. 6;) that is, in their first and last journeys this extraordinary favour was shown them; but in all the rest the ark went in the midst of them. And thus Aben Ezra upon this place: "This first removal was not like the rest of their removals." But I see no good ground for this exposition. The plain meaning seems to be, that the Lord, as their king and governor, led them by the cloud, which was always over the ark; just as a general leads his army, though he be not in the front of it, but in the midst, from whence he issues out his orders.

To search out a resting place. There was no need of inquiry after a resting place for Moses, but he speaks after the manner of generals, who send officers before them, to take up the most convenient quarters for their army (see Deut. i. 33).

Ver. 31. It seems this removal of their camp from Sinai was in the day-time (as sometimes they removed in the night, ch. ix. 21); and the cloud being taken up from off the tabernacle, so moved over the ark as to overshadow them all by day, as the pillar of fire was over them by night, to give them assurance of the Divine protection (see note upon Exod. xiii. 21, and Ps. cv. 39).

Ver. 35. When the ark set forward.] There being the letter nun turned the wrong way in the Hebrew word for set forward, as there is in the word for complained, in the first verse of the next chapter; the Jewish doctors fancy it denotes "where God's place was," converting his face towards them, at the prayer of Moses; and, in the following story, the people's aversion to God, and ungrateful turning away their hearts from him.

Moses said.] It was his custom to pray in this manner upon such occasions; as R. Levi ben Gersom explains it.

Rise up.] This is an expression (saith Abarbinel) like that in Isa. xxxiii. 10. "Now will I rise, saith the Lord, and will be exalted," &c., where his taking vengeance upon his enemies is called his rising; according to Job xxxi. 11, "What shall I do, when God riseth up," &c. The next words, "Let thine enemies be scattered," &c., justify this sense.

Lord.] It seems very strange to me, that any should allege this place as a proof that the ark is called Jehovah; when the prayer of Moses is so plainly directed to the Lord himself (who was there in a glorious symbol of his presence), and not to the ark; considering also, that in other places where this very form of speech is used, the Lord and the ark are mentioned together, as in the expression, thus, from the other (see 2 Chron. vi. 41, and Ps. cxxxii. 8). And yet an anonymous anti-trinitarian writer (confuted by Joseph de Veisin fifty years ago), observing that the 35 And it came to pass, when the ark set forward, that Moses said, Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee flee before thee.

36 And when it rested, he said, Return, O Lord, unto the many thousands of Israel.
CHAPTER XI.

1 The burning at Taberah quenched by Moses' prayer. 4 The people lust for flesh, and bore the manna. 10 Moses complaineth of his charge. 16 God divideth his burden unto seventy elders. 31 Quails are given in wrath at Kibroth-hattaavah.

1 And when the people complained, it displeased the Lord: and the Lord heard it; and his anger was kindled; and the fire of the Lord burnt among them, and consumed them that were in the uttermost parts of the camp.

2 And the people cried unto Moses; and when Moses prayed unto the Lord, the fire was quenched.

3 And he called the name of the place Taberah: because the fire of the Lord burnt among them.

4 ¶ And the multitude that was among the uttermost parts, signifies in all, or throughout. Of which he gives many instances out of Leu, De Dieu, upon Ezek. xxxiii. 1 (see Gen. xix. 4, and xvii. 2, &c. Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34). And therefore so it should be here rendered, consumed some in every part of the camp: where they began to make complaints one to another, of their being still in a wilderness.

5 Ver. 2. The people cried unto Moses;]. Of whose power with God they had a great experience: but had reason to distrust their own interest in him, because of their murmuring humour: for it is likely they were the same people that cried now to Moses, who before complained (ver. 1).

When Moses prayed unto the Lord,]. As they begged he would.

The fire was quenched.]. Went out; and no signs of it appeared. So the Hebrew phrase signifies, it sunk. What number of them was burnt we are not told; it is likely not many, because the terror of it instantly made them deprecate God's displeasure, by Moses their intercessor; which put a stop to it.

Ver. 3. Taberah.]. Which, for another reason, was also called Kibroth-hattaavah (ver. 34). They are mentioned, indeed, in Deut. ix. 22, as if they were two distinct places; but it is plain, by the story, that the things which occasioned both these names, happened in one and the same station. And therefore they were only different names for the same place; unless we suppose Kibroth-hattaavah to have been the name of that particular piece of ground in that place where the lusters were buried.

Because the fire of the Lord burnt among them.]. This is the reason of the name of Taberah (which signifies a burning), which was imposed on this place, to preserve the memory both of God's judgments and of his mercy.

Ver. 4. The mixed multitude that was among them.]. The Hebrew word hasaphaphor is well translated by Bochartus, populi colluvies undecunque collecta, the drage or scum of the people gathered together from all parts. For the doubling of words increases their sense, in the Hebrew language, and makes the same with the superlative degree in other tongues; of which he gives many instances in his Hierozoic. (par. ii. lib. v. cap. 6). See Lev. xii. 19, where adadameth signifies exceeding red: as hasaphaphor here doth a very great collection of all sorts of people, both Egyptians and other neighbouring nations, who were invited by their wonderful deliverance out of Egypt, to join themselves to the Israelites, as proselytes to their religion (see Exod. xii. 39). The Jews, in Tanchuma, say, there were forty thousand of them, and James and Jambres at the head of them.

Fell a lusting.]. He doth not say for what: and the Jews have taken the liberty to fancy what they please. Some of them say that they lusted after such women, as Moses had lately forbidden them to marry. So the them fell a lusting: and the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat?

5 We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlic:

paraphrase of Uzielides; “Moses heard the people weeping, because that those were near of kin to them were forbidden in marriage.” And he makes as if these prodelytes petitioned Moses in the name of the people, and that they be not permitted to eat flesh: such conceits others have indulged to themselves (as Mr. Selden shows, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4, p. 292), when the words (in the end of this verse, and vers. 13, 18), plainly show they lusted for flesh to eat.

The children of Israel also] Though the mixed multitude were the firstottoners of this discontent, yet it ran among the children of Israel throughout the whole camp; and rose so high that they fell into a great passion.

Wppl again.] They had shed some tears, it seems, before (when they complained, ver. 1), but now they wept aloud, out of anger, vexation, and grief. Or else this weeping again refers to their first murmuring a few weeks before (Exod. xvi. 2), as Ludolphus interprets. [And said.] They could not refrain from bursting out into such discontented language; as argued they were extremely angry, or rather enraged.

Who shall give us flesh to eat?] It is an expression of a vehement, impatient desire (mixed with despair) after flesh-meat; which they needed not to have wished for, as long as they had killed their cattle, which they brought with them out of Egypt in great abundance (Exod. xii. 38), but they preserved them for bread when they came to Canaan; and if they killed them daily, they would not have lasted long to suffice six hundred thousand people, besides women and children (see vers. 21, 22). Besides this, while they continued in the wilderness, they were not permitted to eat any flesh, but only their share of the peace-offerings that were offered at the altar (Lev. xvi. 3–5). Which lasted, the Jews think, till they came to the land of Canaan, when this restraint was taken off (Deut. xii. 13, 16). And, indeed, the wilderness was so barren a place, that they could there have no great increase of such sustenance. They were angry, therefore, that they were not yet brought to a country where they might have had all sorts of flesh, without killing their own cattle; and have taken their fill of that and all other food (as appears by the next verse) at as easy rates as they had done in Egypt: whereas now they despaired, as I said, of getting any such food; for so such questions as this signify (Psalm xiii. 5; Isa. lxi. 8; John viii. 16).

Ver. 5. We remember the fish.] This shows that all kind of food is comprehended under flesh, for which they longed; particularly this, which is one sort of flesh (1 Cor. xv. 39).

Which we did eat in Egypt freely.] Or, for nothing; for they could easily catch them in the river of Egypt, which abounded with them (Isa. xix. 8), and in the sea also, which was not far from them; wherein was exceeding great plenty of excellent fish.

The cucumbers, and the melons, &c.] None of which grew here in the wilderness, but were there in such plenty and perfection, that they were the common food of the Egyptians, as well as of Moses and his people (for we must remember, that their rest was not for a rest, but for the means of their diet, as Calv. observes in lib. ix. Athenei Deipnos. cap. 11, p. 674. Some fancy these things were the cheaper there, because the Egyptians durst not eat either fish, or leeks, or onions; as is said by Juvencu, Sat. xv. Pliny, lib. Vol. I. 77.

6 But now our soul is dried away: there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes.

7 And the manna was as coriander seed, and the colour thereof as the colour of bdellium.

8 And the people went about, and gathered xix. cap. 6, and Herodotus, lib. ii. cap. 37, where he saith, it was not lawful for the Egyptians to taste of fish. But, in my opinion, these words of the people demonstrate rather, that they were not so superstitious in the days of Moses; for they were not the words merely of the Israelites, but of the mixed multitude, who were the beginners of this mutiny, and of this sort of unfruitful language; which, one would think, they put into the mouths of the Israelites, who could not otherwise have had the impudence to magnify their condition in Egypt, where they groaned under the sorest slavery.

It is a strange fancy of one of the doctors in the Talmud (in the title Jona), who by fishes understands harilot; whom this crew of mixed people lusted after.

The onions.] The Hebrew word chetzir properly signifies grass; which being no part of human food, the LXX. here render the word onionus (as agreeable to the other words that accompany it. But the learned Ludolphus thinks they had no other reason for it; and therefore, out of the Arabic language, rather interprets it lettuce, or salada, in general, which were most excellent in Egypt (Dissert. De Locustis, par. ii. cap. 14).

Ver. 6. But now our soul is dried away.] They speak as if they were starved; and, as we speak, had neither life nor soul left in them. Such is the vile nature of discontented ingratitude, which makes men that are advanced from a poor to a plentiful condition contemn their present enjoyments, and praise their former wretched state.

There is nothing at all, beside this manna.] They were angry that they were come to a place where they found nothing but that of which they were now grown weary; and therefore speak of it with disdain.

Ver. 7. The manna.] Upon this occasion he describes more fully what kind of thing it was which they despised, that it might appear how justly God was displeased with them for their ingratitude. [Was it as costly as corn?] Not in colour (for that was like bdellium, as it here follows), but in its shape and form, being round (Exod. xvi. 11).

The colour thereof as the colour of bdellium.] Of a pure white colour, and bright like pearl; so that it was very grateful to the eye, as well as pleasant to the taste (see Exod. xvi. 31).

Ver. 8. The people went about.] Round their camp (Exod. xvi. 12). Gathered it.] Fresh every morning; which made it still more acceptable (Exod. xvi. 18, 19). Ground it in mills.] Into flour, with a hand-mill. Beat it in a mortar.] Bruised it with a pestle, in a wooden or stone mortar.

Baked it in pans.] Or else boiled it (as R. Bechai expounds it) in a pot.

Made cakes of it?] Or make cakes of it in an oven, or in a pan; that is, saith the same R. Bechai, it was of such an excellent composition, that it might be dressed divers ways, or eaten as it fell. For, if they would, they might use it, saith he, for food immediately, as the pan and baked; or they might grind it, or make it into cakes, &c.; and then either boil it or bake it; and it was agreeable in what way soever it was prepared; which Moses mentions, to show how ungrateful they were to God, who, by one thing, entertained them with great variety.
The taste of it was as the taste of fresh oil.] When it was newly all, it tasted like honey; but when it was ripened, it tasted like fresh (see Exod. xvi. 31). Or to some it had the taste of honey; to others, of fresh oil. The Jews, indeed, say it had all sorts of tastes, according to every man's desire. So the author of the Book of Wisdom speaks (cch. xvi. 20, 31), from the ancient tradition of the Hebrews: whereby, I suppose, they meant no more, but that it pleased every man's palate; and had in it all that could be expected in a beverage, to taste of young and old, and refreshed the spirits, and kept up the flesh of their bodies in good plight. For it is not unreasonably observed, by the authors of the Book of Wisdom and (see xxvii. 26), that Moses gave them this water, which was all that they could have to drink, except water of the earth. It is not unreasonable to conclude, that this was a beverage that satisfied the desires of the people, and kept up the strength of their bodies.

Ver. 9. When the dew fell—in the night.] There as was a great providence of God in this, saith the authors of the Book of Wisdom and (see xxvii. 26). For it is the night, when they slept quietly in their beds; that when they rose in the morning they might find their food ready for them.
And thus, saith he, it was when they came to Canaan. And the rains were wont to fall in the night season, and not in the day-time; that they might not be nibed from their work in the fields, and in their plantations.

The manna fell upon it.] That is, upon the dew; for it did not fall upon the camp, but round about it (see Exod. xvi. 14). It is a remarkable observation, that this is a further aggravation of the people, for they are told that the manna was which came not out of the earth, or the waters, but from above, out of the air; and therefore was more pure and spiritual than cucumbers and leeks, &c., whichis, and gross sort of food their depraved minds preferred before this celestial nourishment, which, by falling on the dew, was kept clean and pure for their use.

Huetius observes, that several authors, both ancient and modern, mention manna as a thing which sometimes falls in those countries (particularly in Arabia, and upon Libanus), which they call aerial honey, or dewy honey, and Syriac dew; which was fit for food.
But it never fell in such quantity, nor so constantly, every day, for the space of forty years; and so delicious and hearty. All this was so surprising; as also its melting when the sun shone upon it; and that it ut续 fell before the next day, except on the Sabbath, yet kept in an urn many years (see Almatae Quest.
il. ii. cap. 12, n. 17).

Ver. 10. Moses heard the people weep, throughout their which was the will of the Lord. For, as the families, or, at least, a large part of their families, were understood to it, though to a foolish sense (see Selden, il. ii. De Synod. cap. 4, p. 203): they who pretended could not live any longer upon manna.

Every man in the door of his tent.] It may be understood of Moses's tent, about which the heads of the several families were gathered; as mutinous soldiers are wont to be, about the door of their chief commander.

The anger of the Lord was kindled greatly.] Which brake forth shortly after, in a great plague upon them (ver. 34).

Moses also was displeased.] The same phrase with that, ver. 1.

It was evil in the eyes of Moses.] i.e. Grieved him so that it made him wish himself rid of the burden of their groans, and let them die rather than be grateful. So the author of the Book of Wisdom speaks (see xxvii. 26). And the author of the Book of (see xxvii. 26).

Ver. 11. Moses said unto the Lord.] I suppose he was still in the sanctuary, and while he was bewailing himself, and praying that he might escape the plague, and not have it upon him. According to this, the author of the Book of Wisdom speaks (see xxvii. 26). For the author of the Book of Wisdom speaks (see xxvii. 26). And the author of the Book of (see xxvii. 26).

Wherefore hast thou afflicted thy servant? By committing this people to his charge.
Wherefore have I not found favour in thy sight?] By granting the prayer which he made at his first call to this office (Exod. iii. 2, iv. 10).

That thou layest the burden of all this people upon me?]
And the author of the Book of Wisdom speaks (see xxvii. 26). And the author of the Book of (see xxvii. 26).

Ver. 12. Have I conceived all this people?] Have I begotten them?] Are they my children, that I should make provision for the satisfaction of all their desires? Carry them in thy bosom, &c.] Take a tender care of them, as a parent doth of a little infant, and conduct them into Canaan, &c. Nothing can more deeply express the affection that princes ought to have for their people; and the love of a faithful servant to the will of God, than this Divine command to Moses.
Ver. 13. Whence should I have flesh to give unto all this people? for they weep unto me, saying,
Give us flesh, that we may eat.
And if thou deal thus with me, kill me, I layest the burden of all this people upon me?
12 Have I conceived all this people? Have I begotten them? And thou shouldest say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom, as a nursing father beareth the sucking child, unto the land which thou swarest unto their fathers?
13 Whence should I have flesh to give unto all this people? for they weep unto me, saying,
Give us flesh, that we may eat.
14 I am not able to bear all this people alone, because it is too heavy for me.
15 And if thou deal thus with me, kill me, I pray thee, out of hand, if I have found favour in thy sight; and let me not see my wretchedness.

16 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Gather unto me seventy men of the elders of Israel, whom thou knowest to be the elders of the people, and officers over them; and bring them unto the tabernacle of the congregation, that they may stand there with thee.

17 And I will come down and talk with thee there: and I will take of the spirit which is upon thee, and will put it upon them; and they shall bear the burden of the people with thee, that thou bear it not thyself alone.

Ver. 15. If thou deal thus with me.] If thou leavest me still alone in this office.

Kill me, I pray thee, out of hand.] I shall take it for the greatest kindness to be taken immediately out of the world.

Let me not see my wretchedness.] Live to be a most miserable creature. For to see wretchedness is to be made as to a cook (Psalm xxxiv. 48). And what could make such a tender parent as he was more miserable than their perpetual untowardness, together with the intolerable trouble it would give him to see heavy punishments continually befall them for their wickedness, and the enemies of God rejoice in their ruin.

Here is not the least sign of God's dislike of this expostulation of Moses with God; which seems not very dutiful: because the vexation this stubborn people gave him was really so great, that he had reason to desire to be eased of it: which, though he begged with much earnestness, yet, no doubt, with no less submission to the will and pleasure.

Gather unto me.] These words are interpreted by the Talmudists, as if the meaning was, that "they may be a Sanhedrin to my land;" i.e. a holy, perpetual, standing council, to endure throughout all generations. For wheresoever we meet with this word al "unto me," they think it signifies a thing to be established by God for all generations. The examples they allege of it are these: of Anah (Psalm Ixvii. 17), that he shall minister unto me in the priest's office, (Exod. xxvii. 41), and of the Levites he saith (Num. iii. 12), They shall be mine, or unto me; and of the Israelites (Lev. xxv. 55), Unto me the children of Israel are servants. The like is said of the first-born (Num. iii. 13), of the sanctuary (Exod. xxv. 18), of the altar (Exod. xxv. 12), the holy anointing (Exod. xxx. 31), of the kingdom of David (1 Sam. xvi. 1), and of the sacrifices (Num. xxviii. 2, see Mr. Selden, lib. ii. De Synod. cap. 4, n. 2).

Seventy men of the elders of Israel.] This number is generally thought, both by the Jewish and Christian writers, to be derived from the number of persons that came down into Egypt with Jacob (Gen. xlvii. 27), who, saith R. Bechai, were a kind of prototype of this number in future ages. For hence they were governed by so many elders when they were in prototype in Egypt, Exod. iii. 16 (where there is no mention indeed made of seventy, but he gathers it from what followed), and those were the seventy whom we find at the giving of the law, a little after they came out of Egypt (Exod. xxiv. 1, 9), who are called nobles, or great men (ver. 11). So that this number was not now first constituted; but rather continued and confirmed.

Whom thou knowest to be the elders] For there were many elders, out of whom seventy were chosen (see Exod. xxiv. 1).

Officers over them.] That is (saith R. Bechai) whom thou knowest to be of the number of those who, when they were officers in Egypt over the people, were beaten by Pharaoh's taskmasters (Exod. v. 14). Which word officers do not signify men that had any judicial authority; but only such as had an inspection over others, to see they did their work, and to give an account of them. But it is very likely they were persons of note, who had more than ordinary understanding and breeding, which advanced them to be inspectors of others. And therefore the Talmudists rightly observe, that the elders and officers here mentioned were, no doubt, men of wisdom and judgment; who knew how to use the authority that was committed to them. Viz. seventy of the Sanhedrin, Moses, their head, seventy-one (Exod. xxiv. 1). And it is not unworthy our notice, that about the same time (as he observes, sect. 13), that this number of seventy judges was here constituted in the wilderness, the great judicature in Areeagus was constituted among the Greeks, viz., in the reign of Cecropus, the first king of Athens, after the Egyptian flood: when, according to Eusebius, the people of Israel were brought out of Egypt. The Marmor Arundeliani indeed say, this court was erected in the time of Cranaus; but that makes no great difference, for he was the successor of Cecropes. We do not find of what number it consisted, but it is certain it was the highest πάρθω τῶν ἐν τοῖς Ἑλληνιστῖοι τῶν πρώτων ἰσχυρῶν, of all the courts among the Greeks. And is observable, that, as that court began about the same time with the constitution of this among the Hebrews, so they both ended in the reign of the emperor Vespasian; as the said Mr. Selden shows in that book (cap. 16, sect. 10).

Bring them unto the tabernacle.] That there they might be as were consecrated unto God; and that the people might know they received their authority from him.

That they may stand there with thee.] As those men who were to be sharers with him in his authority, and were like to him in wisdom, piety, and descent. So Maimonides glosses upon these words in Hilik. Sanhedr. cap. 2, where he saith, none were made members of the Sanhedrin but priests and Levites, and such of the Israelites as were descended from the noblest families; and quotes these words to prove it.

Ver. 17. I will come down.] In a visible manner (ver. 25).

Talk with thee there.] To declare (perhaps in their audience), that he appointed them to the office of being the assistant of Moses in the government.

I will take of the spirit which is upon thee, and will put it upon them.] He did not take away from Moses any of the gifts which he had bestowed upon him; nor did he diminish them: but conferred upon these men some of the gifts (which are here meant by spirit, viz., of wisdom, and judgment, and courage; with all others that were needful in a governor. This R. Solomon Jarchi illustrates by the comparison of setting up a room, at which many others are lighted, without the least diminution of its light (see further, ver. 25).

They shall bear the burden of the people with thee.] By this it appears it was the spirit of government which God intended to give them, that they might case Moses, by assisting him, with the same authority.
18 And say thou unto the people, Sanctify yourselves against to morrow, and ye shall eat flesh: for ye have wept in the ears of the Lord, saying, Who shall give us flesh to eat? for it was well with us in Egypt: therefore the Lord will give you flesh, and ye shall eat.

19 Ye shall not eat one day, nor two days, nor five days, neither ten days, nor twenty days;

20 But even a whole month, until it come out at your nostrils, and it be loathsomely unto you: because that ye have despised the Lord which is among you, and have wept before him, saying, Why came we forth out of Egypt?

21 And Moses said, The people, among whom I am, are six hundred thousand footmen; and thou hast said, I will give them flesh, that they may eat a whole month.

22 Shall the flocks and the herds be slain for that he had, to hinder or to appease such mutinies as now the people were fallen into.

'That thou bear it not thyself alone: But I will surely send thee to Pharaoh, and will utter my words unto him. And I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and multiply my一只手 over Pharaoh's servants: and Pharaoh shall not hearken unto thee. And I will multiply my powers in thee, and will bring out still more of thy people out of Egypt, and get thee into the wilderness. Then thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, The Lord hath shown himself great against me; for I am come out of Egypt: and go in peace.' (Deut. viii. 16, 17.)

Cornelius Bertram indeed fancies, that these rules of the law werebesides hundreds, fifites, and tens, not being sufficient for the business committed to them (though he likewise conceives they had some of their several families joined with them), God appointed these seventy for their assistance, to whom they were to bring all causes which they could not determine, before they troubled Moses with them (lib. De Repub. Jud. only.

But our learned Mr. Thornside, in his Rights of the Church, ch. 2, hath well observed, that those captains were to be in place only during the pilgrimage of the wilderness; for when they came to the land of promise, the law provided that judges and ministers should be ordained in every city (Deut. xvi. 18), who, if there fell any difference about the law, were to have an upper place, and to have the succession of Moses, and these seventy, for resolution in it (Deut. vii. 11, 12). For, as he judiciously notes in his Review, p. 69 (suitable to what is here delivered), they were assumed to assist Moses in his great office of judging the hardest causes; and, by that law (Deut. xvii. 8, &c.), were afterwards made a standing court resident at the place of the tabernacle, to judge the last result of all causes concerning the law, and to determine all matter of right not determined by the letter of the same.

Ver. 18. Say thou unto the people.] All that he said hitherto concerned Moses himself, in answer to his request. Now he tells him what he should say to the people, in answer to their complaint.

Sanctify yourselves.] Here the word sanctify seems to signify no more, but to prepare and make themselves ready to receive what they desired. So the Chaldee expounds it; and so the word is translated by us several times in the book of Jeremiah (ch. vi. 4, xii. 3, li. 29).

Against to morrow.] He seems at the same time to give in to Moses and satisfy them: for his setting the seventy elders before the Lord, and their eating flesh succeed one another. Or else, he immediately gathered the elders; and the next day the quails came for their food.

Ye shall eat flesh, &c.] You shall have what you long for with such vehemence, that it hath made you utter complaints against the Lord.

Ver. 19. Ye shall not eat one day. As they did about a year ago (Exod. xvi. 13, 13).

Nor two days, &c.] Not for a short time only.

Ver. 20. But even a whole month. So long (the Hebrews gather from hence) they stayed in this part of the wilderness of Paran; or rather, a little longer. For they came hither on the twenty-third day of the second month, in the even; on which, if we suppose the fire to have burnt among them (ver. 1), and that the next morning, which is scarce credible, they lasted after the flesh they had eaten; it was not by Moses, who promised they should have it; we must allow a little time for the constituting of the seventy elders; and suppose it was done on the twenty-fifth day, and that the next day the quails came (as we translate it), they were two days in gathering them: from whence, if we begin this month, it will appear they stayed more longer than he supposed.

Until it come out at your nostrils.] Till you be glutted with it, and vomit it up so violently, that it come not only out at your mouth, but at your nostrils. It be loathsomely unto you.] Which was both the cause and the effect of vomiting.

Because that ye have despised the Lord.] Forgetting all that he had done for them, as if it had been nothing; and slighting his servant Moses, as if he had turned it to a potion in their days of more persons than one in the Godhead. For these are the words of the latter of them, "Because you have despised (or rejected, as Onkelos) the Word of the Lord, for glorious is his majesty which dwelleth among us." For I cannot see how the word Menori can signify any thing in this place (which however it may do in some other), but a potion equal to Jehovah. And yet the anonymous writer against the Trinity (confuted by De Voisain), hath the strange, unaccountable boldness to pass it by with this silly gloss, Proprié de lege accipit potest, &c. "It may be properly understood of the law, which may be condemned or transgressed!" as if this could be called, "the glorious majesty of the Lord," which dwelleth among them. What will not men say or do to serve a cause?

Ver. 21. The people among whom I am.] Over whom I preside, as their governor.

Are six hundred thousand footmen.] Who were able to carry arms; besides women, and children, and slaves, and the mixed multitude; who in all may well be supposed to have made thirty hundred thousand.

And thou hast said, I will give them flesh, that they may eat a whole month.] i.e. How can this be? Which is a downright distrust of God's promise, if we regard merely the words, and do not consider that they were spoken hastily, and something inconsiderably, while he was in a tumult and was thronged by the tumult which the people made; for which reason a severe notice is not taken of it; but he only put in mind of God's eternal power (ver. 23). Which may make it probable, that they were only words of admiration, by such a provision should be made for such a vast number; and these uttered on a sudden.

Ver. 22. Shall the flocks and the herds be slain for... them, to suffice them?] In the Hebrew the words are, "If the flocks and the herds be slain for them, will they be sufficient for them?" That is, there will not be enough for a whole month; and so the next passage is to be translated, If all the fish of the sea be gathered for them, will they be sufficient for them? Ver. 23. Is the Lord's hand waxed short? thou shalt see now whether my word shall come to pass unto thee or not.

24 And Moses went out, and told the people the words of the Lord, and gathered the seventy men of the elders of the people, and set them round about the tabernacle.

25 And the Lord came down in a cloud, and spake unto him, and took of the spirit that was upon him, and gave it unto the seventy elders: and it came to pass, that, when the spirit rested upon them, they prophesied, and did not cease.

26 But there remained two of the men in the camp, 25 And the Lord came down in a cloud, and spake unto him, and took of the spirit that was upon him, and gave it unto the seventy elders: and it came to pass, that, when the spirit rested upon them, they prophesied, and did not cease.

26 But there remained two of the men in the camp, 25 And the Lord came down in a cloud, and spake unto him, and took of the spirit that was upon him, and gave it unto the seventy elders: and it came to pass, that, when the spirit rested upon them, they prophesied, and did not cease.

26 But there remained two of the men in the camp, 25 And the Lord came down in a cloud, and spake unto him, and took of the spirit that was upon him, and gave it unto the seventy elders: and it came to pass, that, when the spirit rested upon them, they prophesied, and did not cease.
camp, the name of the one was Eldad, and the name of the other Medad: and the spirit rested upon them; and they were of them that were written, but went not out unto the tabernacle: and they prophesied in the camp.

27 And there ran a young man, and told unrrly, that it made them decline the burden; as Saul did, when he hid himself among the stuff.

Eldad, and—Medad: We do not find the names of any other of the seventy elders, but only these two. Of their very names, there was nothing to advance this by the mother's side. And St. Jerome himself mentions such a tradition, that they were his brethren. But there is no certainty of this; nor of what others of the Jews say concerning them (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4, sect. 3).

It may be they are mentioned in honour of their virtuous modesty which made them think themselves unworthy of so high a dignity.

The spirit rested upon them As it did upon those who were about the tabernacle (ver. 25). Whereby God marked them out to be in the number of those whom he had chosen to be assistants unto Moses.

They were of them that were written, &c. Whose names Moses put into the summons, which he sent to those of our very learned fit to be advanced to this authority. The Jews (particularly Solomon Jarchi) say, they were chosen by the way of casting lots; and, according to their manner, they tell the story thus, in the place mentioned before in the Gemara—Moses, say they, was in doubt how he should execute God's command (ver. 16), because, if he did not choose an equal number of each tribe, it might be ill taken; and if he chose six out of each of the twelve tribes, they would exceed the number of seventy; if but five, they would fall short of it. He resolved, therefore, at last, to choose six out of each tribe, which, in all, were seventy-two persons: and in seventy schedules he wrote the name of elder, but the other two were blanks. Then mixing all these in an urn, he bade them come and draw: and to every one who drew a schedule, that had the name of elder in it, he said, "God hath sanctified thee;" but to him that drew a blank, he said, "God hath not chosen thee." And those two blanks, some of the Jewish doctors say, came into the hands of Eldad and Medad; who therefore, were left behind. The Talmudists, accordingly, state that Rabbini and Eira, in a passage of the Gemara, say, that when seventy of the seventy-two had drawn, two of them had blanks: whereby Eldad and Medad knew that the two remaining schedules had the name of elder in them, and therefore would not draw them, because they would not have the dignity. But they had no mind to be governors. Nay, the Talmudic gloss upon the forenamed place of the Gemara, saith, that when seventy of the seventy-two had drawn, two of them had blanks: whereby Eldad and Medad knew that the two remaining schedules had the name of elder in them, and therefore would not draw them, because they did not go to the tabernacle, to be advanced to the office.

And this was very proper, for the very same, Mr. Selden shows, is in other noted books of theirs. So that it is generally received, they were in the number of those seventy Moses, and said, Eldad and Medad do prophesy in the camp.

28 And Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of Moses, one of his young men, answered and said, My lord Moses, forbid them.

29 And Moses said unto him, Enviest thou Moses, and said, Eldad and Medad do prophesy in the camp.

which were chosen to be joined with Moses in the government (see lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4, sect. 7).

They prophesied in the camp. Which was a greater thing than if they had prophesied at the tabernacle; two old men of a brother's tribe, and seventy of the rest. But God that he would distinguish them from other men whosoever they were, and not want their service. The Jerusalem Targum relates what each of them foretold (for to that he restrains their prophesying), and what they both foretold but it is not worth the mentioning.

"There ran a young man. The Jews, who will seem ignorant of nothing, say it was Gershon, the son of Moses, who carried these tidings to his father.

Ver. 28. Joshua the son of Nun. From whence some conclude, that he was none of the seventy elders; though a man of a most excellent spirit. And indeed this is likely enough, he being to succeed Moses, and so to become the head of them.

The servant of Moses. Who ministered to him, as a constant attendant on his person (Exod. xxiv. 13.

One of his young men. The word one is not in the Hebrew, which may be translated "from among his young men," I. e. the rest of those that waited on him.

My lord Moses, forbid them. Perhaps he thought they could not have authority; not being at the tabernacle: or rather, that their prophesying too much lessened the authority of Moses; by whose consent, and in whose presence, the rest were joined to him; but these two, without his knowledge, and being absent from him, became his consorts in spiritual gifts.

This he thought tended to the diminution of his master; for whom he expressed a great honour. The two Targums say that they prophesied of the death of Moses, and the advancement of Joshua to be the leader of God's people; which made Joshua the more concerned to have them suppressed. But this is like the rest of their conceits; several of which are mentioned by Mr. Selden in the place before named, sect. 9.

Ver. 29. Moses said unto him, Enviest thou for my sake? This shows that Joshua thought it a disapprobation unto Moses, that they should have the gift of prophecy bestowed on them, and be no way involved to Moses for it; as the others were, who were brought by him to the tabernacle, where he presented them to God, as men fit to partake of it; but these two seemed to have no dependence on him for what they received.

Would God that all the Lord's people were prophets. This shows also that the gift of prophecy was a distinct thing from the gift of government; for he did not wish they might all be made rulers; than which nothing could have been more absurd.

That the Lord would put his spirit upon them. That they might all break forth, by his inspiration, into his praises; which is a high demonstration of that most excellent spirit that dwelt in Moses; which had nothing of envy, pride, or vain-glory in it: for he sought not himself in the least, but purely the glory of God, and the good of his people; which admirable spirit durst not to have been common to all Christians, when he saith (ch. iv. 5). "Do ye think that the Scripture saith in vain, The spirit that dwelleth in us is lustful to envy? But he giveth more grace."
CHAPTER XI.

for my sake! would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his spirit upon them!

30 And Moses gat him into the camp, and he and the elders of Israel.

31 ¶ And there went forth a wind from the Lord, and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp, as it were a day's journey on this side, and as it were a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, and as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth.

Where doth the Scripture (by which word the apostles commonly mean the Old Testament) say anything like this, unless it be in this place! the sense of which is fully explained by James L. Witius well explains this meaning. "Doth that spirit, whereby we are regenerated and governed, move us to envy or any such like vicious desire? No, far from that; it giveth greater grace, and make us rejoice in the good of our neighbours," &c., as Moses did, when he said, "Doth thou envy for my sake? and thereby excite me to the work of God," Is. xlv. 3. It is suitable to the Spirit that is in us! which I wish God would bestow upon all his people. This agrees with what St. James saith, "But he giveth more grace" (Miscell. Sacr. lib. i. cap. 18, n. 27).

Ver. 30. Moses gat him into the camp.] From the tabernacle where the elders had been presented unto God, and endowed with his spirit (loc. cit.). That they might exercise their authority jointly with him. And there, I suppose, Eldad and Medad were assumed into the same authority; for we do not read that they were brought to the tabernacle: being sufficiently approved by God in the camp.

Ver. 31. There went forth a wind from the Lord.] At Uzzerath (it is likely) of Moses and the elders, who promised the people flesh enough, a mighty wind of an extraordinary force was raised beyond the common course of nature. The Psalmist informs us from what quarter this wind blew, when he saith (Psalm Ixxxviii. 26), "He caused the east wind to blow in the heaven, and by his power he brought in the south wind," which some understand, as if sometimes an east wind blew, and sometimes a south: that these quails (as we call them) might be brought from several coasts. But the Hebrews wanting compound words, make use of these two words, to express that which we call a south-east wind. Or, as Bochart will have it, the Hebrew word kaddin, which properly signifies the south, but where they say kaddin is by the LXX. often so translated; of which he gives a great many instances. And therefore the Psalmist (as the manner of the Hebrew language is) repeats the same thing in other words (see Hierozoic, par. ii. lib. i. cap. 15). And so the famous Ludolphus, both in this commentary upon his Ethiopic History, and his Dissertation De Locustis, saith, they were brought in by a south wind blowing from all points of that quarter.

Brought quails.] Nobody, that I have met withal, hath laboured so much to give a clear explication of this whole following discourse as Job Ludolphus, in his most learned commentary upon his Ethiopic History, lib. i. cap. 13, n. 96, where he hath a long discourse (to which I refer the reader) to show that the Hebrews do not take the word selau (here used) to signify quails; but we take that translation of it only from Josephus (see what I have noted on Exod. xvi. 13).

The no less learned Boer, indeed, hath said a great deal to justify Josephus; and hath shewn how Egypt and the neighbouring regions abound still with quails, and that from whence this wind blew fair to bring them to the Hebrews. And every one knows that there are certain winds called Ornithias, from their bringing great flights of birds along with them. Quails also, he ob-
NUMBERS.

32 And the people stood up all that day, and all that night, and all the next day, and they gathered the quails: he that gathered least gathered ten homers: and they spread them all abroad for themselves round about the camp.

33 And while the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was chewed, the wrath of the Lord

Bochartus) on all sides. But that which would have been a most miraculous, if we understood it of quails, will be found less wonderful, or rather natural, if it be understood of locusts: who come in very great and thick clouds, which darken the sky; as all authors tell us (see Ludolphus, Comment. in Histor. Ethiop. p. 188).

Two cubits high] This interpreters look upon as impossible: for then the quails would have been choked any sparrow; if they had been heaped so deep one upon another. And therefore they have devised the addition of a new word; and refer this, not to their falling upon the ground, but to their flying in the air, two cubits high above the earth; that so they might the more easily be taken by their hands. So the Jews and so Val. Schindler in his Lexicon upon the word所说的, therefore it is better to explain it of locusts, who, though they fall one upon another to a great depth, are not thereby suffocated, by reason of the length of their feet, and the thinness of their wings.

Ver. 32. The people stood up (or rather, rose up) all that day.] They were intent upon the gathering of them for thirty-six hours.

They gathered the quails.] By this it is evident that they were something lying upon the ground, and not flying in the air; for we do not gather things there but take or catch them.

He that gathered least] viz. The master of every family for himself, and for those belonging to him. For we are not to suppose that every man in Israel gathered so many as follows:--

A vast quantity if they were quails; which would have served them, not for a month, but for a year or two, as Ludolphus observes (p. 190, of his Commentary on his Ethiopic Hist.), besides, we do not use to measure fowls, but to number them. And therefore Bochart, being sensible of this impropriety, takes the word homer here to signify a heap; which is confuted by Ludolphus in his Dissertation De Locustis (par. ii. cap. 49, 50). Gathered ten homers: or, therefore it is better to explain it of locusts, which are always in vast quantities.

They spread them all abroad] This is another plain indication that they were locusts; which they spread to be dried in the sun: but if they had been quails would have been very preposterous; for it would have made them the sooner stink. Interpreters therefore commonly pass by this, and give no account why they spread them abroad: and the Vulgar Latin omit this word spread: whereas all authors tell us, this is the principal way of preparing locusts, and preserving them for a month or more: which they boiled, or otherwise made fit to eat, when they had occasion (see Ludolphus in his formentioned Commentary, and in his defence of it lately in his Dissertation De Locustis, par. ii. cap. 97, 98, &c.).

was kindled against the people, and the Lord smote the people with a very great plague.

34 And he called the name of that place Kibroth-hattaavah: because there they buried the people that lusted.

35 And the people journeyed from Kibroth-hattaavah unto Hazeroth; and at the door of Hazeroth.

Ver. 33. While the flesh was yet between their teeth,] While they were eating: and therefore were in good health, and had a good stomach.

Ere it was chewed,] Before they had swallowed it. The wrath of the Lord was kindled against the people.] They felt unexpected effects of God's displeasure; being taken, perhaps, with a sudden vomiting, of which they died (ver. 30). This was the conclusion of the month; for so long (he there saith) so they were at this murmuring.

The Lord smote the people with a very great plague.] He sent a pestilence among them, as Eben Ezra supposes; or, as others think, they wasted away in a consumption: the vomiting, perhaps, continuing so that they could never retain any meat, till they died. This they gather from Ps. cvi. 15, where the Psalmist saith, "He sent fire among them, that it might destroy them." But Bochartus and Monochius think he burnt them up with a fire from his presence, as at the beginning of this murmuring, ver. 1, where it is said, as it is here, "The anger of the Lord was kindled." But Bochartus grounds this chiefly upon Ps. lxviii. 21, where it is said, "A fire was kindled in Jacob;" which he refers to this story.

It may seem strange to some, that now they should be punished so heavily, when about a year ago they murmured for flesh as they did now; and he gave it them in the even, together with manna in the morning, without any punishment at all. But it is to be considered, that as it was a greater fault to fall into the same sin again, after God had been so good to them; and many other instructions from the house of God.

Ver. 34. Kibroth-hattaavah.] That is, the Graves of Lust: because their wanton appetites threw them into those graves; for there, as it follows, they buried those that lusted.

For there they buried the people that lusted.] Not all that lusted, for then all the people who were guilty of this sin would have been buried; but all that died of the plague, which was inflicted for this sin; who, perhaps, were those that began and headed this mutiny; or were most violent in it.

Ver. 35. The people journeyed] When the cloud was taken up (ch. ix. 17).

From Kibroth-hattaavah] From whence they departed about the beginning of the fourth month, called Tammuz.

Unto Hazeroth.] Another place in the wilderness of Paran: but how far from the former station, whether a day's journey or more, we do not find.

Abode at Hazeroth.] There the cloud rested, and accordingly there they encamped. But we do not read how long; only we are sure they stayed there at least a week (ch. xii. 15).
CHAPTER XII.

And Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses because of the Ethiopian woman whom he had married: for he had married an Ethiopian woman.

And they said, Hath the Lord indeed spoken only by Moses? hath he not spoken also by us? And the Lord heard it.

(Now the man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth.)

What men he thought good to be presented unto God, to be constituted by him his assistants in the government (ch. xi. 24).

Hath he not spoken also by us? Are not we also acquainted with God's mind, being prophets? For so Aaron was made (Exod. iv. 14, 15), and Miriam so acknowledged (Exod. xv. 20). And moreover the prophet Micah (ch. vi. 4) mentions them as conductors of the people, while they were in the wilderness, together with Moses. Which is the same as saying, Who can interpret, without the aid of the stomach, that he took no notice of them when he chose the seventy elders, who were to be his coadjutors, but did it of himself.

The Lord heard it. Observed their ill behaviour towards him; though he himself took no notice of it.

Ver. 2. Hath the Lord indeed spoken only by Moses? Here it appears that it was really Moses with whom they were offended; who alone had called what men he thought good to be presented unto God, to be constituted by him his assistants in the government (ch. xi. 24).

The Lord heard it. Observed their ill behaviour towards him; though he himself took no notice of it.

Ver. 3. Now the man Moses was very meek. This is added as the reason why he passed by the affront they put upon him, and why God avenged it; because he was so exceeding meek and patient (or, as others translate it, so humble and lowly), that he would have been exposed to further affronts, if God had not chastised their insolence. Moses also might think fit to set this down as a confutation of their charge against him, being so far from that pride which they imputed to him, that he did not resent (though he was so very much above them) their undutiful behaviour towards him; who had conversed immediately with God himself, and been with him in the holy mount many days together; who sent several commands to Aaron, as well as to the people by him, and made a difference between him and all others, that, as it was an accountable arrogance in them to equal themselves unto him, so he demonstrated how far he was from being proud of his superiority, by meekly bearing their haughty behaviour towards him.

So little cause there is for their cavils, who from hence argue that Moses was not the author of these books, because he commends himself in them; for this is not so much a commendation, as a necessary account of himself, to show how causeless their charges against him was. To such vindications of themselves the humblest souls may be constrained, by the calumnies of wicked men: as we see not only in St. Paul, but our bless. authors glorying and magnifying themselves by the malignity of their enemies (see John x. 36; 2 Cor. vi. 10, 25, &c.). And this is the more allowable, when men know, not only that they write the truth, but that it is notorious to all that are acquainted with them, and cannot be contradicted. The holy writers also are not to be confined to our rules, being moved by the Holy Ghost to set down such things, which, if they had been left to themselves, they would not have mentioned. And men, who have a due reverence to the Holy Scriptures, will look upon this rather as the Holy Ghost's testimony concerning Moses, than Moses's testimony concerning himself. But we have to do now with a generation of men that write upon

Vol. I.—75
4 And the Lord spake suddenly unto Moses, and unto Aaron, and unto Miriam, Come out ye three unto the tabernacle of the congregation. And they three came out.

5 And the Lord came down in the pillar of the cloud, and stood in the door of the tabernacle, and called Aaron and Miriam: and they both came forth.

these books, not as of a Divine original, but as they do upon common authors.

6 And he said, Hear now my words: If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream.

7 My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house.

8 With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and saying imports, if it had been usual for persons to be endowed with this gift on a sudden, who were never bred up in such a course as led to it. But to show how this came to pass, "one of that place answered and said (as it there follows, ver. 12). But who is their father? that is, this is no such wonder, who observed, that the word masor (the plural of which, masoroth, signifies looking-glasses, in Exodus xxxviii. 8) is a different word from march or march, which is commonly used for vision, and teaches us, that all the representations made in this way to the prophets, were only as the images of things represented in a glass; in which we behold the outward shape, or form of things, and yet they are not the things themselves, And so St. Paul seems to have understood this word (if he alludes to this place, as Grotius thinks he doth) when he saith, Now we see, διδο ύποντας, "through a glass darkly" (1 Cor. xiii. 12).

9 And will speak unto him in a dream. This was another way of God's revealing his mind unto the prophets, in their sleep; when they not only saw things represented to them, but also heard a voice. And both these seem sometimes to have been mixed together, or to have followed one another; as in Gen. xvi. 12; Dan. vii. 1, and viii. 16–18. And it is a maxim among the Jews, that there is no degree of prophecy, but it is comprehended under one of these visions or dreams. So Maimonides, in his More Nebuchim, pass. ii. cap. xxii, p. 48, thus expresses the thing, saying, These are the marks of prophecy: and so st. Paul seems to have understood this word (if he alludes to this place, as Grotius thinks he doth) when he saith, Now we see, διδο ύποντας, "through a glass darkly" (1 Cor. xiii. 12).
the similitude of the Lord shall he behold: wherefore then were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses?

receive my mind in either of those ways; and therefore is more than a prophet, having it communicated to him in a far more noble and clearer manner, which placed him in a higher rank than any other inspired person.

Who is faithful in all mine house.] Because he was intrusted (so the word may be understood) with God's whole family; that is, with all the children of Israel, and faithfully discharged the trust reposed in him, and, according to God's will, and according to all his commands; and doing nothing of himself (as now he was falsely accused), but only what God required. This is a high testimony to him; and the Jews, when they are in the humour of exalting Moses, say he was more faithful than the angels of the ministry: they are the words of R. Jose in Siphri; and they only had said, "the faithful at the angels of the ministry, it might have passed for a good explication.

Ver. 8. With him will I speak mouth to mouth.] In a most familiar manner, as one friend discourses with another. So it is explained, Exod. xxxiii. 11. From whence Abarbinel, in his Rosch Amanah, gathereth, that Moses's prophecy differed from others in this form: God spake with Moses, but he spake with the angels of the ministry; that is, with the prophets. The next is to the exclamation; and that is, he spake with Moses, not being his mediator (that is, as he explains it, by some angel), but to him by himself, without the intervention of any other. Secondly, that they never prophesied, but their senses were all bound up, either in visions or in dreams; whereas he was as perfectly awake, as we are when we discourse one with another. Thirdly, that they were only spoked to, that they were often weak and feeble, that they could not stand upon their feet, as appears from Dan. x. 8, 11; but Moses spake with the Divine Majesty, without any constellation or alteration; his conversation with him being like that of one friend with another. And lastly, no prophet but he could understand the mind of God when they pleased; for he communed himself to them, and spake in parables, and gave them nothing as a secret; the other had been his mediator (as the Rosch Amanah observes); and therefore, that he did not speak with the mediators of the prophets, as is supposed, or that he did not make the thing plain at any time resort to God, to inquire of him, and receive an answer (see ch. ix. 8). To the same purpose also Maimonides writes, in his book De Fundamentis Legis (cap. vii.).

Even apparently.] Plainly, clearly, and distinctly; so that there was no difficulty to apprehend his meaning: but to imagine that he did it from an impression upon his mind, he proclaims his name to Moses, Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7.

Not in dark speeches.] Or, in parables and enigmatical representations, such as the ladder which Jacob saw in a dream, the boiling-pot which was shown to Jeremiah, the wall, the plumb-line, and the basket of summer fruits which Amos saw; the beasts which were represented to Daniel, the lamp, mountains, taimina, horses, and chariots to Zachariah, the roll of the book which Ezekiel was to eat. By all which the prophet (as Maimonides observes, whose illustrations these are of these words), was given to understand some other thing, which was intended to be made known to him by these figures (More Nevochin. par. ii. cap. 43); who, in his book concerning the Foundations of the Law, further observes, that some of these prophets had both the parable (as he calls it) and its interpretation represented to them; others, the parable only without any exposition; and to some was only delivered the explication.

The similitude of the Lord shall he behold.] I am apt to think the word not should be here again repeated (as it must be in some places to make out the sense; as Prov. xxv. 27), which will make the meaning plainly this, "He shall not behold the Lord in similitudes and resemblances," as other prophets did. For the Hebrew word temunah signifies the shape of a thing represented either to the outward senses or to the imagination, not the thing itself. Therefore it would be to equal Moses with the rest of the prophets to say he should see the similitude of the Lord; for so did they. Amos, for instance, saith he "saw the Lord standing upon the altar" (ch. ix. 1), that is, some angelfical appearance, in a glorious shape. And Elisha saith, that "God spake with him, and he passed before him, the form (or aspect) whereof he could not discern;" only the temunah (we render it an image) "was before his eyes" (Job iv. 15, 16). But God did not thus reveal himself to Moses by images and similitudes of things, but spake to him himself, as it goes before, mouth to mouth. Which led Maimonides into the opinion (which he often repeats) that when God is said to speak to any other man, it was by an angel; and that he never spake to any one himself, but only to Moses. Nor did any man before him say that God spake to him, or that he sent him on a message unto others; but Moses was the first who had this honour (More Nevochin. par. i. cap. 63, and par. ii. cap. 39).

But if we follow our translation, which should run thus, "But the similitude of the Lord shall he behold," it relates to that wonderful apparition of God to him in the bush (Exod. iii. 6), as Maimonides thinks, More Nevochin. par. i. cap. 5, where he saith, "God poured upon him as much as he could contain," but especially in that respect, in which God made of himself to him, when he told him that he could not see his face, but should behold his back parts (Exod. xxxiii. 20, 23), which was a privilege granted to none but him. And thus the similitude of the Lord, or his likeness, signifies the Lord himself (Ps. xlvii. ult.). "When thy likeness shall awake that is, thou thyself appear for me," I shall be satisfied.

Wherefore then were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses? [Who is my prime minister, employed by me in the highest services.

Ver. 9. The anger of the Lord was kindled.] As appeared by what follows.

He departed.] He withdrew his presence from the door of the tabernacle, immediately before they could make an answer: which was a token of exceeding great displeasure; as it is in us when we will not so much as hear what men say for themselves, when they have highly and notoriously offended us, and we reprove them for it, but turn away from them.

Ver. 10. The cloud departed from off the tabernacle.] It was not merely taken up from it (as it was wont to be when they were to remove their camp), but quite disappeared for a time; or stood at a great distance from them, till Miriam was removed from the tabernacle, and carried out of the camp: for that was one reason of its departure; the Divine Majesty not designing to stay where so impure a creature was. And this was also a manifest token of God's high displeasure against them, which moved him to forsake them.

Miriam became leprous.] Or, "was become leprous;" a proper punishment for pride and evil speaking; which was not inflicted upon Aaron, because he was to be the judge of levitical matters; but was so in this case, it was not the first in the term of discussion. And besides, it is likely, God would not have one that was but newly made his high-priest become vile and contemptible.
nacle; and, behold, Miriam became leprous, white as snow: and Aaron looked upon Miriam, and, behold, she was leprous.

11 And Aaron said unto Moses, Alas, my lord, I beseech thee, lay not the sin upon us, wherein we have done foolishly, and wherein we have sinned.

12 Let her not be as one dead, of whom the flesh is half consumed when he cometh out of his mother's womb.

13 And Moses cried unto the Lord, saying, Heal her now, O God, I beseech thee.

White as snow:] Which was a mark of an incurable leprosy, when all the body was overspread with it (Job xxix. 16; Ps. lxxiv. 14; Ezek. xiv. 21, 22; xliii. 25; xlii. 1).

Aaron looked upon Miriam.] As he was bound to do; whose office it was to inspect it, and judge whether it was a leprosy or not (Lev. xiii. 2, &c.).

Behold, she was leprous.] He could not but judge her to have a leprosy, and consequently pronounce her unclean.

11. [Aaron said unto Moses.] He was made sensible that Moses had greater interest in God than himself, and therefore desires his intercession for them.

Alas, my Lord.] Have pity upon us, miserable wretches.

Lay not the sin upon us,] He supplicates him as his superior, and humbly begs his pardon; and that he would obtain remission of the punishment which they had justly deserved by their sin; for he was afraid he himself might suffer, as he saw she did.

Wherein we have done foolishly,] He prays him to look upon their offence as proceeding from folly and weakness, though in itself a great sin.

Ver. 12. [Let her not be as one dead, &c.] For so she was not only legally, being to be separated from the living, but naturally also; this being, as I said, the worst kind of leprosy, which ate into the very flesh, and made her look like an abortive (as it here follows) or still-born child, which had lain long dead, and was half wasted away in its mother's womb.

Ver. 13. [Moses cried unto the Lord.] Most earnestly petitioned the Lord for her; such was his meekness and piety. And his crying, perhaps, supposes the Divine Majesty to be gone afar off, if not out of sight.

Heal her now, O God,] For it was beyond any other power but his to recover her.

Ver. 14. [If her father had but spit in her face,] An expression of extreme anger, abhorrence, and contempt (Job xxx. 10; Isa. lii. 6).

Should she not be ashamed seven days?] She could not have had the confidence to come presently into his presence; but be ashamed for a great while to look him in the face.

Let her be shut out from the camp.] Much more is it fit that Miriam should avoid my presence, and not presume to come before me; who have set a greater mark of my indignation and detestation upon her.

For spittle might soon be wiped off; but the leprosy stuck to her, and made her unfit for all conversation with God or man.

14 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, If her father had but spit in her face, should she not be ashamed seven days? let her be shut out from the camp seven days, and after that let her be received in again.

15 And Miriam was shut out from the camp seven days: and the people journeyed not till Miriam was brought in again.

16 And afterward the people removed from Hazeroth, and pitched in the wilderness of Paran.

Seven days,] Which was the time for legal cleansing from such great impurities (Lev. xiv. 8; Num. vi. 9, xx. 8). After that let her be received in again.] I suppose she was presently freed from leprosy; but kept out from the camp so long, to declare God's displeasure against her; and to humble her, by exposing her to shame.

Ver. 15. Miriam was shut out from the camp seven days.] That her offence might be known to all, by her open punishment.

The people journeyed not till Miriam was brought in again.] For the cloud was gone which should have directed them in their motions. And besides, this respect, perhaps, was shown unto her because she was a prophetess; and hereby she had time given her to humble herself before God, and to beg his pardon for her sin.

Brought in again.] When one would have expected that such sacrifices should have been offered for her cleansing, as are required in Lev. xiv. But this was an extraordinary case; she being on a sudden miraculously struck with the highest degree of the plague of leprosy, and as suddenly cured by the same hand that struck her.

Ver. 16. [Afterward the people removed.] Which shows that the cloud, which departed from the tabernacle (ver. 10) returned again to it, together with Miriam, that it might guide them in their removal to another station; for till it was taken up from the tabernacle, they stirred not from the place where they were (ch. ix. 17, 18).

From Hazeroth,] After they had abode there seven days at the least.

Pitched in the wilderness of Paran.] Where they were before (see ch. x. 12), but now were brought into another part of it, called Rithmah; (ch. xxxiii. 18), which was called also by another name, Kadesi-barnea (ch. xiii. 26; Deut. i. 19). Or else we must suppose these two places to have been so very near together, that they might be said to have pitched either in the one or the other. This station was at the foot of the mountain on the south part of Canaan (Deut. i. 90), so that their next removal was to have been into the land promised to them, if they themselves had not hindered, by their renewed rebellion. This removal was in the fourth month of the second year after they came out of the land of Egypt (see ch. xi. 20, 35).
CHAPTER XIII.

1 The names of the men who were sent to search the land. 17 Their instructions. 21 Their acts. 26 Their relation.

And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
2 Send thou men, that they may search the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel: of every tribe of their fathers shall ye send a man, every one a ruler among them,
3 And Moses by the commandment of the Lord sent them from the wilderness of Paran: all those men were heads of the children of Israel.
4 And these were their names: of the tribe of Reuben, Shammau the son of Zaccur.
5 Of the tribe of Simeon, Shaphat the son of Hori.
6 Of the tribe of Judah, Caleb the son of Jephunneh.
7 Of the tribe of Issachar, Igal the son of Joseph.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. They being now come to the borders of Canaan, the Lord ordered Moses to exhort them to go up and take possession of it, and not to fear nor be discouraged; as we read in Deut. i. 21. But the people (out of a distrust of God's power, as Moses seems to intimate, Deut. ix. 23) desired they might first send some to come out the land, before they attempted its conquest (Deut. i. 22). About which, it is likely, Moses consulted the Divine Majesty, who gave them leave to do so.

Ver. 2. Send thou men.] For their greater satisfaction, God ordered them to have their desire. For there seems to have been a general fear upon them (though we are only informed of these heads, Deut. i. 22) which could not be removed, but by sending some to bring them intelligence what kind of country it was, and what people they had to deal withal (ver. 18—20)

That they may search the land of Canaan.] To make a discovery both of the country and of the inhabitants, and the best way to invade it (Deut. i. 22).

Which I give unto the children of Israel.] To the possession of which God now intended to introduce them. For he had already brought them to the confines of it, and bidden them go up and possess it (Deut. i. 20, 21), but they would needs make this delay, for a discovery of the condition of the country; which was their own contrivance at the first, and not a Divine counsel.

Of every tribe—shall ye send a man.] That there might be no suspicion or partiality in their report.

Every one a ruler among them.] Men of authority and prudence, who might be the more believed; yet not of the highest rank (for such are called by the name of princes, ch. i. 16), but rulers perhaps of thousands, who were very constant among their tribes; for they are called by the same name in the Hebrew, every one being said to be a rashi and a rosh, a leader and a head in their tribes; which may incline one to think that there were higher and lower persons of this sort, who had the same title in every tribe.

Ver. 3. Moses by the commandment of the Lord.] Which was given him in the sixth month (called Ab, as St. Jerome notes from the Jews) of the second year

8 Of the tribe of Ephraim, Oshea the son of Nun.
9 Of the tribe of Benjamin, Palti the son of Raphu.
10 Of the tribe of Zebulun, Gaddiel the son of Sodi.
11 Of the tribe of Joseph, namely, of the tribe of Manasses, Gaddi the son of Susi.
12 Of the tribe of Dan, Ammiel the son of Gemalli.
13 Of the tribe of Asher, Sethur the son of Michael.
14 Of the tribe of Naphtali, Nahbi the son of Vophsi.
15 Of the tribe of Gad, Geuel the son of Machi.
16 These are the names of the men which after they came out of Egypt: it is not certain upon what day; but it is likely in the beginning of the month, which answers to the nineteenth of our July.

Sent them from the wilderness of Paran.] From Kadesh-barnea (ch. xxxii. 8, Deut. i. 19, 20, ix. 23, Josh. xiv. 7).

All those men were heads.] So the rulers of thousands and thousands are called (Exod. xxviii. 29), as well as the princes (Num. i. 16). But these were a lower sort of heads, or great men, in the several tribes of Israel.

Ver. 4. These were their names.] There is little to be observed concerning this verse, and those that follow to the sixteenth, but that it is evident these were not the same men who, in the first chapter of this book, were called the princes and princes of the tribes; being inferior persons, who ruled over some part, not over a whole tribe. The three first tribes also that are here mentioned, sprang from the three eldest sons (for Levi did not make a tribe in Israel) of Jacob: but, in the enumeration of the rest, there is not any order observed, of which I can give an account. Perhaps they being to disperse themselves, when they entered the country they were to search (see ver. 29), and thinking it not prudent to go above two (at the most) in company, cast lots who should be associated; and the first lot fell to those of the tribes of Reuben and Simeon; the next to those of Judah and Issachar; and so to the rest.

Ver. 11. Of the tribe of Joseph.] i.e. Of the other branch of Joseph's family, viz. of the tribe of Manasseh, as it here follows.

Ver. 16. These are the names.] He would have their names remembered (which is the reason of this remark), for the sake of those two worthy men, Caleb and Joshua, whose virtue was very illustrious in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation.

Moses and Oshea.] So he is called, ver. 8, being named for the tribe of Ephraim.

Jehoshua.] He was called by this name presently after they came out of Egypt (Exod. xvii. 9), when he went to fight with Amalek: whom he having overcome, Moses looked upon it as a token that he should save and deliver the people of Israel, and then called him by this name: which imports something more than Oshea; for that denotes only a prayer for salva-Moses sent to spy out the land. And Moses called Oshea the son of Nun Jeshua.

17 ¶ And Moses sent them to spy out the land of Canaan, and said unto them, Get you up this way southward, and go up into the mountain:

18 And see the land, what it is; and the people that dwelleth therein, whether they be strong or weak, few or many;

19 And what the land is that they dwell in, whether it be good or bad; and what cities they hold that they dwell in, whether in tents, or in strong holds;

... (as menochius observes), but this carries in it a promise of it. And some think the addition of the first letter in the name of Jeshua was from the name Jehovah; implying that the Lord would employ him in leading and conducting his people into the land of promise: wherein he was a type of the Saviour of the world, the Lord Jesus (whose name is the same with this), who conducts those who believe on him to a heavenly inheritance.

If I could find the like comfortable signification in the names of these cities, I should think there might be some ground for their opinion, who fancy Moses chose Joshua because there was a good omen in his very name. For all nations took great care that no man should be employed in affairs of moment, whose name carried any unlucky signification in it. So Cicero observes, in his first book of Divination, that the generals of armies, and the censors, took care that none should so much as lead the sacrifices to the altar but who were bonis nominibus, "of names that signified good:" of which the consuls also were very observant, at primus miles flat bono nomine, "that the first soldier whom they listed should be of a good name;" such as Valerius, Salvius, Statorius, or the like. On the contrary, the name of Nævius was deemed so bad, that in his Oration pro Quinòm Sext. he saith, "having named the man, methinks I have said enough."

Ver. 17. Moses sent them to spy.] That is, when he sent them to spy out the land (as was said in the foregoing verse), he gave them the following directions:

Get you up this way southward.] This south part of Canaan fell afterward to be part of the lot of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 1—3), and was very dry, and consequently barren (Judg. i. 15), and therefore fittest for their entrance to spy out the land unobserved, being less inhabited than the better parts of the country. Besides, it was nearest to the place where they now were encamped.

Go up into the mountain.] Where the Amorites dwelt (Deut. i. 19), together with some Amalekites, and other people (ch. xiv. 43, 45). From whence they were to go down into the valleys.

Ver. 18. See the land, what it is; and the people. These are the general directions which he gave them, to inform themselves both of the country and of its inhabitants.

Whether they be strong or weak, few or many.] In particular, with respect to the latter, he directs them to inform themselves whether the inhabitants were strong-bodied or feeble; and whether their number was great or small.

19 And what the land is.] And, with respect to the former, he would have them bring an account; first, what sort of country it was, whether healthful and delightful, or unwholesome and unpleasant.

What cities they be.] And then how large their cities were, and of what strength.

20 And what the land is, whether it be fat or lean, whether there be wood therein, or not. And be ye of good courage, and bring of the fruit of the land. Now the time was the time of the firstripe grapes.

21 ¶ They went up, and searched the land from the wilderness of Zin unto Rehob, as men come to Hamath.

22 And they ascended by the south, and came unto Hebron; where Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai, the children of Anak, were. (Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt.)

Whether in tents, or in strong holds.] Whether they lived in tents, as the Arabians did (and the Israelites while they were in the wilderness), or in houses, and whether they were fortified. Or rather (as we would say in our language), whether in open villages or in walled cities: for so the word mahanim signifies, not tents (as we here translate it), but hostis or camps (Gen. xxxii. 1), and here towns without walls, as the LXX. interpret it; and the Vulgar, also, only inverting the order of the words, whether in walled towns, or without walls.

Ver. 20. What the land is.] And last of all, what is the soil of the country; whether rich and fertile, or poor and barren; and also, whether it be a woody country, or otherwise.

Be ye of good courage, and bring of the fruit.] In which discoveries, there being some hazard, he bids them bring some fruit along with them, that he may know whether they have done well in them; so that they might venture to bring away with them some of the fruit which the country produced.

Of the firstripe grapes.] Towards the vintage.

Ver. 21. So they went up,—from the wilderness of Zin] Which was on the south of the land of Canaan (ch. xxxiv. 3; Josh. xv. 3), being different from the wilderness of Sin, which lay near to Egypt (Exod. xvi. 1).

Unto Rehob, as men come to Hamath.] The city of Rehob lay in the north of the land of Canaan, and fell to the lot of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 28). And it lay not far from Hamath (which, in aftertimes, was called Epiphania), a city which we very often read of afterward, as the bounds of Judea northward; which Moses saith they had to enter into the land of Hamath (ch. xxxiv. 8). So that they took a survey of the whole country, from one end of it to the other, south and north; and also, as they passed along, observed those parts that lay east and west. For they gave an account of the Canaanites, as dwelling "by the sea (which was westward), and by the coast of Jordan," which was on the east (ver. 22). Or, if by the sea we understand not the Western Ocean, but the Dead Sea (as some do) ; yet it appears by these very words, that they bent their course, as they passed from south to north, unto the western and eastern parts also. For Rehob and Hamath both lay at the foot of Libanus; one to the north-west (towards Sidon), and the other to the north-east.

Ver. 22. They ascended by the south.] In their return from searching the country.

Come unto Hebron.] That is, some of them. For the word in the Hebrew is not they came (as it is they ascended), but he came; which demonstrats that they did not go all of them together in a company (for that had been dangerous, and might have made them taken notice of), but dispersed themselves; some going to discover one place, some another. And it is a probable conjecture of some of the Hebrew doctors, that Caleb was the man that went to take a view of Hebron; and was so little 23 And they came unto the brook of Eschol, and cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes, and they bare it between two upon a staff; and they brought of the pomegranates, and of the figs.

24 The place was called the brook Eschol, because of the cluster of grapes which the children of Israel cut down from thence.

affrighted at the sight of the giants there, that he was the very person that afterward drove them out; and had this place given him for his portion: for it was in the south part of the lot of the tribe of Judah; being formerly called Kirjath-Arba (Josh. xiv. 9, 12, 14).

Where Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai, the children of Anak, were.] These were the grandchildren of Arba (from whom Hebron had the name of Kirjath-Arba, i.e. the city of Arba), who was the father of Anak, whose family was more eminent than any other in Canaan; these three sons of his being men not only of great bulk, but prowess and valour. Bochartus thinks (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 1) that Anak signifies as much as the Roman name Torquatus; both these being clusters of grape-vines. And Ahiman signifies as much as, who is my brother? importing there was none to be compared with him. Sheshai he takes to be as much as Sixtius, viz. six cubits high, as Goliath was. And Talmai he derives from talm, "furnace," as if he seemed in length to equal a furnace in the field. These were the people that made the Israelites tremble, for it is likely their whole family was of a very large stature, though not so big as these. And, indeed, they were so very terrible to all their neighbours, that it became a proverbial saying in those countries, Who can stand before the children of Anak? (Deut. ix. 2).

Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt.] That place was honored of the great antiquity of their nation and cities: but Moses shows that Hebron was built before the capital city of their country: for so Zoan was; and called in after ages Tanis: lying not far from that mouth of the river Nile, which from thence was called by Plutarch ταντιτανος σεφυα. R. Solomon will have it that Hebron was built by Cham, one of the sons of Noah, and not by the Achaicus, whose name is Mizrain; from whom the Egyptians descended. But of this there is no certainty; and the Gemara upon Sota (cap. 7), saith, It is not likely that a man would build a house for his younger son, before he had built one for his elder; for Canaan was the youngest of all the sons of Cham (Gen. x. 6). Yet those doctors are willing to suppose that Cham built both these cities; and therefore interpret the word בנו וח was, which is translated built, as if it signified fruitful (according to Gen. xvi. 2), and make the sense to be, that "Hebron was seven times more fruitful than Zoan:" which is very foolish; as, upon other accounts, so on this, that Hebron was a stony place, and therefore not fertile.

Ver. 23. Came unto the brook of Eschol.] A place which lay in a valley at the foot of the mountain (Deut. i. 24).

Cut down—a branch with one cluster of grapes.] This was done, no doubt, in some private place, upon the southern borders of Canaan; just as they were returning to the camp of Israel again. For it would have been in the country too great an alarm, if they had marched in the highway with this bunch upon their shoulders.

They bare it between two.] A great many authors mention vine and grapes of an extraordinary bigness in those eastern and southern countries. I need only refer to Strabo, who says, the vines in Magarina, and other places, were so big, that two men could scarce compass them with their arms, and that they produced δεσμων δεσμων, a bunch of grapes of two cubits (lib. ii. Geograph. p. 73, and lib. xi. p. 516). Which is in part justified by Olearius, in his late travels into Persia, book iii., where he saith, not far from Astraeus, he saw vines, whose trunks were so thick, that a man could do no more than grasp them about with both his arms. And Forsterus, in his Dictionarium Hebraeum, p. 862, saith, there was a preacher at Nuremberg called Achaicus, who lived as a monk eight years in the holy land (as they call it), who told him upon his sick-bed, that in his time there were clusters of grapes at Hebron of such bigness, that one single kernel was sufficient to quench his thirst a whole day, when he was sick there of a tumpansy. J. Conradus Dieterius hath collected a great deal more to this purpose out of Leo Africanus and Nic. Radizivillus, and other authors, in his Antiq. Biblica, p. 219. And since him the most learned Huetius, in his Questions Alnetane, lib. ii. cap. 12, p. 24, where, among other things, he observes that Crete, Chios, and other islands in the Archipelago, afford bunches of grapes of ten pound weight, sometimes of thirty-six, yea, of forty. And he mentions grapes of a prodigious bigness in the island of Madeira.

Upon a staff.] See ch. iv. 10.

They brought of the pomegranates, and of the figs.] Which grew in the parts nearest to the place where the Israelites were encamped.

Ver. 24. The place was called the brook Eschol.] That is, when the Israelites got possession of the land, they called this brook (or valley) by the name of Eschol, in memory of this bunch of grapes, for so Eschol signifies.

Ver. 25. They returned from searching.] Came back to the camp of Israel.

After forty days.] This shows that they did not take a cursory view of the country, but took time enough to make their observations. And the ripe fruit which they brought with them, after they had been forty days from the camp, demonstrates that their return was in the latter end of the sixth month, very near to the seventh; that is, in the end of the year, according to the old style of that nation. For on the fiftieth day of the seventh month God ordered the feast of the tabernacles to be celebrated; a little before which they gathered both their harvest and their vintage (Exod. xxiii. 16, Lev. xxiii. 39, Ruth. i. 32).

Ver. 26. They went and came to Moses, &c.] They went up the mountain from Eschol, and came down on the other side of it to Moses and Aaron, and all the congregation (Deut. i. 24, 25).

Unto the wilderness of Paran, to Kadesh.] Unto the place from whence they were sent; which was Kadesh-barnath, which was Hebron 25:13, which is here in short called Kadesh; but is quite different from that Kadesh we read of afterward (ch. xxxi. 1). For that was in the wilderness of Sin; and they did not come to it till the fortieth year after they came out of 27 And they told him, and said, We came unto the land whither thou sentest us; and surely it floweth with milk and honey; and this is the fruit of it.

28 Nevertheless the people be strong that dwell in the land, and the cities are walled, and very great: and moreover we saw the children of Anak there.

Egypt (ch. xxxiii. 37, 38), whereas they were at this Kadesh in the second year; before they were doomed to wander forty years in the wilderness.

Brought back word unto them. Gave a public account before Moses and Aaron of what they had discovered.

Showed them the fruit. And at the same time presented to them the cluster of grapes, the pomegranates, and figs of the cluster, which they had brought with them.

Ver. 27. They told him. They address their relation to Moses, because he sent them (ver. 2).

We came unto the land whither thou sentest us. I suppose they chose some of their number to speak in the name of the rest: and, first, they give an account of the land, as he required (ver. 19, 20). Their report of the condition of the land was as honest as could be desired; for they testify it to be such as God promised to bestow upon them (Exod. xxxiii. 3).

This is the fruit of it. They prove what they say by a sample of the product of it: which was so large, that some of the Jews fancy there were eight men employed to carry this one cluster, as they say in the Gemara Sota, cap. 7. Of which the spies make this wicked use, as from thence to tell their brethren, "You see this goodly fruit, how vast it is: but believe us, the inhabitants of the country exceed us, and all other men, in stature, as much as this fruit exceeds all other of the same kind throughout the world." So Wagenseil explains the sense of their discourse in that place, sect. 4.

Ver. 28. The people be strong. This is an account of the other part of the inquiry Moses commanded them to make concerning the inhabitants and their cities (ver. 18).

We saw the children of Anak there. See ver. 29. All this was done to prove that the sons of Anak were as to represent the conquest of the country exceeding difficult, if not impossible. So they explain their meaning in downright words (ver. 31), and so the people understood them, Deut. i. 28, where these frightful people are called "the sons of the Anakims:" for they saw not only those three mentioned before (ver. 29), but others also that were descended from them; who, as I there noted, were gigantic persons. So the LXX. translate these words υπήρχοντας, and so the Chaldee; and so the Jews use the word Anakim, to signify giants; particularly Benjami Tudelenis, p. 3, of his Itinerary; where L'Empereur thinks it probable they were called Anakinis, a torque quod colla superbus eingenbat, "from a collar or chain which they proudly wore about their necks:" for the word Anak properly signifies collum torquere eingenbat (p. 136), "to overawe a chain about the neck." But it is evident they had their name from their progenitor, Anak, the son of Arba: whence he was so called we do not know.

Ver. 29. The Anakites dwell in the land of the south. This do not represent the Anakites as inhabitants of the land of Canaan: but they observe that they lay on the south border of it: where, if they went about to enter, in all probability, that nation (which were their early enemies when they came out of Egypt) would help to oppose them in their attempt as much as the people of Canaan. For that is their intention, in the following report, to show what a stout people they must encounter, which way soever they endeavoured to enter into Canaan.

The Hittites, and the Jebusites, and the Amorites. An account of all these see Gen. xv. 20, 21.

Dwell in the mountains. Which were in the entrance of the land of Canaan, on the south-east part of it. Particularly the Amorites, it is evident, were planted there, upon the mountains of the borders of Canaan (Deut. i. 27, 44). And many of them had made an expedition into the country beyond Jordan, where they had possessed themselves of Bashan and Heshbon, and all the land between the rivers Jabbok and Arnon. For they were a very warlike people, and, with a view of greatly increasing their own fame, those of them which were natives of Mount Sion, which made them the searchers of their land afraid of them; and bid their brethren consider whether they thought they should be able to dispute their passage with them: which they plainly suggest, in their opinion, they could not. For the Jebusites were another mighty people, whom, after the conquest of Canaan, they could not of a long time dispossess of Mount Sion. I need not say how terrible the Hittites were; for it is probable from thence came the word kithas, which signifies a fright and sudden consternation, as Bochartus hath observed in his Phælog. lib. iv. cap. 36.

The Canaanites. Those who were particularly called by this name; see Gen. xv. 20.

Dwell by the sea. It is certain that the Canaanites dwelt by the ocean called the Midland Sea, for they seem to have had their names from merchandising, for which that situation was most proper; and for that reason others of them were seated near Jordan. This, I think, is plain from Deut. i. 7. And, besides, the word sea alone commonly signifies that great ocean. Whereby it is further probable that the report which follows, upon the river Jordan, it is possible that by sea may be meant, in this place, the Dead Sea, or the Lake of Genesareth, or both of them; because they were near Jordan, which ran into them.

By the coast of Jordan. Where the Canaanites were also seated, as is evident from Deut. xi. 30. For there were both western and eastern Canaanites, as appears from Josh. xi. 3, and they are frequently joined with the Perizites (particularly Judg. i. 4), who were a fierce sort of rough people, that dwelt in the woody part of the mountains. So that the intention of the men who made this report was, to represent to the people, that whether they invaded the land by the southern parts or the eastern, they would find both strongly guarded by mighty people, much superior to them in force: which account, the following verse shows, put the people into a tumult.

Ver. 30. Caleb stilled the people. It is plain by this, that the people understood, by their way of speaking, countenances, and gestures, that the meaning of these men who made this report (which was not false in itself) was that though the country indeed was very rich and desirable, yet it was impossible for them to drive the inhabitants out of it: which put them into a mutinous disposition, as Caleb perceived by their looks and their muttering; and therefore stepped forth, before it broke out, to quiet their spirits with 31 But the men that went up with him said, We be not able to go up against the people; for they are stronger than we.

32 And they brought up an evil report of the land which they had searched unto the children of Israel, saying, The land, through which we have gone to search it, is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; and all the people that we saw in it are men of a great stature.

his account of the country and inhabitants, in which Joshua, no question, joined with him. It is not indeed here mentioned, because Caleb, perhaps, stood next to those who began to make a commotion, and therefore spake first: but he was seconded by Joshua, we may be sure; because we find him mentioned in the next chapter, and, in the first place, together with Caleb, as endeavouring to oppose the motion of the rest.

Before Moses,] The Hebrew phrase el mosheb may signify that he stilled them, as they were coming to work; but Moses in a sedulous manner, or quieted them so far as to make them hearken to Moses; or, as we render it, in his presence, when they were ready to fly in his face. One of the doctors in the Gemara before mentioned (cap. 9), saith, that Joshua being about to speak, they bitterly reproached him, and would not suffer him to proceed; and therefore Caleb thought he could not give them a manner of quieting them, and to call Moses this son of Juram, which looked like contempt of him; whereby he stilled them, and disposed them to listen to him. And then he said, "Is not he the person that brought us out of Egypt; that divided the Red Sea for us to pass through it; that gave us manna from heaven! What if he should bid you make ladders and climb up into the sky, should we not obey him?"

Let us go up at once,] Or, go up immediately, without a stop.

Possess it.] He speaks as if it were already their own (as indeed it was, by God's gift), and they needed only enter and take possession of it.

We were able to overcome it.] There will be no such difficulty, as these men represent, in the conquest of it.

Ver. 31. But the men that went up with him] The rest of the company that went to search the land; who, if they had not persisted in their unbelief, the people, perhaps, might have been perfectly appeased by Caleb and Joshua.

Now they open their minds more plainly, in their reply to Caleb, whom they oppose directly; and declare their opinion downright, that they were not an equal match for their enemies.

To go up against the people.] To beat them out of the mountains which they inhabited.

For they are stronger than we.] These men had no confidence in the grace and power of God, on which Caleb and Joshua relied; but measured all things by human strength.

Ver. 32. They brought up an evil report.] In the heat of their opposition, they now disparage the country which they had before praised (ver. 27), and also stretch their report of the inhabitants beyond the truth, and, as they say, the men of the country everywhere, as they passed along, carrying their neighbours to their graves (as the Hebrews tell the tale), this, which they should have ascribed to the providence of God, who sent this mortality, that they might have fewer enemies to oppose them, and that these spies might pass more freely, and less observed, they most wickedly ascribe to the badness of the air: which being very unhealthful to the natives, might well be thought would be much more so to strangers. Thus bad minds (as the aforesaid Gemara glosses well enough upon this story) turn which God intends for their benefit into their hurt. And if we had any better authority for this story, the word "achal" (which we translate "eat up") would well enough agree with it. For, as Maimonides observes, in the first part of his More Nevuch. (cap. 39), it is used in the Holy Scripture respecting any thing of consumption, destruction, or desolation: as here in this book, ch. xi. 1; Lev. xxvi. 38; 3 Sam. ii. 26, &c.

The people—were men of a great stature.] The Hebrew phrase is, "men of measures," אָדָמֹ֥שׁים אֶחָ֖ד בַּיָּמָֽו, as the LXX. translate it, "men of larger size than the rest of mankind." Which we have no reason to oppose to the many blander things words, and to call Moses this son of Juram, which looked like contempt of him; whereby he stilled them, and disposed them to listen to him. And then he said, "Is not he the person that brought us out of Egypt; that divided the Red Sea for us to pass through it; that gave us manna from heaven! What if he should bid you make ladders and climb up into the sky, should we not obey him?"

Ver. 33. There we saw the giants.] Men of greater bulk and strength than the biggest of those very great men (see Gen. vi. 4) which they spoke of in the foregoing words.

Sons of Anak.] They had mentioned this once before (ver. 29), and now repeat it again; because they were struck with such a terror at the sight of them, that they were always at their tongue's end. Just as Homer mentions, Τὼν άνάκτος ὢνοι καὶ Εξορνα, as Bochart makes the comparison (lib. i. Cannan, cap. 1).

Which came of the giants.] Who were descended from a gigantic race of men; particularly from Arba, who was their grandfather, as Joshua tells us, ch. xiv. 15, xv. 13, 14, &c., where he shows how Caleb drove these Anakims out of their cities, and made them fly to the Philistines; where there were some remaniders of them till the days of David. And of them, perhaps, fled into Greece; for there was a race of men among the Greeks called "Anthes;" who, Vossius thinks it probable, might descend from these children of Caleb (lib. i. De Orig. et Progressu Idolol. cap. 13).

We were—as grasshoppers.] Their fear magnified them above measure: though, no doubt, they were men of such an extraordinary height, that they might look upon themselves to be as small and contemptible as grasshoppers are compared with us. And such very tall men there are still in some parts of the world as Job Ludolphus observes, in his Commentary upon his Histor. Ethiopica, lib. i. cap. 2, n. 22.

So we were in their sight.] One of the Jewish doctors makes bold to call these men liars: for, though their fear might make them appear as grasshoppers, yet how could they tell, saith he, that they were so in the sight of the children of Anak? Here the Gemarists (in the place I mentioned above, cap. 10) endeavour to help them out, by continuing the tale of the great mortality which was then in those countries. Where a funeral-feast (as the manner was) being one day made under certain of their trees, which are very shady, the spies got up to the top of them, to hide themselves among the thick boughs; but the people below happening to look up, the spies heard them say, There are men got up into the trees, who look like grasshoppers. But there needs no such inventions, to defend them, when an hyperbole will do it; their plain meaning being this, that the Anakims looked down upon them with the utmost contempt.
And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants: and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight.

By all which it appears that they had not only a sight of the Anakims, but the Anakims also saw them, and looked upon them, it is likely, as they did upon other travellers; who were wont to come thither, either for their pleasure, or to traffic in their country; or in their way to other places; whom it was not their custom to examine strictly, whence they came, and what their business was; but let pass to and fro among them freely.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 The people murmured at the news. 6 Joshua and Caleb labour to still them. 11 God threateneth them. 13 Moses persuadeth God, and obtaineth pardon. 36 The murmurers are deprivèd of entering into the land. 36 The men who raised the evil report die by a plague. 40 The people that would invade the land against the will of God are smitten.

And all the congregation lifted up their voice, and cried; and the people wept that night.

And all the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron; and the whole congregation said unto them, Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt! or would God we had died in this wilderness!

And wherewith hast the Lord brought us unto this land, to fall by the sword, that our wives and our children should be a prey? were it not better for us to return into Egypt?

And they said one to another, Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt.

Then Moses and Aaron fell on their faces before all the assembly of the congregation of the children of Israel.

as Nehemiah saith they did, ch. ix. 17. For how could they get thither without food? which they could not expect God would send them from heaven, when they had forsaken him. Or how could they hope to find their way, when his cloud, which directed them, was withdrawn from them? Or hope to deal with those that might oppose their passage, if they hit upon the right way? And after all, if they came into Egypt, what entertainment could they look for there, amongst a people whose kings, and princes, and firstborn, had latelylished on their account? Nothing can be said in answer to these things, but that outrageous discontent will not suffer men to consider any thing but that which grieves them; and that foul ingratitude and forgetfulness of God's benefits, throws them into such contents.

Ver. 5. Moses and Aaron fell on their faces] To deprecate God's displeasure; which lately arose against them, upon a less occasion than this (ch. xi. 33), and they might justly fear would now destroy them all, for their incurable infidelity; as Josephus explains it.

Before all the assembly] Some fancy, that their falling down before them, was to beseech them to desist from their murmuring; and to trust in God, who would go before them, and fight for them; as he saith he told them, Deut. i. 29, 30. But falling on their faces being the posture of the most humble suppliants to God, and not to men (as all understand it in other places, particularly ch. xvi. 4, xx. 8); their falling down before the assembly signifies no more, but that in their presence Moses and Aaron humbled themselves deeply before the Divine Majesty; and prayed to him with the greatest earnestness to forgive them, and to bestow a better mind upon them. Which they did in their presence, to awaken them to consider the danger they were in by their heinous sin; that they themselves might cry to him for mercy. For the usual posture of prayer in that sa-
CHAPTER XIV.

6 ¶ And Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of them that searched the land, rent their clothes:

7 And they spake unto all the company of the children of Israel, saying, The land, which we passed through to search it, is an exceeding good land.

8 If the Lord delight in us, then he will bring us into this land, and give it us; a land which floweth with milk and honey.

9 Only rebel not ye against the Lord, neither fear ye the people of the land; for they are bread for us: their defence is departed from them, and the Lord is with us: fear them not.

10 But all the congregation bade stone them with stones. And the glory of the Lord appeared in the tabernacle of the congregation before all the children of Israel.

11 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, How long will this people provoke me? and how long will it be ere they believe me, for all the signs which I have shewed among them?

12 I will smite them with the pestilence, and disinherit them, and will make of thee a greater nation and mightier than they.

13 ¶ And Moses said unto the Lord, Then the Egyptians shall hear it, (for thou broughtest

Ver. 10. But all the congregation] The Hebrew words col ha edah, as I observed, ver. 1, signifies "all the great men; the rulers of the rest."

Bade stone them over the most holy place; which the cloud constantly covered, over the mercy-seat, where the Divine Glory dwelt (see ch. ix. 15).

Before all the children of Israel.] Both to fright them, as I said, from their purpose of stoning Joshua and Caleb; and to show his anger and displeasure at their rebellion, which, it is likely, appeared by the flashes that went from it. Ordered this to approach near unto it, Exod. xxiv. 17 (from whence, Moses said, the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, Deut. iv. 24), and thus it appeared afterward (Numb. xvi. 19, 42).

Ver. 11. The Lord said unto Moses.] In answer, I suppose, unto his prayer (ver. 5).

How long will this people provoke me?] Shall I always bear with their most unfruitful behaviour; which will provoke the greatest patience unto anger? How long will it be ere they believe me.] Most thou not see that their unbelief is incurable?

For all the things which I have brought] Since they continue in it, notwithstanding all the wonders I have done, to convince them of my power and faithfulness.

Ver. 12. I will smite them.] Send a pestilential disease among them to sweep them away at once, as the fifteenth verse interprets it (see Exod. xxxii. 10).

Disturb them.] And so deprive them of the use of the country which I promised to their fathers for an inheritance (Gen. xv. 7). This was not an irrecoverable decree, but a threatening which God changed into another severe punishment.

Will make of thee a greater nation] Fulfil my promise to Abraham, by making thee a father of a more numerous people, and more powerful than they whom I reject.

Ver. 13.] It is an abrupt kind of speech, proceed-up this people in thy might from among them;)

14 And they will tell it to the inhabitants of this land: for they have heard that thou Lord art among this people, that thou Lord art seen face to face, and that thy cloud standeth over them, and that thou goest before them, by day time in a pillar of a cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night.

15 ¶ Now if thou shalt kill all this people as one man, then the nations which have heard the fame of thee will speak, saying,

16 Because the Lord was not able to bring this people into the land which he sware unto them, therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness.

from the great disturbance which this threatening made in his mind; being as much as if he had said, If thou thus destroy them, the Egyptians, when they hear of it, will triumph; and thou wilt lose all the honour thou hast got, by the wonderful deliverance thou didst work for thy people from their bondage.

Ver. 14. They will tell it] Or rather, they will say to the inhabitants of this land, ï¿½the Canaanites, with their gods and their manner of life. For they have heard, &c.] The word for ï¿½is not in the Hebrew: and the sense will be more plain if we omit it, and translate the whole thus: ï¿½They will say to the inhabitants of this land, they have heard that thou Lord art among this people;ï¿½ that is, that there was a glorious token of thy presence among them.

That thou Lord art seen face to face.] And spaketh to us from Mount Sinai out of that glorious cloud, which there appeared unto all the people (Exod. xix. 8, xx. 1, xxiv. 16, 17; Deut. iv. 12).

Thy cloud standeth over them.] Num. x. 34.

That thou goest before them.] Exod. xii. 21.

Ver. 15. If thou shalt kill all this people.] Or rather, ï¿½but thou wilt destroy this people,ï¿½ as one man.

As one man.] On a sudden, with one stroke; as if they had all but one life.

Then the nations—will speak, saying.] Of which the nations that have heard the forenamed report of thy majesty will make this construction.

Ver. 16. Because the Lord was not able to bring this people into the land.] Because he whom he exalted was not able to bring his people into the land; which at last failed him, so that he could not complete what he had undertaken.

Which he sware.] Gen. xv. 17, 18, xxiv. 7.

Therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness.] Killed them all, before they came to the land he had solemnly promised to them; for that was an easier way than to make good his word.

The sum of this argument is, that it would be a great disparagement to the Divine Majesty if he now destroyed this nation; because his enemies would conclude, he had deluded them with false promises, which he wanted power to effect.

Ver. 17. Now,—let the power of my Lord be great.] That is, let it appear to be unlimited by bringing them into the land which he sware to give to them (ver. 16), or by pardoning their sin, which had provoked his high displeasure against them (ver. 11). For by power may be meant either that which is properly called by that name, viz., his omnipotence, which can conquer all opposition: or his mercy and clemency, in overcoming his anger, and bearing with an ungrateful people: which agrees very well with what follows; but both tend to the same meaning, that he would not destroy them, but bestow the land of Canaan upon them according to his intention.

And now, I beseech thee, let the power of my Lord be great, according as thou hast spoken, saying, 18 The Lord is longsuffering, and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression, and by no means clearing the guilty, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation.

19 Pardon, I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people according unto the greatness of thy mercy, and as thou hast forgiven this people, from Egypt even until now.

20 And the Lord said, I have pardoned according to thy word:

21 But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord.
22 Because all those men which have seen my glory, and my miracles, which I did in Egypt and in the wilderness, and have tempted me now these ten times, and have not hearkened to my voice:

23 Surely they shall not see the land which I sware unto their fathers, neither shall any of them that provoked me see it:

thus, "As true as I live, and that all the earth shall be (or hath been) filled with the glory of the Lord." For so the Egyptians themselves confessed (ver. 14), that the fame of it was come to them; and afterward he did many more wonderful things when he brought them into Canaan: unto which (if these words be taken in the future tense) he hath respect, when he saith, "as true as that he would in a most glorious manner subdue the Canaanites, not one of these murmuring Israelites should come into that good land."

Ver. 29. Because all those men. The sense would have been clear if we had left out the word because, as we might have done, the Hebrew particle ki being sometimes only an expulsive, or if we had translated it that, as it signifies in Gen. xxii. 17, and many other places. For the meaning plainly is, though the words be something intireate, that all the men of whom he is speaking should perish, and not one of them come into the good land.

Which have seen my glory.] Which appeared to them in the cloud upon Mount Sinai, and resided in the tabernacle.

Miracles which I did in Egypt.] Mentioned in the fourth, seventh, eighth, and following chapters of the book of Exodus.

In ten words.] Where he divided the Red Sea for them to pass through on dry land, and gave them manna constantly from heaven, with water out of a rock, which followed them whithersoever they went, &c.

Tempted me now these ten times.] That is, very oft, as this phrase ten times signifies (Gen. xxxi. 7, 41; Neh. iv. 12; Josh. xix. 3). But some of the Hebrews will not be satisfied with this explication, but endeavour to find out precisely just ten provocations of which they were guilty: though, to do this, they are forced to begin with one which fell out before they came to the Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 11, 12), and all the other nine they find in the wilderness (see Pirke Avoth, cap. 5, and Paulus Fagius’s Scholia upon it; with Genebrard upon Ps. lxxxviii. 46). Mr. Mede hath observed, that "to tempt God, in Scripture language, is to provoke him by some presumptuous fact to anger;" as it were, to try whether he will punish or not; or, in fewer words, to dare God (book i. Discourse 36, p. 153). And the following words in the next verse justify this notion in this Case.

Have not hearkened to my voice.] This seems particularly to refer to their disobedience, when he bade them "go up, and possess the land of Canaan;" notwithstanding, they would not go up, but rebelled against the commandment of the Lord their God (Deut. i. 21, 26, &c.).

Neither shall any of them that provoked me see it.] This is but an explication of the foregoing words, and might have been better translated, "even all that provoked me, (by their discontent and murmuring, &c., ver. 1—3), they shall not see it." This heavy doom was passed upon them on the ninth day of the month Ab (which answers to our July), as Moses Kotzensis reports the opinion of their doctors: on which day, they say, the two tribes and half tribes of the people were levelled with the ground; and Bitter, likewise, a great city, was taken on the same day, in which were many thousand Jews; who, with their king (as they called him) Ben Cosiba, and his whole army, were cut in pieces. And to make this day still more dismal, Turnus Rutilus, one of the Roman captains, ploughed up the ground on which the temple and buildings about it stood upon this very day (see Wagensen in Gemara Sote, cap. 7, sect. 10, annot. 6).

Ver. 24. But my servant Caleb. He alone is here particularly mentioned, because this is the first proof we read of his sincerity and resolution. But Joshua is as much concerned in this character and promise, whose faith and courage were tried, as soon as they came out of Egypt, by fighting with the Amalekites. And therefore there was no need to speak here of his integrity: though afterward it is expressly remembered, in the very same words used in this place concerning Caleb (ch. xxxii. 12). And here below in this chapter (ver. 30), he is assured of coming into the land of Canaan, and is well worthy to be joined in opposing the mutinous multitude (ver. 6), where he is named first in that heroic action.

Because he had another spirit.] Was otherwise affected (as we now speak), trusting in the power and promise of God, and not at all afraid of the strength of their enemies.

His seed shall possess it.] Or, as some translate it, "shall expel it;" i. e. drive out the inhabitants of that place, and the parts adjacent, as we read he and his brother did (Josh. xv. 13—15, &c.).

Ver. 25. Now the Amalekites dwelt in the valley.] These words being read without a parenthesis, in conjunction with those that follow, are very plain, being thus translated; "both the Amalekites and the Canaanites dwell in the valley:" that is, at present lie in wait for you at the bottom of the other side of the mountain. For they were not far from one another (ch. xiii. 29), and the Hebrews use the word jashok for any abode in any place, though it be not a settlement, but for a short time (see ver. 45).

To morrow turn you.] Therefore, do not go forward, as I formerly commanded you, lest you fall into their ambuscades; but face about, and return from whence you came, &c. This he bade them do to morrow, i. e. hereafter; at their next removal; for they did remain some days in Kadesh before they 26 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying,

27 How long shall I bear with this evil congregation, which murmur against me? I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel, which they murmur against me.

28 Say unto them, As truly as I live, saith the Lord, as ye have spoken in mine ears, so will I do to you:

29 Your carcases shall fall in this wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, which have murmured against me, turned about (Deut. i. ult.). And so the word to-morrow is used in Exod. xiiii, 14, for the time to come.

Get you into the wilderness] Into that wilderness which led to the Red Sea, and so to Egypt, whither they desired to return (ver. 3, 4). This command was so grievous to them, that it set them, as I take it, into a new fit of murmuring: which is the occasion of what follows in the next verses, 26, 27.

Ver. 26.] He now spakes unto Aaron, what he only spake to Moses before (ver. 11).

Ver. 27. How long shall I bear with this evil congregation] It is a short imperfect sort of speech in the Hebrew, such as men use when they are very angry: "how long to this evil congregation," i. e. shall I show mercy: which is the same with bear with them, as we translate it; to supply the sense.

Which murmured] Whom nothing will please, unless they have their own will in every thing.

I have heard the murmurings] This seems to signify that there was a new discontent; which, in all likelihood, arose, because God would not conduct them forward to Canaan: but bade them go back from whence they came: which order he tells them, in the following words, he would never revoke.

Ver. 28. As truly as I live, saith the Lord] This oath made what he had resolved unalterable.

As ye have spoken in mine ears,] See ch. v. 2.

So will I do to you:] Give you your own wishes, to die in the wilderness; which was exactly fulfilled (ch. xxvi. 65).

Ye carcases shall fall in this wilderness] He repeats his own desire.

All that were numbered] Which number was taken about half a year ago; as we read in the first chapter of this book (ver. 3, 18, &c.).

From twenty years old and upward,] Which amounted in all to six hundred and three thousand five hundred and fifty (ver. 48), besides the Levites, who were not numbered at this time, as we read in the next verse, 47. And when they were numbered, their number was not taken from twenty years old; but from a month old and upward (ch. iii. 15). And therefore, the Levites are not comprehended in the heavy sentence here denounced, no more than the children under twenty years old, or the wives of the men of war, who, with but only the men of war, who were above twenty years old. And accordingly we find Eleazar, who is mentioned at the numbering of the Levites (ch. iii. 32), alive at the dividing of the land of Canaan (Josh. xiv. 1).

Ver. 30. Ye shall not come into the land.] He would not have them retain the least hope of having this sentence reversed, but established by God's oath.

Concerning which I swear] Not to make these particular men, but the seed of Abraham inhabit it; as Grotius rightly observes (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 13, sect. 3). The land was promised by oath, not persons, sed populo, "not to persons, but to the 30 Doubtless ye shall not come into the land, concerning which I swear to make you dwell therein, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun.

31 But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despaired.

32 But as for you, your carcases, they shall fall in this wilderness.

33 And your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years, and bear your whoredoms, until your carcases be wasted in the wilderness.

34 After the number of the days in which ye people;" viz. to the posterity of those unto whom God swore to give it (ver. 25). Now such a promise, as he observes, may be performed at any time, because it is not tied to certain persons.

Save Caleb—and Joshua] They are excepted, because they had distinguished themselves from the rest, by their eminent faith and courage, in the midst of a perverse generation.

Ver. 31. Your little ones,] All under twenty years old.

Which ye said should be a prey.] He upbraids them with their discontented and distrustful language (ver. 3).

They shall know the land] That is, enjoy it.

Which ye have despaired] See ch. xiii. 33.

Ver. 32. They repents it again, to make them sensible of the certainty of it; and, in their own words (ver. 2), to humble and put them to confusion.

Ver. 33. Shall wander] So the Chaldee interpret what in the Hebrew is shall feed, or graze, as sheep do in the deserts. Or rather, after the manner of the Arabian shepherds, who could not stay long in one place, but were forced to remove their tents to another, that they might find pasture for their flocks. So R. Solomon interprets it.

Forty years,] Reckoning from their first coming out of Egypt; from whence they were brought into the wilderness a year and a half ago; and now are commanded to make up their time of wandering in it full forty years.

And bear your whoredoms] That is, the punishment of their whoredoms; as idolatry is peculiarly called (ch. xv. 39, Exod. xxxiv. 15, Jer. iii. 14), of which they had been guilty presently after they came out of Egypt, when they made the golden calf and worshipped it; and continued other idolatrous practices (Lev. xvii. 3, 7), which God punishes now that he visits their present rebellion. For it was not that alone to which he threatens this punishment, but he reckons with them for all the rest of their iniquities (Deut. ix. 18, 24), especially for the greatest of them all, which he declared he would not forget to punish upon any new occasion (see Exod. xxxii. 34), which they now gave him. It must be acknowledged, also, that other passages are called by this name of whoredoms in Scripture, as well as idolatry (Ps. lxxiii. 26), See Mr. Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 23, p. 499.

Until your carcases be wasted] This is the third time he reflects upon their foolish wish (ver. 29, 32).

Ver. 34. After the number] See ch. xiii. 25.

Even forty years,] Reckoning the time past, since they came into the wilderness, which was a year and a half: so that the meaning is, they should wander forty years in the wilderness before they got out of it. Which is not to be understood so precisely as to want nothing at all of it: for they came out of Egypt on the fifteenth day of the first month, on the morrow after the passover (ch. xxxiii. 9), and they came into searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years, and ye shall know my breach of promise.

35 I the Lord have said, I will surely do it unto all this evil congregation, that are gathered together against me: in this wilderness they shall be consumed, and there they shall die.

36 And the men, which Moses sent to search the land, who returned, and made all the congregation to murmur against him, by bringing up a slander upon the land, 37 Even those men that did bring up the evil report upon the land, died by the plague before the Lord.

38 But Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of the men that went to search the land, lived still.

Chapter XIV.

39 And Moses told these sayings unto all the children of Israel: and the people mourned greatly.

40 ¶ And they rose up early in the morning, and gat them up into the top of the mountain, saying, Lo, we be here, and will go up unto the place which the Lord hath promised: for we have sinned.

41 And Moses said, Wherefore now do ye transgress the commandment of the Lord? but it shall not prosper.

42 Go not up, for the Lord is not among you; that ye be not smitten before your enemies.

43 For the Amalekites and the Canaanites are there before you, and ye shall fall by the sword: because ye are turned away from the Lord, therefore the Lord will not be with you.

Ver. 35. But Joshua—and Caleb] Here Joshua is mentioned with Caleb, and placed first (as in the sixth verse), as Caleb was in ver. 30. Which shows there was no difference made between them.

Lived still.] This is set down to show God's faithfulness in his promise to them: who, I suppose, were now in the company of the rest of the searchers of the land, before the Lord, and had no hurt, when all the other ten fell down dead on a sudden; which made their preservation the more remarkable.

Ver. 39. Moses told these sayings.] Acquainted them with the doom which God had passed upon them.

The people mourned greatly.] Were extremely affected at the news: but did not beseech him to pray for them (as at other times, ch. xii. 2), because he had told them the doom was irreversible.

Ver. 40. And they rose up] Or, "but they rose up,"

In the morning.] The next morning after they were told what God had decreed against them.

Get them up into the top of the mountain.] They resolved they would go up; or they prepared themselves for it: for they did not yet actually go up; as appears by the following words.

Lo, we be here.] We are ready to do as Joshua and Caleb exhorted us, ch. xiii. 40, xiv. 9. They seem now to be forward, as before they were backward to go to possess the land: which their rising early signified.

Will go up unto the place which the Lord hath promised.] They pretend now to depend upon his promise, and to trust he will make it good.

For we have sinned.] Are sensible of our sin, and repent of it. Or, though we have sinned, yet we hope he will make good his promise.

Ver. 41. Wherefore now do ye transgress?] Why do you still continue in your disobedience to God; the commands you to return, and not to go forward (ver. 25).

But it shall not prosper.] You shall not succeed in your enterprise; which these words show they stood ready to take in hand.

Ver. 42. Go not up.] Though they sought the renewal of God's promise with tears (ver. 39), and now were ready to testify their repentance with the hazard of their lives, he would not recall the sentence passed upon them.

The Lord is not among you.] The cloud did not stir to conduct them; by which they might have understood that their attempt was presumptuous.

That ye be not smitten before your enemies.] Who, without God's help, would be too strong for them.

Ver. 43. For the Amalekites and the Canaanites are 44 But they presumed to go up unto the hill top: nevertheless the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and Moses, departed not out of the camp.

45 Then the Amalekites came down, and the Canaanites which dwelt in that hill, and smote them, and discomfited them, even unto Hormah.

Ver. 45. Then the Amalekites came down, and the Canaanites] With whom the Amorites also joined (see Deut. i. 44),

Which dwelt in that hill.] Who had posted themselves there, and possessed themselves of the top of the mountain (ver. 43, and see ver. 25).

Sinode them.] Having a great advantage of them that were climbing up the hill; from whence they came pouring down upon the mountain.

Discomfited them.] It is not said how great a slaughter they made of them; but it is likely it was not small, because they chased them a good way. Thus began God's threatening to be immediately fulfilled (that their carcasses should fall in that wilderness, ver. 20), by their own wilfulness.

Even unto Hormah.] A place in the confines of Canaan, near the Dead Sea: so called from the destruction that was here made of the Israelites, and afterward of the Canaanites (ch. xxi. 3; Judg. i. 17). And upon the occasion of this calamity which befel the Israelites, and the great mortality which followed, while they stayed in the wilderness, Moses is thought to have penned the ninetieth Psalm, in which he signifies the life of man was now shortened, and reduced to seventy or eighty years; that is, made but half as long as their forefathers.

CHAPTER XV.

1 The law of the meat offering and the drink offering.

2 The law of the first of the dough for an heave offering. 39 He that violated the sabbath is stoned. 40 The law of fringes.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land of your habitations, which I give unto you,

3 And will make an offering by fire unto the Lord, a burnt offering, or a sacrifice in performing a vow, or in a freewill offering, or in your solemn feasts, to make a sweet savour unto the Lord, of the herd, or of the flock:

comprehends all the sacrifices which were burnt upon the altar, either in the whole or in part.

Burnt offering] This was the principal, and most ancient sacrifice of all other; which was wholly burnt upon the altar, every morning and every evening. (Exod. xxix. 40) of which he treats in the first of Leviticus.

A sacrifice] This undoubtedly signifies peace-offerings, as appears from ver. 8, and from the words here following; and likewise from the use of the word sacrifice in other places (Lev. xvi. 13; Lev. xvii. 5, 6), and from this consideration also, that sin-offerings had no meat-offerings attending on them, but only in the case of a leper (Lev. xiv. 10).

In performing a vow.] These words explain what he means by a sacrifice, viz. peace-offerings; which were offered in performance of some vow, or freely of their own accord (Lev. vii. 16, xxii. 21); or by God's command upon their solemn feasts; as it here follows.

In your solemn feasts.] Mentioned Lev. xxiii. (see there, ver. 37, and Num. xxix. 39).

To make a sweet savour] Lev. i. 9.

Of the herd, or of the flock.] Under the word flock is comprehended both kids and lambs; for the Hebrew words tsen and zeb signify both; as many have observed, particularly Bochart in his Hierozoicon (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 42).
CHAPTER XV.

4 Then shall he that offereth his offering unto the Lord bring a meat-offering of a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of oil.

5 And the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink offering shalt thou prepare with the burnt offering or sacrifice, for one lamb.

6 Or for a ram, thou shalt prepare for a meat offering two tenth deals of flour mingled with the third part of an hin of oil.

7 And for a drink offering thou shalt offer the third part of an hin of wine, for a sweet savour unto the Lord.

8 And when thou preparest a bullock for a burnt offering, or for a sacrifice in performing a vow, or peace offerings unto the Lord:

9 Then shall he bring with a bullock a meat offering of three tenth deals of flour mingled with half an hin of oil.

10 And thou shalt bring for a drink offering half an hin of wine, for an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.

11 Thus shall it be done for one bullock, or for one ram, or for a lamb, or a kid.

12 According to the number that ye shall prepare, so shall ye do to every one according to their number.

13 All that are born of the country shall do

And as for wine, Brentius, in his paraphrase to Lovicetus, takes notice of that phrase in him, no less obvious, which they not only poured upon the sacrifice, as it stood at the altar ready to be offered, but upon its flesh, when it was burning there: as we find in Virgil, Georg. iv.

—ter liquido ardentem perfidit Nectanebam mamman.

And in many other places (see Dilhers, in his Dissert. Specialis de Caecezia Gentilium, cap. 10).

Ver. 5. Fourth part of an hin of wine[.] See Exod. xxix. 40. With the burnt offering or sacrifice, Whether it were a whole burnt-offering, or a peace-offering (ver. 3), this wine was wholly poured upon the altar; and the priest had none of it.

For one lamb:] It was the same for one kid. If there were more than one, the drink-offering, as well as the meat-offering, was increased: a particularly upon the Sabbath (ch. xxviii. 9). And the true reason why meat-offerings and drink-offerings are required to attend upon the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, was, because these sacrifices were a feast, and are called the bread or food of God (ch. xxviii. 2). And therefore, as bread and wine, as well as flesh, are our refreshment, so God required them at his table. And salt, though not here named, was also added (because it was to be omitted in no sacrifice, Lev. ii. 13), as also frankincense; because it is said both ver. 7 and ver. 10, this drink-offering was for a sweet savour unto the Lord; which seems to allude to the fragrance of frankincense.

This was a thing so well known, that the heathen imitated this practice, in all their sacrifices, which were ever accompanied with a meat-offering: insomuch that Pliny saith, without this mola salta, no sacrifice was thought to be good: “nullum sacrificium ratum fieri existimavit” (lib. xxx. cap. 5). And long before him we meet with it in Homer, in those known words of his, these things after this manner, in offering an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.

14 And if a stranger sojourn with you, or whatsoever be among you in your generations, and will offer an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord; as ye do, so he shall do.

15 One ordinance shall be both for you of the congregation, and also for the stranger that sojourneth with you, an ordinance for ever in your generations: as ye are, so shall the stranger be before the Lord.

16 One law and one manner shall be for you, and for the stranger that sojourneth with you.

Ver. 14. If a stranger sojourn with you.] There were two sorts of strangers, it is vulgarly known, among the Israelites: some that entirely embraced and professed the Jewish religion, into which they were admitted by circumcision, &c.; others that were permitted to live among them, having renounced all idolatry, but did not submit to their whole religion. The Talmudists expound this place of the former sort. One would think this should signify the other sort of strangers; but they make it only an explanation of the former: whether he was a proselyte that sojourned for a time, or were settled among them.

And will offer an offering.] Any of the forementioned offerings, which could be offered, as is here declared, may be offered, that was subject to their law. For though another proselyte, who worshipped the true God, but was not circumcised, might bring a burnt-offering; yet they say it was without a meat-offering and drink-offering; and no peace-offerings were accepted from him.

As ye do, so he shall do.] Offer according to the rules above given; which is farther explained in the following verses.

Ver. 15. One ordinance.] viz. About sacrifices.

Shall be both for you.] i. e. For you Israelites. Also for the stranger.] Here the LXX. translate it, προσκυνητος προσκυνητους αν εψειν, “proselytes that are added, or joined to you!” or are juris vestri particies, as Mr. Selden expounds it (lib. ii. Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2. p. 147).

An ordinance for ever, &c.] Never to be repealed as long as your religion lasts.

As ye are, so shall the stranger be.] In matters of religion and Divine worship, though not in all civil things: for no proselyte, they think, could be chosen a member of the Sanhedrin, or great council at Jerusalem. The Jews extend these words to the way and manner of being made proselytes, by circumcision, baptism, and sprinkling of blood; as the Jews were originally, they say, initiated into their religion (Selden, lib. i. De Synod. cap. 3. p. 34).

Ver. 16.] This general rule was made to invite and encourage strangers to become proselytes to the Jewish religion, and to engage the Jews to be kind to them, as much as to their own. Thus, as Philo calls it, an equal privilege with those who were born Jews. Yet this, the Jews say, is to be received with some distinctions; for the laws of Moses, either concerning the duties they owed to God and one to another, or concerning magistracy and marriages; they say, those of the first sort belonged to proselytes, as much as to their own; but those of the second sort they had not an equal privilege; for they were not to have any sort of command, either civil or military; and though they might marry with the Jews, yet not with the priests; and some marriages were permitted to them, which were forbidden to the Israelites (see there, p. 167).

Ver. 17.] These commands were given, in all likelihood, at the same time with the foregoing.

Ver. 18. Speak unto the children of Israel.] See ver. 10.

When ye come into the land whither I bring you.] See there also: only add this, that the Jews acknowledge such kind of offerings, as here follow, and first-fruits were due by the law only from the corn, &c., that grew in the land of Canaan; but, by the decree of their wise men, they were to bring them out of Syria, and out of the land of the Philistines, and the Moabites, and the Ammonites, and the Edomites, and the Ezion-geberites. They, therefore, gave them a privilege, by which they might bring them out of Syria, and so forth. But, as yet, the command is, that they should bring them out of the land of Canaan only.

Ye shall offer up an heave offering.] This is explained in the next verse, of offering a cake out of the first dough, whether it were of wheat, or barley, or rye, or oats, or that which they called cuscinim (which they describe to be a kind of wheat, or barley, different from that which is commonly known by those names); for of these, as of all sorts of grains, it is said, this cake was to be offered; and that out of the gleanings, and the sheaf left in the field, and out of the corners of the field.

Ver. 20. A cake of the first of your dough.] Not upon the altar; but it was given to the priests, on whom God bestowed all their heave-offerings (ch. xviii. 8), yet they are said to be “offered unto the Lord,” because they were heaved, or lifted up to him, as the Creator of heaven and earth; and then given to his ministers, who had it in his right.

As ye do the heave-offering—so shall ye heave it.] That is, as the first-fruits of the harvest were given to the priests, and not offered upon the altar, so should this be given them (Lev. xxvii. 16, 17); and so were the first-fruits of their oil and their wine, &c. (Numb. xviii. 12, 13). All which the Jews call the great terumah, or heave-offering.

Ver. 21.] This being a new law, not given before, he repeats it, that they might be the more observant of it: as we may see they were by this; that it was one of the things which rendered a man circumcised; and it was a great sin to treat the bitter water, if she did not separate this cake from the first dough of the new corn to be presented to God; but either made her husband believe she had done it when she had not, or ate it herself; as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 17, and therefore at this very day
CHAPTER XV.

And if ye have erred, and not observed all these commandments, which the Lord hath spoken unto Moses,

Even all that the Lord hath commanded you the hand of Moses, from the day that the Lord commanded Moses, and henceforward among your generations;

Then it shall be, if ought be committed by ignorance without the knowledge of the congregation, that all the congregation shall offer one young bullock for a burnt offering, for a sweet savour unto the Lord, with his meat offering, and his drink offering, according to the manner, and one kid of the goats for a sin offering.

And the priest shall make an atonement for all the congregation of the children of Israel, and it shall be forgiven them; for it is ignorance: and they shall bring their offering, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord, and their sin offering before the Lord, for their ignorance:

The Jews are so nice in this point, that they take enough to make a cake, as soon as the meal is mingled with water. The proportion is not mentioned in the law; but their wise men say, it was to be the forty-fourth part of the whole dough (see Buxtorf. Synagog. Jud. cap. 34). The cabalists observing that this verse begins with the letter mem, and ends with men, conclude (after their way), that therefore they were to take the forty-fourth part, because mem is the numeral letter for forty.

Ver. 22.] Which have been now given concerning sacrifices; for to such commandments these words seem to have respect. Maimonides, in his treatise of the worship of the planets (and the Jews generally), saith this concerns idolatry.

That all the Lord hath commanded] That is, all the commandments in the book of Leviticus, about such matters of God's worship and service.

From the day that the Lord commanded Moses] The word Moses is not in the Hebrew, and the sense is plainer without it, as the Vulgar hath translated these words, "from the day he began to command."

Henceforward] Or rather therefromforward, until now; or rather commencing with the Lord's command. So this phrase is used in Lev. xxii. 27, "From the eighth day, and henceforward," creatures were clean to be offered (see Ezek. xxix. 22).

Among your generations] In the Hebrew, "to your generations." And so the LXX. διὰ τὸς υἱόν του άνθρωπον, "to be observed throughout all generations."

That all the Lord hath commanded] That is, all the commandments in the book of Leviticus, concerning sacrifices. It is common, as Moses here speaks concerning sins of omission (as we call them), as in Lev. iv. 13, he doth of sins of commission, or doing that which ought not to be done; as here not doing that which ought to be done; for which different sorts of sacrifices are appointed. But others think that he speaks in both places of the same errors; only in that law (Lev. iv. 14), concerning those committed by the whole congregation, here of such as were committed by some lesser number of them, called the congregation; suppose the seventy elders, or the rulers of thousands and hundreds, &c., who are sometimes called by this name (ch. xxvii. 7, xxxii. 12, Josh. xxiv. 4). But the Jews generally think Moses here speaks of strange worship, which was to be expiated by this sacrifice of a goat for a sin-offering. And therefore an excellent person of our own, after long consideration of the matter, comes to this conclusion: that in Leviticus he requires a young bullock to be slain for a sin-offering, when the whole congregation, though adhering to the true worship, did many thing, which were latterly to do something against some negative precept (as they call it); to practise, that is, what God had forbidden (so those words seem to import, Lev. iv. 13, 11), but this kid of the goats here mentioned for a sin-offering, together with a young bullock for a burnt-offering, was to be sacrificed, when all the people, forgetting the holy rites prescribed by Moses, which often happened under bad kings), fell by a common error into idolatrous worship; which agrees very well with what is said in the two verses beforegoing; where he speaks, as I noted, of not observing these holy rites about sacrifices (see Dr. Outram, lib. i. De Sacrificiis, cap. 14, sect. 2).

That all the congregation shall offer one young bullock] Having neglected these laws ordained by Moses, and worshipped God in a wrong manner, according to the rites of the Gentiles; or rather concerning the breach of the law, by interpreting it erroneously (Rights of the Church in a Christian state, p. 159).

One kid of the goats for a sin offering.] To expiate for what had been done after the manner of the heathen, contrary to the laws of God's worship here delivered by Moses; or otherwise than he directed; from whence it was (which adds much probability to this), that when Hezekiah restored the true worship, and of God, after the temple had been shut up, and the daily sacrifice omitted, and many idolatrous rites there used, by the ignorance of the people, in the days of his father (2 Chron. xxviii. 21, xxix. 3), he caused seven bullocks to be offered for a burnt-offering; and as many goats for a sin-offering; and so Ezra did at the restoration of the Jewish service, when they came out of Babylon (Ezra viii. 35). And it makes no difference, that Moses here requires only one of a sort to be offered, whereas Hezekiah offered seven, and Ezra twelve; for this only proves that one was absolutely necessary, but more than one was acceptable; especially when exceeding great errors had been committed by the people. Ver. 25. The priest shall make an atonement] Without he had committed an error in the worship of God out of ignorance: being misled by the great interpreters of the law; who therefore were to bring this sacrifice in the name of them all. For it is apparent by this, as well as the former verse, that all the congregation were concerned in this sacrifice, as much as in that Lev. iv. 12. And the same appears from the next verse, where he saith, "all the people were in ignorance."

It shall be forgiven them.] Proceeding from an erroneous interpretation of the law, or some other mistake; not from contempt of God and of his laws: for then they were to be utterly cut off (ver. 30, 31).

A sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord.] That is, a burnt-offering: which is not prescribed in Leviticus 26 And it shall be forgiven all the congregation of the children of Israel, and the stranger that sojourneth among them; seeing all the people were in ignorance.

27 ¶ And if any soul sin through ignorance, then he shall bring a she goat of the first year for a sin offering.

28 And the priest shall make an atonement for the soul that sinneth ignorantly, when he sinneth by ignorance before the Lord, to make an atonement for him; and it shall be forgiven him.

29 Ye shall have one law for him that sinneth through ignorance, both for him that is born among the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them.

30 ¶ But the soul that doeth ought presumptuously, whether he be born in the land, or a stranger, the same reproacheth the Lord; and that soul shall be cut off from among his people.

The word "stranger" is simply used, without the addition of that sojourneth among them (as in the preceding verse), and therefore Mr. Selden well concludes, that even the proselytes of the gate were concerned in this law, and is of a tied and contempt of his deity), though not in the foregoing; and that they were liable to be cut off by the hand of Heaven; but whether to be punished by the judges or not, it doth not appear (lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 11).

"The same reproacheth the Lord." "No man sinned thus (saith Maimonides in the place forenamed), but he who had become a stranger, committed such an act as is contrary to the law of God; in which he disserted from it. And the common received exposition of this place is, that it speaks of an idolater; because he opposed the chief and principal foundation of the law. For no man worshipped a star or a planet, but he that believed its eternity: which is the most repugnant of all other things to the law of God; which, in the very first words of it, declares, that all the world had a beginning, and was made by Him whom the Jews worshipped." Thus he. But doing any thing with a high hand doth not signify any one certain kind of sin, as the Jews generally fancy (who think he speaks here only of an idolater or blasphemer: see Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 6, p. 101), but a certain manner of sinning, with which belief its eternity: which is the most repugnant of all other things to the law of God; which, in the very first words of it, declares, that all the world had a beginning, and was made by Him whom the Jews worshipped." Thus he. But doing any thing with a high hand doth not signify any one certain kind of sin, as the Jews generally fancy (who think he speaks here only of an idolater or blasphemer: see Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 6, p. 101), but a certain manner of sinning, with which belief its eternity: which is the most repugnant of all other things to the law of God; which, in the very first words of it, declares, that all the world had a beginning, and was made by Him whom the Jews worshipped." Thus he. But doing any thing with a high hand doth not signify any one certain kind of sin, as the Jews generally fancy (who think he speaks here only of an idolater or blasphemer: see Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 6, p. 101), but a certain manner of sinning, with which belief its eternity: which is the most repugnant of all other things to the law of God; which, in the very first words of it, declares, that all the world had a beginning, and was made by Him whom the Jews worshipped." Thus he. But doing any thing with a high hand doth not signify any one certain kind of sin, as the Jews generally fancy (who think he speaks here only of an idolater or blasphemer: see Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 6, p. 101), but a certain manner of sinning, with which 31 Because he hath despised the word of the Lord, and hath broken his commandment, that soul shall utterly be cut off; his iniquity shall be upon him.

32 ¶ And while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man that gathered sticks upon the sabbath day.

33 And they that found him gathering sticks dan, contrary to God's law, as was imagined, all the rest of the tribes of Israel gathered together, to go up to war against them, and cut them off, Josh. xxii. 11, 12, &c., 23, 23, where they acknowledged they desecrated the sabbath for worship, as their brethren thought they had done.

Ver. 31. Because he hath despised] This shows the nature of the offence; which was being at naught God's laws, and denying them to be of divine authority.

Hath broken his commandment.] Not only by doing contrary to it, but, in effect, disannulling it; by rejecting its authority, and affirming he is not bound to observe that law, which he confines.

That soul shall utterly be cut off;] They shall have no mercy upon him.

His iniquity shall be upon him.] Not upon those who put him to death; but upon himself.

Ver. 32. While the children of Israel were in the wilderness.] In this part of the wilderness, at Kadesh-barnea, that piece of land (see ver. 1).

They found a man.] The Jews, who would not be thought ignorant of any thing, say this man was one of those that presumed to go up to the mountain, when Moses forbade them (ch. xiv. 44). And some of them say expressely, his name was Zelophehad; about the dividing of whose estate a question afterward was raised, and which was determined by the Chaldee paraphrase, ascribed to Jonathan and others, (see Seld., lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. i. n. 9).

That gathered sticks; Or was binding up sticks, which he had gathered, and plucked up by the roots out of the earth; as some of the Jews understand the Hebrew word (Mr. Selden there observes, from Exod. v. 7).

Upon the sabbath day.] This the Jewish doctors would have to be the very next Sabbath after its first institution in the wilderness; which is to make this history misplaced, and the foregoing also, without any necessity.

Ver. 33. They that found him gathering sticks] Admonished him (as the Jews) for the sake of the unlawfulness of it, and wished him to desist. But he would not hearken unto them; and therefore (as it here follows) "they brought him unto Moses," &c., as one that contumaciously, and with a high hand, had offended God. For they make this an instance of such a presumptuous sin as is mentioned before, ver. 30, 31, which is not improbable. And it appears from hence that it was more frequent in this case than in any other, for the reason forementioned, so heinous a crime, and so severely punished: for by this time a true worshipper of God was distinguished from a profane person and an idolater.

All the congregation shall stone him] This was a punishment inflicted for very enormous crimes (see Lev. xxv. 2, xxiv. 16). And this man was condemned to suffer it because he was the first breaker of this sacred law. And he doing it presumptuously (as is supposed from the connection of this story with ver. 30, 31), in contempt of the law; and not desisting from his impiety, when he was admonished to forbear (as I said, ver. 33), it highly aggravated his guilt; being no less than a reproach of the Lord, and a despising of his word." Whence Aaron and the elders, it appears by these words, were present (and called here all the congregation), when this offender was brought before him.

Ver. 34. They put him in ward.] By the order of Moses (as we are told, chap. xii. 31, to secure him, till the mind of God was known how he should be punished.

Because it was not declared what should be done to him.] They knew very well that he was to die; for it had been declared (Exod. xxxi. 14, xxxv. 2), but they questioned what kind of death he should suffer, in the Jews informing. For there was a difference between that case of the blasphemer in Leviticus, and this here of the sabbath-breaker: that there they doubted whether he should be punished by them, or by the hand of Heaven; but here, what kind of death they should inflict upon him. Though there are some (as Mr. Selden there observes, n. 8) who imagine, the question here in Moses is the same as of the case of the law was, that they should expect his punishment from God, or be put to death by the court of judgment.

Ver. 35. The Lord said unto Moses; Who went, I suppose, into the sanctuary, to inquire what the pleasure of God was in this matter; as he did in another difficulty (Num. xxv. 10). The man shall surely be put to death.] By this answer, it seems to me, the question was not at first, what death he should die; but whether he should be put to death or not: that is, whether the gathering and binding up sticks into a fagot was such a work as is forbidden in the law (Exod. xxv.), unto which death was afterward threatened in the places before mentioned. And the resolution was, that he should be put to death, as a man that denied God, the creator of the world; though not in words, yet in fact. For he who did any work on the Sabbath (as Aben Ezra notes upon Exod. xxv.), denied the work of creation; though he did not in downright terms deny God himself. For the Sabbath being a sign (as God calls it) that he made all things; the contempt of that was a renunciation of their religion, and therefore deserved to be punished with death; the belief of the creation of the world being the very foundation of the Jewish religion; as the belief of its eternity was the foundation of the pagan. This made the breach of this precept, of keeping the Sabbath strictly (which is more frequent than any other, for the reason forementioned), so heinous a crime, and so severely punished: for by this time a true worshipper of God was distinguished from a profane person and an idolater.

All the congregation shall stone him] This was a punishment inflicted for very enormous crimes (see Lev. xxv. 2, xxiv. 16). And this man was condemned to suffer it because he was the first breaker of this sacred law. And he doing it presumptuously (as is supposed from the connection of this story with ver. 30, 31), in contempt of the law; and not desisting from his impiety, when he was admonished to forbear (as I said, ver. 33), it highly aggravated his guilt; being no less than a reproach of the Lord, and a despising of his word." Whence without the camp, and stoned him with stones, and he died; as the Lord commanded Moses.

37 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
38 Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of the borders a ribband of blue:
39 And it shall be unto you for a fringe, that vulgar saying of the Talmudists, "He that denies the Sabbath, is like to him that denies the whole law."

Ver. 36.] Not on the Sabbath-day, as I said before; for that was unlawful (as Philo observes), but the next day after; or as soon as Moses had passed sentence upon him.

Ver. 37.] This was spoken, it is most likely, about the same time that the foregoing passage happened, and the commands mentioned in the beginning of this chapter were delivered. For this that follows, is a direction for the better observance of all the rest of God's commandments.

Ver. 38. Fringe: This is the best word we have in our language to express the Hebrew word tzitzith, which imports something of an ornament resembling a flower, as the word tzitz signifies. Of how many threads they consist, and after what fashion they are made by the Jews at this day, see Buxtorf's Synagoga Judaeæ, cap. 9.

In the borders of their garments.] Or, (as it is in the Hebrew) "in the wings of their garments;" which had four skirts, as appears by Deut. xxii. 12, at the bottom of each of which they were to have a fringe: which seem to have been only threads left at the end of the web unwoven; at the top whereof they put a lace, as it here follows.

Throughout their generations.] To be a perpetual mark of their religion, and put them in mind of their duty.

A ribband] Or, a lace; which both bound the fringe fast at the top, and also made it more conspicuous and observable; which was the intention of it. For by this they were distinguished from all other people who were not Jews; as well as put in mind of the precept of God, and to fall to performing it.

Of blue.] Or, as some would have it translated, of purple. But the Hebrew writers say, teceket signifies that colour which we now call ultramarine; as Braunius hath observed (lib. i. De Vestitu Sacerd. Hebr. cap. 13, and Bochart. Hierozoic. par. ii. lib. v. cap. 10, 11).

There is another very learned person, also, who hath more lately shown, out of an excellent MS. in his possession, what the Jews deliver concerning the way and manner of dyeing this colour: which being not easy to copy, the Jews at this day, instead of this colour, are contented to use white (see J. Wagensell, of the Gemara Sotes, cap. 2, annot. 8).

Ver. 39. It shall be unto you for a fringe.] Or, rather, (that is, the ribband) shall be unto you upon the fringe; or, to the fringe; added to it, to make it the more noted; being of a distinct colour from the fringe, which was of the same colour. And the garment, the Jews say, in the selvage of which these fringes were, was their upper garment, called talith, being a kind of cloak.

That ye may look upon it, &c.] i.e. When they looked down, this fringe and lace which they saw there might put them in mind of the duty they owed to God; who commanded this, not for itself, but to remember them that they were a holy people, bound to God by peculiar laws, which they should be as careful to observe as to wear these fringes. Hence it ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them; and that ye seek not after your own heart and your own eyes, after which ye use to go a whoring:

40 That ye may remember, and do all my commandments, and be holy unto your God.

41 I am the Lord your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: I am the Lord your God.
CHAPTER XVI.

1 The rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. 23 Moses separatest the people from the rebels' tents. 31 The earth swallowed up Korah, and a fire consumeth others. 36 The censers are reserved to holy use. 41 Fourteen thousand and seven hundred are slain by a plague for murmuring against Moses and Aaron. 46 Aaron by incense stayeth the plague.

1 Now Korah, the son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi, and Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab, and On, the son of Peleth, sons of Reuben, took men: 2 And they rose up before Moses, with cerhim whom he hath chosen will he cause to come near unto him.

6 This do; Take you censers, Korah, and all his company;

7 And put fire therein, and put incense in them before the Lord to morrow: and it shall be that the man whom the Lord doth choose, he shall be holy: ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi.

8 And Moses said unto Korah, Hear, I pray you, ye sons of Levi:

Saying,] Being risen up from prayer, he made this answer to the seditious people, by order from God, who, no doubt, directed him to this way of suppressing the rebellion of the conspirators.

Even to morrow the Lord will shew, &c.] In the Hebrew the words are "to-morrow (or, in the morning) and the Lord will shew," &c. That is, stay but till to-morrow, and it shall appear, without any further delay, whether you or we be in the right. He would keep them in suspense no longer, and yet gave them much time to consider better, and repent. Someobserve, that when he told them to come in the morning with the time of executing justice, and therefore here appointed the Lord will shew] By some visible token.

Who are his] Or, "who appointeth to him:" viz. as his ministers.

Who is holy] Separated and solemnly consecrated, by his appointment, to the sacred office of priesthood.

To come near] Make it appear that they are the persons who ought to act as minister, and to discharge the office. For to come near, is to perform these offices, as may be learnt from Lev. xix. 22, but especially from Lev. v. 3. And the very word Cohen denotes it; for it signifies "a minister next to the king."

His whom he hath chosen] They shall discharge the office of priesthood, whom God himself hath chosen to it, and nobody else.

Ver. 6. This do;] I put you to this trial.

Ver. 7. Put fire therein,] As the priests were wont to do.

Before the Lord to morrow] At the altar of the incense, as some conceive, before the most holy place. So Menochius. But this is contrary to ver. 18, where we read they "stood in the door of the tabernacle," with their censers, fire, and incense. Nor would the sanctuary contain such a company; or, if it had been large enough, the people could not have seen either their offering or their punishment from the Lord for their sin. Therefore these words before the Lord signify with their faces towards the sanctuary, at the gate of which they stood; for what was done there is said to be done before the Lord (Exod. xxix. 42).

The man whom the Lord doth choose] This comprehends both the man and all his family: so the meaning is, the Lord would declare whether Aaron and his sons should execute the priesthood alone, or Korah and his company be admitted to it.

Ye take too much upon you,] It is the same phrase which we find at ver. 3, rublackem; you are high enough already; let the station whereto you are suffice you, and aspire not after greater dignity. The following words justify this interpretation.

Ver. 8.] By this and by the foregoing verse it appears, not only that there were some of the Levites in 9

Seemeth it but a small thing unto you, that the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation of Israel, to bring you near to him-selves to do the service of the tabernacle of the Lord, and to stand before the congregation to minister unto them?

10 And he hath brought thee near to him, and all thy brethren the sons of Levi with thee; and seek ye the priesthood also?

11 For which cause both thou and all thy company are gathered together against the Lord: and what is Aaron, that ye murmur against him?

this sedition, together with Korah at the head of them, but that they were the chief incendiaries (though others, as I said before, were drawn in to join with them), because Moses addresses himself only to them.

Ver. 9. Seemeth it but a small thing unto you, Do you take it to be no honour to you.

Hath separated you ] Made choice of you, above all others, to deal with him in his family, as his domestic servants (Num. iii. 12, viii. 6, 14).

To bring you near ] Though not so near as the priests, yet nearer than all other men, being the sole attendants upon the priests (ch. iii. 6, viii. 10, 11).

To do the service ] See ch. iii. 7, 8, particularly the Kohathites were chosen to do the service of the tabernacle, about the most holy things (ch. iv. 4, 19).

To stand before the congregation ] See ch. viii. 11, 19.

Ver. 10. And he hath brought thee ] Or, "though he hath brought thee" (speaking unto Korah) thus near to him, and all the rest of the Levites thy brethren (see Exod. vi. 20, 21, 23, 25, 26).

Seek ye the priesthood also? ] Will it not content you that you alone are chosen to minister unto the priests
(ch. iii. 6), but you must be advanced to minister unto God in their office?

Ver. 11. Thou and all thy company are gathered totgether against the Lord: ] By whose order Aaron and his sons were appointed to serve him in the office of priests: as was declared when the Levites were taken to minister unto them (ch. iii. 3, iv. 15, 19, 20).
And therefore, to rise up against them, was to rise up to the Lord, and oppose his authority, who made them his priests.

And what is Aaron? ] Or, "and Aaron, what hath he done? Wherein is he first?

That ye murmur against him? ] For taking upon him the office of priesthood; into which he did not intrude himself, but was chosen and appointed by God to do him that service; who would have been angry with him if he had refused it.

Ver. 12. Moses sent to call Dathan and Abiram, ]
To summon them to the place where Moses now was; which the Jews say was the court of judgment. This shows, that either these men (as I said ver. 2) did not openly appear with Korah and his company against Moses (ver. 3): or, if they did, they retired to their tents, before he rose up from his prayer, to give them an answer.

What became of On we are not informed: for he is neither mentioned here, nor in the following part of this narrative, concerning their sedition; nor anywhere else in the Holy Scripture.

We will not come up. ] They bade the messenger who summoned them to appear before Moses, to tell him plainly that they denied his authority. For that is the meaning of this language, "He hath no authority to command us, who are none of his subjects; and there-therefore will not obey him."

Ver. 13. Is it a small thing, &c. ] Though they would not come to him, yet they returned him this message:
Have we not suffered enough by being brought out of a rich and plentiful country, abounding with all good things, into a barren wilderness, where we are ready to starve? Nothing could be more insolent and ungrateful, than to describe Egypt in the very same language wherein God himself had often spoken of the land of promise; particularly when he sent Moses to tell them, he would teach them out of the afflic-tion of Egypt, under which they groaned (Exod. iii. 16, 17).

Except thou make thyself altogether a prince over us? ] Unless we allow thee to make what laws thou thinkest good, and impose what thou pleasest upon us? A most rude and insolent speech; signifying that they had not shaken off the yoke of bondage, but only exchanged it: and instead of the rich and wealthy oppression of Pharaoh, were come under the poor and hungry tyranny of Moses. For so the next verse imports.

Ver. 14. Moreover thou hast not brought us into a land, &c. ] Or, certainly, this is not the good land into which thou didst promise to conduct us. It seems to be a sarcastical speech; upbraiding him as if he had put a bane upon them, and fed them only with good words, to which they were no longer trust. Or given us inhertance ] But told us it shall be bestowed forty years hence, when we are all dead. This still shows they took him for a deluder of them with decieftul promises.

Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men? ] Some of them spake this in the name of the rest, who were now with Dathan and Abiram; and the meaning is, Dost thou think to blind us so, that none of us shall discern this imposture? or, shall we suffer thee to lead us about like blind men, wither thou pleasest; sometimes towards Canaan, and now back again towards the Red Sea and Egypt?

We will not come up. ] A peremptory resolution, not to own his authority, which they denied at the first (ver. 12).

Ver. 15. Moses was very wroth. ] For such behaviour and language was so provoking, that it was no wonder it incensed the meekest man upon earth (ch. xii.
3). Yet the LXX. translate the words, as if he only took it very heathen, ἰπερπεπεμασθη το θρωμα, "it made him exceeding sad." Respect thou their offering? ] He calls the incense which they were about to offer by the name of minche, which commonly signifies a meat-offering; but sometimes any inanimate thing that was consumed in honour of God, as incense was; and must so signify in this place, for they offered nothing else. And when Moses desires it may not be accepted, he means a great deal 3 ii 2
the Lord, Respect not thou their offering: I have not taken one ass from them, neither have I hurt one of them.
16 And Moses said unto Korah, Be thou and all thy company before the Lord, thou, and they, and Aaron, to morrow:
17 And take every man his censer, and put incense in them, and bring ye before the Lord every man his censer, two hundred and fifty censers; thou also, and Aaron, each of you his censer.
18 And they took every man his censer, and put fire in them, and laid incense thereon, and more, that God would give some sign of his dislike to it. Hence it seems plain to me that Dathan and Abi-ram, as well as Korah, quarrelled at the confusing the priesthood unto Aaron's family; for Moses calls this their offering, the Lord, &c.; e. c. the acceptance or rejection of which, this controversy was to be decided.
I have not taken one ass from them,
This seems to be an appeal to God against their unjust charge, that he acted arbitrarily, and did with them what he listed (ver. 13). From which he was so far, that he declares before God he had not taken, i. e. received by way of gift or reward (so the LXX., and the Vulgar understand it), the smallest thing (for such a single ass was), much less exerted any thing from them.
Neither have I hurt one of them.
None can say that I have done any kind of evil to them; but contrarily, all good offices. For, that he did not seek himself appeared in this, that he had not advanced his own family to the priesthood, but left them in the number of common Levites, upon the same level with Korah and his company.
Ver. 16. Be thou and all thy company before the Lord, &c.
He repeats what he had said to him before (ver. 6, 7), only adding, that he would have Aaron also there, together with them. So it follows, "Thou, and they, and Aaron, to-morrow,"
In the court of the tabernacle, see ver. 7, where, by an extraordinary commission from the Divine Majesty, this trial was to be made. And therefore Aaron himself did not now go into the sanctuary to offer incense (which was the proper and only place allowed by the law), but stood with them without; as in another great necessity he offered incense "at the midst of the congregation" (ver. 46, 47). Both which were done by a dispensation from him that made the law.
Ver. 17. Take every man his censer. Let every man of them stand before the Lord, at the door of the tabernacle, to do the office of priests; to which they pretended as good a right as Aaron and his sons.
Two hundred and fifty censers. This shows that the incense being offered by so great a number (as it appears it was, ver. 35), they did not offer it in the sanctuary; which would not contain so many persons.
Thou also, and Aaron, each of you his censer. This seems to signify as if Korah was commanded to stand by Aaron, since he pretended to be his equal; which made the hand of God the more remarkable upon him, when he was struck with lightning, and no harm came to Aaron, which fell by him; but it may be doubted, what way Korah perished.
Ver. 18. They took every man his censer. That is, the two hundred and fifty men did as they were commanded; but Korah went first to muster up as many as he could get together against Moses (ver. 19), and then seems to have gone to his tent (ver. 24). Herein these men submitted to the way of decision which Moses proposed, though they had so boldly destood in the door of the tabernacle of the congregation with Moses and Aaron.
19 And Korah gathered all the congregation against them unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and the glory of the Lord appeared unto all the congregation.
20 And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying,
21 Separate yourselves from among this con-gration, that I may consume them in a moment.
22 And they fell upon their faces, and said, O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall nied his authority. For they could not but think, that God, whom they owned to be among them (ver. 3), would approve of them, if they were in the right, and make good their allegation, that all the congregation were holy; to whom they did not deny an equality with themselves; but only a superiority.
Put fire in them. From the altar of burnt-offering, which stood in the court, at the door of which they were placed (Lev. i. 5), for Aaron durst not take it from any other place; his sons having lost their lives for offering with (or without) incense; the remembrance of which, it is likely, deterred these men from doing otherwise; who did not as yet put in the fire, but only took their censers, and put incense in them (which is all that is ordered in the preceding verse), and put fire in afterward.
Stood with Moses and Aaron. As if they were no-thinking inferior to them.
Ver. 19. The LXX. translate it, "Korah gathered all his congregation," i. e. all the men of his faction.
But the Hebrew words import that he gathered all the congregation of Israel, at least all the great men; who are sometimes called by the name of all the con-gration (ch. xiv. 1), whom he got together, that they might be witnesses, at least, of the issue of this trial; though he assembled together with Korah and his company, rather than with Moses and Aaron, is too plain an indication that they were inclined, if not to throw off, yet to doubt of their authority.
Unto the door. Where they themselves stood (ver.
18). And so did Moses and Aaron; but the Israelites that Korah had gathered together stood on his side, appears from the foregoing words, and from
ver. 24.
And the glory of the Lord. The Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, came forth out of the most holy place, where it usually resided.
Appeared unto all the congregation. Openly showed itself in the sight of all the people; and, it is likely, in such an amazing manner, as it had done before, (ch. xiv. 10). But where it appeared, we are not told; I suppose in the cloud, which was just over the ark of the testimony (ch. ix. 15); not in the door of the tabernacle, for there Korah and his company stood (see Exod. xvi. 10). And the end of the Lord's appearing was to give sentence in this case; and to declare, by a visible token, whom he accepted as his priests. Thus the glory of the Lord appeared the first time that Aaron and his sons offered sacrifice (Lev. ix. 6, 23).
Ver. 20. A little before they put fire in their censers.
Ver. 21. Separate yourselvesviz. From Korah and his company, and the people they brought along with them; who seemed to favour them (ver. 19).
That I may consume them. As he did Korah and his companions.
one man sin, and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation?

23 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

24 Speak unto the congregation, saying, Get you up from about the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.

25 And Moses rose up and went unto Dathan and Abiram; and the elders of Israel followed him.

26 And he spake unto the congregation, saying, Depart, I pray you, from the tents of these wicked men, and touch nothing of their's, lest ye be consumed in all their sins.

27 So they gat up from the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, on every side: and Dathan and Abiram came out, and stood in the door of their tents, and their wives, and their sons, and their little children.

28 And Moses said, Hereby ye shall know that the Lord hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind.

29 If these men die the common death of all

when, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men; then the Lord hath not sent me. 30 But if the Lord make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that appertained unto them, and they go down quick into the pit; then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the Lord. 31 And it came to pass, as he had made an end of speaking all these words, that the ground clave asunder that was under them: 32 And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods. 33 They, and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them: and they perished from among the congregation. 34 And all Israel that were round about them fled at the cry of them; for they said, Lest the earth swallow us up also. 35 And there came out a fire from the Lord, and devoured them, and their companies: and they were consumed with a very great flame, according to the voice of the Lord.
and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense.

36 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

37 Speak unto Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, that he take up the censers out of the burning, and scatter thou the fire yonder; for they are hallowed.

38 The censers of these sinners against their own souls, let them make them broad plates for a covering of the altar: for they offered them before the Lord, therefore they are hallowed: and wicked faction; and all of them knew how highly they had lately offended God, by their unbelief and murmuring (ch. xiv.), which might make them justly fear the same fate with their brethren.

Ver. 35. There came out a fire from the Lord.] From the glory of the Lord, which appeared unto all the congregation (ch. xiv. 19), read to exclude the controversy: this fell out either at the same time the earth swallowed up Dathan and Abiram, or immediately after it.

Consumed the two hundred and fifty men] Which was a plain declaration that they usurped the office of priests; and, therefore, were thus punished by God himself for their presumption. It is not certain, whether they were devoured by the fire, or only struck dead, as men are sometimes on a sudden by lightning; and perhaps scorched, as they likewise sometimes are. The latter seems most probable from what follows (ver. 37), and from the like punishment "by fire from the Lord," which is said to devour Nadab and Abihu that are hallowed. Or bodies remained entire (Lev. x. 2, 4). This was the more astonishing, because Moses and Aaron, who stood with them at the door of the tabernacle (ver. 18), had no hurt.

Ver. 36.] Immediately after the death of those men.

Ver. 37. Speak unto Eleazar] Who is it likely stood by them, as next successor to Aaron, in the office which was disputed; and therefore, perhaps, employed in what follows rather than Aaron, that his succession might be confirmed. Though others will have it, that it was below the dignity of Aaron to perform such a mean office: and besides, he might have been in danger to be polluted by the dead bodies of the men that were burnt.

That he take up the censers out of the burning.] Out of the place where the men were burnt, as some understand it: or (which differs not much) from among the dead bodies, which were burnt: burning being put for bodies burnt, as captivity (ch. xxi. 1), for those that were carried captive, or made prisoners, as we here translate it. But there is no need of either of these additions: burning signifies the fire which burnt in them, which he orders Eleazar to throw out, that the censers might be brought away.

Scatter thou the fire yonder.] The men were burnt as soon as ever they put fire to the incense in their censers (ver. 18), which, flaming at the door of the tabernacle where they stood (near the altar from whence they took the fire), God commanded to be thrown away without the camp; into that place, I suppose, where they were wont to throw the ashes (Lev. vi. 11); or rather, into some unclean place, where they threw the dust scraped from the walls of leprous houses (Lev. xiv. 41). For it was to show that God abhorred their offerings.

And take fire out of the altar put into them; which some think sanctified them. But the plain reason is given in the next verse, because they offered them before the Lord: i.e., they had been employed to a holy use, and that by God's command (ver. 6, 17), and therefore God would not have them hereafter serve for any other.

Ver. 38. These sinners against their own souls.] Who have brought destruction upon themselves by their presumption.

Make them] Either Aaron or Eleazar was to cause them to be beaten into such plates as here follow.

Broad plates for a covering of the altar.] Of burnt-offering, which was covered with brass (Exod. xxvii. 12); but these plates were to be laid upon that covering which it had already, for the end mentioned in the conclusion of this verse. And hereby also the proper covering of the altar lasted the longer.

For they offered them before the Lord.] Presented them before the Lord, when they offered incense in them (ver. 35).

Therefore they are hallowed.] Or holy; that is, I will have them separated, for this reason, to my use alone, and no other. It was that worthy to be taken special notice of, that the impiety of the men that offered incense did not discharge their censers of the discriminative respect (as our famous Mr. Mede speaks) due unto things sacred; as these in some sort were, by being presented to the Lord, which made it unlawful to employ them to common uses. For as the Lord himself is that singular, incomunicable, and absolutely Holy One, and his service and worship therefore incomunicable to any other, so should that also which is consecrated to his service, be in some proportion incomunicably used, and not promiscuously and commonly, as other things are (see Book I. Discourse 2, p. 15).

They shall be a sign.] That God accepts no sacrifice which is not accompanied by the hands of the sons of Aaron. This the Levites were to remember, who attended upon the priest, when they saw these plates laid upon the altar of burnt-offering every day.

Ver. 39.] By this it appears these censers were made of the same metal (though it was not said before) that Aaron's censer was of, and wherewith the altar was overlaid. He took them up out of the burning, no doubt, immediately upon the foregoing commands; and as soon as the mutiny was quite quelled, they were employed as Moses had directed.

Ver. 40. To be a memorial.] This explains what is meant by a sign (ver. 38), viz. to put them in mind; or rather, to keep in their memory.

That he be not as Korah.] Even though he were an Israelite, nay a Levite, if he were not (as it here follows) of the seed of Aaron, he was reputed a stranger to this office.

Come near to offer incense.] Presume to execute the office of a priest in the sanctuary.

That he be not as Korah.] Destroyed in a dreadful manner. By God's threat, Korah perished as well as the two hundred and fifty men; and it is likely, as they did, by fire from the Lord.
of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron, saying, Ye have killed the people of the Lord.

42 And it came to pass, when the congregation was gathered against Moses and against Aaron, that they looked toward the tabernacle of the congregation: and, behold, the cloud covered it, and the glory of the Lord appeared.

43 And Moses and Aaron came before the tabernacle of the congregation.

44 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

45 Get you up from among this congregation, that I may consume them as in a moment. And they fell upon their faces.

46 ¶ And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a censer, and put fire therein from off the altar, and put on incense, and go quickly unto the congregation, and make an atonement for them: for there is wrath gone out from the Lord; the plague is begun.

47 And Aaron took as Moses commanded, and ran into the midst of the congregation; and, behold, the plague was begun among the people: and he put on incense, and made an atonement for the people.

48 And he stood between the dead and the living; and the plague was stayed.

They fell upon their faces.] To beseech God not to punish the people as they deserved (ver. 29).

Ver. 46. Moses said unto Aaron.] By God’s direction.

Take a censer and put fire therein from off the altar.] Near to which they now were (ver. 43).

Put on incense.] Upon the fire; that is, not till he came into the midst of the congregation (ver. 47).

Go quickly unto the congregation.] With the incense, which regularly was to be offered only at the golden altar within the sanctuary; but now, in this extraordinary case, by God’s special order, Aaron is sent with it into the camp, that they might all be witnesses of his power with God, and that, by his authority, he was settled in the priesthood.

Make an atonement for them.] Which was usually performed by the blood of a sacrifice: but there was not time for that; and therefore now it was made by the incense, wherewith their daily sacrifices, morning and evening, were concluded; and was accompanied by the prayers of the people, while the priest, as he offered it, made intercession for them (Ps. cxii. 2). Thus, as St. Jerome glosses, Currens ira Dei, sacerdotes voce prohibebatur; “the Divine anger, coming with full speed upon them, was stopped by the voice of the priest;” which was a notable type of the power of our great high-priest and intercessor with God, the Lord Jesus.

For there is wrath gone out from the Lord.] Who would not wholly grant their prayer for a pardon (ver. 45), but inflicted some punishment upon them.

The plague is begun.] A pestilence, in all probability, of which several immediately died.

Ver. 47. Aaron took as Moses commanded.] A censer, and fire from the altar, with incense ready to be put upon it (ver. 46).

And rain.] According to the command of Moses (ver. 46), who bade him go quickly.

Into the midst.] Perhaps into the midst of each of the four camps, of Judah, Reuben, Ephraim, and Dan (mentioned in the second chapter), it being broke out everywhere.

Behold, the plague was begun.] He saw people die on all sides of it.

He put on incense.] Whereupon he put incense upon the fire which he brought along with him from the altar (ver. 46).

Made an atonement.] Interceded with God for them, and obtained what he desired.

Ver. 48. He stood between the dead and the living.] This sentence demonstrates, that the plague began in the skirts of their camps, and was proceeding into the heart of them, where Aaron stood, as a mediator for those who were not yet smitten.

The plague was stayed.] A stop was put to its progress; which was a further evidence of Aaron’s right 49 Now they that died in the plague were fourteen thousand and seven hundred, beside them that died about the matter of Korah.

to the priesthood, by God’s appointment; who not only preserved him when he offered incense together with Korah’s company (ver. 17), but now makes him an instrument of preserving others from destruction.

Ver. 49. They that died—were fourteen thousand and seven hundred.] Who, it is likely, were of the forwardest men to associate themselves with Korah (ver. 19).

Beside them that died about the matter of Korah.

50 And Aaron returned unto Moses unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and the plague was stayed.

Whose just number is not known; for besides the two hundred and fifty men (mentioned ver. 25), the whole families of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram were swallowed up.

Ver. 50. Aaron returned] To carry back his censer.

The plague was stayed.] Or rather, “for the plague was stayed;” and so, having done his business, he returned to the tabernacle.

CHAPTER XVII.

1 Aaron’s rod among all the rods of the tribes only flourished. 10 It is left for a monument against the rebels.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Speak unto the children of Israel, and take of every one of them a rod according to the house of their fathers, of all their princes according to the house of their fathers twelve rods: write thou every man’s name upon his rod.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. The Lord spake unto Moses.] Not long after the plague was stayed. For though there had been enough done to satisfy the people that Aaron was advanced to the priesthood by God’s appointment, and not by Moses’s affection to his kindred; yet their minds had been so poisoned by Korah and his associates, with the contrary opinion, that it was necessary to do still more to root it out. Which was the occasion of what follows.

Ver. 2. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Order them to bring what I require thee to take of them.

Take of every one of them] i. e. Of every tribe.

A rod.] Or a staff as the Hebrew word matath is often translated: which some take for an ordinary walking-staff, or for the staff which was the badge of their authority, as princes of the several tribes; neither of which seems to me to be true. For what reason have we to think that every man’s staff which he commonly used was made of the wood of an almond-tree? as these were, one may probably conclude from the eighth verse. And therefore, I take it, they were now all cut off from some tree of that kind, and it is likely from one and the same tree, that none might fancy there was any difference between them. For the miracle was great enough (which here follows), without supposing, as some do, that these rods were all of some other common wood; and yet Aaron’s rod produced almonds, which were not the proper fruit of it: though it must be confessed, that if they were not of the wood of an almond-tree, the wonder was greater that his rod should bring forth almonds; and struck their minds more strongly.

According to the house of their fathers] In the Hebrew it is father, in the singular number; denoting the principal person or patriarch (as we call them), of whose house or family he was to take one rod.

Of all their princes.] This explains the meaning more fully, that the prince of every tribe, who was the head of the house of their fathers, should bring these rods. Their names we have in the first chapter of this book (ver. 6, 6, ch. vii. 5, 12, &c.).

Twelve rods.] Besides Aaron’s; for so many tribes

3 And thou shalt write Aaron’s name upon the rod of Levi: for one rod shall be for the head of the house of their fathers.

4 And thou shalt lay them up in the tabernacle of the congregation before the testimony, where I will meet with you.

there were besides that of Levi. And too great a number of every tribe, in all likelihood, had joined with Korah in their discontented murmurings, at the confinement of the priesthood unto Aaron’s family alone; to which they all fancied they had as much right as he. Which is the reason of taking a rod from every tribe; that they might all be convinced that none of them, but he and his family alone, were owned by God for his priests (see ch. vii. 3).

Write thou every man’s name upon his rod.] Either by an incision into the very wood; or with such ink as they wrote withal in those days (v. 92). This he did in the presence of the princes; that they might not afterward suspect any fraud, when they came to take their rods again; but be satisfied they were the very same which they saw noted with their names.

Ver. 3. Write Aaron’s name upon the rod of Levi.] Because God had made him the prince of that tribe, by giving him the high-priesthood. And he would have them see, that as no other person in any of the twelve tribes, so no other Levite ought to pretend unto that high office, which he had invested him withal, and him alone.

One rod shall be for the head.] One rod was sufficient, because the head of the tribe comprehended the whole tribe, who were all excluded from the priesthood, by the exclusion of him who represented them.

Ver. 4. Lay them up] In the most holy place.

Before the testimony.] i. e. Before the ark; called in many places the ark of the testimony (Exod. xl. 2), because therein Moses put the testimony (or, two tables of stone), and the mercy-seat above it, ver. 20, 21, where the Divine glory resided. Therefore, to lay the rods before the testimony, was to lay them before the Divine Majesty; who intended by them finally to determine the present controversy.

Where I will meet with you.] There he promised to meet with Moses, Exod. xxv. 22, by whom he communicated his mind unto the people. For he neither met with them, nor with Aaron, there, any other way but by Moses. And therefore the Vulgar Latin here translates it, minding the sense rather than the words, “Where I will speak to them.” And so the LXX.

“By which I will be made known to thee there.”
5 And it shall come to pass, that the man’s rod, whom I shall choose, shall blossom: and I will make to cease from me the murmuring of the children of Israel, whereby they murmur against you.

6 ¶ And Moses spake unto the children of Israel, and every one of their princes gave him a rod apiece, for each prince one, according to their fathers’ houses, even twelve rods: and the rod of Aaron was among their rods.

7 And Moses laid up the rods before the Lord in the tabernacle of witness.

And indeed meeting with them here, is nothing but declaring, or making known his mind to them all, by what was done there upon Aaron’s rod. So it follows in the next verse. And for this reason the tabernacle of the Lord is called Ἱδεν νευτ, the “tabernacle of meeting”; not of men’s meeting there (as is commonly supposed, by our translating it “the tabernacle of the presence”) but of God’s meeting there with men: for so the Lord himself gives the reason of the name, both here and in Exod. xxix. 42, xxx. 36, where I have noted the same out of Mr. Mede.

Ver. 5. The man’s rod, whom I shall choose, shall blossom.] The rods being laid before me, I will tell you whom I have chosen to minister to me in the priesthood, by making the rod (which his name is written to blossom, when all the rest remain as they were before, without any alteration. This was a kind of new choice (as the words import), whereby God confirmed the choice he had formerly made of Aaron to be high-priest.

I will make to cease from me the murmuring.] And hereby the mouths of all the people of Israel, that were murmuring any more about this matter; unless they would oppose me, directly, who declare beforehand how I intend to give judgment in this case, and put an end to this dispute.

Ver. 6. Moses spake.] Told them what God had said, that they might be all consenting to this way of decision.

Every one of their princes gave him a rod.] For they could not refuse such a fair proposal.

For each prince one,] Observing herein the commands of Moses; who wrote, no doubt, every man’s “name upon his rod,” as he was also commanded, ver. 2.

The rod of Aaron was among their rods.] Not one of the twelve, as the Jews fancy; but besides the twelve rods for the twelve tribes (as was children’s), ver. 2, and obeyed by them, as the foregoing words tell us), his rod was put among them with his name upon it, as their names were upon their rods. And therefore the Vulgar translates it, having regard to the sense only, “there were twelve rods besides the rod of Aaron,” which the LXX. intended in their translation. It is, however, more of God’s meeting there: and the rod of Aaron in the midst of their rods.” And if it were cut from the very same tree with theirs, the miracle became the more remarkable.

Ver. 7. Moses laid up the rods.] Who was by them to declare his choice (ver. 5).

Ver. 7 in the tabernacle of witness.] In that part of the tabernacle where the ark was, which had in it the witness or testimony which God gave Moses (Exod. xxv. 21), who alone could go into that place.

Ver. 8. On the morrow.] It is likely God told him he would forthwith show whom he had chosen.

Moses went into the tabernacle of witness.] The most holy place, where the rods were laid up by God’s order.

The rod of Aaron.] Which had his name written on it.

8 And it came to pass, that on the morrow Moses went into the tabernacle of witness; and, behold, the rod of Aaron for the house of Levi was budded, and brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds.

9 And Moses brought out all the rods from before the Lord unto all the children of Israel: and they looked, and took every man his rod.

10 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Bring Aaron’s rod again before the testimony, to be kept for a token against the rebels; and thou shalt put it with the rods of the children of Israel in the tabernacle of witness, that it may be there a token of the瞎ness of Egypt and all his gods.

For the house of Levi.] Or, “to the house of Levi,” i.e. whom God had made head of the Levites.

Was budded.] In some places of the rod, I suppose, there was an appearance of buds coming forth; in others, the buds were fully thrust out; and in others, they were opened and shot forth into blossoms; and those blossoms, in other parts, knotted and grown amazing; to prove the same with a miracle of God, &c., as Gregory Nyss. speaks in the Life of Moses (p. 185), “the greatest miracle even in the judgment of unbelievers;” who now acknowledged that which before they opposed (ver. 12, 13).

For that in one night, a dry stick (as some suppose them all to have been) should produce buds, and flowers, and fruit, when all the rest, which perhaps were cut from the same tree, were as dry as they were before, could not but be very amazing; and, unless they would shut their eyes, make them see the distinction which the Lord made between Aaron, whose name that rod bore, and all the rest of the children of Israel whom the other rods represented.

The heathen did not think such things incredible, as Huetus hath shown in his Questions Alenatens (lib. i. cap. 12, n. 24).

Ver. 9. Moses brought out all the rods—unto all the children of Israel.] Before whom they were exposed to open view, that they might see the difference God had made.

They looked, and took every man his rod.] Viewed them, and, taking them into their hands, examined them; and found they were the very same rods which they had delivered unto Moses with their names on them, without any alteration.

Ver. 10. Bring Aaron’s rod again.] Which either Moses held in his hand, or delivered it to Aaron (as he did the rest to the several princes of the tribes), who showed it to the children of Israel, with the buds, blossoms, and almonds, upon it: after which God commanded it to be returned unto him.

Before the testimony.] To be laid up in the place where it was before it was thus changed (ver. 4, 7).

To be kept for a token against the rebels.] That it might be produced as a sufficient conviction of their impotency, and thereby to rebuke them to rebel against Aaron’s authority: or rather, that it might prevent all insurrections against him for the future. For it remained, we find, in the most holy place for some time; as appears both from the apostle (Heb. ix. 4), and from the reason of its being put here, that it might be preserved as a sign or proof of Aaron’s authority, and suppress all opposition to it. But how long it continued we cannot tell (for it is not mentioned when the ark was brought into the temple of Solomon, 1 Kings viii. 9), nor is it certain whether it continued in that verdure wherein it now appeared, with the buds, blossoms, and fruit, though it is highly probable it did; because it was to be a testimony that the honour of the priesthood should continue to Aaron’s family alone, through all generations.
shalt quite take away their murmurings from me, that they die not.

11 And Moses did so: as the Lord commanded him, so did he.

12 And the children of Israel spake unto Moses, saying, Behold, we die, we perish, we all perish.

13 Whosoever cometh any thing near unto the tabernacle of the Lord shall die: shall we be consumed with dying?

There are those who take this rod which blossomed, and was laid up in the most holy place, to have been the rod of Moses, wherewith he wrought so many miracles in Egypt and at the Red Sea: concerning which the Jews tell very many incredible things; as that it came from a branch of the tree of life, which an angel gave to Seth, who planted it in the wilderness, where Moses found it grown to a tree, and cut this rod from it. For when they came to Marah, and could not drink the waters, because they were bitter, God showed them this tree, that with it he might make them sweet. Upon which tree he afterward placed the brazen serpent, by looking on which the people were healed, &c. Thus the cabalists generally tell this tale; but some of them much otherwise; who say the God himself gave the Jews a rod, upon which so often till it came to Joseph, in whose house the Egyptians found it when he died, and brought it to Pharaoh; from whom Jethro stole it, &c., with a great deal of such-like stuff; which Abarbinel saith is to be understood mysteriously. But all the ground they have for their fancy, of the rod here laid up being Moses's rod, is from ch. xx. 9., where it is said, that "Moses took the rod from before the Lord," wherein he brought water out of the rock; and this rod is said (ver. 11.), to be Moses's rod. Dr. Owen, upon the Epistle to the Hebrews, follows this conceit, and endeavours to find many mysteries in it. But it is evidently false: for as there is not the least intimation here that it was the rod of Moses, but quite contrary, it is called the rod of Aaron. Ver. 6., so it had not been a sufficient argument to convince the infidelity of the Israelites, if Aaron's rod had not been of the same kind with all the rest. For they might have ascribed what came to pass to the singular quality or virtue of that rod, especially if it were Moses's rod (wherewith besides used to be wrought), and not Moses's rod, from hand to hand, God appearing to establish the authority of Aaron. And besides, a rod full of blossoms and fruit had been very unfit to be used to smite the rock withal; for which purpose that rod (which seems to have been his pastoral stuff) wherewith he smote the rock in Horeb was most proper (Exod. xvi. 5, 6).

That and which. Best to take away their murmurings from me. I.e. Silence all their cavils against Aaron and his family; which the Lord here declares he would no longer bear, if they continued in them after this demonstration of his will and pleasure. For here were a great many miraculous things concurred together to convince them, that to oppose Aaron was to oppose God himself. The Jews reckon up eight. First, that Aaron's rod should bring forth buds, blossoms, and fruit, all in one night, when the other rods, which were of the same nature, brought forth nothing. And then, secondly, that the buds brought forth leaves; for so they interpret those words (ver. 8), the rod of Aaron was budded, i.e. brought forth leaves; for the next words speak of its budding, which followed. And thirdly, that it thrust out leaves before the blossoms, which is contrary to the nature of the almond-tree. And next, that it put forth blossoms all the rod over; as they interpret those words, bloomed blossoms. And then, that a dry stick (as they understand it) should produce fruit, and this fruit almonds, which such trees (they think) as that rod was taken from, did not bear. And further, that it produced ripe almonds, as the Hebrew word shekedim imports. And lastly, that Moses showed the people these heathen buds, blossoms, and fruit in perfection. By which multiplicity of miracles the dignity of Aaron was so demonstrated, that we do not find they at any time hereafter ventured to rise up against him. For, besides all those wonders now mentioned, it may be, that it was not the season of the year for almonds, nor so much as for the budding of that tree: which made it the more astonishing. But the greatest thing of all was, the continuing of this miracle to future ages; which might well make them afraid to open their mouths again in murmurings against Aaron.

That they die not.] Be not consumed in a moment, as God had more than once formerly threatened (ch. xvi. 21, 45) and now declared, if they did not mend their manners, and cease their murmurings about this matter, he would instantly execute.

Ver. 11. Moses did so; &c.] Both brought the rod again to him, and laid it up before him; and told the children of Israel the reason of it; which occasioned what follows.

Ver. 12. Behold, we die, we perish, &c.] Moses having told them what he had done for this end, to be a witness against them, that (if they continued worse, and more) they deserved to be all cut off, as they should certainly be, it moved them to make this doleful complaint, wherein they seem to be convinced of their guilt, and to bewail their miserable state. For the sense of these two verses is, "Some of us died before, and now lately more have perished, and we are all in the same danger; surely we shall never have done dying, till we be all consumed."

Behold, we die.] This seems to relate to those judgments which had passed upon them heretofore.

We perish.] And this to what had very lately happened to Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, with their company, and to those that murmured the next day after (ch. xvi. 49).

We all perish.] This will be the fate of the whole congregation.

Ver. 13. Whosoever cometh any thing near unto the tabernacle.] Who was not a priest, and yet approached nearer than God allowed.

Shall die; &c.] So Moses had threatened; and they now believed him, and were afraid, those they should some time or other incur God's displeasure by their rashness.

Shall we be consumed with dying; &c.] They seem to be afraid, lest, for their late murmurings and insurrection after such a heavy punishment for that sin (ch. xvi. 41, 42), God should further plague them, as by this new sign he convinced them they justly deserved; and therefore beg of Moses to entreat God to spare them, and not to go on utterly to destroy them.
CHAPTER XVIII.

1 The charge of the priests and Levites. 9 The priests' portion. 21 The Levites' portion. 25 The heave offering to the priests out of the Levites' portion.

1 And the Lord said unto Aaron, Thou and thy sons and thy father's house with thee shall bear the iniquity of the sanctuary: and thou and thy sons with thee shall bear the iniquity of your priesthood.

2 And thy brethren also of the tribe of Levi, the tribe of thy father, bring thou with thee, that they may be joined unto thee, and minister unto thee: but thou and thy sons with thee shall minister before the tabernacle of witness.

3 And they shall keep thy charge, and the charge of all the tabernacle: only they shall not come nigh the vessels of the sanctuary and the altar, that neither they, nor ye also, die.

4 And they shall be joined unto thee, and keep the charge of the tabernacle of the congregation as was said before before the tabernacle of witness.

But they that are of this opinion do not consider what is meant by the tabernacle of witness, which signifies the most holy place (see ch. ix. 15, and x. 11), before which the Levites did not minister; but before the tabernacle of the congregation, as Moses expressly speaks, ch. iii. 7 (see there), where they attended upon the priests in the court of the sanctuary, in which the priests only could minister: as Aaron alone did, upon one certain day only, in the most holy place.

Ver. 2. The charge of all the tabernacle: Of the outward part of it (see ch. iii. 7, 8), and carry the vessels belonging to the inward part, viz. the sanctuary (ch. iv. 15).

They shall not come nigh the vessels: They were not to touch them when they carried them (ch. iv. 15), nor to see when they were covered by the priests (ch. iv. 19, 20).

The altar: I take this to be meant not only of the altar of incense, but also of the burnt-offering, unto which they were not to approach, nor touch it, while they attended upon the priests, who only could minister there. This is justified from Exod. xxix. 37, where this altar is said to be most holy, and that neither they, nor ye also, die: They for presuming to go beyond the bounds of their office, and the priest for permitting them.

Ver. 4. They shall be joined unto thee: He would have the priests look upon the Levites as part of that sacred body of men that waited upon God in the tabernacle, though in an inferior office. And, indeed, the very name of Levi imported as much: and denoted them to be adjuncts to some other persons. Accordingly we find, in aftertimes, that as the Levites were a guard on the outside of the temple, so the priests watched within it.

And keep the charge of the tabernacle: See ch. iii. 7, 8. The heaviest part of their service, which is called their burden, is mentioned particularly ch. iv. 3, 4, and the rest of that chapter.

A stranger shall not come nigh unto you: This seems to relate both to the priests and to the inferior ministers: that none should presume to perform the office of the former, but only the family of Aaron; nor of the latter, who were not of the tribe of Levi. But the Hebrew doctors, particularly Maimonides, byzar (strangers), understand in this place every one that was not of the seed-male of Aaron: so that the sons of his daughters should not minister. For the sons of Aaron, saith he (Biath Hammikdash, cap. 9), are appointed, and none other, to lay things in order for sacrifice (Lev. i. 5), and to burn the fat of the peace-offerings upon the altar (Lev. ii. 15). His daughters were incapable of it; and so were all those that descended from them. The same may be said of the Levites.
Ver. 5. Ye shall keep] That is, the priests were bound to do what follows.

The charge of the sanctuary.] Where, as they alone were to minister, so they were to take care of all the holy things therein contained (the shew-bread, lamps, &c.), and to cover them when they were to be removed (ch. iv. 5, 6, &c.).

The charge of the altar.] Of burnt-offering; where they only were to offer sacrifice, and to take care of every thing belonging to it (ch. iv. 3, 11).

That there be no wrath any more.] That you may by your care and constant admonitions prevent the children of Israel from running into such profanations, much more from such intrusions into the sacred offices as may bring God's most high displeasure again upon them.

Ver. 6. I have taken—the Levites from among the children of Israel.] See ch. iii. 12, 14, 16, and viii. 6, 16, 18. The Levites are again called their brethren, that the priests might not despise them because they served in a lower condition, but treat them with kindness and brotherly affection.

To you they are given.] See ch. iii. 2, but especially ch. viii. 19.

For the Lord.] To assist you in your ministry to the Lord.

To do the service.] This hath been repeated very often (ch. iii. 7, 8, iv. 3, 4, 23, &c., viii. 19, 22, 24), and here is mentioned again that the Levites might be possessed with this opinion, that they were but ministers to the priests, and therefore ought not to presume to offer to aspire, as Korah did, to the office of priesthood.

Ver. 7. Keep your priest's office] Preserve it to yourselves, and suffer no other person to invade it.

For every thing of the altar.] Those words and the following, briefy declare what is meant by the priest's office.

First, to offer sacrifice at the altar of burnt-offering, and sprinkle the blood, &c.

Within the veil.] Next, to perform all the service of God, within the sanctuary. For in the Hebrew the words are, "and for within the veil," which is a short form of speech, importing both all that was to be done in the sanctuary by the sons of Aaron, (as burning incense, putting on the shew-bread, and lighting the lamps), and likewise all that was to be done in the most holy place, by Aaron himself, on the day of atonement.

For the word parocheth always signifies the inner veil, before the most holy place; the outward veil being constantly called meshack, and therefore the exactest translation of the Hebrew words lehembeth laphareoth is this, "for within the house (i.e. the holy place) for the veil," i.e. within the veil, in the most holy place, the place ye alone shall serve and employ nobody else.

I have given your priest's office unto you.] He would have the Levites to know, that Aaron and his sons had service of gift: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.

8 And the Lord spake unto Aaron, Behold, I also have given thee the charge of mine heave offerings of all the hallowed things of the children of Israel; unto thee have I given them by reason of the anointing, and to thy sons, by an ordinance for ever.

9 This shall be thine of the most holy things, reserved from the fire, every oblation of their's, every meat offering of their's, and every sin offering of their's, and every trespass offering of their's, which they shall render unto me, shall be most holy for thee and for thy sons.
In the most holy place shall thou eat it; every male shall eat it: it shall be holy unto thee.

And this is thine; the heave offering of their gift, with all the wave offerings of the children of Israel: I have given them unto thee, and to thy sons and to thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: every one that is clean in thy house shall eat of it.

All the best of this oil, and all the best of the wine, and of the wheat, the firstfruits of which they shall offer unto the Lord, them have I given thee.

And whatsoever is first ripe in the land, which they shall bring unto the Lord, shall be thine; every one that is clean in thine house shall eat of it.

Every thing devoted in Israel shall be thine.

Every thing that openeth the matrix in all the house of Israel shall be thine.
flesh, which they bring unto the Lord; whether it be of men or beasts, shall be thine: nevertheless the firstborn of man shalt thou surely redeem, and the firstling of unclean beasts shalt thou redeem.

16 And those that are to be redeemed from a month old shalt thou redeem, according to thine estimation, for the money of five shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary, which is twenty gerahs.

17 But the firstling of a cow, or the firstling of a sheep, or the firstling of a goat, thou shalt not redeem; they are holy: thou shalt sprinkle their blood upon the altar, and shalt burn their fat for an offering made by fire, for a sweet savour unto the Lord.

18 And the flesh of them shall be thine, as the wave breast and as the right shoulder are thine.

19 All the heave offerings of the holy things, which the children of Israel offer unto the Lord, have I given thee, and thy sons and thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: it is a covenant of salt for ever before the Lord unto thee and to thy seed with thee.

20 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Aaron, Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land, neither shalt thou have any part among them: I am thy as these, let this thing be a cherem; or with an addition (determining it to a certain use) "let this be a cherem offered by me for holy uses." The first sort was wholly the priests'; but the latter was employed about the consecration of the people, as if it, or the priests' meal-offerings, were put into the hands of the Levites. And these devoted things, which became the priests' portion, differed in this from freewill-offerings, that every thing which was offered as a cherem might be eaten only by the priests in the holy place; but other freewill-offerings by the whole family in any clean place.

Ver. 15. Every thing that openeth the matrix That which first came out of the womb of any creature was to be the priests', if it were a male. If a female were the first-born, and a man followed next, that was not the priests', because it did not open the womb, as the Hebrews expound it (see Exod. xiii. 2).

The firstborn of men] See Exod. xiii. 13, xxxiv. 20. Of the priests of the Levites; with a view to the first-born of men mentioned before (not of unclean creatures, which were to be redeemed by a lamb, Exod. xiii. 13), and that after they were eight days old (Exod. xxii. 30).

From a month old] Then the money was due, but they commonly stayed till the fortieth day, when the woman was purified.

According to thine estimation,] Some think this relates not to what follows, that the priest should set a value upon them (for that was a set rate, five shekels for every one), but to what goes before, that, after a child was a month old, the priest should appoint a day for the payment of the redemption-money; either immediately after the woman had lain in a month, or on the fortieth day, that she might be purified and the child redeemed both together. But it rather refers to what follows: for though the price be determined, yet so is it in another case (Lev. xxvii. 3, 4), and notwithstanding is said to be by the estimation of the priest; because he was to take this money, not according to the quality of the person, but as much of a poor man as of a rich, and not more of a rich man than of a poor.

For the money of five shekels, &c.] Which was the price set upon the first-born, when they were exchanged for the Levites (ch. iii. 46, 47). This redemption of every first-born was a matter of great importance, and therefore so often mentioned, as a very learned friend of mine, Mr. Alix, observes, in his Reflections on the last four Books of Moses, ch. 2. For as the separation of the tribe of Levi to God's service instead of the first-born, whom God spared and preserved in Egypt (of which we read in the third chapter of this book), made every Levite become a living memorial of that great miracle wrought at the Israelites' going out of Egypt; so this law concerning the redemption of the first-born made a further impression upon their minds, of that mighty hand of God which compelled Pharaoh to let the Israelites depart out of his country.

Ver. 17. The firstling of a cow, &c. thou shalt not redeem.] For they were clean cereals; and only unclean beasts were to be redeemed (ver. 15).

They are holy.] Separated by my appointment for a holy use; viz. to be offered in sacrifice; not redeemed, nor put to any other use.

Sprinkle their blood upon the altar, &c.] Just as they did with their peace-offerings (Lev. vii. 31, 33).

Ver. 18. The flesh of them shall be thine. The whole body of the beasts (not merely some part of them), after the fat was burnt, became the priests' entirely.

As the wave breast and as the right shoulder As these parts of the peace-offerings were the priests' (see ver. 11), so that all their family, who were clean, might eat of the flesh of these firstlings, as they did of those firstlings which were not to be redeemed (ver. 15).

Ver. 19. All the heave offerings. He repeats what he had said in the beginning of this discourse (ver. 8), that he had given him all the heave-offerings; which comprehended those mentioned ch. vi. 19, 20.

Have I given thee.] Settled upon the priests and their whole family for their support, by an unalterable law (see ver. 11). It is a command of salt for ever before the Lord, &c.] 1. An everlasting covenant, never to be revoked (see upon Lev. ii. 13. And these things being to be eaten before the Lord, there was a place in the court of the women where they feasted upon them; as L'Empe- reur observes upon Middoth, cap. 2, sect. 6.

Ver. 20. The Lord spake unto Aaron.] See ver. 1. Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land. In the land of the children of Israel, whom he speaks of in the foregoing verse; where, having told him what reward he and his family should have for his service, he bids them be satisfied therewith, and not expect any more. And indeed it was so very liberal a provision, that their desires could not reasonably extend any further. For as they had two sorts of first-fruit offerings, one (ver. 12), so, after a tithe of that which was given to the Levites, there was another tithe of what remained to be spent in sacrificing at Jerusalem: that is, for the most part, upon the priests and Levites, unto whom, and unto the poor, it wholly belonged every third year (Deut. xiv. 22, 23, Exod. xxiii. 19, xxxiv. 20). Add hereunto the first-born, all the sin-offerings, and their share in the peace-offerings, and the skins of the sacrifices (which alone, as Philo observes, were a great revenue), and it will appear it could not be so little as a fifth part of the fruit of the country that came to the priests for their maintenance, as Mr. Thornike observes in the Rights of the Church in a Christian State, p. 211.

Neither shalt thou have any part among them.]
part and thine inheritance among the children of Israel.

21 And, behold, I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance, for their service which they serve, even the service of the tabernacle of the congregation.

22 Neither must the children of Israel henceforth come nigh the tabernacle of the congregation, lest they bear sin, and die.

23 But the Levites shall do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they shall bear their iniquity: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations, that among the children of Israel they have no inheritance.

When the land was divided, no fields, or vineyards, &c. were to be given to the priests, nor to any of the tribe of Levi. And, as the Jewish doctors say, they were to have nothing given them in the land for their support. So Jarchi upon this place, and Maimonides, and others, who endeavour to answer the objection which may be raised against this from the thirty-first chapter of this very book, ver. 28, 29, where a tribute was taken of the prey they got from the Midianites, and given to Eleazar and the Levites. This tribute, say they, was offered because the spoil came by executing God's vengeance upon a land that was not theirs (ch. xxv. 17). But of the land of Sihon and Og (which God bestowed upon them, as he did the land of Canaan), nothing was given to the priests and Levites: for they were admonished to the contrary (as they understand them) by these words, "neither shalt thou have any part among them!" no, not of the spoil.

Certain it is, that of the land of the country they were to have no part, God having otherwise provided for them, that they might attend wholly to his service, and not spend their time in tilling the ground, or feeding cattle, which would have taken up their thoughts very much from their sacred employment. Yet the Levites were greatly favoured, and had the offerings assigned to them, ch. xxxv. 2, &c. (which was executed by Joshua, as God commanded, Josh. xxi. 2, 3), whereby they were dispersed among the tribes of Israel, that they might the better instruct the people in the Divine law (Deut. xxxiii. 10; 2 Chron. xxx. 29; Mal. ii. 4, 5, &c.). By accident also the priests came to have a portion (see Lev. xxvii. 30, &c., and my notes there).

I am thy part and thine inheritance: For they were maintained in his house, and lived upon his altar, and fed from his table; as it is explained in Josh. xii. 14, "The sacrifices of the Lord God of Israel made by fire are their inheritance, as he said unto them!" which from their own words proves that they gave them no inheritance. And see ver. 33, of this chapter, where the Lord God of Israel is said to be their inheritance; who, it appears by the foregoing part of this chapter, and other places, made such an ample provision for them, that if he had given them any part of the land of Canaan together with it, there had been too great an inequality between them and the rest of the tribes of Israel. For without any share in the land, their portion was far richer than that of any other persons whatsoever. I have said enough to prove this already; but it may not be amiss to set it before the reader again a little more distinctly. As they had yearly the first-fruits of the whole country, which were at least the sixtieth part of the fruits it produced; and the first-fruits of the tithe given to the Levites (as it follows below, ver. 36), and all freewill-offerings; together with the money which arose out of persons and things devoted unto God; and all the firstlings of cows, sheep, and goats, and the redemption-money for the firstlings of such creatures as were unclean: so they had all the meat-offerings, offerings for sin, and the tithes and the tenth part of the tithe given to the Levites (as it is shouder of all peace-offerings, and the skins of all burnt-offerings; and the leaves made of the first dough, and the shew-bread, and (as Josephus and others ex-2pound Deut. xviii. 3), a considerable part of every beast that was killed for private use; besides the cities and land about them which were assigned to them, and the cities of the Levites, as it appears a vast difference between the priests and the rest of the people. For the first-fruits alone, if they were not less than the sixtieth part of the product of the country, might seem sufficient, especially if the firstlings be added, the priests not being the sixtieth part of the people; no, nor the hundredth part, as learned men have computed (see Bonfrerius).

Ver. 21. Behold, Now he gives the Levites notice of the recompense he would make for their service, as he had told the priests what they should have for theirs. And Aaron hath the delivery of this grant made to them from God, that they might see he did not mind himself, and the interest of his own family only.

I have given the children of Levi all the tenth! See Lev. xxvii. 30, and 2 Chron. xxxvi. 5, 6, where they are distinctly mentioned. Aben Ezra thinks the tenth rather than any other part was assigned, because it was a perfect number; ten being in simple numbers the highest to which we can arise, without repeating the numbers under it. For it is (as he speaks) the number of the workings of the hand, the first, whereupon all numbers do depend: which our Mr. Mede hath expressed, in my judgment, far better; who looks upon it as God's favourable dealing with men, in requiring but the tenth, which is in truth the least part of their goods, according to the first division. For when we proceed beyond ten, we begin to make a new division, as eleven is ten and one, &c. But we need not have recourse to such niceties (see upon Genesis xxviii. 22).

For an inheritance: Instead of a share in the land of Canaan, which other tribes had divided among them. And a larger inheritance this was than any other tribe possessed; for this was the smallest tribe in all, as it appears from comparing the part which is given them in the beginning of this book. For all the males of this tribe, from a month old and upward, were but two and twenty thousand (ch. iii. 29), whereas in the tribe of Judah alone there were above threescore and fourteen thousand men of war (ch. i. 96, 27), and yet the Levites had a tenth part of the product of the whole country; and the twelve tribes had only the other nine parts among them. Such a care had God of those who were peculiarly devoted to his service.

For their service which they serve, &c. As a reward of their service, of which see ch. iv.

Ver. 22. Neither must the children of Israel henceforth come nigh the tabernacle: or rather, "Therefore the children of Israel must not come near the tabernacle of the congregation, lest it was their work, and nobody's else; and therefore no other persons were to meddle with it: that is, they alone guarded the tabernacle, and afterward the temple;
24 But the tithes of the children of Israel, which they offer as a heave offering unto the Lord, I have given to the Levites to inherit: therefore I have said unto them, Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance.

25 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

26 Thus speak unto the Levites, and say unto them, When ye take of the children of Israel the tithes which I have given you from them for your inheritance, then ye shall offer up an heave offering of it for the Lord, even a tenth part of the tithes.

27 And this your heave offering shall be reckoned unto you, as though it were the corn of the threshingfloor, and as the fulness of the winepress.

28 Thus ye also shall offer an heave offering unto the Lord of all your tithes, which ye receive of the children of Israel; and ye shall give thereof the Lord's heave offering to Aaron the priest.

Levites should be so grateful as to offer to him the tithe of their tithes (as it here follows), for such uses as he should appoint.

Even a tenth part For the tenth part which God reserved to himself out of the land which he gave the children of Israel, was a kind of rent paid to him their supreme owner. This was thus paid to the Levites for their maintenance, thought good notwithstanding to reserve a tithe of this tenth part to himself; that thereby he might, as it were, hold his possession, and keep seisin (as the lawyers speak) of his own inheritance.

Ver. 27. And this—shall be reckoned unto you. Be accepted by God, the offerings heaved up to him in the sanctuary are (ver. 28), though it be but the hundredth part of the whole fruit of the land.

As though it were the corn of the threshingfloor, &c.] As if you paid such a tithe, as the Israelites do to you, out of all their own fields and vineyards: that is, they were to believe their offerings of this small part to be as acceptable to God, as that of all the tribes of Israel; and to be a right to what remained, when they had done this, as the people had to all the rest of the fruits of the earth, when they had paid the tenth part to the Levites.

Ver. 28. Thus ye also shall offer an heave offering—of all your tithes.] He would have them know that he ordered this, because he would not have the Levites have nothing to him, from whom they received so much; but they also should make him a grateful acknowledgment as well as others.

Ye shall give thereof the Lord's heave offering. It is called so often the "Lord's heave-offering," that they might the more willingly pay it out, out of a thankful sense of what they owed to him, the donor of all.

As a portion of Aaron. This tithe is thought to have been designed for the high-priest alone. Two great men in their time were of this opinion, viz. Nicolaus Lyra, and the famous Alphonso Tostatus. And another very learned person of our own (bishop R. Montague), thinks it not altogether improbable, that such a provision as this might be made for the high-priest and his family, state, and dignity: he being of great power and might, only less than the kings of Israel; and the inferior priests having a noble maintenance without this, from the first-fruits and offerings of the people.

But there is nothing to support this, but the mere letter of the text; for Josephus expressly says the contrary (lib. vi. Archeolog. cap. 3), and so do the generality of the learned. Thus it was also, that all the priests had their share in this tenth part by the Levites: which, till it was paid, the Levites might not spend, to their own use, any part of their tithe. And to secure this, "the priest was to be with the Levites when they took tithes" (as we read Neh. x. 37, 38), to take care that they set out a tenth part for them as priests. Whereby "the son of Aaron," I cannot think is meant the high-priest himself (for that had been below his dignity), opened the gates of it, kept out all strangers (i.e. all but priests and Levites), carried the tabernacle, and its vessels, when they were to be removed, &c.

They shall bear their iniquity:] They shall die for it, if they permit any one else to come there and do their work (see ver. 1).

I shall be a statute for ever—have no inheritance.] As all other persons were excluded from serving in the tabernacle, so they who served there were shut out from having any inheritance among their brethren. This was made an unalterable law, which provided another separate maintenance for them, by the tithes of all the land; as here it again follows.

Ver. 24. But the tithes—which they offer as an heave offering] That the people might not grudge to pay them the tithes for their service, he represents them as a heave offering which they offered to God, in gratitude to him of whom, as the supreme landlord, they held their land. Not that they were heaved up or waved before the Lord: but they were of the same nature with those tithes which the people gave, and which the Lord directed to his people, to separate things, separate to his uses; all which are called by this name of terumah (ver. 8). And particularly all the offerings which God required to be freely brought, for the building him a sanctuary, are called by this name of terumah, or heave-offering (Exod. xxv. 2, see there).

Ver. 25.] In all the foregoing part of the chapter (ver. 1, 8, 30), the Lord spake unto Aaron (though by Moses); but here his order is particular, directed to Moses; because that which follows would better come from him, than from Aaron; who was employed in acquainting the Levites with the donation God had made of the tithes to them (ver. 21), but it would not have been so proper for him to tell them what was to be given out of the tithes to himself and to the priests.

Ver. 26. When ye take—the tithes] In these words Moses confirms the report which Aaron had made to them, that the tithes of the land should be theirs, and their brethren the children of Israel have no right to them.

Then ye shall offer up an heave offering.] As the Israelites made their grateful acknowledgments to God by offering their tithes to him, for the use of his servants the Levites (ver. 24), so it was but fit that the offering of it for the Lord, even a tenth part of the tithes.
30 And ye shall eat it in every place, ye and your households: for it is your reward for your service in the tabernacle of the congregation.

31 And ye shall bear no sin by reason of it, when ye have heaved from it the best of it: neither shall ye pollute the holy things of the children of Israel, lest ye die.

Even the hallowed part] The sacred part was the tenth part, which they might not use; it being taken by God for his part (Lev. xxvii. 30). By which all the rest was sanctified to the use of the owner, when this part was taken out of it, which may possibly be here also intended.

Ver. 30. Say unto them.] Tell them the reason why this tenth part must be separated from the rest.

When ye have heaved the best thereof from it.] Taken out the tenth part as an offering to the Lord.

Then it shall be counted unto the Levites as the increase of the threshingfloor. &c.] Then the remainder may be as freely used by them as the corn or the wine of any man's land in Israel, when he had paid his tithe: but till then it was unlawful for him to enjoy it, because God was first to be served. This is made more plain by the next verses.

Ver. 31. Ye shall eat it?] After the hallowed part was taken out (ver. 29) all the rest was theirs, to be enjoyed as men do that which is their own.

In every place.] This seems to be said to distinguish these from the holy things given by God to the priests; which, being offered at the altar, were to be eaten only in the holy place; but the tithes, though they were a kind of offering to the Lord, yet not being presented at the altar, might be eaten anywhere, after the tenth part was given to the priests.

Your households.] All their family, servants as well as others, might eat of them, whether they were clean or not. And more than this, they might sell them to strangers, to buy other necessaries with the money they yielded, or exchange them for other commodities.

For it is your reward] See ver. 21.

Ver. 32. Bear no sin.] Suffer no punishment.

By reason of it.] For eating it, with your households.

When ye have hallowed from it the best of it.] When they had taken out the tenth part as sacred to God's uses (ver. 29), they might safely use the rest themselves as they pleased: for God had given it to them for their support, and therefore would not punish them for eating it, as he did those that did eat holy things which did not belong to them.

Neither shall ye pollute the holy things] Nor would there be any danger of polluting the holy things (which God had reserved to himself) by turning them to a common use, as there would have been if they had eaten the tithes, or other gifts, before the tenth part, which was God's, was taken out of them.

Lest ye die.] In the Hebrew it is, nor shall ye die: as those did who meddled with the holy things which God reserved for his ministers alone.
The water of separation made of the ashes of a red heifer. 11 The law for the use of it in purification of the unclean.

And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying,

CHAP. XIX.

Ver. 1.] They were both concerned in what follows; Moses to deliver the command, and Aaron to see it executed.

Ver. 2. This is the ordinance] Or, "the constitution of the law which is now passed into a law by God's command; who had ordered this water of purification to be made some time before, as appears from ch. viii. 7, but now sets down a rule for all posterity to observe in the making of it. It is the rather mentioned now, after the foregoing history, to free the people from that great fear they were of perishing in their uncleanness (ch. xvi. 12, 13), by showing them a way how to be purified from the greatest pollution, before they approached to the tabernacle.

That they bring thee] At the common charge of the people, because it was for their common benefit.

A red heifer] The Hebrew word parah, which we translate heifer, signifies a young cow; as par signifies a young bullock, not above two or three years old at most, as Kimchi and others observe.

Without spot.] This the Jews refer to the word red, which goes before, and take it to signify perfectly red, without the mixture of any other colour: for as to any other imperfections, they are provided against in the next words, without blemish: inasmuch that Maimonides, in his treatise on this subject, saith, that if this cow had two hairs black or white, it was unfit for this use. From whence other nations, particularly the Egyptians, derived the custom of sacrificing red oxen, as Plutarch tells us in his book De Iside et Osiride, τὸν δοῦν τοῦ τοποσίου καθεργονον κ. ι. &c. And he saith they searched them so very narrowly, that if there was one hair of hair black or white, or any that seemed it ὀπτέρων, "unfit to be sacrificed:" see Bochartus, par. i. Hierozoic. lib. ii. cap. 39, where he shows this was the most common colour among that sort of creatures in some countries.

No blemish.] See Lev. xxii. 20—22.

Upon which never came goke:] Had never been employed in ploughing the ground, or any other work; for according to the common sense of all mankind, those creatures which had been made to serve other uses became unfit to be offered to God. Whence Diomedes promises Pallas a cow of a year old, τὴν οὖς ἐκ τοῦ θησαυροῦ ἐγένετο ἄγρινον," which no man hitherto had brought under the yoke" (Hild. K). And so both Nestor, Odys. 1, and the like Bochartus observes out of Virgil, Ovid, and others, in his Hierozoic (par. i. lib. ii. cap. 33).

All this is very plain; but why a young cow, rather than a bullock (which is commonly appointed in sacrifices), and why one perfectly red, is not so easy to understand. If we had any reason to believe that those superstitions were among the Egyptians in the days of Moses, which were when Plutarch or Herodotus lived, we might very probably say (as children of Israel, that they bring thee a red heifer without spot, wherein is no blemish, and upon which never came yoke:

And ye shall give her unto Eleazar the priest, and some men of learning have), that this precept was given to preserve the Israelites from their religion. For they abhorred to offer a cow, whom they honoured as sacred to Isis. So Herodotus; they sacrificed males, both old and young, ταῖς δὲ θυσίας τοῖς ὑπὸ ἑρμοῦ, "but it is not lawful for them to offer females" (lib. ii. cap. 41). And therefore God, it might be thought ordered a cow in preference to a bullock; and for the same cause one perfectly red, because that was a colour odious and abominable to the Egyptians; who fancied Typhon (the author of all evil in their account) to be of that colour; and therefore offered him red oxen, as hateful to them as red men and asses were. Thus Plutarch and Diodorus Siculus. In opposition to which, it may be thought the colour was acceptable to God, because hated and abhorred by those idolaters: but I look upon what such late writers say as of no authority in this matter. And as there is no proof of any such customs among the Egyptians in Moses' time, so there is a high probability that the whole fable of Typhon was framed out of the fear which Plutarch here, and Bochartus has, most ingeniously endeavoured to make out, by many observations out of that book of Plutarch, and other authors (Hierozoic, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 34, p. 340, 341, &c.).

But supposing the antiquity of those superstitions among the Egyptians to have been as great as some fancy them, I cannot think, that if Moses had had any respect to them, he would have ordered such a great number of sacrifices as we read of in his law, without the least consideration of the colour of any one of them, and only mention the colour of this cow, which was no sacrifice. I rather think this perfect red colour was chosen because of its rarity; it being hard to find a cow without any least mixture of other hair. And though it might have been designed to the same end, there was a respect herein to that great expiation which was made by the sacrifice of Christ: with whose blood, though the apostle did not compare the blood of this heifer (because it was not offered), yet he doth compare it with the ashes of this burnt heifer, put into the water of purification. See Heb. ix. 13, where, after the blood of bulls and goats, he mentions "the ashes of this heifer sprinkling the unclean." For they were a more extraordinary sort of purification than any under the law, of which we nowhere read but in this place; nor of any command for the repeated burning of such an heifer to ashes (as there is for the anniversary sacrifice on the day of atonement), but only of the use of the water made of these ashes as off as there was occasion. But of this it will be more fit to treat in the following part of the chapter.

Ver. 3. Ye shall give her] They who brought her in the name of the whole congregation were to bring her to Moses, as the foregoing verse directs: and he and Aaron were to deliver her to Eleazar. Unto Eleazar the priest] It is commonly thought that Aaron might not be employed in the following work, because he would have defiled him, and madu priest, that he may bring her forth without the camp, and one shall slay her before his face.

4 And Eleazar the priest shall take of her blood with his finger, and sprinkle of her blood directly before the tabernacle of the congregation seven times:

him unfit to minister before God for a season; which was to avoid, even when natural infliction seemed to fall on him, the chance of being in any way defiled. The priest was not intrusted with this service, but it was committed unto the very next person to Aaron, who was to be his successor, because it was of very great weight and importance.

That he may bring her forth without the camp.] As a thing exceeding unclean; more impure than any common offering for sin. For the greater the impurity was that was laid upon any sacrifice, the further still off from the sanctuary it was carried. The bullock, for instance, which was offered for a sin committed by the priest, or the whole congregation, was in part offered at the altar, but the far greater part was to be burnt without the camp (Lev. iv. 12, 13). And so was the bullock and goad offered for all the sins of the people on the great day of expiation (Lev. xxvi. 27): and the scape-goat, which was designed for the same purpose, was not so much as burnt, but banished into a land not inhabited, nobody knows whither. All which more particularly represented Christ in his sufferings, as the apostle observes, Heb. xiii. 11, 12, and so did this in part; having something of the nature of that sacrifice which it was not sanctified to be slain at the altar, yet it was intended to be used to the same purpose, for the cleansing of the people from the greatest legal defilement.

And one shall slay her before his face.] Some person appointed by Eleazar (for it was not necessary a priest should do it) was to kill her without the camp. Where it is plain from ver. 5, 6, 9, there were more than one concerned in this office. But it could not be slain unless Eleazar was there; and it was to be done in his presence, who was the chief of the priests, to show that it was intended for God's service, though not offered as sacrifices were at the tabernacle before the Lord. And this is the reason, perhaps, why the care of this heifer is committed to Eleazar, and not to Aaron, because he officiated only at the tabernacle.

Ver. 4. Eleazar—shall take of her blood with his finger.] As they did in expiatory sacrifices (Lev. iv. 6).

Sprinkler of her blood] In the sprinkling of the blood, as the Jews observed, consisted the very essence of an expiatory sacrifice. Therefore, though this was not a sacrifice, yet it had something of that nature in it, and may be called a pisculum, an expiatory thing; though nothing was called korban, a "sacrifice," but what was offered at the altar, as our Dr. Outram hath most judiciously observed against Abarbinel, who calls this red cow an offering for sin.

Before the tabernacle] This manner of sprinkling the blood was used but in sacrifices slain at the altar, in the presence of God; and in this red cow, which was slain in the prospect of the sanctuary; towards which the priest was to look steadfastly while he sprinkled it; otherwise, the Jews say, it was in vain: which shows that the validity of this act, and of the purificatory to be made by it, was to be expected from the sanctuary. For the blood of that heifer, whose head was cut off to cleanse a city near to which a man was found slain by an unknown person, was not sprinkled; being slain, not in sight of the sanctuary, but in a valley near that city (Deut. xxi. 5, 6, &c.). And in this the Jews were so curious, that after the temple was built, this blood being to be sprinkled without it, care was taken in the book of the priests to send a letter to the governor of the gate Shushan, which was before it, should have lower battlements than any other gate of the temple had, that the priest might see the face of the porch of the house of God.

Seven times] This signifies the perfection of the expiation that was to be made by this red cow, on whose ashes the Jews thought so much, deeming it that they took care the priest, who was to see her burnt, should be put apart in a chamber of the temple (called "the house of stone"), that they might be certain he was free from all pollution by a grave, or a dead corpse. For the ashes of this burnt cow being the greatest and only cleanser for that defilement, they took it for a thing in itself unclean, and not to be defiled by which was to burn her. See Dr. Lightfoot's Temple Service, chap. 17, sect. 2, where he describes, out of Maimonides, and others, how solemnly the priest was attended when he went about this work. And the apostle had reason to mention the ashes of this heifer, wherewith the water was made for sprinkling the unclean, as the principal thing that "sanctified to be purified of the flesh," i.e. taking away body defilements: with which he compares the blood of Christ, as infinitely more powerful for the "purifying of the conscience from dead works" (Heb. ix. 13, 14). In which words, dead works, there is a respect (as our Dr. Jackson observes) to the main intention of these ashes, which were for the purification of those defiled by the blood of the" heifer, and not by the blood of the scape-goat, which was offered for the sins of the people, or for this purpose, without any danger of pollution, for a longer time than the law of ceremonies lasted. For ashes, being well kept, never perish; and therefore are an emblem of immortality. But it must be considered, that the frequent use of these ashes might exhaust the whole stock of them made at this time, and make it necessary the priests should supply another heifer for the same end; as the Jews say they did, though so rarely (as I shall note below), that this burning of a red heifer was not reiterated, if we may believe them, till the destruction of Solomon's temple. Which makes them a more notable figure, though not a perfect one (for no such can be found), of the power of Christ's blood to purify us for ever, without the repetition of it continually; which was the imperfect perfection of the legal sacrifices, that they must be often offered.

Ver. 5.] There was a great pile of wood (to which they set fire immediately after he had done sprinkling), in which this heifer was more entirely burnt than any public expiatory sacrifice before mentioned, ver. 3; but repetition that he should not be defiled (as by being burnt), because this was of all other things the most unclean, and to be utterly consumed at a distance from the sanctuary.

Ver. 6. Cedar wood, and hyssop, and scarlet.] These three things composed that instrument which the CHAPTER XIX.

7 Then the priest shall wash his clothes, and he shall bathe his flesh in water, and afterward he shall come into the camp, and the priest shall be unclean until the even.

8 And he that burneth her shall wash his clothes in water, and bathe his flesh in water, and shall be unclean until the even.

9 And a man that is clean shall gather up the ashes of the heifer, and lay them up without the camp in a clean place, and it shall be kept for the use of those who had defiled themselves by the dead; unto whom it was delivered when they had occasion for it. And this word reserved, or kept, imports, that these ashes were not for the use of that generation only, but for all posterity. And as many (which was commanded in the same form of speech, as be kept or reserved) were a type of Christ, as he was the food of life, or the bread that came down from heaven: so were these ashes kept as an emblem of the everlasting efficacy of his sacrifice. For there is no bodily substance under heaven (as Dr. Johnson speaks, book x. chap. 55) which can be so true an emblem or model of incorruption, as ashes are; for when the rest and use thereof are dissolved or corrupted, they are not capable of a second corruption.

For the congregation] This one heifer, being slain, and its blood sprinkled, and body burnt, afforded ashes enough to season as many vessels of water as the whole people of Israel should need.

Ver. 7. The priest shall wash his clothes, &c.] Though we do not find that Eleazar was employed, either in killing or in burning this heifer, which was only to be done in his presence, yet, having touched her blood, he became unclean; and therefore was to use these ceremonies for his cleansing; before he returned to his places, while he kept his holy clothes, or otherwise, was done when he had offered the great sacrifice of expiation, on the day of general atonement (Lev. xvi. 24).

Shall be unclean until the even.] So as not to come into the camp, I suppose, much less to the sanctuary, until sun-set; which was but a short time, considering the greatness of this heifer’s impurity; this being the common time of remaining unclean for the smallest defilements (Lev. xiv. 24, 25, 27, &c.).

Ver. 8.] This was a general maxim among the Jews, that the bodies of those beasts whose blood was carried into the holy place, polluted those that touched them: which is justified by Lev. xvi. 23. And therefore he that burnt this heifer, whose blood was sprinkled towards it, was to do the same as he that carried the scape-goat into the wilderness was also bound to do (Lev. xvi. 29).

Ver. 9. A man that is clean] Free from any legal defilement.

Shall gather up the ashes] They were the principal ashes, though the ashes of the cedar wood, byssop, and scarlet wool, were also mingled with them; which, being taken up, were pounded and sifted, as the Jews tell us.

Lay them up without the camp in a clean place.] The Jews say that the heifer, in aftertimes, being burnt on the pitch of Mount Olivet, which was over against the temple, they laid up some part of the ashes in a place near that mount, for the sprinkling of the people; and another part was delivered to the twenty-four courses, for the sprinkling of the high priests; and another third part laid up for a memorial in the enclosure of the court of the temple (see Dr. Lightfoot in the place before named). But there is no certainty of this, and it contradicts in part what is here commanded, that they should be laid up without the camp.

It shall be kept] Laid up, is ἐκτείνειν, as the LXX. translate it, to be reserved and kept for the use of others.

In a clean place, &c.] The word translated in a clean place is originally of a leper, who was kept in a house that was separate and apart. And as in all things relative to the Mosaic law, the purification was thought of, and the idea was, that the body of the heifer, which was put on the fire and burnt, should typify the purifying of the human body, of the people as a whole. And the ashes of this heifer were kept sacred, in order that the priests who had defiled themselves with the ashes of the dead might again become holy; and also that these ashes might be used for other defilements, that were not of the same nature as the dead, but of a spiritual kind, which the people might have occasion for, in order to be cleansed from the defilement of sin. This is signified in the Old Testament, as we shall see in the New Testament, by the blood and death of Christ; which was a purifying sacrifice, sent by the Holy Spirit into the world, in order to cleanse the people from the defilement of sin.

In a clean place, &c.] The words are it is sin; and we add, a purification, to explain the sense. For it was not a proper sacrifice for sin (as this phrase for sin sometimes imports, Lev. iv. 21), but had something of that nature in it (as I observed before); and yet it properly signified to purify or cleanse men from their sin, i.e. from such legal defilements as are mentioned afterwards. And the congregation of the children of Israel for a water of separation: it is a purification for sin.

10 And he that gathereth the ashes of the heifer shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: and it shall be unto the children of Israel, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among them, for a statute for ever.

11 ¶ He that toucheth the dead body of any man shall be unclean seven days.

12 He shall purify himself with it on the third day, and on the seventh day he shall be clean: but if he purify not himself the third day, then the seventh day he shall not be clean.

13 Whosoever toucheth the dead body of any man that is dead, and purifieth not himself, defileth the tabernacle of the Lord; and that soul shall be cut off from Israel: because the water of separation was not sprinkled upon him, he shall be unclean; his uncleanness is yet upon him.

14 This is the law, when a man dieth in a tent: all that come into the tent, and that is in the tent, shall be unclean seven days.

Ver. 12. He shall purify himself with it.] With the water of separation, mentioned ver. 9. Which he may not be designated chiefly, if not only, for the purging of this great impurity, by touching any man's dead body.

On the third day.] Then he was to begin his purification, by being sprinkled with it; which makes it probable that these ashes were kept in more places than the Jews mention without the camp (as afterward near Jerusalem), and he had sprinkled them in the cities of the Jews. For it had been too hard for all the people, nay, impossible for those who were remote, to go to Jerusalem the third day after they were defiled to fetch these ashes; which, therefore, were kept in several clean places, where everybody might easily have them to put into water, and be sprinkled with it. For as there was no sacrifice, so no preparation required to make this purification; but any clean person might sprinkle the water (ver. 16, 19).

On the seventh day he shall be clean.] Then his purification was perfected; but not without a new sprinkling on this day (ver. 19).

But if he purify not himself the third day, &c.] If he did not begin his purification on this third day, his sprinkling on the seventh would not make him clean. But it is very probable, that, though he omitted it on the third day, yet, if he purified himself on the fourth or fifth, or any day following, that being reckoned as if it had been the third, when he had made up the number seven, his cleansing might be completed.

Ver. 13. Purifieth not himself.] With the water of separation, in the manner before prescribed (ver. 12).

Delfeth the tabernacle?] If he approach unto it without this purification.

That soul shall be cut off.] He was to die for it if he did it presumptuously. Because the water was not sprinkled upon him.] Because he neglected the means of his purification.

He shall be unclean.] Remain in his uncleanness. His uncleanness is yet upon him.] Not to be purified now by this water of separation, but cut off from the body of the people. This still concerns those that came to the tabernacle presumptuously, being unpurified. If they did it ignorantly, a sacrifice was admitted for their sin (Lev. v. 17, 18).

Ver. 14. This is the law.] Concerning such defilements as these, by the dead bodies of men.

When a man dieth in a tent?] Wherein they now lived during their stay in the wilderness; and the same law obliged them, when they came to dwell in houses, in the land of Canaan.

All those that came near the tent shall be unclean seven days.] The meaning seems to be, that every person who came into the tent while the dead body lay there (or before the tent was purified), as well as those who were in it when the person died, should be unclean. For all the goods of the house were not made unclean but only all open vessels.
15 And every open vessel, which hath no covering bound upon it, is unclean.
16 And whosoever toucheth one that is slain with a sword in the open fields, or a dead body, or a bone of a man, or a grave, shall be unclean seven days.

17 And for an unclean person they shall take of the ashes of the burnt heifer of purification for sin, and running water shall be put thereto in a vessel:
18 And a clean person shall take hyssop, and dip it in the water, and sprinkle it upon the tent, and upon all the vessels, and upon the persons that were there, and upon him that touched a bone, or one slain, or one dead, or a grave:
19 And the clean person shall sprinkle upon the unclean on the third day, and on the seventh day: and on the seventh day he shall purify himself, and wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and shall be clean at even.
20 But the man that shall be unclean, and shall not purify himself, that soul shall be cut off from among the congregation, because he hath defiled the sanctuary of the Lord: the water of separation hath not been sprinkled upon him; he is unclean.

21 And it shall be a perpetual statute unto &c.). But here the sprinkling being made by some neighbour, hyssop alone sufficed; which every one knows was a cleansing herb, and easily procured: instead of which the gentiles, in their superstition, used branches of laurel, or of olive; as we learn from Joseph and Virgil.

Sprinkle it upon the tent, &c.] For the purifying of all the things, and all the persons above mentioned (ver. 14—16).

Ver. 19. The clean person shall sprinkle upon the unclean] Here he explains what was not so distinctively delivered, ver. 12. And I suppose both persons and things were to be sprinkled on both days, because he saith in general, upon the unclean; which seems to relate to all that is mentioned in the foregoing verse.

On the seventh day he shall purify himself, &c.] This seems to be meant of the clean person who sprinkled the unclean, and by coming near them, was in some sort defiled. But he was not to be purified by the water of separation; but only by washing his clothes, and bathing himself in water; and his uncleanness lasted but till the even, as it here follows in the rest of this verse (see ver. 21).

Ver. 20. The man that shall be unclean,] By a dead body, a bone, or a grave, &c.

Shall not purify himself,] By the water of separation appointed for that purpose.

That soul shall be cut off] As a contemptor of this law of God.

Because he hath defiled the sanctuary] This and the following words are only a repetition of what was said ver. 13, for the greater confirmation of it.

Ver. 21. He that sprinkled the water of separation shall wash his clothes.] Be reputed unclean, until he hath washed his clothes; which I suppose comprehends his body also, ver. 19.

He that toucheth the water of separation] As a man might chance to do, when he mingled the water and ashes together (ver. 17).

Shall be unclean until even.] And wash his clothes, it must be supposed from the foregoing words. For mere staying till even purified nobody, without some act of cleanness was all his life; and therefore tell us that devices they had to keep persons thus clean, for this very end and purpose (see Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, ch. 17, sect. 2).

Shall take hyssop,] When the priests sprinkled the lepers, or their houses, with the blood of a bird killed over running water, he dipped hyssop, cedar-wood, and scarlet-wool in them (Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 7; 49, 50, 52).
them, that he that sprinkles the water of separation shall wash his clothes; and he that toucheth the water of separation shall be unclean until even.

The soul that toucheth it? Or toucheth him. Shall be unclean until the even.] Not only he whom the unclean person touched, but he who touched the unclean person, or any unclean thing, was to be unclean till the even, and wash his clothes (as I said before) for his cleansing. No other cleansing was necessary for such kinds of uncleanliness as these. For sacrifices were required only for the uncleanness of lepers, and of a childbed woman, and of a flux of blood, or seed: all others were purged without sacrifice.

22 And whatsoever the unclean person toucheth shall be unclean; and the soul that toucheth it shall be unclean until even.

By this nice care, which is here taken, about the smallest bodily defilements, God intended (I make no doubt) to make them sensible how necessary it was to preserve inward purity; without which they could not be acceptable to God, though they approached to his sanctuary. For these laws, extending to what was done at home, as well as abroad, were a plain instruction, both that it was not sufficient to be pure in the eyes of men, and that nothing could be concealed from the Divine Majesty, who sees what passeth in secret.

CHAPTER XX.

1 The children of Israel came to Zin, where Miriam died. 2 They murmured for want of water. 3 Moses smiting the rock brought forth water at Meribah. 14 Moses at Kadesh dearest passage through Edom, which is denied him. 22 At mount Hor Aaron resigneth his place to Eleazar, and dieth.

Ver. 1. Into the wilderness of Zin.] From Rithmah, or Kadesh-barnea, they came at last into this wilderness, after many removals to other stations, of which Moses gives an account in the thirty-third chapter, from ver. 19, to ver. 36. For God led them, by the cloud, quite back again to the Red Sea (ch. xiv. 35), and from thence brought them into this wilderness of Zin; which is quite different from that mentioned Exod. xvi. called Sin; for this lay on the confines of Idumea, as appears from ver. 14, 15.

In the first month.] Of the fortieth year after they came out of the land of Egypt. For Moses gives an account of the transactions only of the first two years after they came from thence, and of the last: the rest he passeth over in silence, being spent in troublesome journeys; whereby all above twenty years old were consumed, by one disease or other. In those travels he shows how, at several removals (mentioned ch. xxxiii.) they were led back from Kadesh-barnea unto Ezion-Geber (that is, from the north to the south of the shore of the Red Sea), in which journey they compassed the land of Edom many days (Deut. ii. 1), that is, many years. For, from the time they left Kadesh-barnea till they returned back again was thirty-eight years (Deut. ii. 14).

The people abode in Kadesh.] Not in Kadesh-barnea, which was their fifteenth station, and in the confines of the south part of Canaan (ch. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3), but another Kadesh on the confines of the land of Edom, towards the Red Sea (ch. xxxiii. 36; Deut. ii. 3; Judges xi. 17).

Miriam died there.] Four months before her brother Aaron (ch. xxxiii. 38), and eleven months before Moses; being elder than either of them. For she was near a hundred and thirty years old, as may be gathered from Exod. ii. 4, 7, where it appears she was not a child when Moses was born.

Was buried there.] In Kadesh, where she died. But we read of no mourning for her, as there was for Aaron a little after (ver. 29).
spake, saying, Would God that we had died when our brethren died before the Lord!

4 And why have ye brought up the congregation of the Lord into this wilderness, that we and our cattle should die there?

5 And wherefore have ye made us to come up out of Egypt, to bring us in unto this evil place? it is no place of seed, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates; neither is there any water to drink.

6 And Moses and Aaron went from the presence of the assembly unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they fell upon their faces: and the glory of the Lord appeared unto them.

7 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

8 Take the rod, and gather thou the assembly together, thou, and Aaron thy brother, and speak ye unto the rock before their eyes; and it shall give forth his water, and thou shalt bring forth to them water out of the rock: so shalt thou give the congregation and their beasts drink.

9 And Moses took the rod from before the Lord, as he commanded him.
10 And Moses and Aaron gathered the congregation together before the rock, and he said unto them, Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock?

11 And Moses lifted up his hand, and with instrument of bringing the former water out of the rock in Horeb, that I cannot but think this was the very same rod; which being there called "the rod of God," (Exod. iv. 20,) it is very probable, that by God's order it was laid up somewhere before him in the sanctuary; though not before the ark of the testimony. For having been employed in doing so many wonders, it was not seemly it should lie in his own tent, as a common staff; but in the house of God, as a sacred wand. This, indeed, is nowhere mentioned, so I think it in things, which notwithstanding are plainly intimated.

Ver. 10. Moses and Aaron gathered the congregation] As God had commanded, ver. 8.

He said unto them, Moses, who was the chief actor, said unto them.

Hear now, ye rebels: The Talmudists fancy that this is the reason why Moses and Aaron were denied to go into Canaan, because he called God's people rebels: from whence they have framed this maxim, "He that treats the church contemptuously, which ought to be honoured, is as if he blasphemed the name of God." But they subvert the truth, who build it upon no better foundations. For Moses, the great minister of God, only uses God's own language to their fathers, ch. xxvii. 10, where he bids him lay up Aaron's rod, "as a token against the rebels." And if this was a sin, Moses committed it again not long after this, and in a higher strain (which nobody can think he would have done, if it had cost him so dear), when he saith, Deut. ix. 24, "Ye have been rebellious against the Lord ever since I knew you." Must we then, you water out of this rock?] In these words, also, some of the Jews (particularly Nachman) think they find the sin of Moses and Aaron; who here (they fancy) ascribe to themselves that which they ought to have acknowledged the work of God alone. But this is without any ground; for the plain meaning of the words is quite contrary: "Is it in our power, when God brought thirty thousand of a rock?" For we know not what the Latin translates it; it being a speech of those that wonder, like that I Kings xxi. 10, "Hast thou killed, and also taken possession?" As if Moses had said, "Strange! that you should think it possible for us to bring you water out of a rock, which is the work only of an omnipotent power!"

Ver. 11. He smote the rock twice: It seems the water did not gush out at the first stroke; which made him repeat it.

The water came out abundantly: So that their present necessity was supplied; and they also filled their vessels when they left this place, to serve them till they met with the convenience of water; as they did, I showed up ver. 3.

Ver. 12. ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not, Here interpreters have been much troubled to find what it was for which God was offended at Moses and Aaron: for though the text tells us expressly it was for their unbelief (whereby they gave great scandal, and did not sanctify him as they did formerly, before the Israelites), yet doth not clearly appear wherein this unbelief declared itself. Ababbinel hath collected several opinions of the Jewish doctors about this matter, which are no less than ten; after which he delivers his own, which seems to me as unsatisfactory as the his rod he smote the rock twice: and the water came out abundantly, and the congregation drank, and their beasts also.

12 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not, to sanctify rest were to him; for it is far-fetched, with too much nicely and subtilly, and relies also upon uncertainties. The plainest account of it, I think, is this, which none of them take notice of; that the water now coming out of the rock, was the same water the sea was divided for the death of Pharaoh; and was very sad both for her death, and, perhaps, for the ceasing of the water; and being unexpectedly assaulted by the people, who ought to have had a greater reverence for him, in a time of mourning especially, it was the occasion of a greater commotion of anger and inclination than was usually in him: which gave such a disturbance in his mind, and so disordered his thoughts that when God bade him take his rod, and go and speak to the rock, he fell into some doubt, whether God would grant them the favour he had done before; either, because they were so wretched a people, that it was not fit God should do any thing for them; or because he thought, perhaps, water might be at a distance, and that God would provide for them by some other means. For these are mentioned by the Divine writers that touch upon this history, that he did not believe; and that his spirit was so provoked, that "he spake unadvisedly with his lips" (Ps. cxi. 32, 33), which was when he spake those words, ver. 10, " Must we fetch you water out of this rock?" i. e. "is that a likely matter?" They bring words of the same sort with those of Sarah, Gen. xvii. 13, "Shall I of a surety have a child, who am old?" that is, "I cannot believe it." And when he saw the water did not come out at the first stroke, he might be so rash as to say, "Now it is plain God will give you none, but let you perish;" or words to that effect.

I know nothing more probable than this; unless the reader likes the opinion of Joseph Albo better, which is the ninth opinion mentioned by Ababbinel. That Moses and Aaron, having had such long experience of God's goodness to this people, and of his readiness to help them, ought not to have gone and made their complaints to God about the want of water (ver. 6,) but immediately, of themselves, gone to the God that would do nothing of God's power and mercy, which had never failed them, and called for water to come out of it. For now the tabernacle was built, and they had God dwelling among them (which they had not when he smote the rock at first), which ought to have bred in them the highest assurance that God would supply them. Dr. Lightfoot hath another conjecture (which I shall not pretend for them. And because he may judge which is most likely), that Moses and Aaron began to distrust God's promise of entering into the promised land, at the end of forty years; imagining, that, if they brought water again out of the rock, it must follow them as long as the other had done. For this he makes the sense of their words, that God would not do anything for them. And because we did at Horeh? Are all our hopes and expectations of getting out of the wilderness come to this? We never fetched you water out of a rock but once; and that was because ye were to stay a long time in me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them.

13 This is the water of Meribah; because in it the children of Israel strove with the Lord, and he was sanctified in them.

14 ¶ And Moses sent messengers from Kadesh unto the king of Edom, Thus saith thy brother Israel, Thou knowest all the travel that hath befallen us:

15 How our fathers went down into Egypt, and we have dwelt in Egypt a long time; and the Egyptians vexed us, and our fathers:

16 And when we cried unto the Lord, he heard our voice, and sent an angel, and hath brought us forth out of Egypt: and, behold, we are in the wilderness, &c. Now that is gone, must we fetch water out of another rock? O ye rebels, have ye brought this to pass by your murmuring, that we must have a new stay in the wilderness. Are we to begin our abode here again, when we thought we had been at the end of our travels? At this rate we shall never get out of this wilderness, &c.

To sanctify me i.e. Openly to assert me to be the Holy One of Israel, faithful to my promises (as well as infinite in power), of which they had given the Israelites occasion to doubt, by declaring some divine promises not having been fulfilled, &c. For the words plainly show that their sin did not consist only in an inward disaffection, but in such outward expressions of it in their anger and impatience, as might be apt to breed unbelief in the Israelites; who were already too prone thereto. And it is no improbable conjecture of a Jewish doctor (in his book of the Death of Man) and who put the Divine Glory not appearing now upon this rock, as it did at Horeb (Exod. xxvii. 6), which perhaps they expected; it gave some occasion to their unbelief: which, he thinks, was not so great a sin in itself as to have deserved the following punishment, had not God, in passing this sentence, have a respect to the excellency and dignity of their persons; in whom a fault of this nature was far more grievous, than in an ordinary man.

Ye shall not bring this congregation into the land] They brought them into the land of Sihon, and of Og: but not into Canaan, which was properly the land promised to them.

Ver. 13. This is the water of Meribah.] Called Meribah-kadesh, Deut. xxxii. 51, to distinguish it from scened Edom here. 7, where the Israelites are guilty of the same crime. Because the children of Israel strove with the Lord] Expostulated with him most unaptly, and accused him of unkindness to them (ver. 3, 4).

He was sanctified in them.] The Hebrew doctors differ very much in their opinions about this also, whether he was sanctified in the waters, or in the people of Israel, or in Moses and Aaron. Some fancy it is meant of the waters; viz. that God did himself great honour in bringing waters again out of a rock: and therefore the name of the place was called Kadesh, from his being sanctified there. Thus Chas. But it seems to have been called so before this, being a place well known to the Edomites. (ver. 16). The common opinion is, that he speaks of Moses and Aaron: for God's name, saith R. Solomon, is much revered when he doth not spare even his holy ones (Lev. x. 3). But Nachmanides expounds it of the Israelites, before whose face (as he expounds sanctified in them) God's power, and faithfulness, and goodness appeared: and was not mentioned in this verse; not Moses and Aaron. But all three opinions in the issue concur in this one, that God made his power, &c., appear in the eyes of all the Israelites, by bringing water out of a rock; and at the same time demonstrated his holiness and impartial justice in punishing his greatest friends for their unbelief.

From Kadesh] On the confines of the king of Edom's country.

Unto the king of Edom.] When the Israelites came out of Egypt, Moses speaks of Edom as governed by a king. This is one of the many instances of the error of the ancient versions. The Edomites are not mentioned, Gen. xxxvi. 39, who, for his inhumanity to the children of Israel, was shortly after punished with death; and the kingdom turned again into the government by dukes. For Moses (as he thinks) writing the book of Genesis in the latter end of his life (or then adding what was necessary to what he had written before), reckons immediately after Hadar several dukes reigning all at one time, in several parts of the country which they had shared among them (see Usser. Chronolog. Sacra, cap. 11).

Thus saith thy brother Israel.] In the language of these times, all that were near of kin called one another brethren: and these two nations descended from two twin brothers. Thou knowest] For they could not but have received intelligence before this time of such public things. All the travel that hath befallen us.] How we, and our fathers before us, have travelled from place to place, without any certain habitation (see Ps. ev. 12). Ver. 15. How our fathers.] After several removals from one part of Canaan to another.

Went down into Egypt.] Which was so public a thing (they being invited by Pharaoh, who sent carriages for them), that the Edomites could not be ignorant of it.

We have dwelt in Egypt] See Exod. xii. 40, 41, and what I have observed there. The Egyptians vexed us] See Exod. i. 11—13, &c. Ver. 16. When we cried] See Exod. ii. 23—25, iii. 7, 8.

Sent an angel.] See Exod. iii. 2, &c. Maimonides here by angel understands Moses himself; for the prophets are sometimes called angels, i.e. messengers sent from God (Judges ii. 1). This he asserts in the first part, and was Michael, the prince of the heavenly host, whom they commonly understand by the angel here mentioned. But many great men, particularly Masius, think this is short of the truth, unless we understand by Michael, the eternal Son of God, who was, as he speaks, "the perpetual prince and director of Kadesh, a city in the uttermost of thy border:
  17 Let us pass, I pray thee, through thy country: we will not pass through the fields, or through the vineyards, neither will we drink of the water of the wells: we will go by the king's high way, we will not turn to the right hand nor to the left, until we have passed thy borders.
  18 And Edom said unto him, Thou shalt not pass by me, lest I come out against thee with the sword.
  19 And the children of Israel said unto him, of the people of God." For though he was then properly made the messenger of the Father, when he took on himself our flesh, and dwelt among us, yet fresh from the beginning it was his constant care to reconcile men to God, and preserve religion among them. So that he might be called the angel of God before he became a man, because God the Father by him communicated with men about all things necessary for their good. And the Jews seem to have had some obscure notion of this, for which reason in Genesis, when he speaks, the angel whom Moses saw in the bush was the same whom Jacob calls the God of Bethel, and whom he calls the angel Redemer? of whom Moses, he saith, speaks in this place, and in Deut. vi. 12, "The Lord brought us out of Egypt." Certain it is, that thus the ancient Christians understood such places, taking the angel here spoken of to be the eternal Logos, or Word, as St. John calls the eternal Son of God: whose sense no man, I think, hath better explained than our Mr. Thorndike, who, though he confesses it to be plain by the Scriptures, that it was always an angel that appeared under the Old Testament, who is sometimes called by the proper name of God (Jehovah), yet this is as little probable as the notion of the church father, concerning the appearing of the eternal Word; who was that Lord who then assumed some angelical nature, wherein he might appear, to deal with men for a short time; after which he dismissed it, when he had done that business for which he assumed it.

Hith brought us forth
Ver. 17. Let us pass—through thy country—In our way to the land of Canaan; which God hath promised to give us.
  20 We will not pass through the fields, or—vineyards.—They engaged not to turn aside, as they went along, into any private man's grounds (see ch. xxi. 22).
  21 Neither will we drink of—wells.—Which any passed through, or was a well of the country; for it is only of the rivers, which are common to all creatures.
  22 We will go by the king's high way.—Keep in the common road, which is made for all passengers, by the king's allowance.
  23 We will not turn to the right hand nor to the left.—Out of the road, but go straight on.
  24 Until we have passed thy borders.—Got to the other side of the country of Edom.
  25 Ver. 18. Edom said unto him.—This sounds as if the whole country had joined in the following answer.
  26 Thou shalt not pass by me.—Go through our country
  27 (ver. 20).
  28 Lest I come out against thee with the sword.—The king bids them not attempt it, for he would oppose 29 We will go by the high way: and if I and my cattle drink of thy water, then I will pay for it: I will only, without doing any thing else, go through on my feet.
  30 And he said, Thou shalt not go through.
  31 And Edom came out against him with much people, and with a strong hand.
  32 Thad Edom refused to give Israel passage through his border: wherefore Israel turned away from him.
  33 ¶ And the children of Israel, even the their passage with all his forces. He was afraid, no doubt, lest they should seize his country, or spoil it, and therefore would not trust their declarations which they made to the contrary.

Ver. 19. The children of Israel. Which were sent upon this message (ver. 14). Or else some new ambassadors, whom Moses despatched with new entreaties after he understood his denial.
  34 Said unto him.—Gave him new assurances of their honest intentions.
  35 We will go by the high way.—Believe us, we will not step out of the common road.
  36 If I and my cattle drink.—Out of the wells before mentioned (ver. 17), which private men had digged, and therefore had a propriety in them.
  37 Then I will pay for it.—For water was commonly sold in those dry countries, where it was very scarce.
  38 I will only, without doing any thing else. The Hebrew words ein dober (which we translate, "without doing any thing else"), literally signify in our language, it is no word, i. e. not mere fair promises, but we will perform what we say.
  39 Go through on my feet.—Go through, as fast as we can travel on foot.
  40 Ver. 21. Edom refused to give Israel passage through his border. Which Grocius conures in his second book De Juric Belli et Paxis, cap. 2, sect. 13, as contrary to the law of nations; by which the highways, as well as the sea and the rivers of all countries, ought to be free for all that have a mind to pass through them upon just occasions. And he gives many examples of such permission out of heathen story; and therefore looks upon the denial of this as just ground of war with Sihon and Og (mentioned in the next chapter, where I shall consider it), as it might have been with Edom and Mecab, had not God prohibited it. Nor doth the fear, he thinks, which the Edomites had, it is rather a more just and a vast number of people pass through their country, alter the case; for no man's fear is to take away another man's right: and there might have been means contrived to remove this fear, by letting them pass through in small companies at a time, or unarmed. He had better have said, in my opinion, by giving hostages on both sides to the performance of conditions: for it might have put the Israelites in as great fear to have gone through in small parties, or if they should have disarmed themselves. But, when all is said, it seems not clear that all men have such a right, as that great man thinks they may claim. For no man can challenge a passage through a private man's ground without his leave; and every prince hath the same dominion in whole congregation, journeyed from Kadesh, and came unto mount Hor.

23 And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in mount Hor, by the coast of the land of Edom, saying, 24 Aaron shall be gathered unto his people: for he shall not enter into the land which I have given unto the children of Israel, because ye rebelled against my word at the water of Meribah.

25 Take Aaron and Eleazar his son, and bring them up unto mount Hor:

26 And strip Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son; and Aaron shall be gathered unto his people, and shall die there.

27 And Moses did as the Lord commanded: and they went up into mount Hor in the sight of all the congregation.

28 And Moses stripped Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son; and Aaron died there in the top of the mount: and Moses and Eleazar came down from the mount.

29 And when all the congregation saw that Aaron was dead, they mourned for Aaron thirty days, even all the house of Israel.

Put them upon Eleazar his son: Which was the investing him with the office of high-priest in which he now succeeded in his father's stead, and was by this ceremony admitted to it. The Talmudists say the manner was, first to put on the breeches, then the coat; which being bound about with the girdle, then the robe, upon which was the ephod, and then the mitre and golden crown (see Selden De Succession. in Postil. lib. ii. cap. 8).

Ver. 27. In the sight of all the congregation.] That they might all be witnesses of the succession of Eleazar to the office of his father.

Ver. 28. Moses stripped Aaron of his garments.] This Moses did as the minister of God; who now translated the priesthood to another.

Aaron died there in the top of the mount.] And was buried also there (Deut. x. 6). For great and hero persons were in ancient days usually buried in high places. So Joshua was (ch. xxiv. 30, 33), and Eleazar (Judges ii. 9), and Cadmus and Harmonia; who lived near the time of Joshua, as Bochartus observes in his Cannan, lib. i. cap. 23.

Moses and Eleazar came down from the mount.] After they had seen him laid in his grave by those that attended them.

This fell out in the fortieth year after they came out of Egypt, on the first day of the fifth month; when Aaron was a hundred and three-and-twenty years old, as we read ch. xxxiii. 38, 39, in the new moon of the month, which the Athenians called Hecatombaeon, the Macedonians Lous, and the Hebrews called Sabba, as Josephus glosses. But that last word should be סב, Sabba, as Josephus observes in his Historia Sacra et Exotica ad An. 25142), which answers, he thinks, to the nineteenth of our July. And so the Hebrews say in Seder Olam, “Aaron died on the first day of the month Ab;” upon which there is a fast in their rituals in memory of it.

Ver. 29. When all the congregation saw that Aaron was dead.] i.e. Heb. יִהְוָה עָשֶׂרָהוֹ, as the word see is used Gen. xiii. 1); that God had taken him out of the world, as Moses and Eleazar told them; who also came down from the mount with him.

They mourned for Aaron thirty days.] Till the end of the month. For so long their mourning seems, in those days, to have been continued for great persons (as it was for Moses, Deut. xxxvii. 9), though a week sufficed for private persons.

All the house of Israel.] Both men and women.
1 And when king Arad the Canaanite dwelt in the south, heard tell that Israel came by the way of the spies; then he fought against Israel, and took some of them prisoners.

2 And Israel vowed a vow unto the Lord, and said, If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand, then I will utterly destroy their cities.

3 And the Lord hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed them and their cities: and he called the name of the place Hormah.

4 ¶ And they journeyed from mount Hor by the way of the Red sea, to compass the land of Edom: and the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way.

5 And when they journeyed from mount Hor by the way of the Red sea, to compass the land of Edom: and the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way.

6 And the Lord hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed them and their cities: and he called the name of the place Hormah.

7 Then he fought against Israel.] He marched out of his country with an army; and fell upon the Israelites as they passed that way.

8 Took some of them prisoners.] He attacked, it is likely, at first, only the skirts of their camp, where he surprised some of them, and carried them away except in the Hebrew.

9 If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand.] Give us the victory over them.

10 They vow to reserve none of the spoil to their own use; but devote it all to destruction. For such was the nature of this vow called cherem (see Lev. xxvii. 29).
And the people spake against God, and against Moses, Wherefore have ye brought us up out of Egypt to die in the wilderness? for there is no bread, neither is there any water; and our soul loatheth this light bread.

And the Lord sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died.

Therefore the people came to Moses, and said, We have sinned, for we have spoken against the Lord, and against Moses, and against this place, and we live: and he prayed for the people.

Ver. 5. The people spake against God, and against Moses.] This shows they were in a very great rage, which made them so forgetful of their duty, as to charge God himself with ill conduct: whereas their fathers were wont only to murmur against Moses and Aaron.

Wherefore have ye brought us up out of Egypt?] The Hebrew word hēcliuthu (made us to go up) is a strange word (as Dr. Lightfoot calls it) in this language; declaring the great fume they were in when they uttered it.

To die in the wilderness?] As if they had said (so Abarbinel explains it), What can we expect or hope for but death from this long stay in it, without bread?

For there is no bread, neither is there any water.] For we want the most necessary things for the support of life (as he also well explains it), which they spake in a rage; for they had both, by a miraculous providence over them. They themselves immediately confess they had manna; and that they lately received water out of a rock. But nothing would satisfy, nor lead them, perhaps, if they had been brought to a country where bread and water were to be had without a miracle. For the meaning of their complaint was, that God did not deal with them as he did with other people, who (to speak in our phrase) do not live from hand to mouth, as the Israelites did, who had bread given them only to suffice for one day, and no more; and that such bread and water they received from him, so, they began now to want water again, which did not follow them, as formerly, out of the rock; and what they had in their vessels, perhaps, was near spent.

Our soul loatheth this light bread.] As for the bread God bestowed upon them, they were so far from being satisfied with it, that they loathed it, and call it by the scornful name of light bread: so we translate it.

Hebrew word habakkil; which, being the doubling of a word which signifies light or vile in that language, imports as much as very despicable, exceeding vile; or, as the LXX. translate it, very empty; having no substance in it to fill their stomachs. So Abarbinel expresses this passage, "We are tired with long journeys, which require more solid bread than this to support us."

Ver. 6. The Lord sent fiery serpents among the people.] So most of the Jews transplant this place; taking scorophim for an adjective (as grammarians speak), and consequently rightly translated fiery. But there are those who take it to signify a peculiar sort of serpents; being added to mezophim (serpents) by way of emphasis. But the famous Zachariah hath alleged a great many arguments to prove that they were a sort of serpents called ķâdrûs, because in winter they lived in dens and marshes; which being dried up in summer, they were called cherisydrus, because then they lived in dry places, and in the hot season had a most sharp, stingling poison, which, as Nicander saith, was stung by them, ἄγων μαμά, insinueringe grisbus. See Hierozoicen. par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 13, where he shows also they were flying serpents, of which the prophet Isaiah speaks, ch. ix. 29, xxx. 6; and that now was a hot season, wherein they were wont to be most venomous. For Aaron dying the first day of the fifth month (which answers to the nineteenth of July), and they mourned for him thirty days after which followed their encounter with the Canaanites, and then this murmuring, and this punishment; it must fall out in the latter end of August, when the dog-days were going out (see Vossius De Orig. et Progressu Idolol. lib. iv. cap. 56).

They bit the people.] This Aben Ezra and others think was a punishment suitable to their sin, which was evil-speaking against the Lord, by calumniating his providence. For Solomon compares a calumniator to a serpent, which bites if he be not charmed (Eccles. x. 11).

It is a strange fancy of Fortunatus Licietus, that Moses here speaks of a disease bred in the body which in children is called draceneclus, and not of the biting of serpents from without. (Lib. De Ortu Spiritu Nivente, cap. 51.) For which there is no ground at all; and, on the contrary, nothing more certain, that in Arabia, and Egypt, and other countries of Africa, there are such serpents as are here described. Yet Bartholinus seems to think that this opinion may be defended against Ezekiel de Castro, who confuted it (see Epist. Medici. Centuri. i. Epist. 30).

Much people of Israel died.] The whole wildness, through which the Israelites marched so many years, was full of fiery serpents and scorpions, as Moses's words import, Deut. viii. 13, which makes it the more wonderful, that we never hear of their being bitten and killed by them until now. But it is to be considered, that they were probably indirectly got from this, and from all other dangers (as the Hebrews well observe), which now withdrew its shadow from them, and let in the serpents upon them. Or rather (as Moses here expressly saith), God, who had hitherto kept them off, now sent them, and, perhaps, brought them from remote parts of the wilderness to destroy the whole of that generation.
the Lord, and against thee; pray unto the Lord, that he take away the serpents from us. And Moses prayed for the people.

8 And the Lord said unto Moses, Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it up upon a pole: and it shall come to pass, that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live.

9 And Moses made a serpent of brass, and they beheld it, and expect a cure from him. So the author of the Book of Wisdom, ch. xvi. 7, "He that turned himself towards it was not healed by the thing which he saw, but by thee, that art the Saviour of all." And therefore he calls it, in the foregoing verse, 'the sign of salvation, to put them in remembrance of the commandment of the law.'

Shall live.] Be cured, and restored to perfect health: which the Jews think the greater miracle, because naturally it would have made the inflammation greater. So Nachmanides: This rather would have increased the disease; for they who are bit by venomous beasts (according to the prescriptions of physicians), must not see the image of the beast by whom they are bitten: but this was commanded by God, that the Israelites might know both their disease and their medicine came from God, who made that whose aspect was hurtful to be the means of their cure.

Ver. 9. Moses made a serpent.] Whence this place seems to have been called Zalmonah (ch. xiii. 11), which imports an image, similitude, or resemblance of a thing represented by it. And another place thereabouts, as Dr. Lightfoot observes, called Maaleh Akrobat, seems to have had its name from the same thing, it signifying "the going up of scorpions," Josh. xv. 3.

(f of brass.] Polished, that it might resemble a serpent of a flaming colour; and being very glittering it might be the better seen far and near. So several of the Hebrew writers, particularly Nachmanides and Abarbinel, who observe, that God did not bid him make a serpent of brass, but only a saraph (ver. 8), i. e. a resemblance of a flaming serpent: which could not be made so well of any other metal as of brass; those saraphs (which we render fiery serpents) being fiery red, like copper or brass: of which there was a good store not far off from this place; for the next station to Zalmonah, where they now were, was Punon, or Pinon, as Moses tells us, ch. xxxv. 42. a place belonging to the Edomites (who had an ancient duke of that name), and the Israelitish name Abarbinel or Abarbinel, from which Moses, perhaps, had this brass (Hierozoniac, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 13). Put it upon a pole.] As he had been directed in the foregoing verse.

If a serpent had bitten any man.] Which was not present death, but made an inflammation, and such ulcers (as some conceive) as were incurable.

When he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived.] Though naturalists say the sight of brass was hurtful to those who were bitten, yet hence they received their cure: as the sight of Christ crucified naturally filled his crucifiers only with anguish, when they beheld him whom they had pierced, and were convinced he was their Messiah; but by the grace of God, became their only salvation through faith in him.

The Hebrews cannot but acknowledge a mystery in this brazen serpent, as Moses Gerundensis calls it; which our Lord Christ himself hath explained by his ψηλλος with Nicodemus (John iii. 14). As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish," &c. Where he doth not compare himself to the brazen serpent put it upon a pole, and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived.
10 ¶ And the children of Israel set forward, and pitched in Oboth.
11 And they journeyed from Oboth, and pitched at Ije-abarim, in the wilderness which is before Moab, toward the sunrising.
12 ¶ From thence they removed, and pitched in the valley of Zared.
13 From thence they removed, and pitched on the other side of Arnon, which is in the wil-found water; of the want of which they complained (see ch. xx. 2).

Ver. 11. Journeyed from Oboth, and pitched at Ije-abarim.] Not at the Mount Hor, where Moses died (ch. xxvii. 12), but another place in the confines of Moab, as it here follows (see what I have observed, ch. xx. 2).

In the wilderness which is before Moab.] Called the wilderness of Moab, Deut. ii. 8.

Toward the sunrising.] On the east part of it, as Jephthah observes, a great many years after this, that they came by the east side of the land of Moab" (Judges xi. 18).

Ver. 12. From thence they removed.] As they were about to remove from this last place, they received a command from God not to meddle with the country of Moab (Deut. ii. 9), which is the reason (as Abarbinel observes) that Moses here sets down briefly, whenever they lifted up the figure, and where they pitched; that it might appear they did not transgress that command.

Pitched in the valley of Zared.] Or, as some translate it, in Nachal-Zared; which is called Dibon-Gad, ch. xxxiii. 45. For this place had two names (as the same author observes), and it was just eight-andbirty years since the spies went up to survey the country, from Kades-barnea till their passing this brook, as we translate it, Deut. ii. 14. But I take Dibon-Gad rather to have been a place which lay upon the brook Zered.

Ver. 13. Pitched on the other side of Arnon.] The Hebrew word melahet may be translated on this side, or, on the other side. And some think they were now
"on this side of the river, and not yet gone over it.
Nor did they immediately come hither from their former station; but first to Almon-Diblahaim (ch. xxxiii. 46), which is also called Beth-Diblahaim in the wilderness of Moab, Jer. xlviii. 22, and Diblah, Ezek. vi. 15. And then, passing by Ar, in the confines of Moab, and approaching to the country of the children of Ammon, they then went to invade the Ammonites, being descendants from Lot, as well as the Moabites (Deut. ii. 18, 19, 37), but to pass over the river Arnon (Deut. ii. 24), to that side of it which belonged to the Amorites. For this river, at that time, divided the Moabites from the Amorites, as it here follows.

In the wilderness that compass out of the coasts of the Amorites.] Runs by the wilderness of Kedemoth, unto which the Amorites extended their dominion (Deut. ii. 26).

For Arnon is the border of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites.] This river flowed from the mountains of Arabia, where it had its rise, and fell into the Dead Sea (as Josephus saith, lib. i. Antiq. § 70, p. 380), and was the border of Moab from Anterina, "hounding the country of the Moabites, and of the Amorites;" the country of Moab lying on one side of it, and that of the Amorites on the other. For though the Moabites formerly possessed the country on both sides of Arnon, as far as Heshbon, yet the Amorites had driven them out of that part of it which lay next to them, and were the river the boundary of their two kingdoms (Ver. 26, 27). This Moses recites the more exactly, that it might appear the Israelites invaded none of the Moabites' possessions, but what was now pos-ness that cometh out of the coasts of the Amorites: for Arnon is the border of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites.

14 Wherefore it is said in the book of the wars of the Lord, What he did in the Red sea, and in the brooks of Arnon.

15 And at the stream of the brooks that goeth down to the dwelling of Ar, and lieth upon the border of Moab.

16 And from hence they went to Beer: that sessed by the Amorites: by which Jephthah defended the right of the children of Israel, in future times, against the Amorites, who possessed this country belonged to them ( Judges xi. 13-15. &c.).

Ver. 14. In the book of the wars of the Lord.] A proof of this Moses thought good to allege out of an authentic record in those countries, containing the history of all the wars that had been in those parts; which are here called the wars of the Lord, because he is the Governor of the country (as Ababines interprets it), "from whom and by whom are all things, which put down one, and setteth up another (as the Psalmist speaks) at his good pleasure." This book, he thinks, was written by some of the wise men of those nations (and so thinks Nachmanides), who, looking upon this conquest made by Sihon as a very memorable thing, put it down in their Annals; which, after the way of the countries were written, he thinks, in a poetical manner. There are those who are of opinion, that this book was written by Moses himself; who left in it directions to Joshua how to proceed in the wars of the Lord, when he conquered Canaan. So Dr. Lightfoot conjectures; and Benfrereseth doth not much differ from him. But I take that to be the case which this book contains, and Moses justifies what he writes concerning this conquest out of their own books; which he quotes just as St. Paul, in the New Testament, doth one of the Greek poets.

What he did in the Red sea.] These are the words of the book, out of which he quotes a small fragment: and the marginal translation of them is most proper,

Only the word eth is omitted; which makes the sense to be this, "against Vaheb in Suphah:" that is, he came (some such word must be understood) against Vaheb (a king of the Moabites), and overthrew him in Suphah, a place in the frontiers of Moab (see Deut. i. 1). Others understand by Vaheb the place where Sihon gave the Moabites this blow; which he did by falling upon them on a sudden, with a terrible fury. So Nachmanides understands these words besuphah; he stormed the city, and made a furious assault, when they thought not of it: for Suphah signifies a whirlwind, or stormy tempest ( Isa. v. 28).

In the brooks of Arnon.] The same Nachmanides takes it for a short river, which we translate and in, to signify rather and with; and these being still the words of the book before mentioned, the sense is this: In the same manner he smote the brooks or torrents of Arnon; upon which he fell like a tame, and carried all before him.

Ver. 15. At the stream of the brooks.] None, I think, can give a better account of these words than the same Nachman, who by eschewed hancehalim (which we translate the "streams of the brooks"), understands either a cliff from whence the torrents flowed (as Ashdod and Hapipsgah, Deut. iii. 17, are the hills from whence the springs gushed), or the valley through which the torrents ran; where they made a great bread water, which is here called an effusion of torrents, as R. Levi ben Gersom interprets the Hebrew words, esched hancehalim.

That goeth down to the dwelling of Ar.] Which extends itself as far as Ar, a city of Moab (ver. 28). R. Levi ben Gersom takes the word shebel (which we translate dwelling) to signify a place as well as Ar, towards which these torrents bent their course.

Lieth upon the borders of Moab.] Which leanneth or belongeth unto Moab, being in the border of that country.

Thus far are the words of the book of the wars of the Lord: and the meaning of them is, that the king of the Amorites took all these places by a sudden, furious invasion; which Moses therefore punctually recites, to show that the country of the Moabites now reached no further than Arnon: all the brooks, or torrents, and all the effusions of water as far as Arnon (i.e. the country about them), being taken from them by the Amorites, in whose possession it now was, and, perhaps, had been a long time. And therefore the Israelites took nothing from the Moabites when they conquered this country (as was said before), nor from the Ammonites neither; part of whose country the Amorites also had got from them (Deut. iii. 11); and the Israelites took from the Amorites, when they conquered Sihon and Og; and it fell to the share of the Gadites ( Josh. xiii. 25).

Ver. 16. They went to Beer.] A place which took its name from the pit, or well, which was here digged by God's order, as the next words tell us.

That is the well whereof the Lord spake unto Moses.] That is, saith Ababineel, that place was remarkable for the well, or the place where God gave us, of his own accord, without our petition; which he prevented by bidding Moses dig it for us.

Gather the people together, and I will give them water.] Which they now again wanted, being removed from the river Arnon; but did not murmur about it, as they had done formerly; and therefore God most graciously, when he saw their distress, provided it for them.

Ver. 17. Then Israel sang this song.] This extraordinary kindness of God, which prevented their prayers, and gave them water out of his own good pleasure alone (as Ababineel speaks), transported them with such joy, that it made them express their thankfulness by this song.

Spring up, O well;] As soon as they saw Moses and the princes thrust their staves into the earth, and the water began to bubble up, they said, with a loud voice, Come up, O well; that is, let waters flow abundantly to satisfy us all.

Sing ye unto it.] Or, as it is in the margin, answer unto it. The manner of the Hebrews was anciently to sing their songs of praise alternately, as appears from Exod. xv. 20. And so one company having said, Spring up, O well (which it is likely they repeated often), they called to the rest to answer to them; which they did, I suppose, in the following words.

Ver. 18. The princes.] 1. e. The seventy elders, and heads of the tribes.
19 And from Mattanah to Nahaliel: and 20 from Nahaliel to Bamoth:
21 from Bamoth in the valley, that is in the country of Moab, to the top of Pisghah, in the land of Moab, which looketh toward Jeshimon, 22 and Israel sent messengers unto Sihon king of the Amorites, saying, 23 Let me pass through thy land: we will not turn into the fields, or into the vineyards;
we will not drink of the waters of the well: but Dig let it be digged, and I will drink.

The nobles of the people digged it.] The other side of the choir, perhaps, took up the song again, repeating the sense of what the former company had said.

By the direction of the lawgiver.] Or, "together with the lawgiver," who began the work, and whose example they followed.

With their staves.] Without no more labour but only thrusting their staves into the ground and turning up the earth.
For, as R. Levi ben Gersom takes it, the ground here being sandy and very soft, was easily penetrated, though they were not likely to find water in it. But they believing Moses, and following his directions, and sowing amongst them; and with no more pains than a scribe takes when he writes with his pen. For so he translates the Hebrew word mekokek (which we render lawgiver) a scribe, or doctor of the law.

From the wilderness.] Mentioned ver. 13.

They went to Mattanah.] This and the place following are otherwise named in the thirty-third chapter, where the Amorites pitched their tents, but places through which they passed, till they came to the station from whence they sent to Sihon for leave to pass through his country.

Ver. 19. From Mattanah to Nahaliel, &c.] This, as well as the place next mentioned in this verse, seems to have been on the borders of Moab.

Ver. 20. From Bamoth in the valley.] Rather "from Bamoth (which signifies a very high place) to the valley." Or, as it may be translated, "from Bamoth, a wady" (in Moab, as we say the valley) in the field of Moab, &c., unto which they came next; for some such thing must be understood.

That is in the country of Moab.] Or near to it.

To the top of Pisghah.] Or, to the beginning (as the Hebrew word rosh may be interpreted) of the high Mount Pisghah; that is, they pitched at the foot of it, where the mountain began; which mountain was a part of the mountains of Abarim, as appears from Deut. xxxii. 49, xxxiv. 1.

Which looketh toward Jeshimon.] Or, "towards the wilderness." For so R. Levi ben Gersom interprets it; to a land that was shenemuth, untilled and desolate, viz. to the wilderness of Kedemoth: where they pitched and settled their camp; and from thence sent messengers to Sihon.

Ver. 21.] These messengers were sent from the wilderness of Kedemoth, which was in the skirts of his country (Deut. ii. 26), or lay just upon it; for there was a city of this name in that country, which was given to Reuben, in the division of the land (Deut. iii. 18).

Ver. 22. Let me pass through thy land.] They do not seem to desire a passage through the midst of his country, but only the extreme parts of it; which would have shortened their journey to the fords of Jordan.

We will not turn into the fields, &c.] This is the very same civil message which they sent to Edom.
(See Deut. ii. 22.) By whose example they pressed Sihon to grant them, at least, as much as the Edomites and Moabites had done (see Deut. ii. 38, 39).

Ver. 23. Sihon would not suffer Israel to pass.] This shows that they asked only to pass through the skirts of his country (see Deut. ii. 30).

Sihon gathered all his people together.] He not only refused to grant their request; but came in a hostile manner, with all the forces he could raise, to oppose their passage over Arnon.

Went out against Israel into the wilderness.] From whence they sent their friendly message to him, ver.
21, which Moses, in Deut. ii. 26, calls, "words of peace."

He came to Jahaz,] A city, it is probable, belonging to the Moabites; whither the Israelites, perhaps, retreated, when Sihon denied them a passage through his country. For Isaiah plainly mentions Jahaz, as a place either in the country of Moab, or near it (ch. xlvi. 29), and Jeremiah also, calling it Jahazah,
(ch. xlviii. 21).

Fought against Israel.] Who had orders from God, not to decline the battle (as they did with the Edomites and the Moabites), and were assured of victory (Deut. ii. 31). For they were Amorites, whose country God promised to Abraham (Gen. xv. 21), being part of the Canaanites, whom they were commissioned to destroy; for they were descended from one of the sons of Canaan (Gen. x. 16): which made this war with them to have a just ground; not because they denied the Israelites a passage through their country, against the right of nations, as Grotius thinks (which was but the occasion, not the ground of the war), but because they were of the seven nations condemned by God to destruction when they entered the land he bestowed upon the Israelites (Josh. iii. 10), and because Sihon came out armed against them, beyond the bounds of his own dominions; and fell upon them, when they had given him no provocation.

Ver. 24. And Israel smote him.] Utterly overthrew his army; and, putting them all to the sword, made themselves masters of his country.

Possessed his land.] For they destroyed all the inhabitants, men, women, and children (Deut. ii. 33, 34).

From Arnon unto Jabbok, even unto the children of Ammon.] This is a brief description of the extent of Sihon's country, which reached from the river
Arnon, the bound of the Moabites' country on the south
(ch. xxii. 36), unto Jabbok, which was the bound of the Ammonites' country on the north (Deut. iii. 16, Josh. xii. 3, xiii. 10).
But they meddled with no place that lay upon the river Jabbok, which belonged to the Ammonites; for that God had forbidden (Deut. ii. 37). By which it is observed, two hundred and sixty years after this, justified the title of the Israelites to all the country here mentioned; which they took not from the Ammonites, or Moabites, but from the Amorites, who

Vol. I.—85
the border of the children of Ammon was strong.

25 And Israel took all these cities: and Israel dwelt in all the cities of the Amorites, in Heshbon, and in all the villages thereof.

26 For Heshbon was the city of Sihon the king of the Amorites, who had fought against the former king of Moab, and taken all his land out of his hand, even unto Arnon.

27 Wherefore they that speak in proverbs say, Come into Heshbon, let the city of Sihon be built and prepared:

28 For there is a fire gone out of Heshbon, a flame from the city of Sihon: it hath consumed Ar of Moab, and the lords of the high places of Arnon.

29 Woe to thee, Moab! thou art undone, O people of Chemosh: he hath given his sons that escaped, and his daughters, into captivity unto Sihon king of the Amorites.

that is, the poets, whose composures, in those days, were very sententious.

29 Ver. 28. He speaks as if he already saw the thing done which he foretold, though it never came to pass. For they did not conquer Ar, which remained in the possession of Moab in Moses' time, as appears from Deut. ii. 9, 18, 29. But, in his poetical heat (or fury, as they speak), he anticipates, as if they had actually taken the capital city of Moab. For so Ar was, and afterward called Rabbath, and Rabbath-moba, i.e. the great city of Moab, to distinguish it from Rabbath-Ammon, i.e. the great city of the Ammonites. For so we find in Stephanus (De Urbibus), Ραββαθ-Μωβα, as Bochartus hath truly corrected it, in his preface to his Phaëles), which he calls παρὰ τὸν Ἡσσόπον. Thus he quotes a common saying about Nimrod, to justify what he writes of his greatness (see Gen. x. 9).

Come into Heshbon.] The words either of Sihon calling to his people, or of the Amorites exhorting one another to go to Heshbon, and help to repair the ruins that had been caused in it by the war, that it might become better than ever it was before.

For that is the meaning of the following words. Let the city of Sihon be built and prepared.] Let that place which Sihon hath chosen for his seat be built up again, and made fit for his reception.

Ver. 29. Woe to thee, Moab!] He goes on to foretell the calamity of the whole country.
CHAPTER XXI.

675

30 We have shot at them; Heshbon is perished even unto Dibon, and we have laid them waste even unto Nophah, which reacheth unto Medeba.

31 ¶ Thus Israel dwelt in the land of the Amorites.

32 And Moses sent to spy out Jaazer, and they took the villages thereof, and drove out the Amorites that were there.

33 ¶ And they turned and went up by the way of Bashan: and Og the king of Bashan went out against them, he, and all his people, to the battle at Edrei.

34 And the Lord said unto Moses, Fear him and the words without it may be thus truly translated, "and as far as Medeba." For so the Hebrew particle ashēr is sometimes used, to signify simply and, as Eccles. vi. 12, "ashēr mi, and who can tell, &c., so here ashēr ad, and unto, &c.

And here I think fit to note, that it is likely these verses were some part of the history of those countries: for a poetical way of writing was in use before prose, as Strabo tells us, lib. i. Geograph. p. 18, where he saith, "νηψεις λαος ο γα κατοικοναινυον μεμοντα του ποιητος," περιτοι γα η ποιητικη, &c. All set or artificial speech, (whether historical or rhetorical) was but an imitation of poetical compositions, the ancients knowing no other: Cadmus, and Pherecydes, and Hecateus, being the first who brought in this form of writing now in use (see Salmasius in Solinum, p. 541, and Cuperus in his Apotheosis Homer, p. 53). However, this is certain, that they who would instruct them put their lessons into verse, as Strabo there shows; where he says, p. 15, "ο παλαιος φιλοσοφος τα γεγονει πρωτη της ποιητικης εισηγησεν, &c., the ancients call poetry the first philosophy, forming our lives from tender years, teaching good manners, governing the passions and actions with pleasure." for which cause the Greeks and Romans instituted their children in their cities by poetry, of "γνωσιν ιχνον δειναι ιτολον ἀλλα σοφονονον, not merely for the sake of bare delection, but to form them to sobriety."

Ver. 31.] This he mentions again to make it the more observed, that this was the country of the Amorites, into which the children of Israel entered, not of the Moabites, who had been expelled out of it, as was notoriously known, there being a song in everybody's mouth which continued the memory of it.

Ver. 32. Moses sent to spy out Jaazer,] Another city formerly belonging to Moab, but now in the possession of the Amorites, which the Israelites did not visit at the time, as it is clear after they had conquered all the country before mentioned, they sent some men to bring them intelligence which way it was best to attack that city also, and the country about it. It was not far from Mount Gilade (2 Sam. xxv. 5, 6; 1 Chron. xxvi. 31), and both of them were famous for good pasture, and therefore given to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, who had much cattle (ch. xxxix. of this book, 1, 9, 4, 35, 36). After the ten tribes were carried captive from their own land, it fell into the hands of the Moabites again, as may be gathered from Jer. xlviii. 32.

Tog the villages] As well as the city itself. Drove out the Amorites] If it had not been possessed by them, they would not have meddled with it.

Ver. 33. They turned] Or returned (as the LXX. have it) from Jaazer.

Went up by the way of Bashan] A famous mountain (Psalm lxviii. 15) lying more northerly than the country of Sihon, and belonging also to the Amorites, where was very rich pasture, and an excellent breed of cattle (Deut. iv. 14; Psalm xxiii. 10), and stately oaks (Ezek. xxvii. 6).

Og the king of Bashan] The whole country of which he was king had its name from that mountain, not: for I have delivered him into thy hand, and all his people, and his land; and thou shalt do him as thou didst unto Sihon king of the Amorites, which dwelt at Heshbon.

and was called "the kingdom of Og in Bashan," Deut. iii. 10, where he is said, as well as Sihon, to be "a king of the Amorites" (ver. 8), and (ver. 11) that he was "of the remnant of the giants," or of the Rephaim, who were a mighty people in that country of Bashan (see Gen. xiv. 5), which in after ages was called Batanaea.

Went out against them.] To oppose their passage.

He, and all his people.] With all the men of war in his country.

To the battle at Edrei.] A city near that country, afterward called Adara, as St. Jerome tells us in his book De Locis Hebraicis. He offered the Israelites battle, which, by God's order, they accepted.

Ver. 34. The Lord said unto Moses.] That he might report it to the people.

Fear him not:] They had reason to be courageous (and not affrighted, because he was a giant), having lately overcome a mightier king than he, of which God puts them in mind in the end of this verse.

CHAPTER XXII.

1 Balak's first message for Balaam is refused. 15 His second message obtained him. 22 An angel would have slain him, if his ass had not saved him. 36 Balak entertained him.

And the children of Israel set forward, and pitched in the plains of Moab on this side Jordan by Jericho.

2 ¶ And Balak the son of Zippor saw all that Israel had done to the Amorites.

And Moab was sore afraid of the people, because they were many: and Moab was distressed because of the children of Israel.

And Moab said unto the elders of Midian, Now shall this company lick up all that are they should expel them out of their country, as they had done the Amorites: for they knew nothing of God's command to the Israelites, not to disturb them in their possessions. Some imagine, but I see no good ground for it, that they were afraid the Israelites should get possession of the land of Canaan, unto which they thought themselves perhaps to have a better title; being descended from the eldest daughter of Lot, who was the son of Abraham's elder brother; for Abraham was the youngest son of Terah. But nobody can see any right that this descent gave Lot or his children; there being no promise made of it by God to any person, but Abraham and his posterity.

B cause they were many: Too strong for the Moabites to deal withal; having conquered those who had been too hard for them, and taken a great territory from them (ch. xxii. 20).

Moab said] As Moses in his song, after they had passed the Red Sea, foretold they would be (Exod. xv. 15).

Ver. 1. Moab said] By messengers, which were sent (it is most likely) by the king and the princes of the country.

Unto the elders of Midian.] Who were their neighbours and confederates. The title of elders, it appears by this, was given in other nations, as well as among the Israelites, to the greatest persons in their countries: or the Israelites, after their manner, so called men everywhere, who were in high authority. For these persons who are here called elders, are called kings, ch. xxxi. 8, and princes, Josh. xiii. 21. In like manner they, who in the seventh verse of this chapter are called "the elders of Moab," are 35 So they smote him, and his sons, and all his people, until there was none left him alive: and they possessed his land.

For I have delivered him into thy hand, &c.] For their greater encouragement he adds his promise, on which they bide them rely, as if they saw it already done, that he would give them the victory over Og and all his forces, and bestow upon them his country. This history Moses reports more at large, Deut. iii. 1-3, &c.

Ver. 35. So they smote him.] After they had overthrown him and his army, they pursued the victory till they had destroyed all the people of the country; some part of which held out longer than the rest (as appears from ch. xxiii. 39, &c.), but at length was wholly subdued by Jair, the son of Manasseh, who had all the region of Argob given him for his pains (ch. xxiii. 41, Deut. iii. 14).

They possessed his land.] Wherein were sixty walled cities, besides a great many small towns (Deut. iii. 4, 5; Josh. xiii. 30). All which was given to the half tribe of Manasseh (Deut. iii. 13; Josh. xiii. 29, 30; 1 Kings iv. 13).
round about us, as the ox licketh up the grass of the field. And Balak the son of Zippor was king of the Moabites at that time.

5 He sent messengers therefore unto Balaam the son of Beor to Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people, to call in the next verse called "the princes of Moab." Which, it is evident, was the ancient language among the Egyptians (Gen. ii. 7, unless we suppose Moses, as I said, to have spoken in the language of the Jews), and, it is very likely, was also the ancient language to be had for their common safety elsewhere, and perhaps in much remote parts. For it is a known story, that when the Phenicians fled before Joshua, and forsaw the land of Canaan, they fixed in Afric; where they left this name of elders among the Carthaginians (see Mr. Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 14, p. 587, &c.).

Midian. This is not the country wherein Jethro was a prince; for that was not far from Mount Sinai, as appears from Exod. iii. 1, whereas this was remote from that place, adjoining to the Moabites, and near to Palestine: though it is very probable the people of both these countries were descended from Abraham, by one of the sons he had by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2). Now shall this company] The army of Israel encamped in the plains of Moab (ver. 1).

Lick up all that are round about us.] i. e. Devour us and all our neighbours (or our whole country), unless we join together to oppose them.

As the ox licketh up the grass.] They use this metaphor, of the Hebrews, to signify what they would conquer them, without a timely, resolute, and unanimous opposition; and likewise what a universal desolation they would make. For the words are in the Hebrew, the green of the field, i. e. not only the grass, but the leaves of trees, which oxen eat, as Bochartus observes out of the Scripture, as well as other authors (Isa. xxvii. 20). And to lick up is not lightly to touch with their tongue, but to eat and consume (see Hierozoeicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31).

Balak—was king] He was mentioned before, ver. 8, but here recorded to have been king of the country; who endeavoured to secure himself, by the assistance of his neighbours and allies; unto whom he sent this embassy, to advise with them what course it was best for him to take, in order to yield them a most effectual means for their security. This, I think, the word therefore importis.

Unto Balaam] A famous soothsayer, or diviner, as he is called in Josh. xiii. 22. That is, one who pretended to foretell future things, and discover secrets, &c. though not by good and allowable arts, but such as were absolutely prohibited to God's people (Deut. xxi. 10). He had been formerly a good man, and a true prophet, till, loving the wages of unrighteousness, he apostatized from God, and became a kosome, which we translate a diviner: that is (saith Aben Ezra) an astrologer; who, observing when men were under a bad aspect of the stars, pronounced a curse upon them, and thereby procured a curse upon those who were actually prohibited to God's people, gained him a great reputation. But this is not the import of that word, as I shall show in its proper place. Let it suffice now to observe that the Jews are so much him, saying, Behold, there is a people come out from Egypt: behold, they cover the face of the earth, and they abide over against me:

6 Come now therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people; for they are too mighty for me: peradventure I shall prevail, that we may smite of this opinion, that he had been a better man than he was now, that they take him up, as St. Jerome observes, to be the same person who, in the book of Job, is called Elihu. But Origen and some others think he was no prophet, but only one of the devil's hirelings, to the father to have been a poor Arcian; but God was pleased to put the devil by, and give what answer he thought fit: which Balaam himself plainly discerned, and therefore calls himself, "He who heard the words of God," &c. On which side the truth lies, we shall be able to judge, when we come to consider what passed between God and him, in the following history.

Son of Beor.] Who was also called Bosor, as some gather from 2 Pet. ii. 15, though that place may have another interpretation.

Pethor.] A city in Aram, or Mesopotamia (ch. xxiii. 7; Deut. xxiii. 4). This was the ancient name of the place; which in aftertimes the Syrians called Bosor, by an easy change of two letters; which is very usual. So Grotius understands those words (2 Pet. ii. 15). Balaan roe Bosor, "Balaam (not the son, but) of the city of Bosor."

Which is by the river of the land of the children of his people.] i. e. Near to Euphrates; which is commonly in these books called by the name of the river (Gen. xvi. 18, and many other places). This determines Aram (with the name of several countries thereabouts) to signify that which is called in Scripture Aram Naharaim; that is, the Aram which lay between the two famous rivers of Euphrates and Tigris. The former of which was called, by way of eminence, the river (though the other also was eminent), because it was nearest and best known to the Israelites. And Ptolomy mentions a city called Pachoria in his time, upon this river, which some take to be Pethor. And it is very probable that Abraham, before he came into Canaan; lived hereabout (Gen. xxiv. 4, 10; Josh. xxiv. 2). And here Jacob also served for his wife, and begat all the patriarchs, except Benjamin (whence the Israelites acknowledged their father to have been a poor Aramian, as we translate it, Deut. xxvi. 5), by which means some relics of true religion still remained in this country, though mixed with a great deal of superstition.

To call him.] To invite him to come to them.

There is a people come out from Egypt:] Which all the power of Pharaoh could not hinder. They cover the face of the earth.] Are exceeding numerous.

They abide over against me.] Lie encamped not far from me, and are ready to invade my country.

Ver. 6. Come now.] They were to speak in the name of the king of Moab (whose words these are said to be, ver. 7), there being no king; perhaps, at this time in Midian, but several little princes, who are called kings (ch. xxxii. 8).

Curses this people.] It seems they had an opinion in those days, which prevailed much in aftertimes, that some men had a power, by the help of their gods, to blast not only particular persons, but whole armies; so that they should not be able to effect their designs. This they are said to have done, sometimes by the bare words of imprecation; of which there was a set form among some people, which Æschines calls διορισμένον όμοιον, "the deter-
NUMBERS.

8 And he said unto him, Lodge here this night, and I will bring you word again, as the Lord shall speak unto me: and the princes of Moab abide with Balaam.

9 And God came unto Balaam, and said, What men are these with thee?

10 And Balaam said unto God, Balak the son of them, and that I may drive them out of the land: for I wot that he whom thou blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed.

7 And the elders of Moab and the elders of Midian departed with the rewards of divination in their hand; and they came unto Balaam, and spake unto him the words of Balak.

minate curse." Sometimes they also offered sacrifices, and used certain rites and ceremonies, with solemn charms: a famous instance of which we find in the life of Crassus; where Plutarch tells us, that Atticus, tribune of the people, made a fire at the gate, out of which Crassus was to march unto the war against the Parthians; into which he threw certain things to make a fume, and offered sacrifices to the most angry gods, with horrid imprecations upon him; which, he said, according to ancient tradition, had such a power, that no man, who was loaded with them, could avoid being undone.

They are too mighty for me! I am not able to deal with them without thy help.

Peradventure] But I hope, &c. For the Hebrew word ונ is not a particle of doubting, but of hoping: "Non est participium dubitantis, sed bene ominantis et spes," says Forsterus observes (I sa. xxxvii. 4; Zeph. ii. 3).

Drive them out of the land] I hope, by the conjunction of thy curses with my sword, I may be able to destroy them; or at least to drive them out of this country.

He whom thou blessest is blessed, &c.] The ancient prophets, as some power with God to obtain blessings from him, for others, as appears by the story of Abraham and Abimelech (Gen. xx. 10), and of Jacob, who blessed Pharaoh (Gen. xlvii. 7), and afterward all his own sons. And no doubt their imprecations were as powerful, when there was a just cause for them; according to what we read, 2 Kings ii. 24. And it is likely, while Balaam (who was a prophet, as appears by what follows, and is so called by St. Peter), continued a good man, he blessed and cursed no other way, but by prayer to God, and by imprecations in his name: which was imitated by other great men, particularly by king Cambyses in his speech to the Persians, recorded by Herodotus, in Thal. cap. 65, where he saith, that the purpose of the war, which was then being brought forth plentifully; and your wives and your flocks be fruitful, and yourselves enjoy your liberty: but if ye do not, πάντα τὸ τῶν αἵματα ἡμῶν θέλετε, Αἰματοφυλάκισθαι τοις ἡμῖν γενέσθαι. "I implore the quite contrary things to these to fall upon you." But when Balaam degenerated into a false prophet, and became a diviner, then he used spells and enchantments (as is plain by this history), and such rites and ceremonies as were the invention of wicked spirits; which Pharaoh's magicians, the Jews fancy, made use of to stop the Israelites at the Red Sea (see Exod. xiv. 2).

Ver. 7. The elders of Moab, and—of Midian] I take these two nations to have been ancient confederates; but the Jewish tradition is, that they had been always at enmity; and noting this by a common danger: just as two mastiffs (so they explain it), who are continually fighting, when they see the wolf set upon one of them, join together for their defence: because, if he devour the one, the other will not long survive him.

Departed with the rewards of divination] It was the custom among God's people, when they came to consult with a prophet, to bring him a present; as appears from 1 Sam. ix. 7, 8. And, indeed, from ancient time men were not wont to approach great persons without one (see Gen. xlii. 11, 25, 26).
CHAPTER XXII.

679 of Zippor, king of Moab, hath sent unto me, saying:
11 Behold, there is a people come out of Egypt, which covereth the face of the earth: come now, curse me them; and peradventure I shall be able to overcome them, and drive them out.
12 And God said unto Balaam, Thou shalt not go with them; thou shalt not curse the people: for they are blessed.
13 And Balaam rose up in the morning, and said unto the princes of Balak, Get you into your land: for the Lord refuseth to give me leave to go with you.
14 And the princes of Moab rose up, and they went unto Balak, and said, Balaam refuseth to come with us.
15 ¶ And Balak sent yet again princes, more, and more honourable than they.
16 And they came to Balak, and said to him, Thus saith Balak the son of Zippor, Let nothing, I pray thee, hinder thee from coming unto me: I for I will promote thee unto very great particular by his angels, whom he sent on messages to them, as long as there was any goodness left among them. This is most admirably expressed by Catullus:

"Præsentem nuncque ante domos invierrae castas Sorores, et nos mortali extenderit corum.
Celtis, non dum specte, solentem."

See Huetius in his Questions Alnetane, lib. ii. cap. 12, n. 1, 2. And indeed no account can be given, how it came into the head of Homer, and other poets, to bring in the gods appearing so oft as they do, upon every occasion, in all manner of actions, and at all times, to manifest himself, not only to the Israelites, but to other nations also, especially before the distinction of this people from them. So he did to Abimelech, Laban, &c., as well as to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. For, as Dr. Jackson hath well observed (in his first book upon the Creed, ch. 11), if they had never read of any such thing, all the poets in the world, had they beat their brains never so much, could not have thought of bringing the gods in a visible shape upon the stage, or interlacing their poems with their frequent apparitions: nor can any other account be given, how this came to be the common belief of the world, from one end of it to the other, that the gods revealed their mind to men; the philosophers, as well as ordinary people, in the east, west, north, and south, making no doubt of it: for Abaris Hyperboreus, and Zamolxis Geta, were no less famous in the north, than the Egyptian prophets were in the south.

But when mankind degenerated, and corrupted themselves in all manner of vice, then did they forsake them, and permitted evil angels to take the place of the good, and plunge mankind further into all manner of slights; especially into abominable idolatries. So that Balaam, who, I question not, had at first familiarity with God and his holy angels, abusing this honour God had done him, in making him a prophet, by employing it to serve his vile covetousness, God gave him up to the delusion of evil spirits; of whom he learnt enchantments. But at this time God was pleased again to appear to him himself, for the good of his people Israel, and to overrule all his bad inclinations: insomuch that Moses says at last he did not go as he had done, to seek enchantments (Num. xx. 1), but gave up himself wholly, for the present, to the conduct of God's Spirit, as I shall there observe.

And said,] By an angel, as Maimonides interprets it (More Nevoch, par. ii. cap. 41).

What men are these with thee?] He asks this question, partly to prove Balaam, whether he would tell him the truth of their business; and partly to make way for the following direction.

Ver. 10. Balaam said unto God.] To whom (it appears by this) and to the way wherein God communicated himself, he was not a stranger.

Balaam—hath sent unto me.] This shows the embassy was sent principally in his name; the Midianites only joined in it (ver. 5).

Ver. 11.] This verse contains only a brief report of the message that was sent him; to which he desired God would tell him what answer he should return.

Ver. 12. God said unto Balaam.] By an angel (ver. 9, and ver. 35).

Thou shalt not curse the people:] He not only forbids him to comply with Balak's desire, but gives him such a reason as was likely to prevail with him, if his prohibition was not sufficient; that it was impossible, with all his enchantments, to reverse the blessing which God had bestowed upon this people.

Ver. 13. Get you into your land.] He seems resolved to obey God, rather than comply with them; and therefore despatched them, as soon as he could, with the following answer.

The Lord refuseth to give me leave to go with you.] He acquaints them only with half of God's answer; for he omits the reason, which was the principal thing: though it may be thought to be implied: that if the Lord, on whose pleasure he pretended to depend, refused to let him go, it was in vain to attempt to curse them.

Ver. 14. The princes of Moab rose up.] They did not stand to dispute the matter with him, or to importune him; which shows that he had given them a peremptory denial.

Balaam refuseth to come with us.] They report his answer as imperfectly as he did God's; saying not a word, that the Lord refused to let him come. They were loath, perhaps (as the manner of such persons is), to deliver unwelcome news to their master.
21 And Balaam rose up in the morning, and saddled his ass, and went with the princes of Moab.

22 ¶ And God's anger was kindled because he went; and the angel of the Lord stood in the way for an adversary against him. Now he was riding upon his ass, and his two servants were with him.

23 And the ass saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand; and the ass turned aside out of the way, and went into the field: and Balaam smote the ass, to turn her into the way.

24 But the angel of the Lord stood in a path of the vineyards, a wall being on this side, and a wall on that side.

Commanded his ass to be made ready; for he had servants to wait upon him (ver. 23). And great persons in those countries were wont to be preceded by men, who, as they had done Pharaoh and the Amalekites, the king of Moab thought he might prevail against them by the same means.

Ver. 17. I will promote thee] He imagined, it is probable, that Balaam looked upon the rewards of divination, which he sent him, as not sufficient encouraging him to advance to some higher preferment in his court.

I will do whatsoever thou sayest unto me.] And moreover, he promises to bestow an estate, as great as he would desire, to support his new dignity.

Come therefore,] They add importunity to their earnest request.

Verse 18. Balaam—said unto the servants of Balak.] To the messengers whom he had sent, who, it appears by this, were principal officers in his court (ver. 15). For the servants of Pharaoh are called "the elders of his house," Gen. 1. 7.

I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God.] This is not the language of one who is a stranger to the true God; for no prophet in Israel ever spake of him in more familiar terms than these, the Lord my God: and for the present the command of God seems to have suppressed his covetous and ambitious desires, so that he durst not yield to them; though it appears, by what follows, he was strongly inclined to follow them.

Ver. 19. Tarry ye also here this night.] Take a lodging with me, as your predecessors did (ver. 8). That I may know what the Lord will say unto me more.] Whether the Lord will alter his mind, as he hoped he might; otherwise he would have rested in the first answer he received from God, and not tried again if he could prevail by his importunity to get leave to go; as these great promises of riches and honour made him desire.

Ver. 20. God came unto Balaam at night.] Notwithstanding which God was pleased again to visit him with his presence; at least by one of his angelic ministers.

If the men come to call thee,] Press thee again to comply with them.

Rise up, and go] Since thou hast such a mind to go, follow thy inclinations. These words seem to be spoken angrily, though not sarcastically, as some would have them, like those, 1 Kings xxii. 15.

The word which I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do.] Some take these words to be not so much a command as a prediction; that he should not be able to say a word but what he was ordered by God.

Ver. 21. Balaam rose up—and saddled his ass,] Commanded his ass to be made ready; for he had servants to wait upon him (ver. 23). And great persons in those countries were wont to be preceded by men, who, as they had done Pharaoh and the Amalekites, the king of Moab thought he might prevail against them by the same means.
25 And when the ass saw the angel of the Lord, she thrust herself unto the wall, and crushed Balaam's foot against the wall: and he smote her again.

26 And the angel of theLord went further, and stood in a narrow place, where was no way to turn either to the right hand or to the left.

27 And when the ass saw the angel of the Lord, she fell down under Balaam: and Balaam's anger was kindled, and he smote the ass with a staff.

28 And the Lord opened the mouth of the ass, and she said unto Balaam, What have I done unto thee, that thou hast smitten me these three times?

29 And Balaam said unto the ass, Because thou hast mocked me: I would there were a sword in mine hand, for now would I kill thee.

30 And the ass said unto Balaam, Am not I thine ass, upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day? was I ever wont to do so unto thee? And he said, Nay, in any thing which might give credit to their own religion.

If Maimonides had been acquainted with such things as these, he would not have said, that all this which hap-"happened is unusual. In fact, it is done in a prophetical vision (par. ii. More Nechomim, cap. 42), which is the conceit of R. Levi ben Gersom, also, who compares this with what we read, Hoesa i. 3, &c., concerning the prophet's taking a wife of whoredoms, &c., and denies the literal sense, merely because he could not imagine how an ass should be made to speak; nor could he, or any man else, tell how such a representation could be made to the prophet's imagination in a vision, but by the power of God; to whom the one was as easy as the other.

What have I done unto thee, There was some cause; for his foot was crushed, and he fell with her: but the ass could not help it.

31 Ver. 29. Balaam said unto the ass, One would have expected that he should have been astonished, and struck as dumb as the ass naturally was, to hear her speak so plain, and expostulate with him: but he was in a rage, or rather fury; so that for the present he did not consider any thing, but her untoward crossness. St. Peter observes so much, when he said the dumb ass rebuked "the madness of the prophet," because the word ἀγέλασαμαι (the Greek language, signifying that he was beside himself, not knowing what he said or did; partly out of anger, and partly because he was possessed with an eager desire and hope to serve Balak, and get the riches and honour he promised him, now that he had got leave of God to go to him.

Because thou hast mocked me. Or, as the Arabic version, printed at Paris, translates it, thrown me in the dirt. But they seem to have read the word otherwise than it is in the Hebrew; where it signifies either mocking, or exposing to scorn and laughter.

I would there were a sword in mine hand. This shows the height of his rage, to be thuscrossed in his designs; and, as the Jewish doctors take it, the height of his folly also; that he should pretend to be able to destroy the whole congregation of Israel with his enchantments, who needed a sword to kill a poor ass.

Ver. 30. Am not I thine ass. This does not prove that the ass understood what Balaam said, and thereupon returned this pertinent answer; but that the same Power which made the ass speak at first, continued to form such an answer as might convince Balaam of his error.

Upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine? The Hebrew words will not bear this sense; but are exactly rendered in the margin of our Bibles, ever since thou wast, that is, a rider; ever since thou be-ganst to ride as Aben Ezra conjectures. Whether many read it, "from thy youth," which may be supposed to be a long time; Balaam, in all likelihood, being now no young man, but for many years a famous prophet.

Was I ever wont to do so unto thee? Hast thou not 31 Then the Lord opened the eyes of Balaam, and he saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand: and he bowed down his head, and fell flat on his face.

32 And the angel of the Lord said unto him, Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass these three times? behold, I went out to withstand thee, because thy way is perverse before me:

33 And the ass saw me, and turned from me these three times: unless she had turned from me, surely now also I had slain thee, and saved her alive.

34 And Balaam said unto the angel of the Lord, I have sinned; for I knew not that thou stoodest in the way against me: now therefore, if it displease thee, I will get me back again.

had sufficient experience, in so many years as I have served thee, of my sure going! As much as to say, Thou shouldst have thought some unwonted cause had forced me to do three times what I never did before.

He said, Nay.] He could not but allow the truth of what was spoken by the ass.

Ver. 31. The Lord opened the eyes of Balaam.] He was not blind before; but his eyes were held as the eyes of the men of Sodom were, who could not see Lot’s door, though they found their way to their own houses. (Gen. xxxii. 1.)

He saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way.] He understood the true cause of the ass’s turning aside and falling under him.

He bowed down his head,] He first bowed his head, and then his whole body, in token of his most profound reverence.

Ver. 32. Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass these three times?] This serves to teach us, saith Maimonides, not to use cruelty towards beasts, but to treat them gently and mercifully (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 17), or rather as another of them makes the angel to say to Balaam, If I am commanded to reprove thee for thy injustice to thy ass, how much more for thy wicked intention to destroy a whole nation? But this is the sense of his speech seems to be, to reprehend the brutish stupidity of the prophet, in not apprehending some extraordinary hand of God, which turned his ass aside so oft, and at last made her speak.

I went out to withstand thee.] I was the cause of thy ass’s turning out of the way, and falling down, by my standing in the path to oppose thee, and stop thy proceedings (ver. 32).

Because thy way is perverse before me.] His intentions and purposes were not sincere and honest; for pretending to obey God, he designed, if he could, to serve Balak. The word we translate perverse signifies peripixed and intricata in the Arabic language: and so Bochartus thinks it should be translated here. The word I saw me, and turned from me I was merciful unto thee, in letting the ass see me, which saved thy life, as it here follows.

Unless she had turned from me, surely now also I had slain thee.] It had cost thee thy life if the ass had gone forward, and thy life alone; for I would not have done any hurt to her.

Ver. 33. I have sinned.] It is not certain that this refers to any sense he had of the perverse disposition of his heart; for it may have respect only to his outrageousness against his ass, which he confesses was without cause.

For I knew not that thou stoodest in the way.] Or rather, “but I knew not,” &c., for this seems to be said in excuse of himself, from his ignorance that the ass was turned out of the way by the angel.

If it displease thee, I will get me back.] He would not understand the angel right, who did not find fault with his going to Balak, but with his going with such bad intentions.

Ver. 35. Go with the men.] As God had before bidden him (ver. 20), and did not send the angel to forbid what he had allowed.

The word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak.] These words are something different from those in ver. 20, importing both, that he should not presume to speak a word but what he ordered, and that he should not forbear to speak what he bade him.

So Balaam went with the princes.] Whom he overtook after this stop, either at the place where they lodged, or where they stayed for him; but he did not tell them what he met withal in the way.

Ver. 36. Whence camest thou? This city seems to have been I camest from.] And Balaam, in the utmost coast.] He did him the honour to meet him at the very entrance of his country; and did not think it sufficient to send some of his court to receive him.

Ver. 37. Did not I earnestly send unto thee to call thee? After this compliment was paid to Balaam, the king could not forbear to let him know, he did not think himself well used by him, whom he had earnestly entreated to come to him, and at the first he would not.

Wherefore camest thou not?] As soon as I sent for thee.

Am I not able indeed to promote thee to honour? Dost thou doubt of my power to make thee a great man, if thou gratistest me in my desire? And his readiness he showed by this honourable reception of him.

Ver. 38. Lo, I am come unto thee.] Say no more of that; but he satisfied that I am now come.

Have I now any power at all to say anything?] Yet he would not have him expect that he should do all that Balak desired, or he himself was inclined to do, for he was under a higher overruling Power, which he could not gainsay.

The word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak.] He seems to acquaint him that he had received such a command from God (ver. 35), and he must be obedient.
39 And Balaam went with Balak, and they came unto Kirjath-huzoth.
40 And Balak offered oxen and sheep, and sent to Balaam, and to the princes that were with him.

Ver. 39. Balaam went with Balak.] This did not discourage Moses from carrying Balaam along with him into his country: where he hoped he might be persuaded to do as he would have him.

They came unto Kirjath-huzoth.] The royal city, it is likely; for it signifies in our language the city of streets; that is, a large city, which had many streets and (consequently) inhabitants in it.

Ver. 40. Balak offered oxen and sheep.] In thankfulness that he had procured Balaam's assistance, as he hoped, against his enemies.

And sent to Balaam.] They were such sacrifices as the Jews called peace-offerings; of which the offerers had a share for themselves and for their friends: and the sacrifices being over, Balak invited Balaam to come, to the feast he had made upon it.

And to the princes] The princes, I suppose, of Midian, and of Moab, who were sent on the embassy to him, and had succeeded in it (ver. 7, 15).

Ver. 41. On the morrow.] Having rested one night after his journey, Balak would have him go about his business, and see what he could do for him.

Brought him up into the high places of Baal.] All nations worshipped their gods in high places; and Baal was the god of this country; who was worshipped in more high places than one; unto all which he brought Balaam, that he might see where he could take the fullest view of the Israelities, and which of them would be fittest for his purpose. These high places were full of trees, and very shady (as I observed, Lev. xxvi. 30), which made them the fitter both for the solemn thoughts and prayers of such as were devout, and for the filthy inclinations and intentions of the wicked. Baal was the name of several gods, both male and female, as our Selden shows in his Syntagma ii. De Dis Syris, cap. 1. And I suppose Chemosh, the god of Moab, is here called by this name (signifying a lord), though that great man seems to take it for Baal-Peor (cap. 2, of that book).

He might see the utmost part of the people.] i.e. All their armies, to the very skirts of their camp.

CHAPTER XXIII.

1, 13, 28 Balak's sacrifice.

And Balaam said unto Balak, Build me here seven altars, and prepare me here seven oxen and seven rams.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. Build me here.] Upon one of the high places; which Balaam, it is likely, pitched upon as fit for his purpose.

Seven altars.] The number seven was much observed, we find among the Hebrews, by God's order (see Lev. iv. 6), but we never read of more than one altar built by the patriarchs, when they offered their sacrifices; nor was more than one allowed by Moses. Therefore in this there was something of the heathen superstition; who, worshipping the sun (who is principally meant by Baal), offered also to all the seven planets: unless we allow the conjecture of Fortunatus Scaccus, who imagines, that as Moses erected twelve pillars, according to the number of the children of Israel, when he entered them into the covenant of God (Exod. xxv. 4), so Balaam ordered seven altars to be erected, according to the number of the principal houses of Moab (Myth. Sacr. Sacr. Elsechromys, par. ii. cap. 59). But there is no ground for the conceit of Abarbinel, who, in his preface to Leviticus (sect. 4), saith, Balaam ordered this in emulation of the seven acceptable altars to God, built by seven men famous for piety; viz. Adam, Abel, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses. There is more certainty in this, that these altars were erected in honour either of the Most High, or of the greatest of their gods: for according to the account which both Festus and Servius have given us of the ancient times, they sacrificed to the celestial gods only upon altars (which were so called, because they were set above, built high and lofty), whereas to the terrestrial they sacrificed upon the earth; and to the infernal gods, in holes digged in the earth.

Prepare me here seven oxen and seven rams.] To offer one of each upon the several altars, as it follows (ver. 2). This number was used by pious persons, both in these days (Job xii. 8), and in aftertimes (1 Chron. xv. 26).

Ver. 2. Balak did as Balaam had spoken; and Balak and Balaam offered on every altar a bullock and a ram. Kings, in ancient times, were priests also; as appears by Melchizedek: but perhaps Balak only presented the sacrifices to be offered for him, and for his people; and Balaam performed the office of a priest. The only doubt is, to whom these sacrifices were offered. I suppose each of them had their several intentions: Balak supplanting Baal by them; and Balaam making his prayer to the Lord, though with such superstitious ceremonies, it is likely, as were used by the worshippers of Baal; in one of whose high places these sacrifices were offered. But it may also be supposed, that Balaam telling Balak he could not effect any thing without the Lord, the God of Israel, persuaded him to join with him at present in his worship, that they might prevail with him to withdraw his presence from the Israelities: for there is no reason to think, that Balak would go to inquire of the Lord, when he had sacrificed to other gods; and it appears evidently from ver. 4, that he pretended to sacrifice unto God; and would not have presumed surely to tell him so, if he meant otherwise.

7, 18 Balaam's parable.

And Balak did as Balaam had spoken; and Balak and Balaam offered on every altar a bullock and a ram.
3 And Balaam said unto Balak, Stand by thy burnt offering, and I will go: peradventure the Lord will come to meet me: and whatsoever he sheweth me I will tell thee. And he went to a high place.

4 And God met Balaam: and he said unto him, I have prepared seven altars, and I have offered upon every altar a bullock and a ram.

5 And the Lord put a word in Balaam's mouth, and said, Return unto Balak, and thus thou shalt speak.

Ver. 3. Balaam said unto Balak.] When he had laid the pieces upon the altars.

Stand by thy burnt offering.] Attend thy sacrifice, and pray to God to accept it. By this it appears, that these sacrifices were of a different nature from those mentioned in ch. xxii. 40, being burnt-offerings which were wholly consumed. And one of them seems to have been offered particularly for Balak, which he calls his burnt-offering; as the rest were for the princes of Midian, it is likely, stood by them representing all the people.

And here it is to be observed, that in old time, before the law of Moses was given, burnt-offerings served for all purposes in Divine worship; whether they gave thanks for blessings, or deprecated evil things, or prayed for good. Thus Noah, when he returned from the preservation in the ark, offered burnt-offerings (Gen. viii. 20). And when Job besought God to pardon his sons (ch. i. 5), and his friends (ch. xlii. 8), he offered sacrifices of this sort: and so did Balak and Balaam here use them, to procure blessings upon Moab, and a curse upon Israel.

(See ch. xxii. 40.) By myself, into some private place, to consult with God, and to exercise his enchainments (as may be gathered from ch. xxiv. 1), whereby he thought he might prevail for such a power as he desired, of cursing the people of Israel.

Peradventure the Lord will come to meet me.] He durst not be confident, because he had lately opposed himself to the standing prophet (ch. xxii. 31), in a frightful manner. Whateover he sheweth me! Whateover he reveals to me, either by word or otherwise. I will tell thee.] Deal faithfully with thee, and conceal nothing from thee.

He went to an high place.] Or rather, into a valley: for he was now in a high place when he sacrificed, and did not go into another high place, but down into the plain (as the Hebrew word properly signifies), where he might, in some solitary retirement, address himself to God, and expect his presence with him. So we translate it in the margin, he went solitary. Therefore, if we retain the other translation, it must be understood of some part of the high place, where he might be solitary, viz. into the grove, which high places Solomon, and Solomon's successors built to their temples, and had their oracles: as we learn from Justin, lib. xxiv. cap. 6, where he saith, the temple of Apollo postum est in monte Parnasso, &c., "was seated upon the mountain Parnassus:" and from Pausanias, who, speaking of the cave of Trophonius in Beotia, saith, ἐξ ἐκείνου τοῦ μνημείου ὑπὸ τὸν θεὸν ὕπερ τὸν ναόν, "the oracle being in a grove upon a mountain." The like might be observed of other oracles; which may con- tense this conjecture, that some such pretended oracles might be in this high place, where Balaam went for direction from God.

Ver. 4. God met Balaam.] Appeared unto him, as he had been wont to do in other places, ch. xxii. 9, 20, where the word Elohim is constantly used, as it is here and everywhere else, till we come to ver. 16, which strengthens the opinion, that the Lord hitherto spake to him only by an angel.

He said unto him, &c.] I.e. Balaam said unto God, when he saw him appear.

I have prepared seven altars, &c.] This shows he sacrificed unto God, and not unto Baal: and he represents it to God that he might be moved thereby to condescend to his desire. For sacrificing was a form of superstition; as we find in other places, particularly 1 Sam. xiii. 12, and that which he begged of God was, in all likelihood, that he would give him power to curse Israel.

Ver. 5. The Lord put a word in Balaam's mouth.] Told him what he should say. And therefore (saith Maimonides), he spake by the Spirit of God: which he makes account was the second degree of prophecy. Whence that description Balaam gives of himself, "He hath said, who heard the words of God" (par. ii. More Nevochin, cap. 45).

Thus thou shalt speak.] He commanded him to speak unto Balak, at his return to him, as he was instructed, and no otherwise. The words he bade him speak, are those translated below (ver. 7, 8, &c.).

Ver. 6. Lo, he stood by his burnt sacrifice.] He found him in the very same posture wherein he left him (ver. 3), which shows Balaam did not go far, nor stay long before he returned; and that Balak was earnest in his supplications.

He, and all the princes.] Who were concerned in the great success of his negotiation.

Ver. 7. He took up.] A Hebrew phrase for speaking aloud.

His parable.] Or, prophetical speech; which was sometimes delivered in parables, properly so called: that is, not in plain words, but in apt figures and resemblances (concerning which see Maimonides, par. ii. cap. 46). Here the Hebrew phrase signifies (as it doth in the book of Job) a weighty speech expressed in sublime and majestic words, Job xcvii. 1, xcviii. 1.

Balaam—hath brought me from Aram.] See ch. xxii. 5. Out of the mountains of the east.] The country of Mesopotamia lay eastward of Moab: and that part of it towards Arabia was stony and mountaneous (see Bochart's in his Phægè, lib. ii. cap. 6).

Curse me Jacob, and come, defy Israel.] Two different expressions for the same thing; only the latter word (which we translate defy) imports something of fury; because he would have had him curse them in such a prophetic rage as should have the most direful effects upon them.

Ver. 8. How shall I curse, whom God hath not cursed? &c.] As much as if he had said, Balak desires of me that which is impossible. In the Jerusalem Targum, this verse is thus paraphrased: "How shall I curse the house of Jacob, when the Word of the Lord hath blessed them! or how shall I diminish the family of Israel, when the Word of the Lord hath multiplied them?"
and from the hills I behold him: lo, the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations. 10 Who can count the dust of Jacob, and the number of the fourth part of Israel? Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his! 11 And Balak said unto Balaam, What hast thou done unto me? I look thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast blessed them altogether.

Ver. 9. For from the top of the rockes.] Upon which he then stood, when he spake these words, I see him.] As Balaak desired he might (ch. xxii. 41), though for another purpose; that he might curse the people. From the hills I behold him.] The same thing again, in other words, according to the manner of the eastern people. And both these may relate, not only to the present view he had of the camp of Israel, but to their future settlement in their own land; wherein they were represented to him as dwelling securely, under the protection of the Almighty. The people shall dwell! In the land of Canaan. Alone.] Not mingled with other nations, but separated from them by different laws, religion, and manners. It seems also to import their security and safety, by the situation of their country, and God's care of them. They shall not be reckoned among the nations.] Be a peculiar people by themselves; and therefore not liable to the power of my curses, like other nations. All this came to pass, partly by the natural situation of their country, which was surrounded with high mountains, and rocky precipices, so that the coming to it was very difficult; but more especially by their rites and customs; and particularly by their diet, which restrained them from common conversation with other nations, because they could not eat of their food (swine's flesh, for instance, which was a delicate dish among the gentiles, was an abomination to the Israelites). By which means they were the better secured from learning the religion of the gentiles, having so little communication with them, that they were looked upon by Diodorus Siculus, and others, as unso- sociable people, and thought to have an enmity to the rest of the world.

Ver. 10. Who can count the dust of Jacob.] This may refer either to their present, or their future increase; which was so great, that they might be compared to the dust of the earth, or the sand on the sea-shore, which is without number. Hereby he confirmed the promise made by God to Abraham, Gen. xiii. 16, and to Israel, ch. xxvii. 14, where he saith expressly, "Thy seed shall be made as the dust of the earth."

The number of the fourth part of Israel?] Any one of their camps, every one of which was grown to a vast number: for the whole host of Israel was divided into four camps, under the standard of Judah, Reuben, Ephraim, and Dan (as we read in the second chapter of this book), one of which camps lay more plainly before him than the rest, viz. that on the west, under the standard of Ephraim. Let me die the death of the righteous.] By the righteous he means Israel, who were now a people free from idolatry, which was the great crime of those days; and he desires either to be as happy as they in the other world, or that he might not die an immortal and violent death, but enjoy such a long life here as was promised to them. The author of Sepher Cosri takes it in the former sense; alleging this place as a proof that a future state was believed in ancient times, though not so clearly expressed in the prophetic writings, as other things are: for there is a certain resemblance, as the expression of the Almighty, Thou shalt see them: though shalt see but the utmost part of them, and shalt not see them all: and curse me them from thence.

And he brought him into the field of Zophim, to the top of Pisgah, and built seven altars, and offered a bullock and a ram on every altar. 12 And he answered and said, Must I not take heed to speak that which the Lord hath put in my mouth? 13 And Balak said unto him, Come, I pray thee, with me unto another place, from whence thou mayest see them: thou shalt see but the utmost part of them, and shalt not see them all: and curse me them from thence.

Ver. 14. ¶ And he brought him into the field of Zophim, to the top of Pisgah, and built seven altars, and offered a bullock and a ram on every altar. 12 And he answered and said, Must I not take heed to speak that which the Lord hath put in my mouth? 13 And Balak said unto him, Come, I pray thee, with me unto another place, from whence thou mayest see them: thou shalt see but the utmost part of them, and shalt not see them all: and curse me them from thence.

From whence thou mayest see them: It seems this was thought necessary to make their curses effectual; that they should have a sight of those whom they cursed, and that they should look upon them. The utmost part of them: The skirts of their camps. And shall not see them all:] He imagined, perhaps, that Balaam was afflicted at the sight of their multitude, and therefore durst not meddle with them. Curse me them from thence: He seems to desire him to curse only that small parcel of the Israelites whom he saw in the utmost part of the camp, hoping he might by degrees get them all, in like manner, destroyed.

Ver. 14. He brought him into the field of Zophim:] Or, as some translate it, unto Sede-Zophim; a place by the very name apt to enchant a superstitious mind with expectation of success, as Dr. Jackson speaks. It is thought by some to be so called from the watchers that were placed here, which the word Zophim imports. To the top of Pisgah:] A very high mountain in the country of Moab, from whence one might see a great way, and take a view of all the parts of Canaan (Deut. iii. 27, xxxiv. 1, 2, &c.). But on that side of 15 And he said unto Balak, Stand here by thy burnt offering, while I meet the LORD yonder.

16 And the Lord met Balaam, and put a word in his mouth, and said, Go again unto Balak, and say thus.

17 And when he came to him, behold, he stood by his burnt offering, and the princes of Moab with him. And Balak said unto him, What hath the Lord spoken?

18 And he took up his parable, and said,

Rise up, Balak, and hear; hearken unto me, thou son of Zipper:

19 God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?

20 Behold, I have received commandment to bless: and he hath blessed; and I cannot reverse it.

21 He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel: the

Ver. 19. God is not a man, that he should lie.] Do not imagine that God is like to one of us: he can by no sacrifices, or prayers, or other means, be induced to break his word; and therefore it is in vain for me any longer to importune him to curse Israel, when he hath said he will bless them.

Neither the son of man.] An usual variation of the expression of the same thing (Ps. viii. 4). That he should repent.] After his mind, when he hath absolutely resolved any thing, Balak seems to have fancied, that by the change of the place where he sacrificed (ver. 15), he might procure a change of the Divine purposes.

Hath he said, and shall he not do it?] What should hinder? for he wants no power to execute his will; and he cannot be moved to revoke his word by better information; nor can any thing happen which he did not foresee, to make him do otherwise than he intended.

Or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good?] This is the same with the former, after the prophetical manner of speaking. Omnia per jugo repetendo (as Conradus Pellicanus glosses) ad exaggerationem: only the foregoing words may be thought to refer to his threatenings, and these to his promises.

Ver. 20.] In these words he applies the general proposition, in the foregoing verse, to this particular case: God hath ordered me to pronounce a blessing upon Israel, for he himself hath blessed them; and I can neither reverse that blessing, nor go against his order.

Ver. 21. He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel:] Both the word even (which we translate iniquity) and the word anath (which we translate perverseness) are frequently in Scripture the hine, wickedness, viz. idolatry. And so Onkelos here understood it, when he thus paraphrased these words: "I see that there are none who worship idols in the house of Jacob, nor any servants of trouble and vanity (so they called idols) in Israel." And accordingly the Vulgar Latin expressly translates this verse thus, "There is no idol in Jacob, nor is there any image seen in Israel": which seemed so clear a truth to Johannes Forsterus, a famous professor of the Hebrew tongue in the beginning of the Reformation, that, in his explication of both these words in his Lexicon, he saith, "From this place all the prophets borrow these phrases, and translated them to express impiety, i. e. idolatrous worship, devised according to men's own humours and desires, and by the instinct of the devil: for Moses was the fountain of all the prophets." Thus he writes upon the word anath, and he repeats it again upon the word hine, So that this is the reason Balaam gives why God had blessed, and he could not curse them, because they were free from idolatry; unto which, unless they could be seduced, there was no hope that God would deliver them unto the power of their enemies; for which reason Balaam afterward counselled this prince to entice them to this sin by the Scripture that the reem hath two horns, Deut. xxxiii. 17, where we read of the horns of the unicorn (as we translate it), to which the reem and unicorn are compared (see also Ps. xxii. 27). Therefore the famous Ibochardus, after a long discussion of other opinions, thinks it most probable that the reem is a kind of goat, which the Arabians called algayzel, and is now called gazelles; which is a tall creature (some of them as high as a stag) with long and sharp horns. So that, if we compare the Israelites to be as eminent among other people as the reem was among other kinds of goats. Unless we will think it refers to what the Arabians observe, that it is proper to this animal to carry his head very high, and to erect his ears, which is an excellent emblem of the people of Israel; who being lately oppressed in Egypt, were asserted by God into a state of triumph, and raised to great height in this nation, in order to be exalted to a higher (Hierozoicen, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 27). At this Onkelos seemed to have aimed, when he translates these words thus, "fortitude and exaltation are his;" taking reem not for a proper name but for an appellative, as if it were derived from ramam, which signifies to exalt. I shall only add, that there is one passage of Scripture which refers to the God nor to the Israelites, but to Egypt before mentioned; as if the sense was, Though the Egyptians were as strong as a unicorn, they were not able to detain the Israelites any longer in bondage to them; but God brought them thence with a mighty hand and outstretched arm; so Joseph. Hispanics (lib. iii. Ikaunim, cap. xxv. 23). Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel.

Neither I, nor anybody else, have power to hurt them, by all the secret arts of sorcery and soothsaying which are practised in the world. It is not proper here to mention the various sorts of them; but it is manifest, from ancient history, that these curious arts (as it is called (see Learn. St. Luke, cap. xxxviii.) had got a kind of sovereignty in the eastern nations, who for many ages were much addicted to them. One of our own church hath said many excellent things concerning the original of this sorcery and idolatry, which commonly accompanied each other; to whom I refer the reader (see Dr. Jackson's Original of Unbelief, &c., &c.). The Vulgar Latin takes these words as if they were spoken in praise of the Israelites, that there were no enchantments or divinations used among them, nor any other diabolical arts, which were forbidden by their law in several places. From these they being as free as from idolatry (mentioned ver. 21), they were seene of God's favour to them. And so we acknowledge, in the names, the Hebrew words, as the same authors expressed, "There is no enchantment in Jacob, or among them;" from which God intended in all ages to preserve them by the prophets he raised up to them. And thus R. Solomon expounds this verse, either to signify that they could not be cursed, because they were not given to enchantments and divinations; or that they needed not to make use of diviners and having all that was needful for them to know revealed to them by God's prophets, and by urim and thummim, &c.

According to this time it shall be said—What hath God wrought! The LXX. translate the first words ἀραὶ καρποί, "when time shall be;" or, upon all occasions; not only now, but in future ages, men shall Behold, the people shall rise up as a great those, I will bring thee unto another place. Such a concept we see remains to this day in the Remish as well as others. It is probably that Balak added out for the still returns to his place. Such a day or hour which he thought might be more

30. And Balak said unto Balaam, Come, I will offer a bullock and a ram on every altar.
CHAPTER XXIV.

1 Balaam, leaving divinations, prophesied the happiness of Israel. 10 Balak in anger dismissed him. 15 He prophesied of the Star of Jacob, and the destruction of some nations.

1 And when Balaam saw that it pleased the Lord to bless Israel, he went not, as at other times, to seek for enchantments, but he set his face toward the wilderness.

2 And Balaam lifted up his eyes, and he saw Israel abiding in his tents according to their tribes; and the spirit of God came upon him.

3 And he took up his parable, and said, Balaam the son of Beor hath said, and the man whose eyes are open hath said:

4 He hath said, which heard the words of God, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open:

function of nature. The several species of it are mentioned by Maimonides, who saith the Zabai pretended to exercise this power, not only over particular persons, but over whole provinces, by certain words, and actions, and things, which nobody can understand to Balaam—(hath said.) Though the Spirit of God came upon him, which suggested the words mentioned, ver. 5-7, &c., yet it did not alter the temper and disposition of his mind; which was no less vain and ambitious than it was covetous, and possessed with a hatred of the Israelites; as appears by the counsel which he gave, at last, how to ruin them: this vanity seems to be pressed in these, and in the following words, wherein he magnifies himself more than the Spirit of God.

The man whose eyes are open) Who when he was awake received revelations from God, which was an extraordinary favour; for commonly he appeared to men in a dream. Others translate it, "whose eyes were shut," i.e. who was in a trance or ecstasy, so that he saw nothing with his bodily eyes, but only with his mind. The Jerusalem Targum thus paraphrases these words (which shows he looked upon them as a boasting of himself), "The man said, who was honoured above his brethren; to whom that was revealed, which was hidden from all the prophets."

Ver. 4. Which heard the words of God.) Mark what he himself, who delivers the words which he received from God.

Which saw the vision of the Almighty.) With whom he was so familiar, that he himself, at last, appeared to him in a vision (ch. xxiii. 16), as at first he appeared to him by an angel (ch. xxii. 33).

Falling into a trance.) There being in the Hebrew only the word noapheth, which signifies falling, we supply the sense by adding into a trance; lest any one

5 How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel!

6 As the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the river's side, as the trees of lign aloes which the LORD hath planted, and as cedar trees beside the waters.

should think he fell to the ground, or fell asleep; which seems not to be the meaning; but that he was in a rapture, perceiving nothing by his outward senses. Yet the forementioned Targum takes it as if he had fallen flat on his face; and the LXX. translates it, "he saw the vision of God in sleep;" according to that, Gen. xv. 12, "a deep sleep fell upon Abraham:" where the word nephela is thought by some to give a good explication of nephel in this place.

Having his eyes open.] His mind being then possessed with a clear apprehension of things, which cut off all communications with his outward senses; which were all locked up, and could discern nothing.

Ver. 5. How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel?] The same thing expressed in different words; which was an usual elegance in those countries; wherein he declares his admiration of the beautiful order in which he saw them pitched in the plains of Moab.

Ver. 6. As the valleys are they spread forth,] This refers either to the tabernacles, which extended themselves on either side of a wide space, which, like a valley, lay between; or rather, to the Israelites themselves, whom he compares to the fruitful valleys which abound with water; for the Hebrew word signifies either valleys or brooks of water by the river's side.] Which were far more green and flourishing, cool and pleasant, than those that lay in dry places.

As the trees of lign aloes] Growing in those gardens, or by the river's side; which perfumed the air by their sweet odours. For there are two sorts of aloes observed by the ancients; the one a tree which was very esteemed in India, and Arabia; and the other a plant or herb, out of which was pressed a purging juice: the former is often joined with myrrh in the Holy Scripture, and was burnt as a perfume, and called by the ancients ξηλαυλος (as Salmusius observes in his Exeget. Plin. upon Solinus, p. 1653, 1654, &c.), which is the lign or wood-aloes. An expression spoken of by Plutarch, in his Symposiæs (lib. vi. cap. 7), saith, some were wont to colour their wine, ηαιναλυλος, και χειροφασα, "either with aloes, or with cinnamon:" (which is meant of this wood-aloes), which gave the wine a pleasant taste.

Which the Lord hath planted.] Which grew naturally of themselves (so Dei nuta, as Bochartus glosses it) without any labour, care, or art of men used about them.

As cedar trees beside the waters.] The cedar was one of the most goodly trees in those countries, upon many accounts, particularly for its fragrancy; the Greeks being wont to burn the wood of it upon their altars, as the same Salmusius there observes (p. 561, 592). By all these metaphors, Balaam sets forth the present and future prosperity of the Israelites, and their fame, which spread itself into all nations round about; and seems to be represented by the sweet odours here mentioned.

Ver. 7. He shall pour the water out of his buckets,] I take this to be meant of God's pouring down rain abundantly, out of the clouds, upon the valleys, gar-king shall be higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted.

8 God brought him forth out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn: he shall eat up the nations his enemies, and shall break their bones, and pierce them through with his arrows.

9 He couched, he lay down as a lion, and as a dens, and trees, unto which the Israelites are compared; signifying that they should be exceedingly blessed by him: for they stood in need of nothing more than rain in those countries.

His seed shall be in many waters.] Or, "by many waters," i. e., he is made to abound in a ground well watered, and consequently bring forth a plentiful crop (Isa. xxxii. 20). There are those who refer both these to their numerous posterity; procreation of children being sometimes expressed in Scripture by the metaphors of waters, and fountains, and cisterns, as every one knows. And both the LXX. and Onkelos interpret this verse in the sense which particularly would arise of their seed. For thus the former of them renders this part of the verse; "There shall come a Man out of his seed, who shall rule over many nations." And the latter of them paraphrases in this manner; "There shall be a great King, who shall be anointed of his children, and shall have dominion over many peoples;" in which the Jerusalem Targum saith expressly is Christ: for thus this verse begins in that paraphrase: "A king shall arise out of his sons, and their Redeemer from among them," and thus concludes; "and the kingdom of the king Messias shall be magnificently exalted."

His king shall be higher than Agag.] This seems to have been the name of one of the Amalekites (for Agag is mentioned as one of the Hebrews who were enemies of the Israelites); and as the name of Agag afterwards was given to the Amalekites, so the name of Agag is here used as an epithet of the Messiah; and the Holy Ghost was by the Spirit of God in the person of Christ so represented to the fathers of Israel by the term of Agag; and the Jews themselves think this hath its full completion in the Lord Christ.

His kingdom shall be exalted.] They shall increase and multiply, till their kingdom be greatly enlarged; as it was in the days of David and Solomon, who were but shadows of the great king Messiah.

Ver. 8. God brought him forth out of Egypt.] All the power of Egypt could not detain them in slavery; but they came out from thence with a strong and high hand (Exod. xiii. 9, xiv. 8), and are grown a mighty people. See the foregoing chapter (ver. 29), where this hath been explained.

He shall eat up the nations.] Utterly destroy the seven nations of Canaan. Shall break their bones.] So that they shall never recover their strength.

Pierce them through with his arrows.] Having given them their deadly wound; or, as some translate the Hebrew words, "break their arrows in pieces," i. e. quite disarm them.

Ver. 9. He couched, he lay down.] He prophesies that the Israelites, having conquered the Canaanites, great lion: who shall stir him up? Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee.

10 ¶ And Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam, and he smote his hands together: and Balak said unto Balaam, I called thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times.

11 Therefore now fce thou to thy place: I thought to promote thee unto great honour; but, lo, the Lord hath kept thee back from honour.

12 And Balaam said unto Balak, Spake I not also to thy messengers which thou sentest unto me, saying, 13 If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord, to do either good or bad of mine own mind: but what the Lord saith, that will I speak?

14 And now, behold, I go unto my people: come therefore, and I will advertise thee what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days.

15 ¶ And he took up his parable, and said, Balaam the son of Beor hath said, and the man whose eyes are open hath said:

16 He hath said, which heard the words of God, and knew the knowledge of the most High, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open:

should sitte in their land, and take their rest, and live securely: which he speaks of with such confidence, as if it were already done.

As a lion, and as a great lion.] See ch. xxiii. 21, the signification of art and ladbl. Who shall stir him up?] Give them any disturbance or disturbance, and that they do not betake themselves to remote or secret places, when they go to sleep; but lie down anywhere (as Oppianus describes them, lib. iii.), as if they understood, that, let them sleep where they pleased, nobody durst meddle with them (see Bechatus in his Hierozoecon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 2), and therefore being applied to the Israelites, signifies such an absolute and secure possession of the land of Canaan, that none should have the boldness to assault, or give them any disquiet: which came to pass chiefly in the days of David and Solomon.

Blessed is he that blesseth thee, &c.] These are the very words wherewith Isaac concluded his blessing of his son Jacob (Gen. xxvii. 29), which God now confirmed from the mouth of one of their enemies, who spake, at this time, by his Spirit.

Ver. 10. Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam.] He could no longer forbear to express his indignation, to be thus treated by Balaam (whom he had sent for a great way, and entertained for some time), and therefore stopped him from proceeding, for the present, any further in his prophecy.

And he smote his hands together.] A token of vehement anger (Ezek. xxi. 17).

Balak said unto Balaam.] It is likely he was so full of wrath, that he could not speak presently, but expressed it only in his looks and actions.

I called thee to curse mine enemies, &c.] Thou hast not said one word to my purpose, but all quite contrary.

These three times.] Though I have been at great expense, and built altars, and offered many sacrifices, in three several places; but at what distance of time, one from another, doth not appear.

Ver. 11. Therefore now flee thou to thy place.] Get thee gone as much wealth more immediately, which is included in the word honour (ch. xxiii. 17).

Lo, the Lord.] Whom thou pretendest to obey.

Hath kept thee back from honour.] By not permitting thee to comply with my desire. It is uncertain whether these words were spoken in anger and scorn, or seriously and in good earnest; believing he was hindered by the Lord's will and pleasure from cursing Israel; which he had more reason to believe, than he had to hope he might obtain liberty to curse them (ch. xxiii. 27), and therefore was, without all reason, in this passion against Balaam.

Ver. 12. Balaam said unto Balak.] Prayed Balak to hear him properly, and a few words before he departed. Spoke I not also to thy messengers—saying.] Did not I, before I saw thee, tell those that came to invite me to thee, the very same which I told thee afterward.

Ver. 13. If Balaam would give me, &c.] So he told his messengers (ch. xxii. 18).

Of mine own mind.] According as I please.

What the Lord saith, that will I speak?] So he told Balak himself (ch. xxii. 38). All which he recalls to his mind, to show him that there was no cause for his anger, he having performed as much as he undertook; which was to follow God's directions, as he had done strictly. And it is likely, that by this just representation of what had passed between them, he brought Balak to a cooler temper, so that he suffered him to go on, to deliver what follows.

Ver. 14. And now, behold, I go unto my people.] And now I will obey thee, as well as God, and be gone to my own country.

I will advertise thee, &c.] But before I go, permit me to give thee some advice. So the Hebrew word jobetz constantly signifies, "to give counsel." And so the Vulgate and the LXX. translate it: but took it for the wicked advice, which we read, in the next chapter, was executed after Balaam's departure, and of which he was certainly the author (ch. xxxi. 16), and therefore thus translates the next words, "What thy people shall do unto this people." But the Hebrew text and the LXX. are directly contrary unto this; being as we translate the words, "What this people shall do to thy people." Therefore Onkelos, to take in the foregoing sense, without altering the latter part of the verse, puts in one word, and makes the whole run thus: "I will give thee counsel what to do, and (will show thee) what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days. And the Jerusalem Targum more largely and plainly, I will advise thee what shall do to this people; make them to sin; otherwise thou shalt not have dominion over them; but this people shall not domineer over thy people in the latter end of days."

In the latter days.] In future ages. This shows the foregoing words do not speak of what Moab should do to Israel by his advice; for that was done as soon as he was gone.

Ver. 15. Balaam, the son of Beor hath said.] This was the preface to his foregoing prophecy (see ver. 3).

Ver. 16. He hath said, which heard the words of God, &c.] This verse also is the same with the fourth, only a few words added, "And knew the knowledge 17 I shall see him, but not now: I shall behold him, but not nigh: there shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of of the Most High;" which he adds, to show his intimate acquaintance with the name of Lord over the world. For he speaks of God in the very same style which Moses doth, calling him both El and Schaddai, and Eljyon, and Jehovah; which demonstrates that he was not a stranger to the true God, though corrupted with bad affections, and addicted also to foul superstitions.

17. I shall see him.] Or, I do see him (for the future tense is often used for the present; that is, he saw the person of whom he was going to speak, represented to him in a vision.

But not now.] He saw him not as in being, now at present, but to come in future times.

I shall behold him, but not nigh.] The same thing in other words; but more plainly telling them, they were to expect of this person in their time, nor in the next generation, but in remoter ages.

There shall come a Star out of Jacob.] A star denotes a great person; and being understood to be spoken of Christ, it denotes his celestial original. And both Onkelos, and Jonathan, and the Jerusalem Targum take the Messiah to be here meant; and so do all the Jewish interpreters, and the most Christian interpreters (as Huetius observes, in his Demonstr. Evang. propos. vii. sect. 9), particularly Eusebius and Cyril of Alexandria: who, in his eighth book against Julian confutes his exposition of these words, which is this: Tost ὁ θεὸς τοῦ Δαβὶδ προφήτης καὶ τῶν ἑως εἰκόνα, πρῶτον ἐστιν νῦν. That this belongs to David, and to his successor upon the throne of David, and belongs not to the Messiah; but the Messiah or Son of Man is the second Coming of Christ, and belongs to the Second Advent; as Huetius replies, that if Balaam had spoken of David, and the kings of Israel, he would have said, "There shall arise stars out of Jacob," &c., whereas he speaks of one alone, ὁσὶ ὁ πρῶτος εἰκόνα, "as very illustrious among the stars;" which it is evident, can be none but Christ. Unto which I shall add the words of another. I have seen the visions of the Almighty in the vision of the Spirit, which is plainer here, because the person of Christ is comprehended in the person of David, and in the person of his kingdom, and the splendor of his dominion, and his great acts throughout the world, p. 72 and 80, where he makes this a prophecy of one kingdom alone to be in the world, viz., that of the Israelites, who are called "the people of the saints of the Most High," Dan. vii. 87, which is true enough, if he had understood the right meaning of Israelites; which are those, not after the flesh, but after the spirit.

It is not fit to conclude this without one observation more: that so long as the time of the Emperor Adrian, this was understood by the generality of the Jews to be a prophecy of the Messiah. For they followed one whose name was Chocab (i. e. a star), to whom they attributed the saying of Balaam. Now, the Chسؤال (which had four-and-twenty thousand scholars) applied these words of Balaam, and calling him Barchochab, i. e. "the son of a star," anointed his king, and carried a sword before him, crying, "Behold the very king Messiah!" This is reported by the Jews themselves in Tzovach David, and several other books; all which I think, doth not hinder, but that this holy person may be hereby signified in the first sense; though as a type of the Messiah, the great son of David, in whom it was completed.

A Sceptre shall be a possession, &c.] This is some think may first have a respect to David, and then to the Messiah, the king of Israel. But the Chaldee paraphrase refers the whole to Christ, whose words are these, "A king shall arise out of the house of Jacob, and the Messiah shall be anointed of the house of Israel.

Nor is it any wonder that Balaam should prophesy of him, since many years before he was born; and so plainly, that Moses himself doth not speak in plainer terms: but it is to be looked upon as the effect of God's infinite goodness, who would not have those, that were not of the seed of Abraham, to be wholly ignorant of what he intended to do for all mankind. And this was necessary to be plainly told them, because otherwise they would not have understood it.

Smite the corners of Moab.] The latter part of this prophecy, Huetius thinks, belongs to David, as the former part to Christ: which was the opinion of Maimonides, who divided the prophecy between them. And this was indeed literally fulfilled in Da-vid, who subdued the Moabites entirely, as we read 2 Sam. vii. 8; Ps. Ix. 8, civ. 9. Some translate these words, "he shall smite through the princes of Moab." So the LXX., ροης ἀπὸ τῶν Μεσία, which doth not after the sense. And it is no unusual thing with the prophets when they intend to speak of something nearer to them, to be transported by the Spirit of God, to speak of things a great deal more remote. To Balaam, and Balaam's prophecies, belongs S. Dan. 9. 24. To smite out of Jacob, first speaks of the greatest of all, above fourteen hundred years after this time; and then of David, who reigned about four hundred years after this.

Destroy all the children of Sheth.] They who interpret this of David, take Sheth to have been some great person in that country, or some place of great note, the inhabitants of which are here threatened to be destroyed. But these are mere conjectures, which have no foundation in history; whereas, if we understand it of Christ, and translate the first word, not he shall destroy, but (as Castalo and others do), he shall rule over, that sense is very remarkable; it being a prophecy of the Messiah, that he shall be no longer such a distinction as God now made between the Israelites and other nations by the peculiar laws he gave them at their entrance into Canaan, but all mankind, who are equally descended from Seth, shall be united under his government. And thus not only Lyraeus, and Abulensis, and others interpret it, but Onkelos also, whose words are, 'He shall have dominion over the sons of Sheth; for from the sons of Sheth it is reasonable, by the children of Sheth, to understand all mankind who were propagated from him, who succeeded in the place of Abel that was killed; all the seed of Cain perishing in the flood.

Ver. 18. Edom shall be a possession.] So it was in the days of David (2 Sam. vii. 14). Scir also shall be a possession:] This was a famous mount in the country of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 8), and being the strongest part of the country, may signify here, that no place should be able to hold out, though never so strongly fortified by nature or art. And so we read they all became David's servants, 2 Sam. viii. 14; 1 Chron. xviii. 13. For his children shall be] Or, the Israelites. Israel shall do valiantly.] For they subdued in those shall be a possession for his enemies; and Israel shall do valiantly.

19 Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city.

days many other countries: as we read in the forenamed chapters (2 Sam. xxiii. 1 Chron. xxviii.).

Ver. 19. Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion.] This may relate to Christ as well as to David, in whom it was literally fulfilled. And so Baal-Hatturim observes, that (ver. 16), it is said of Balaam that he “knew the mind of the Most High,” for he prophesied of the Messiah, when he said, “out of Jacob shall one come that shall have dominion.”

This is not only a parallel to the psalmist, and in Psalm lxxxii. 8, where the Psalmist describes, the universal kingdom of Christ in these words, “He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the end of the earth.”

Shall destroy him that remaineth of the city.] Not only rout them in the field, but take their defended cities, as Bochart renders it, gens una e nobilissimis.

But his latter end shall be that he perish for ever.] This God commanded Saul to execute (1 Sam. xv. 3), according to the doom passed upon them, after their fight with Israel (Exod. xvii. 14, 16), and he lost his kingdom for doing his work imperfectly; which the Vulgar Latin takes to be the meaning of the seventh verse of this chapter. Onkelos paraphrases the whole verse in this manner: “Amalek was the beginning of the wars with Israel, therefore his end shall be to perish for ever.” The Jerusalem Targum more plainly, “The Amalekites were the first people that made war against Israel; and in the latter days they shall make war against them.”

Ver. 21. He looked on the Kenites.] He standing now upon the top of Peor, which was, it is likely, the highest place of the country (for which reason Balak brought him thither, after he had tried other high places, ch. xxiii. 28), might see a great way, and possibly behold the very rocks wherein the Kenites dwelt. But what people are meant by this name, is not yet become evident: for there were a people called Kenites, who were part of the nation that inhabited the land of Canaan (Gen. xvi. 19); these cannot be here intended; for they were too far off from this place. And as for the Kenites mentioned in Judges i. 16, iv. 11, who dwelt among the Israelites when they came into Canaan, they had as yet no fixed state, but were with them in the wilderness. Therefore it is likely, they were some of the kindred of Jethro (originally derived from the same family that he was of), who remained in Midian; and adjoincd so close to the country of the Amalekites, that they are said to dwell among them (1 Sam. xv. 6).

For it is plain, the word Keni in Scripture and by the ancients, is a people, not of a particular person; and there might be a great many of them; some in Canaan, others in Midian; and of these latter, some went with the Israelites into Canaan when they conquered it, and others remained still in their own country; they seem all to come descended from one Ken, or Kain, mentioned Judges iv. 11, (as Seeliger conjectures in his Elenchus Tiraheres, cap. 23) Jethro’s posterity being but one family of this people.

Strong is thy dwelling place.] They were but a small people, who dwelt upon steep mountains.

Thou pourest thy parable.] Strong is thy dwelling place, verse 21 And he looked on the Kenites, and took up his parable, and said, Strong is thy dwellingplace, and thou pourest thy nest in a rock.

22 Nevertheless the Kenite shall be wasted, until Assur shall carry thee away captive.
23 And he took up his parable, and said, Alas, who shall live when God doeth this!
24 And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim, and shall afflict Assur, and shall afflict Eber, and he also shall perish for ever.

Macedon, as Hesychius tells us, they being a mixture (as Mr. Mede probably conjectures in his forty-eighth Discourse, p. 577), of the sons of Madai and Chittim. The Romans, indeed, afterward overthrew the Greek empire, but we do not read that they made war against the Assyrians till the time of Trajan, who subdued them, and reduced them into a province, as Dio relates (lib. lxviii.).

Shall afflict Eber.] This was done by the Romans, not by the Greeks. For we are to understand by Eber, the Hebrew nation, the children of Eber, Gen. x. 21. So the LXX. translate it, τωι Ἐβραίοι: the name of Hebrews being as plainly derived from Eber, as that of the Jews from Judah. Now they were not afflicted by Alexander in his conquests, but rather kindly treated by him: and therefore this cannot be meant of the Greeks; unless we will think it fulfilled in the time of Antiochus, who descended indeed from the Macedonians, but did not come from that country; nor did he afflict them long, much less make them desolate, as the Romans under Vespasian and Titus did; which seems to be here intended.

He also shall perish for ever.] This doth not refer to Eber, but to the nation that afflicted him, viz. the Roman empire; which he prophesies shall not always afflict others, but at last be utterly destroyed itself. Aben Ezra, indeed, refers it to the kingdom of the Seleucidae, or the Greek empire: but R. Isaac, before mentioned, thinks the destruction of the Romans is intended in this prophecy; only he fancies it is to be accomplished by a Christ not yet come.

Ver. 25. Balaam rose up, and went.] As Balak had commanded him (ver. 11), and returned to his place:] Unto his country, viz. Mesopotamia. But he was detained by the Midianites in his passage thither: among whom he was slain, as we read in the thirty-first chapter: for men are said to do that which they design and endeavour to do (Exod. viii. 18; Numb. xiv. 40). If this be not the meaning, then, after he came to his own country, he returned to the Midianites, at their entreaty, or by his own inclination; and (either as he was going home, or when he came back) gave that impious counsel which was executed not long after this, as we find in the next chapter: for that he was the author of it, we are assured by three Divine writers (see 2 Pet. ii. 15; Jude, ver. 11; Rev. ii. 14).

It is a strange exposition which Baal Hatturim gives of his going to his place; that is, saith he, he went down into hell. But it may serve to confirm the common interpretation of that which is said of Judas, Acts l. 32.

Balak also went his way.] To Kiriah-Huzoth, I suppose, mentioned ch. xxii. 39.

CHAPTER XXV.

1 Israel at Shittim commit whoredom and idolatry. 6 giveth him an everlasting priesthood.

1 And Israel abode in Shittim, and the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab.

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. Israel abode in Shittim.] A place in the plains of Moab (where they lay, while the forementioned things were transacted, ch. xxii. 1), called Abel-Shittim, ch. xxxiii. 49, but it is usual to cut off the former part of a place's name, for shortness sake: as in this very book (ch. xxxiii. 38), Baal-meon for Beth-Baal-meen, as it is called, Josh. xiii. 17, and Hcrnon commonly for Baal-Hermon; and Nimrim for Beth-Nimrim. To which may be added, Salem for Jerusalem (Ps. lxvi. 3). This station was the last which the Israelites made, while they remained in the wilderness; in which the rest of the things that follow, to the end of the book of Deuteronomy were done.

The people began to commit whoredom.] Both bodily and spiritual; into which they fell not long after Balaam was gone from Balak: though not all the people fell into this guilt, but a great many of them: as appears from what follows (ver. 4—6).

With the daughters of Moab.] And of Midian also, as we learn from ver. 6, 17, 18. But those of Moab are here alone mentioned; because it is likely, they began this wicked practice. I see no ground for what Greg. Nyssen saith, that the Israelites having vanquished the Moabites in a battle, fell in love with the captives which they had taken, being overcome by lust, when they had been victorious in war; as he speaks, lib. De. Vita Mosis, p. 156. It is something more probable, that the prophecy of Balaam being spread abroad among the Moabites concerning the great blessings God designed to bestow upon the Israelites, particularly that of the Messiah, it might excite in the women of Moab a desire to have children by the men of Israel, that they might partake in their blessings; unto which they might think they had some title, being descended from the eldest daughter of Lot, the son of Abraham's brother. This might pass for truth, if it were not very evident from the following story, that the daughters of Moab exposed themselves, by Balaam's counsel, to the lust of the Israelites, that by this means they might seduce them to idolatry, and so make them lose the blessings intended for them. For that this was done by Balaam's advice, there is no doubt (see ch. xxxi. 16). And the Jews have also a conceit that he ever had been an enemy unto Israel, being one of Pharaoh's privy-council, who advised him to drown their children; as the tale is told in the Talmud, in the title Sanhedrin, cap. ult. But this is to make him to have been now of a greater age than we have reason to believe (viz. two hundred and ten years old, according to their own computation), and quite contrary to what others of them say, that he lived but half his time, according to the Talmudists (Ps. lv. 33).

Ver. 2. And they.] That is, the daughters of Moab.

Called the people.] Invited them to a feast: for the ordinary charms unto idolatry, were good victuals and bad women.

Unto the sacrifices of their gods.] To eat of the sacrifices which had been offered to their gods, particularly to Baal-Peor. These feasts upon their sacrifices were very magnificent among the heathen, being companied with music and dancing, and sometimes pompous processions, which enlivened youthful minds to partake of them. Here the Israelites, casting their eyes upon the daughters of Moab (which dobbles on this occasion appeared in the best dress and richest ornaments), were smitten with their beauty, and courted their enjoyment; who would not yield to this motion, but upon condition that they would first worship their gods; whereupon, being the name of Peor out of their bosom, they presented it to the Israelites to kiss it, and desired them to eat of the sacrifices that had been offered to him. Thus the Jewish doctors tell the story. And indeed it hath been observed by the writers of the church, that women have been the most dangerous seducers of men from the true worship (by the beginning of the 1st book of Samuel, being the name of the old heresies. For Simon Magus advanced his heresy, Helene meretricius adjunctus auxilio, “being assisted by the help of the harlot Helena.” Niccolaus of Antioch also, choros duxit faminoso. The famous Marcion sent before him some Roman ladies to prepare his way. Apelles, Montanus, Arius, Donatus, did all take the same precedent; as St. Jerome shows in his book Adversus Pelagianos.

The people did eat.] Which was an act of idolatry (as to eat of the Lord’s sacrifices was an act of Divine worship), whereby they owned themselves the servants of the gods of Moab (see Exod. xxxiv. 15).

Bowed down to their gods.] This was still a more plain act of idolatry, expressly forbidden by God in the second commandment.

Ver. 3. Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor.] This seems to signify, that they were devoted to the service of this idol in great affection; with which they performed the forenamed actions. The Jews commonly take this Baal-Peor to have been no better than a Priapus; and the worship of him to have consisted in such obscenity, with the degeneration of their rites, as are not fit to be named. Particularly their great commentary upon Numbers saith, that the Israelites being unwilling to enjoy their women upon those terms, they told them they needed only to uncover their nakedness before Baal-Peor, which was all the worship required of them: unto which they easily submitted. This was but an adumbration of the truth, that his worship consisted in revealing their secret parts before him (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 45). But Solomon Jarchi goes further, making this worship to consist in actions as ridiculous as they were beastly. All which seems to me very unlikely, and so it doth to several men of great judgment, particularly Mr. Selden; who thinks, with the beginning of the 2nd book of Samuel, that Peor (as I observed before, ch. xxviii. 26) is to be understood of a mount in the country of Moab, the temple of Baal stood upon it (by whom some understand Saturn, others the sun, which is most likely), and thence he was called Baal-Peor, because there he was especially worshipped; as Jupiter was called Olympius, because he was worshipped in a famous temple, which stood on the mount Olymphi, and every one knows, that anciently they chose the highest mountains, before all other places, for the Divine service; insomuch, that at Jerusalem the temple was set upon the hill of Sion, which the Psalmist saith God preferred before all other places (Ps. Ixxxvi. 9).

4 And the Lord said unto Moses, Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up before the Lord against the sun, that the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned away from Israel.

cvi. 29), that when they worshipped Baal-Peor, they ate the sacrifices of the dead; which seems to signify, that in him they worshipped some dead man, who perhaps was the first inventor of this worship, whatsoever it was. Another great man of our own nation hath said much to strengthen this opinion; having shown at large, that the ancient heathens were wont to defile the souls of men, and canonize them after death: and the first called Baalim, being accounted an inferior sort of deities, who they famous ministers for them to their celestial gods (see Mr. Mede, book iii. p. 724, &c.). Yet it must be acknowledged, that there are others of great note who take all for truth which the Jewish writers report concerning the filthy worship of Baal-Peor, and imagine that fornication was a part of it; as in future times it was Jews, and among the Greeks, and it appears to be of some of their gods. For what the Jews found then practised, they fancied was done in these early days; but it was observable, that the more ancient the books of the Jews are, which speak of this matter, the less they say of the impurities in the service of Baal-Peor.

For example, the Jerusalem Talmud had none of that lewd stuff in the world, and Solomon Jarchi, upon this place, took out of the Babylonian; which was composed long after the former.

The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel. As appeared immediately, by the severe punishment he inflicted on them, both for their idolatry and for their fornication.

Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up. The plain meaning seems to be, that he should take, i.e. cause to be apprehended, “the heads of the people,” i.e. the rulers of thousands and hundreds, and other principal persons in their tribes, who had been guilty of the foul idolatry before mentioned; and by hanging them up, put a stop to the people’s lewdness, when they saw these great men made public examples of God’s displeasure; for it pleased him to make it manifest to all who were princes of the people were guilty besides Zimri; especially if it be true, which the Samaritan Chronicle affirms, that the daughters of the chief men of Moab were sent finely dressed to allure the Israelites; and one of the king’s daughters among the rest. But, though the LXX. and the Vulgar, and Symmachus, thus understand it; that he commanded the heads of the people to be hanged up; yet a great number other ancient translators, and many famous doctors, take the word otham (them whom he commanded to be hanged up) not to refer to the heads of the people, but to such as had joined themselves to Baal-Peor: and they interpret the foregoing words, as if he had bade him “take,” and the LXX. have interpreted, “the heads of the people;” as the thought he did, as is related in the next verse. The judges indeed, there mentioned, seem to be distinct from “the heads of the people;” and Moses did not take them to his assistance, but commanded them to do their duty.

Yet it must be acknowledged that there is a great current of interpreters which runs on the other way; as if Moses was commanded to order the judges to assemble and call before them such as were suspected; and having examined the fact, accordingly proceeded against them, and punished such as had offended. Thus the Samaritan copy reads it expressly, and so Onkelos, and the parapraph called Uzeliades, and the Jerusalem Targum, and the Arabic translation of Saadia Gaon: and both the Talmudists and Karaites agree in this sense, as Mr. Selden shows at large, lib. li. De Synedriis, cap. 1, n. 10, and Joh. Coeh upon the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 4, sect. 4, where he observes that Aben Ezra, and Solomon Jarchi thus interpret it, and takes the meaning to be certain, that the heads of the people should divide themselves into several courts of judgment, and examine who had committed idolatry; and after conviction cause them to be hanged. For there is no instance of the constitution of judges, by Jethro's advice, continued all the time they were in the wilderness; who might easily find out the guilty in their several divisions.

Before the Lord. i.e. Before the sanctuary; as men who had forsaken the worship of their God, and by his sentence were adjudged to die.

Against the sun. Openly, that all the people might see it. So both R. Solomon and Aben Ezra expound it. For this was a peculiar mark of the Divine displeasure against idolaters and blasphemers, that they should be hung up, and publicly exposed, after they had suffered death. For none were hanged alive among the Hebrews; but first stoned (which was the common punishment of the forenamed offenders); and then hanged up to die. As R. Solomon expounds this phrase against the sun.

That the fierce anger of the Lord may be turned away. By their zeal to vindicate the Divine honour.

Ver. 5. Moses said unto the judges. Some take these for the seventy elders, mentioned ch. xl. 25.

Shall ye? By hanging them up, as some understand it. It is a command in these words to the judges, as before to the Levites. But R. Israel interprets the words, "to the Judges of the sun, as R. Solomon expounds this phrase on the sun.

Every one his men. The seventy elders, being appointed to be coadjudicators to Moses in the government, made a division of the people, it is most likely, into so many districts: and each of them having the charge of one, all the people therein called his men; of whom he was to give an account.

That were joined unto Baal-peror. Who were so well known, that there was no danger of slaying the innocent.

Ver. 6. And, behold. This which follows is the more wonderful, if the judges had already begun to execute the sentence; as some argue. Zimri, to have been very impudently wicked, who thought himself so great a man, that no judge durst meddle with him.

One—brought unto his brethren. In the camp of Israel, or into the tent where his own family dwelt.

A Midianitish woman. By which it appears that both nations, Moab and Midian, were in this plot against Israel.

In the sight of Moses. A high contempt of his authority: and of God's also, whose servant Moses was.

In the sight of all the congregation. This seems to be a further aggravation of his sin, that he was not content to go to the women who invited them (ver. 2), but brought one of them along with him into the camp of Israel; and this he did before the face of all the people, as well as of Moses; and that when they were mourning for this sin, as it here follows.

Who were weeping before the door. This shows, that though there were great numbers engaged in this defection, yet the generality of the people clave unto the Lord, and bewailed the wickedness of their brethren, most earnestly imploring God's mercy towards them.

Ver. 7. When Phinehas. A man of great authority, being next to the high-priest, whom he succeeded in his office, as he did Joshua (if we may believe some writers) in the government of all Israel.

He rose up. His spirit (as St. Luke speaks of St. Paul) was stirred in him; and being inspired with a holy zeal was moved to do what follows.

And came among the congregation. With a view to the door of the tabernacle; rather, from among the judges with whom he was assembled, being one of them: so Jonathan; he rose up "from the midst of the Sanhedrin." For, as Bonav. Cornel. Bertramus thinks, Eleazar, after the death of Aaron, appointed his son Phinehas to be prince of the Levites; which he thinks appeared, not only from his rising up here, but also from the multitude of the judges, if the judges were his own: the word here is not "among", but "in the midst of", the word in the original, wherein he was employed by Joshua, unto the Reubenites, &c., beyond Jordan, Josh. xxii. 14, and from 1 Chron. ix. 26, where he is said to be ruler over the Koharites; which signifies, he thinks, such a pre-eminence as Eleazar himself had over the Levites, while his father Aaron lived (De Repub. Jud. chap. 15). And indeed the Psalmist saith, that Phinehas has stood up and executed judgment (Ps. cxv. 39), which seems to import that he acted as a judge, but by an extraordinary motion: which made him kill the offenders with his own hands, without a judicial process against them.

Took a javelin in his hand. Or a sword, as Josephus calls it; which he snatched out of the hand of Moses, as the tradition is, of Pirke Eleazar, b. 17.

Ver. 8. He went after the man of Israel into the tent. It is an unusual word in the Hebrew which we translate tent; importing a private, secret place like a cave, as kubba or kobba is thought to signify, which the Arabians call aloobba; from whence comes the word above; which signifies, as Boeharst observes, concerning one general opera, que locus circumdatur: "a room of arched work, which enclosed a bed in it" (see his Hierozoicon, par. i. p. ult.).

Thrust both of them through. This he did, saith Philo, προστολακασων Μαυλους, "by the command of Moses;" but should rather have said, by a Divine institution; which he followed, when the rest of the judges were afraid (as some conceive) to meddle with so great a man, as Zimri was. And upon this fact, the Jews ground that which they call the judgement of zeal, which authorized them, who were full of zeal, to punish such as blasphemed God, or profaned the temple, &c., in the presence of ten men of Israel, without a formal process against them. Thus Matthias killed a Jew who sacrificed after the manner of the Greeks (1 Mac. ii. 24); and three hundred others were killed by their countrymen, as is related 9 And those that died in the plague were twenty and four thousand.
10 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
11 Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest, hath turned my wrath away in the book commonly called the Third Book of Maccabees. And upon the pretence of such zeal, St. Stephen was stoned, and St. Paul intended to be killed, &c. as Grotius observes (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Paris, cap. 30. sect. 9. and see Selden De Jure Nat. et Gent. lib. ii. cap. 4.). It is, that from hence (as the call it) seems not to be well grounded upon the fact of Phinehas, who was a public person, and had an extraordinary motion, not to be intimidated by private men; nor was it followed till the latter times of the state of that nation.

Through her belly.] The Vulgar hath it, "through her secret parts." And so the Jews in Pirke Elizzer (cap. 47.), and in other books, such as Pesikta and Siphri; where they make many miracles to have concurred in this fact; particularly, they say, that the relations of Zimri going to fall upon Phinehas for killing their prince, the angel of the Lord smote them, and cut them off.

So the plague was stayed.] It seems a pestilential disease (as Josephus calls it) swept away many of the offenders, who could not so speedily be punished by the judges: but it stopped immediately upon this pious act of Phinehas.

Ver. 9. Those that died,—were twenty and four thousand.] There were but twenty and three thousand who died of the plague itself, as the apostle tells us (2 Cor. 11. 29.), but three, that more taken off in the plague time, or during the plague, as the Hebrew words may be read: for, in the twenty and four thousand, Moses comprehends all those who were killed by the sword, in the day of the plague (as the phrase is ver. 18.), whereas St. Paul reckons those only who died of the pestilence, as many have observed, particularly Bochartus (lib. ii. Hieroz. cap. 34. p. 279.), but there, that from hence it was, that the author of the Samaritan Chronicle took up a conceit, that the king of Moab sent twenty-four thousand damsels to seduce the Israelites; as Hottinger reports his words, in his Smeagia Orientale (cap. 8. p. 418.).

Ver. 10.] After the plague was stayed, it is likely, Moses went into the tabernacle to give God thanks for his mercy to his people; and then he spake to him what here follows.

Ver. 11. Phinehas,—hath turned my wrath away. Though they went and mourned before the door of the tabernacle, yet that did not prevail so much for mercy as this heroic act of justice.

While he was zealous for my sake.] With a fervent and ardent affection vindicated the Divine honour, by a speedy punishment of those notorious offenders.

That I consumed not the children of Israel in my jealousy.] Did not proceed to destroy them by the pestilence, when I was so highly incensed against them. For it is observed by Herodotus himself in his Historiae, that τὰς μναχαὶς ἰδιωτὰς, τὴν γὰρ τοῖς Θεοῖς, "for great crimes there are as great punishments sent from God;" which is necessary for the public good: for unless, by such means, a stop be put to open impurities, to murders, and such like crimes, not only all civil society will be overthrown, but nations become so wicked, that they will be fit for nothing but to be rooted out, by the Divine vengeance, as the Canaanites were. Thus from the children of Israel, while he was zealous for my sake among them, that I consumed not the children of Israel in my jealousy.

12 Wherefore say, Behold, I give unto my covenant of peace:
13 And he shall have it, and his seed after him.

Cicero discourses (Philip. viii.), in corpop, si quid ejusmodi est, quod reliqui corpori noceat, &c. "In the body, if there be any thing which hurts the rest of the body, it is necessary to cut it off, or to burn it, that some one member, rather than the whole body perish: and after some of the body of the common wealth: ut totum salvim sit, quicquid est pestifereum amputetur; "that the whole may be preserved, let that which is infectious be lopped off.

Ver. 12. Wherefore say,] Unto Phinehas, or unto all the people.

Behold, I give unto him my covenant of peace.] The word peace, in Scripture, comprehends all manner of blessings. And therefore this is a solemn promise and engagement to make him and his family prosperous: the particular blessing which he entails upon him, following in the next verse. But some will have this to signify, that he should be the great reconciler of God to his people, and make peace between them hereafter, as he had done at present. Philo seems to think this and the priesthood to be two distinct things; when he saith, "God crowneth his pieti δια τας ψηφια τε χρησιον, with two gifts, peace and the priesthood." And the Jews make peace to consist in a long life of prosperity; which was fulfilled in Phinehas' person, who lived till the latter times of the judges (Judg. xxii. 28.). Pirke Eliezer interprets it, ∗." He gave him the life of this world, and of the next."

Ver. 13. He shall have it, and his seed after him.] It shall continue in his family.

Even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood.] This is the particular happiness—which God settled upon him and his posterity, as long as their state lasted; which was with some limitation, it appears from this, that after some successions in the line of Phinehas, the priesthood came, for a time, into the family of Eli, who was descended from Ithamar the youngest son of Aaron: the reason of it is not mentioned in the Scripture; but some great sin, it is reasonable to suppose, provoked God to set aside the line of Eleazar for some years, till Eli's sons also began to assume so wicked, that the priesthood was taken from them, and restored in the days of Solomon to the posterity of Phinehas, with whom it continued as long as the priesthood lasted. What sin this was, and when committed, we do not know. Some of the Hebrew doctors are so bold as to say, it was because Phinehas would not absolve Jephthah from his vow, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. i. De Success. in Pontif. cap. 2. But God is not so much like fancies, which others of them have, so it is more probable that some of Phinehas' successors offended, rather than he himself; his posterity for four generations holding the priesthood, before it was translated to Eli, as Josephus and others (mentioned by Selden in the place before named) make account.

Egidius Camerarius in his Historiae debus Elie, cap. 3. sect. 5. and Cornel. Bertram, cap. 15. De Repub. Jud. imagine, that in those confused times, none of the priests were found fit to administer the affairs of the nation, but Eli alone; and therefore he was appointed by God to it, as appears from 1 Sam. li. 30. But L'Empereur, in his annotations upon Bertram, well observes, that it being the constant course of God's proceedings, to continue his mercies him, even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood; because he was zealous for his God, and made an atonement for the children of Israel.

14 Now the name of the Israelite that was slain, even that was slain with the Midianitish woman, was Zimri, the Son of Salu, a prince of a chief house among the Simeonites.

15 And the name of the Midianitish woman that was slain was Cozbi, the daughter of Zur;

he was head over a people, and of a chief house in Midian.

16 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 17 Vex the Midianites, and smite them:

18 For they vex you with their wives, whereewith they have beguiled you in the matter of Peor, and in the matter of Cozbi, the daughter of a prince of Midian, their sister, which was slain in the day of the plague for Peor's sake.

Ver. 16. Some time after this, though not long (as appears from ch. xxxi. 1, 2), but a little before Moses' death.

Ver. 17. [Vex the Midianites.] Among whom this pernicious contrivance was hatched: for Balak being so incensed against Balaam, that he made him begone, in all haste out of this country (ch. xxiv. 11), Balaam would not stay to propound unto him this mischievous advice which was in his head, but went to the Midianites, and there discovered it; which was the same thing, he knew, as if he had acquainted Balak with it, there being a great friendship between the two nations (ch. xxxii. 4). It is likely, also, that the Midianites were the first that advised Balaam should be sent for, which made their guilt the greater: but the Moabites did not escape, though (for Lot's sake, perhaps, Deut. ii. 9.) their punishment was deferred till future times, as Balaam prophesied (ch. xxiv. 17), and they were also excluded, by a law made immediately after this, from the society of the Israelites, for this very fact (ch. xxxiii. 3, 4).

Smite them.] With the sword: as we find they did, ch. xxxii.

Ver. 18. For they vex you with their wives.] Have sorely distressed you by their subtle devices.

Wherewith they have beguiled you in the matter of Peor.] Drawn you in to commit foul idolatry. Here Peor, which was a mountain in Moab, where Baal had a temple (as I observed, ch. xxiii. 28), is used for the idol itself, which was there worshipped, being a monstrous creature, called Baal-Peor: and so it is, ch. xxxi. 18. Josh. xxiii. 17.

In the matter of Cozbi.] And into lewd filthiness with idolatrous women.

The daughter of a prince of Midian.] By whose consent, no doubt, she went upon this wicked design; that, by her noble garb and attendance, she might the more powerfully entice the great men of Israel to idolatry.

Their sister.] Whom the whole family were content to prostitute, that they might compass the destruction of the Israelites: but by sister may be meant one of the same country or nation; the same kind of language being used among them that was among the Jews; who called one another brethren and sisters (being descended from the same stock), as Christians did all those that were of their religion.

Which was slain] When so many thousands fell by the pestilence.

For Peor's sake.] For worshipping Baal-Peor; into which they were inveigled by the women, who invited them to a feast, and there, by their charms, excited another fleshly appetite in them, which they would not let them satisfy, unless they would both eat of their sacrifices and worship their idol: and perhaps they told them it was not lawful for them to consent to their desire, unless they would be of their religion.
CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1. After the plague, Mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 9, 17, though some fancy it refers unto all the plagues that had swept away all the former generation, except two persons. It is likely this may be done in the eighth month of the fortieth year, after they came out of Egypt.

The Lord spake unto Moses and unto Eleazar, As God had found them in Egypt, when they paid every man half a shekel towards it (Exod. xxx. [11. 13. xxxviii. 25]), and again, when they were to be encamped, in the second month of the second year (Num. i. 1, 2, &c.). And now, all those men who had been then numbered (thirty-eight years ago) being dead (as appears from ver. 61. of this chapter), God commands them to be numbered a third time; partly, that he might demonstrate his faithfulness to his word, in multiplying them vastly, notwithstanding all their provocations (for their number was within eighteen hundred and twenty as many as they were at the last muster), and partly that the land they were now going to possess, might be the more easily divided among the tribes in just and equal proportions.

From twenty years old and upward, &c.] All this is explained in the first chapter, ver. 2, 3.

Ver. 2. Take the sum of all the congregation. They had been twice numbered before this; once, before the building of the tabernacle, in the first year after they came out of Egypt, when they paid every man half a shekel towards it (Exod. xxx. [11. 13. xxxviii. 25]), and again, when they were to be encamped, in the second month of the second year (Num. i. 1, 2, &c.). And now, all those men who had been then numbered (thirty-eight years ago) being dead (as appears from ver. 61. of this chapter), God commands them to be numbered a third time; partly, that he might demonstrate his faithfulness to his word, in multiplying them vastly, notwithstanding all their provocations (for their number was within eighteen hundred and twenty as many as they were at the last muster), and partly that the land they were now going to possess, might be the more easily divided among the tribes in just and equal proportions.

Ver. 3. Moses and Eleazar the priest spake with them. With the heads of the several tribes; who, it is likely, were to assist in this numbering, as they did in the former (Num. i. 4. 16. 17).

In the plains of Moab] See ch. xxii. 1.

Ver. 4. The sum of the people. These words are not in the Hebrew; but some words of this kind are to be understood, that they speak with them about numbering the people, "from twenty years old and upwards," as it here follows.

As the Lord commanded Moses] He bade them proceed according to the directions God had formerly given, in the second month of the second year, after they came out of Egypt (Num. i. 1).
10. And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up together with Korah, when that company died, what time the fire devoured two hundred and fifty men: and they became a sign.

11. Notwithstanding the children of Korah died not.

12. ¶ The sons of Simeon after their families: of Nemuel the family of the Nemuelites: of Jamin, the family of the Jaminites: of Jachin, the family of the Jachinites: of Shaul, the family of the Shautites.

13. Of Zerah, the family of the Zarhites: of Jagg, the family of the Haggites: of Shuni, the family of the Shunites:

14. These are the families of the Simeonites, twenty and two thousand and two hundred.

15. ¶ The children of Gad after their families:

16. Of Ozni, the family of the Oznites: of Eri, the family of the Eritites:

17. Of Arod, the family of the Arodites: of Arni, the family of the Arilites.

18. There are the families of the children of Gad according to those that were numbered of them, forty thousand and five hundred.

19. ¶ The sons of Judah were Er and Onan: and Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan.

20. And the sons of Judah after their families were; of Shelah, the family of the Shelanites: of Pharez, the family of the Phazorites: of Zerah, the family of the Zarhites.

21. And the sons of Pharez were; of Hezron, the family of the Hezronites: of Hamul, the family of the Hamulites.

22. These are the families of Judah according to those that were numbered of them, threescore and sixteen thousand five hundred.

Ver. 19, 13. The sons of Simeon after their families: &c.] His sons are reckoned up here just as they are Gen. xvi. 10. and Exod. vi. 15. only one of them, viz. Ohad, is here omitted; because, either he had no children, or his family was extinct before this time. The first of them also, viz. Nemuel, is there called Nebi; and Jachin, in 1 Chron. iv. 21, is called Jabir; there being some reason, in process of time, for such alterations.

Ver. 14. These are the families of the Simeonites, &c.] There was a wonderful decrease of this tribe in the space of thirty and eight years: for they were fewer by above twenty-seven thousand than they were at the last numbering (see ch. i. 29). Many of them, being probable, being in the same crime with Zimri, and the plague falling most heavily upon this tribe, whom Moses in Deut. xxxiii. doth not bless.

Ver. 15—17. Gad.] They are reckoned here next to the Simeonites, because they lay encamped next to them, under the standard of Reuben (Num. ii. 10, 11, &c.).

Ver. 16. Zephon.] They are reckoned up in the same manner, Gen. xvi. 16. only he that is here called Zephon, is there called Ziphon; and Osni is there called Esbon: and Arod called Arodi.

Ver. 18. Gad.] This tribe also was less by above five thousand than before (ch. i. 25).

Ver. 19. Sons of Judah were Er and Onan.] These were his eldest sons, but died without issue before the children of Israel went down into Egypt, as it here follows (see Gen. xxxviii. 1, 2, &c.).

Ver. 20. ¶ Now he reckons those of his sons who made families, which were three: as we read also, Gen. xvi. 12.

Ver. 21.] Here he numbers two of Judah's grand-children, as he did one of Reuben's, ver. 6. only with this difference, that whereas those two families were called by the names of their chief head, whose grandchild did not being substituted instead of Er and Onan, who died without children. Or rather, the family of Pharez growing very great, there was a subdivision made of it into the other families, who were all still Pharezites (for Pharez had no other children but these two, to make a family of that name), but called by these two names of Hezronites and Hamulites, because the Pharezites were grown too big to be one family, and therefore parted into two.

Ver. 22. Judah.] This tribe was very numerous before, above all the rest; and now this new generation, which sprung up instead of the old (who were all destroyed except Caleb), exceeded them two 23 ¶ Of the sons of Issachar after their families: of Tola, the family of the Tola'ites; of Puah, the family of the Punites; 24 Of Jashub, the family of the Jashubites: of Shimron, the family of the Shimronites. 25 These are the families of Issachar according to those that were numbered of them, threescore and four thousand and three hundred. 26 ¶ Of the sons of Zebulun after their families: of Sered, the family of the Sardites: of Elon, the family of the Elonites: of Jahleel, the family of the Jahleelites. 27 These are the families of the Zebulunites according to those that were numbered of them, threescore thousand and five hundred. 28 ¶ The sons of Joseph after their families were Manasseh and Ephraim. 29 Of the sons of Manasseh: of Machir, the family of the Machirites: and Machir begat Gil'ead: of Gil'ead came the family of the Gil'eadites. 30 These are the sons of Gilead: of Jezer, the family of the Jezerites: of Helek, the family of the Helekites; 31 And of Asriel, the family of the Asrielites: thousand. So faithful was God to his promise, that this should be a most powerful tribe (see Numb. i. 37).

Ver. 23. Issachar] Hez and Zebulon are mentioned next, because they lay encamped together, under the standard of Judah (see Numb. ii. 5-7). Tola.] A wonderful fruitful family, and very valiant: there being of this one family twenty-two thousand and six hundred men in the days of David (1 Chron. vii. 2). Pua.] He is called Phuvah, Gen. xlvi. 13.

Ver. 24. Jashub.] Who is called Job in the same place.

Ver. 25.] This tribe also was exceedingly increased; being near ten thousand more now than they were at their first numbering (ch. i. 29. ii. 6).

Ver. 26. Zebulun] There is no change in their names; which are the same, without any alteration, as when they went into Egypt (Gen. xlvi. 14).

Ver. 27.] This tribe likewise was increased above twenty thousand, compare (see ch. i. 31). And so the whole camp of Judah was mightily augmented, as that of Reuben was diminished.

Ver. 29. Manasses: of Machir, &c.] This was the only son; but those descended from him, by a usual manner of speaking, are called Manass'eh's sons also, being his grandsons. Some think indeed that Manas'seh had other sons, which they gather from Gen. i. 22, but, if he had, their families were extinct; but none but Machir and his posterity had any inheritance in the land of Canaan, Josh. xvii. 1, 2, where the grandchildren are called his children.

Machir begat Gil'ead.] They were not a distinct family from the Machirites, but the very same; Machir having a son by Gil'ead. Therefore that family, which at first was called Machir'ites, was afterwards called Gil'eadites: or it was indifferently called either by the one or the other.

Jezerites.] The posterity of Gil'ead grew so numerous, that his sons made families, and not only households; so that the name of Gil'eadites being too general to distinguish them all, they were called, at length, by the name of his sons, and of Shechem, the family of the Shechemites:

Ver. 31, 32. Asriel.] This, and all the rest that follow, are mentioned as the sons of Gilead; for each of whose children there was a lot in the land of Canaan (Josh. xvi. 2).

Ver. 33. Zeusaphet of the son of Heber had no sons, but daughters.] Whose case is considered in the next, and in the last chapter of this book; where they are ordered to have an inheritance among their father's brethren, but to marry into their own tribe. And their posterity, I suppose, were called after their grandfather's name, Hepherites: for such a family there was, as Moses tells us in the foregoing verse.

Ver. 34.] If this be compared with ch. i. 35, it will appear that this tribe was increased above twenty thousand: which is the greatest increase of any other; and made good the prophecy of Jacob concerning the children of Joseph (Gen. xlix. 22).

Ver. 35. Ephraim.] He is mentioned after Manasses, because he was his younger brother, yet, in their first numbering that tribe had the standard under which Manasses marched (Numb. ii. 18, &c.) Shuthelah.] He is mentioned first also in 1 Chron. vii. 20, where the next son Becher is called Bered; and Tahan called Tabath. For time is wont to make great alterations in the names of persons and places.

Ver. 36. Sons of Shuthelah: of Eran, the family of the Eranites.] He had, it seems, but one son, whose children (after this usual manner of speaking before noted) were called the sons of Shuthelah; though they made a distinct family, under the name of the Eranites.

Ver. 37.] Though this proved a very numerous tribe in future times, yet, for the present, they were fewer by eight thousand than they were in the former numbering (ch. i. 33), which makes Moses' prophecy, a little after this, the more remarkable, Deut. xxxiii. 17, where he numbers the Ephraimites ten to one, in comparison with the Manassites.

Ver. 38. Benjamin.] This tribe also was under the standard of Ephraim, and therefore mentioned here together with him and Manasses. When they went into Egypt, the sons of Benjamin were no less than ten (Gen. xlvi. 21), half of which either had no children, or they were all extinct before this time; for here are only five named.
bel, the family of the Ashbelites of Ahiram, the family of the Ahiramites:
39 Of Shupham, the family of the Shuphamites: of Hupham, the family of the Huphamites.
40 And the sons of Bela were Ard and Naaman: of Ard, the family of the Ardites: and of Naaman, the family of the Naamites.
41 These are the sons of Benjamin after their families: and they that were numbered of them were forty and five thousand and six hundred.
42 These are the sons of Dan after their families: of Shuham, the family of the Shuhamites. These are the families of Dan after their families.
43 All the families of the Shuhamites, according to those that were numbered of them, were threescore and four thousand and four hundred.
44 Of the children of Asher after their families: of Jimna, the family of the Jimmites: of Jesui, the family of the Jesuites: of Beriah, the family of the Berites.
45 Of the sons of Beriah: of Heber, the family of the Heberites: of Malchiel, the family of the Malchielites.
46 And the name of the daughter of Asher was Sarah.
47 These are the families of the sons of Asher according to those that were numbered of them: who were fifty and three thousand and four hundred.
48 Of the sons of Naphtali after their families: of Jahzeel, the family of the Jahzeelites: of Guni, the family of the Gunites.
49 Of Jezer, the family of the Jezerites: of Shillem, the family of the Shillemites.
50 These are the families of Naphtali according to their families: and they that were numbered of them were forty and five thousand and four hundred.
51 These were the numbered of the children of Israel, six hundred thousand and a thousand seven hundred and thirty.
52 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
53 Unto these the land shall be divided for an inheritance according to the number of names.

Beloved.] The two first, Bela and Ashbel, are there named as they are here: but the next, Ahiram, is there called Ehi, and in 1 Chron. viii. 1, Ahara; such alteration doth time make in names.
Ver. 39. Shupham.] He is called Muppim in Gen. xlv. 21, and Hupham is there called Hupham.
Ver. 40. Note of Bela was Naaman.] Though five of his sons were dead without issue, yet two of his grandsons, descended from his eldest son, made distinct families in Israel. And the son of one of them was called after the name of his uncle, the youngest son of Benjamin (Gen. xlv. 21), whose name was Ard; and in 1 Chron. viii. 3, (by a small transposition of letters) is called Abar.
Ver. 41.] This tribe was grown to be ten thousand more than they were at the last numbering (ch. i. 37).
Ver. 42. These are the sons of Dan.] Thus he speaks, though he had but one (see ver. 5).
Shuham.] Called Hushim, by a transposition of letters, Gen. xlv. 23. Just as the same tree is called alomirin, 1 Kings. xii. 8, and algamirin, 2 Chron. ii. 8. And the same city in which Joshua was buried, called Timmuth-Serach, Josh. xxiv. 30, and Timmuth-Cheres, Judg. ii. 9. And, to come still nearer, the same man is called Rechum, Neh. xii. 3, and Cherim, ver. 15, of the same chapter.
Dan.] That is, from these Shuhamites came all the rest of the families of this tribe, which are not here mentioned, but into which this family was subdivided when it grew very great, as it appears from the next words.
Ver. 43. All the families of the Shuhamites.] This shows there were more than one of them who had names from some of the children of Shuham.
Were threescore and four thousand and four hundred.] A vast number to spring from one man: when Benjamin, who had ten sons, wanted almost twenty thousand of this number: which is seventeen hundred more than were in this tribe at the last numbering (ch. i. 39).
Ver. 44. Asher.] They all retain the same names which they had when they went into Egypt (Gen. xlv. 17). Only he that is here called Ishui, is there called Ishu; and another son there mentioned is here omitted: his family, I suppose, being quite extinct.
Ver. 45. Beriah.] Instead of him, whose family was quite lost, the youngest son of Asher (Beriah) had two families sprung from him.
Ver. 46. Sarah.] Or Sarah, as she is called, Gen. xlv. 17: He doth not say that a family sprang from her, which Corn. Bertramus (cap. 6. De Republ. Jud.) seems to think probable, instead of some that were lost; but she was a woman, it is likely, as eminent in this tribe as any of her brethren for some virtue or other: insomuch, that the cabalists, in the ancient book Zohar, parting the heavenly region, where the souls of holy women are, into four palaces, make four great women to be a kind of presidents for them, viz. Pharaoh's daughter, who educated Moses; and this Sarah, the daughter of Asher; with Jochabed, the mother of Moses, and Deborah, the famous prophetess (see Selten, lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4).
Ver. 47.] This tribe also fructified exceedingly, wanting but a hundred of twelve thousand more than they were at the last numbering (ch. i. 41).
Ver. 48, 49. Naphtali, &c.] There are four of them, whose names were not at all changed since they went into Egypt (see Gen. xlv. 21).
Ver. 50.] They wanted eight thousand of their number (Num. i. 43). These two tribes, Asher and Naphtali, are mentioned together with Dan, because they were encamped under his standard (Num. ii. 25, 36, 36, &c.).
Ver. 51.] That is, the whole number amounted to this sum; which was but eighteen hundred and twenty less than they were when they were last numbered, thirty-eight years ago (ch. i. 46). So great was the goodness of God, and such his faithfulness to his word, that, when he destroyed all the former generation (who were above twenty years old), he multiplied their posterity so fast, in that space of time, as to make them equal, in a manner, to those that went before them.
Ver. 52.] After the people were thus numbered, and every family, and the persons it contained, exactly known, then the Lord ordered as follows.
Ver. 53. Unto them.] i. e. These families before named.
51 To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few thou shalt give the less inheritance: to every one shall his inheritance be given according to those that were numbered of him. 55 Notwithstanding the land shall be divided by lot: according to the names of the tribes of their fathers they shall inherit.

The land shall be divided] i. e. The land of Canaan, into which they were going.

For an inheritance] Not to be alienated from those families.

According to the number of names.] Of the persons in the several families, from twenty years old and upwards (ver. 3). So that minors, who had not attained the age of twenty years when this account was taken, the Jews say, were not to have any share in the land, though they were come to that age at the time of the distribution of it among them. But those minors had possessions, as heirs of their fathers, according to the families.

Ver. 51. To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few—the less inheritance.] That is, order Joshua to assign them a share in the land, proportionate to the number of persons in every tribe: some of which were far greater than others, and therefore to have more land, proportionable to the largeness of their families. But this was not measured merely by the number of acres, as we speak, but by the goodness of the soil: for a little ground, in a rich country, would maintain more persons than twice, or thrice as much, in a barren, So Josephus, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 1, where, after he had said that Joshua made a distribution of the land, κοινα μεθόδων κατά τοις φασίων, “according to the bigness of each tribe;” he adds, that in doing this, τιμίωτος μακραν η μετρότων τοις κληρονομοις ειναι δείκτης, “it was necessary to consider rather the value than the measure of every portion;” and gives this reason why the tribe of Benjamin had so narrow a portion allotted them, because the ground was so very fertile about Jerusalem. Στε-κουστος η κρατος ουτως δια την της γῆς χαρτίν, “This lot was very strict, because of the goodness of the soil.”

To every one shall his inheritance be given.] That is, to every family according to those that were numbered of him.] According to the account that had been now taken; not considering who might be born after this (and thereby increase a family), or die (and thereby diminish it) before the division of the land was made. For several died, we may well think, in the wars with the Canaanites, and others were born before the country was conquered.

Ver. 56. The land shall be divided by lot.] When it was divided into so many equal shares as there were tribes (a due respect being had to their number), they were not to choose which share they would have; but that was to be determined by lot. The manner of which they say this was: two urns being placed before him that drew the lots, in one of which were all the names of the twelve tribes of Israel, and in the other, the portions of land; he first put in his hand into the urn wherein were their names, and drew out one, suppose that of Judah; and then he put his hand into the other urn, and drew out the portion that fell to his share. Or, perhaps, there was only one urn, wherein were the several portions of land; and they began suppose with the eldest son of Israel, viz. Reuben; and pulling out a scroll, said, “This is the portion of Reuben;” and so with the rest. But which sooner way they proceeded there were two distribu-

CHAPTER XXVI.

56 According to the lot shall the possession thereof be divided between many and few.

57 And these are they that were numbered of the Levites after their families: of Gershon, the family of the Gershonites; of Kohath, the family of the Kohathites: of Merari, the family of the Merarites.
58 These are the families of the Levites: the family of the Libonites, the family of the Hebronites, the family of the Mahlites, the family of the Mushites, the family of the Korathites. And Kohath begat Amram.

59 And the name of Amram's wife was Jochebed, the daughter of Levi, whom her mother bare to Levi in Egypt; and she bare unto Amram Aaron and Moses, and Miriam their sister.

60 And unto Aaron was born Nadab, and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar.

61 And Nadab and Abihu died, when they offered strange fire before the Lord; and they were not numbered among the children of Israel, because there was no inheritance given them among the children of Israel.

62 And those that were numbered of them were twenty and three thousand, all males from a month old and upward: for they were not in the space of thirty-eight years, all the former generation, from twenty years old and upward.

Of Gershon.] The principal families in this tribe were three, descended from the three sons of Levi, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari; whose names were not at all altered since their coming out of Egypt until this time (Gen. xlv. 11. Exod. vi. 16.

Ver. 58. These are the families of the Levites: The three forenamed were the principal families, divided into those lesser families which here follow.

Libonites.] Descended from Libni the eldest son of Gershon; who had another son, whose family is here omitted (viz. Shimi), though mentioned Exod. vi. 17.

But in this place Moses doth not give a full account of all the families of the Levites, nor is it given in exact order, because they were to have no inheritance in the division of the land; which was the reason that all the families of the other tribes are set down so punctually.

Hebronites.] From Hebron, one of the sons of Kohath (Exod. vi. 18. Numb. iii. 19).

Mahlites.—Mushites.] From the two sons of Merari, who were called Mahli, and Mishri (Exod. vi. 19. Numb. iii. 40).

Korathites.] From the great-grandchild of Levi (Exod. vi. 21. Numb. xvi. 1).

Kohath begat Amram.] Who was grandchild of Levi, and brother to the father of Korah (Exod. vi. 17).

Whom her mother (viz. Levi's wife) bare to Levi.] See this there explained.

Miriam their sister.] Who was born before Moses, if not before Aaron (Exod. ii. 4).

Ver. 60. See Exod. vi. 23, where he tells the name of their mother.

Ver. 61. Nadab and Abihu died, when they offered strange fire before the Lord.] See Lev. x. 2, and the third chapter of this book, ver. 4. But Eleazar (who was the eldest next to them) was now alive, and made high-priest; and it is likely Ithamar also, being under twenty years old, when the people murmured upon the report of the spies; and so not cut off with that wicked generation (ch. xvi. 39).

All this is here recounted, to show that the tribe of Levi was preserved, by the blessing of God, as well as the rest of the Israelites; though they were to have no inheritance in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 62. Twenty and three thousand.] So they were a thousand more than at the last numbering (ch. iii. 39).

They were not numbered among the children of Israel.] But by themselves, for the reason following.

Because there was no inheritance given them among the children of Israel.] For God was their inheritance, as he told them, ch. xviii. 26, &c. And therefore they were ordered not to be numbered thirty-eight years ago, no more than now (Num. i. 49, &c.).

The Jews are something curious in their observations upon these words, "among (or in the midst of) the children of Israel::" from whence they conclude, that the Levites might have lands out of the bounds of the land of Canaan, though not within it, among their brethren.

Ver. 63.] By a special command of God (ver. 1, 2, &c.).

Ver. 64.] See the first chapter of this book, ver. 1, 2, &c., so exactly were God's threatenings fulfilled, as well as his promises.

Ver. 65.] They shall surely die in the wilderness.] He had pronounced this irreversible sentence upon the whole congregation, ch. xiv. 23, 28, 29, where he swears they should not enter into the land of Canaan, because they had brought or entertained an evil report of it (see also Deut. ii. 14, 15).

Save Caleb—and Joshua.] Whom God promised to spare, because they were of another spirit (ch. xv. 24, 30, 33). And their survival was as remarkable an instance of the truth of God's word, as the death of all the rest.

CHAPTER XXVII.

1 The daughters of Zelophehad sue for an inheritance. 6 The law of inheritances. 12 Moses, being told of his death, saith; for a successor. 18 Joshua is appointed to succeed him.

1 Then came the daughters of Zelophehad, the son of Hefer, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, of the families of Manasseh the son of Joseph: and these are the are here; only their genealogy is here more fully set out, that their father was the grandson of Manasseh the son of Joseph, from whom he was linearly descended, but left no sons behind him. Now these names of his daughters; Mahlah, Noah, and Hoglah, and Milcah, and Tirzah.

2 And they stood before Moses, and before Eleazar the priest, and before the princes and all the congregation, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, saying,

3 Our father died in the wilderness, and he was not in the company of that which Moses received from God; and that there was a faithful register kept of every one that was born in every family and tribe, to prevent all disputes about the true heirs to men's estates.

Ver. 2. Stood before Moses.] To represent before him, and the rest of the judges, who were assembled in this august assembly, it is likely, was wont to sit when they met together; that is, in a council, where those who were called to judge were assembled, and consult with God himself in any difficult matter that came before them. And thus Mr. Selden observes, out of Maimonides, that in future times the great Sanhedrin followed the tabernacle, sitting sometimes in one place, sometimes in another, according as that was settled. As (after they came to Canaan) it was first at Shiloh, then at Mizpeh, and afterward at Gilgal, Nob, Gibeon, the house of Oded-Edom; till at last it was fixed in Jerusalem (lib. ii. De Synod. cap. 15. n. 4). As concerning that which the Talmudists say, concerning the proceedings in this case of Zelophehad's daughters, nothing certain can be determined. But they give this account of it: that they first brought this cause into the court, appointed by the ancient law of Joshua (Exod. xix. 21), and began with the rulers of ten, who knowing not what to say to them, they went to those of fifty, and from thence to the centurions, and at last to the chalilarchs: none of which durst adventure to give judgment, but referred the cause, by reason of its difficulty, to Moses; who brought it to the Shechinah, as they speak, i. e. to the Divine Majesty (Seld. lib. cap. 16. n. 1).

Ver. 3. Our father died in the wilderness.] Among the rest mentioned ver. 64, 65, of the foregoing chapter. They seem to have drawn up their cause in the form of a petition; or, as Mr. Selden speaks, in the legal phrase, presented a libel to the court, containing the entire matter of their petition, and that artificially enough.

CHAPTER XXVII

Ver. 6. This shows that the cause was devolved

He was not—in the company of Korah.] They use the very words of Moses concerning that rebellious company (ch. xvi. 23); and indeed it is more than any other; either to show that their father had a due regard to the authority of Moses (who they hoped therefore would be the more favourable to his posterity), or rather, to insinuate, that he was not guilty of such a crime, as might make men justly forfeit what they had for their children, as well as for themselves. For all the family of Dathan and Abiram perished: and it is taken notice of as a singular mercy, that the children of Korah did not (ch. xxvi. 10, 11).

But died in his own sin.] i. e. For his own sin: which God had declared should not affect the children (ch. xiv. 31). For to that general sin, in which all the people were engaged, these words seem to refer. And so it was, according to the laws which Moses received from God; and that there was a faithful register kept of every one that was born in every family and tribe, to prevent all disputes about the true heirs to men's estates.

The Jews commonly say that Zelophehad was the man that was stoned for gathering sticks on the sabbath-day: for which they have no authority, but a fancy of R. Aquiba, who is sharply reproofed by Mr. Selden, who saith it is a rash judgment; for if it were true, since the Scripture conceals it, he ought not to have revealed it: but hath reproached a just man, for any thing that appears (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synod. cap. 1. sect. 2).

And had no sons.] As was found when the people were numbered (ch. xxvii. 32).

Ver. 4. If they be not in the company of our father be done away.] One family of the tribe of Manasseh, viz. the Ephrēmites, being in danger to be wholly extirpated. R. Judah will have the word name in this place to signify as much as hereditary possession; and so he thinks it signifies, Deut. xxv. 6, as Mr. Selden observes out of Pesikta (lib. De Successionibus, cap. 14). Because he had no son?] Merely for want of issue male, when he had left many daughters.

Give unto us therefore a possession.] Let us come in for a share among those that are descended from Manasseh: which if they did, the name of their father could not be thereby preserved, but by the son of one of these daughters taking upon him, not the name of his father that begat him, but of his mother's grandfather, viz. Hophni; which was ordered afterward by a general law (Deut. xxxv. 6).

Ver. 5. Moses brought their cause before the Lord.] This was too difficult a cause (though there seemed to be a great deal of reason on their side) to be judged by the great court before mentioned; and therefore it was referred to Moses alone, as other weighty causes were to be (see ch. xxv. 22, xxvi. 4); for neither Eleazar, nor any other person (before whom it was brought, ver. 2), are here mentioned as the judges of this matter. And he durst not judge it, though the equity appeared very plain, without bringing it before the Lord for his direction, which he could have upon all important occasions (Exod. xxv. 32. Numb. vii. 89).

Ver. 6. ] This shows that the cause was devolved 7 The daughters of Zelophehad speak right; thou shalt surely give them a possession of an inheritance among their father's brethren; and thou shalt cause the inheritance of their father to pass unto them.

8 And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a man die, and have no son, then ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter.

9 And if he have no daughter, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his father's brethren.

10 And if he have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his father's brethren.

11 And if his father have no brethren, then upon Moses alone; for the Lord tells him, and no other person, how it should be determined.

Ver. 7. The daughters of Zelophehad] The Lord approves of their claim, and gives a sentence in their favour.

Give them a possession] Because the word for them in the Hebrew is of the masculine gender, some think it signifies, they were to be considered as if they had been sons.

cause the inheritance of their father to pass unto them.] So that they were to enjoy what would have fallen to his share had he been alive; ob intendam damnum patriis persuasam, as the lawyers speak; "because the share was equal in the place of their dead father, and represented his person." And accordingly they put in their claim at the division of the land, and had their portion therein, according to this decision (Josh. xvii. 2, 3, &c.). How the portion was divided among them, according to the Hebrew doctors, Mr. Selden shows at large in his book De Successionibus in bonis defuncti, cap. 23.

Ver. 8. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Upon this occasion he passes this special case into a general law, to be hereafter observed.

If a man die, and have no son, &c.] It being but reason, as Maimonides observes (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 43), that what a man leaves should come to his family, and to those who are of next kin to him; for natural affection, to have the greater regard to him. But all this is to be understood of land: as for money, and movable goods (which were of his own getting), the father might dispose of them, by his will, to whom he pleased.

Ver. 9. If he have no daughter, &c.] Unless his father was alive, who, undoubtedly, the Jews say, was the next heir; but not mentioned, because it was not necessary; or, as some say, because it was too sad a thing to speak of a father's burying all his children without issue. See Selden, De Success. in bona definita, cap. 12, where he observes, that, according to the rule, ver. 11, it must come to the father, because he is nearest of kin to it. And therefore the Jews interpret this, as if Moses had said, "If he have no daughter, ye shall give his inheritance to the next of his kindred (to his father for instance), and afterward ye shall give it to his brethren," i.e. the children of his father. And the same is to be said of the grandchildren; unto whom the brethren of a father dying without issue are heirs. For the grandfather stands in the same relation to a father that a father doth to his son.

Ver. 11. If his father have no brethren, &c.] To his brother's children, or to those who are descended from them, or from his father's brethren. But no consideration was to be had of his mother's kindred (as the Jewish lawyers say), who could never be capable of the inheritance: which they gather, not only from these words, which determine the inheritance to his family (i.e. the family of the father before mentioned, not to the family of the mother), but from the frequent mention of the father of mishpahoth, which they take to be family kindreds, in the books of Moses, Chronicles, Ezra, and others. From whence this solemn maxim of the Talmudists, "The family or kindred of the mother, is never called by the name of kindred:" that is, it hath not the effect of a kindred in successions to inheritances. Which is the same with that in the ancient book Siphi, "Families follow the fathers," as Mr. Selden observes in the book of Joshua, and other places; viz. words in the next chapter (cap. 13), gives an example, drawn up by Maimonides, of such a succession out of the Holy Scriptures. Amram had two sons, Aaron, and Moses, as we read Exod. vi. 20. If they both died without issue, Miriam their sister had inherited. And if she had died in like manner, the inheritance of the family would have reverted to Kohath, the father of Amram: or he being dead, to his three sons, the brethren of Amram, viz. Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel, as the heirs of Kohath. And there would have been no consideration of primogeniture; both because none of them was the first-born, and because the inheritance was not in the possession of their father, at the time of his death, &c.

Ver. 12. Get thee up into this mount Abarim.] A law whereby to determine such matters in future times, and to be observed inviolably; so that no father should have power to make any other settlement; but if either by word or writing he declared his will to be that his son should not inherit, his act was null and void: as the Jewish lawyers resolve from these very words, "a statute or decree of judgment," i.e. as I said, a rule whereby to judge of succession into inheritances. If therefore a man made a will, wherein he declared his daughter or brethren, &c. should not inherit, in case he had no son, it was void, because contrary to this law (see Selden, De Successionibus, cap. 24).

Ver. 13. Upon Mount Hor, as we read in this book, ch. xx. 23, 24.

See the land.] Take a full view of it, as he did from that high neighbouring mountain (Deut. iil. 17. xxxiv. 1—4).
CHAPTER XXVII.

that is the water of Meribah in Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin.

15 And Moses spake unto the Lord, saying,

16 Let the Lord, the God of the spirits of all flesh, set a man over the congregation, 17 Which may go out before them, and which may go in before them, and which may lead them out, and which may bring them in; that the congregation of the Lord be not as sheep which have no shepherd.

18 And the Lord said unto Moses, Take Ver. 14. For ye rebelled against my commandment: See ch. xx. 13, 24, where all this verse is explained.

Ver. 15.] He did not speak those words which follow, immediately after God had him go up Mount Abarim and die; but first desired he might be permitted to go over Jordan, &c. (Deut. iii. 24—36). Unless we can think that he made the prayer there mentioned as soon as the sentence was passed upon him, at the waters of Meribah, which both seem not so likely.

Ver. 16. Let the Lord, &c.] As soon as he found that God was resolved he should not conduct the people twenty years into the wilderness, but for a fitting person to take that charge upon him. For he had a most generous public spirit, wholly intent upon the good of this people.

The God of the spirits of all flesh,] Who hast not only made the souls of all men, but knowest their dispositions (see ch. xvi. 22), and understandest who are fit for this weighty employment.

Set a man over the congregation.] To be chief ruler and governor of the people in my place.

Ver. 17. Which may go out before them, &c.] If the latter part of these words be not a mere repetition of the former (as is usual), then the one relates to the conduct of war, and the other to the management of all their civil affairs. And both of them seem to be a metaphor from shepherds watching over their flocks.

That the congregation—be not as sheep which have no shepherd.] Having none to govern and to take care of them. This is a description of the most miserable condition a people can be in, and became a proverb among the Hebrews (1 Kings xxvii. 17. Zech. x. 2. xii. 7. Matt. ix. 36).

Ver. 18. Take one that I know. ] Who had been a long time servant unto Moses, and attended upon his person (Exod. xxiv. 13), well known to Moses, and perfectly acquainted with his administration.

A man in whom is the spirit,] Of courage and prudence, and the fear of God, with all other gifts necessary in an excellent governor: among which Onkelos reckons the spirit of prophecy; which is not unlikely. Lay thine hand upon him.] Which was a ceremony usual in blessing (Gen. xlviii. 14, &c.), and in setting men apart and consecrating them to an office (ch. viii. 10). Upon which followed a more abundant measure of the Spirit, as appears from Deut. xxxiv. 9.

Ver. 19. Set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation:] Being all assembled for this purpose, let me also acknowledge him for the designated successor of Moses, and be witnesses of all that Moses commanded him.

Give him a charge.] He told him before them all what God expected from him; and bade him be not afraid to execute it. See Deut. xxxii. 7, 8, where he sets down the words of this charge; unto which God presently after added one of his own (ver. 14, 15, 29).

Ver. 20. Put some of them honour upon him.] Communicate some of thy authority to him at present; and not let him be any longer as thy minister, but as an associate in the government. The word we trans- late honour being glory in the Hebrew, it made Onkelos and other Hebrew doctors imagine these words have respect to that splendour which shone in Moses' face after he came down from the mount; some of which they suppose was imparted unto Joshua, to make him appear more venerable in the eyes of the people. And R. Menachem observes, that it is not said, impart thy glory, but of thy glory to him. From whence came that ancient saying, "the face of Moses shone like the sun, but Joshua's only like the moon." This might have passed for truth, or at least that here was meant some great illumination of the mind, or profound thought, which procured him such reverence as Moses had, if it had been said that God put some of Moses' glory upon him; whereas Moses is commanded to do it, which makes the first sense most reasonable.

That all the congregation—may be obedient.] That the people may begin to submit to his authority, and learn to obey his commands, as well as hear him.

Ver. 21. He shall stand before Eleazar the priest, &c.] For the encouragement of Joshua to undertake this charge, he assures him he shall never want direction from God what to do when he was in any doubt, but, in the manner he prescribed, most certainly receive it. And what is here said concerning him, belongs to all their succeeding governors. And it is observed by Maimonides, and other Jewish doctors, that the high-priest stood before the kings of Israel out of great respect to them: but no king is said to stand before the high-priest, but only in this case, when he was to consult the holy oracle; that it might appear the honour was given not to the priest, but unto the Divine Majesty, whom he consulted by the priest.

Who shall ask counsel for him, after the judgment of Urim? ] Because the word thummim is here wanting, some understand these words as if he had said, the high-priest shall ask counsel for him, by the illumination of the Spirit of God. So Conradus Pellicanus. But the word thummim, in all likelihood, is here to be understood, though not expressed, being always joined with urim (except in this and one other place, where urim only is named, after a short manner of speaking), in Exod. xxviii. Deut. xxxiii. Ezra ii. Neh. vii. For they were inseparable from the breast-plate of judgment, as it is called Exod. xxviii. 30 (see there), with which the high-priest appeared before God when he consulted him in great affairs of state, that public duty, more especially in times of war; of which we have many instances in Judg. i. 1. xx. 1. Sam. xiv. 18. xxvii. 6. David, indeed, is said to consult God by the ephod, but it must be observed that the breast-plate was annexed to it; which Abiathar brought along with him when he fled from Saul, who commanded the priests to be slain, 1 Sam. xxii. 3. xxx. 8. 2 Sam. v. 19. And it is further to be noted, that though David thus frequently consulted God this way, being engaged in wars, yet we never read that Solomon asked counsel by it, being a peaceable king.
shall they go out, and at his word they shall come in, both he, and all the children of Israel with him, even all the congregation.

22 And Moses did as the Lord commanded him: and he took Joshua, and set him before Grotius also observes, that Joshua now, and the kings of Judah afterward, therefore stood before the priest, that they might be near to the urim and thummim, which he had upon his breast; without which he could not receive any answer (De Imperii Summ. Potest, &c. cap. 6).

Before the Lord,] The high-priest never inquired by urim and thummim, but standing before the Lord; that is, before the ark, where the Shechinah was.

At his word they shall go out, and—come in,] That is, saith Grotius, in the place forenamed, at the word of the Lord, "by the judgment of urim," which goes just before. Others, "at the word of the priest," which comes to the same. And this the Hebrew doctors understand concerning the people of Israel making war; which is wont to be meant in Scripture by the words going out and coming in. And they distinguish between the war that was made by the Divine commandment (against the seven nations of Canaan, and against Amalek), and that which was voluntary, and against any of their neighbours, or others, as there should be reason. In the former case, they think there was no need to ask whether they should make war or not, because it was commanded; and Joshua and the kings afterward did it when they pleased. But in the other, they were not to make war without this Divine order (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synod. cap. 12. 13).

They consulted the Lord also in the first sort of war (with the people of Canaan), how to manage it to the best advantage.

Both he, and all the children of Israel with him, even all the congregation.] By the first word [he] the Jews understand Joshua, and all the succeeding princes of Israel, who were bound in all things to the commandments of God by urim and thummim before they made war. And by the next words [all the children of Israel with him] they understand the priest that was particularly appointed to go with the people to war (Deut. xx. 2). And by the last words [the whole congregation] they understand the seventy elders, or the great Sanhedrin. So Maimonides, Abrarbinel, and a great many others, expound these words (as Selden shows in the same place), from which they have framed this general maxim, that no private man might consult this oracle, "but the king, and the head of the great Sanhedrin, and he that was appointed by all the people in their name." And that col ha edah [all the congregation] signifies frequently the great assembly of the elders and judges (see also Bertram, De Repub. Jud. p. 79).

Here the Jews start a difficulty, as they account it, why we never read in the whole book of Joshua, that he consulted the Lord after this manner; but as soon as ever he was dead they did (Judg. i. 1). From whence Abarbinel concludes, that Joshua was bound to do this only at the first entrance upon his office, that is, before he chose the seventy elders or the great Sanhedrin's successor, and that God was with him: but that afterward the spirit of prophecy rested upon him, and conducted him without this oracle. But if nothing was done that is not recorded in the Scripture, he might as well have said that Joshua never consulted the oracle at all, for we do not read he did, though he be here so ordered. De Levi ben Gersom, therefore, seems to me to speak more reasonably, when he says that those words in the beginning of the book of Judges do not import that they did not consult God by urim in the life of Joshua, but only that after his death the children of Israel would not adventure to proceed in the war of Canaan without the same direction.

Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation:

23 And he laid his hands upon him, and gave him a charge, as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses.

And there is something else which they might have observed from this verse, with great reason, which is, how might Moses, before Joshua, whom he had not yet succeeded in the conduct of the people, for Moses never made use of the urim and thummim to consult God by the high-priest, but went directly and immediately to God himself; whereas Joshua was not admitted to such familiarity; nor had he such frequent revelations from God as Moses had. Yet sometimes God vouchsafed him the honour to speak to him, as we read in the beginning of Joshua, ch. iii. 7. iv. 15, &c. And there was a most illustrous appearance of God to him before Jericho (ch. v. 13, &c.).

Ver. 23.] According as he was ordered, ver. 18, 19. In this we see the great integrity, the sincere humility, and self-denial of Moses, that he readily submitted to the government of Israel translated from his own family and tribe unto another, who was of the tribe of Ephraim, whereby his own children were reduced to a mean condition, being not so much as priests, but mere Levites. This demonstrates he acted not from himself, because he acted not for himself; but was contented to have the supreme authority placed where God pleased, both in church and state. But it appears also, that those Levites, who were not of the Ephraim family in an inconsiderable employment. This shows him to have had a principle which raised him above all other lawgivers, who always took care to advance their own families, and establish them in some share of that greatness which they themselves possessed. This likewise demonstrates, that the future rulers of this nation had no temptation to advance the credit of Moses beyond what it really was, since they were not descended from him, but were of other tribes.

Ver. 23.] He did all things which the Lord required to create him his successor, as the Jews speak: for thus (by laying on of hands) they in aftertimes made a man a member of the Sanhedrin, both of the great and of the small; which likewise relates to the time of the destruction of the Jerusalem temple; as Mr. Selden shows (lib. ii. De Synod. cap. 7. n. 1).

And this solemn designation of Joshua to the government by the Divine authority, was a clear indication that God continued to be their king, as he became in a special manner when he brought them out of Egypt (as I observed upon Exod. lii. 10), and he still reserved it to himself to appoint governors under him out of what tribe he pleased: as he did Joshua at this time out of the tribe of Ephraim; and not Caleb, who was of the tribe of Judah, and also a man as valiant as he was virtuous (Josh. xiv. 11). For there was no tribe that could lay claim unto this dignity without the gift of God. And this is one of the principal reasons, why the government of this people, before they had kings, was, as Josephus calls it, θυσιαστηρία (that is, "the empire of God"), because he stirred them up judges to rule them when he pleased; which being of his immediate appointment, are so far acknowledged by him, that when they were weary of Samuel's government and desired a king, God declared, that it was not Samuel, but himself, whom they rejected. And another reason was (as our Mr. Thornlake observes), because God, by his oracle of urim and thummim, prescribed how they were to proceed in their public affairs (Review of the Rites of the Church. p. 133).
CHAPTER XXVIII.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 2 Command the children of Israel, and say unto them, My offering, and my bread for my sacrifices made by fire, for a sweet savour unto me, shall ye observe to offer unto me in their due season.

3 And thou shalt say unto them, This is the offering made by fire which ye shall offer unto the Lord: two lambs of the first year without spot day by day, for a continual burnt offering.

4 The one lamb shalt thou offer in the morning, and the other lamb shalt thou offer at even;

5 And a tenth part of an ephah of flour for a meat offering, mingled with the fourth part of an hin of beaten oil.

6 It is a continual burnt offering, which was Shall ye observe to offer unto me? Be very careful to see it duly performed: this being the food (saith Abarninel), which, to speak after the manner of men, was offered by God's fire, upon his own altar, for his honour and their benefit.

In their due season. For that reason this sacrifice was to be constantly offered, saith the same author, that the Divine fire which came down from heaven to consume the sacrifices might not be disappointed, and burn there in vain without any thing to do.

From this place the Jews endeavour to make out their custom of having stationary men, as they call them, to attend the daily sacrifice: taking noatho ("in its season") as if it had been onatho ["in its stations"], but chiefly relying upon the first words of this verse, "command the children of Israel," who could not all be present at the daily sacrifice, and therefore some particular persons were chosen to represent all the rest. For they thought it very indecent to have a sacrifice made for a man, and he not to stand by it; and therefore the first prophets ordained twenty-four courses of men, chosen out of the priests, Levites, and people, to stand in the temple, when the daily sacrifice was offered in the name of all Israel; and pray that God would accept it for them, as if they were all present. This account the Mischna gives of them in Taanath, and other places; where they say these men were held so necessary, that it was a usual speech among them, Without stations the world could not stand. For without sacrifices, that is, the worship of God, the world would be undone; and sacrifices could not be maintained without stations (see Yoysin ha Dafte in Jubilees, cap. 25, and our learned Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, ch. 7. sect. 3).

Ver. 3. This is the offering made by fire. That offering which he peculiarly speaks of is the daily sacrifice; which was appointed long ago, before the tabernacle was set up (Exod. xxix. 38, 39, see my notes there). And add this, that God's promise to meet them there (ver. 42, 48); and afterward to dwell among them (ver. 45), seems to depend upon this constant service which he expected should be paid to him; which if neglected, he withdrew himself from them.

Two lambs of the first year without spot. This is expressly required in Exod. xxix. 38. Only here it is added, without leaven, or personally in its kind; which was required in all sacrifices, particularly in the first lamb which they offered, when they came out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 5, see there).

Ver. 4.] The very words in Exod. xxix. 39.

Ver. 5.] This is also there explained, Exod. xxix. 40.

Ver. 6. It is a continual burnt offering.] To be con ordained in mount Sinai for a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord.

7 And the drink offering thereof shall be the fourth part of an hin for the one lamb; in the holy place shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the Lord for a drink offering.

8 And the other lamb shalt thou offer at even: as the meat offering of the morning, and as the drink offering thereof, thou shalt offer it, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.

9 ¶ And on the sabbath day two lambs of the first year without spot; and two tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil; and the drink offering thereof:

10 This is the burnt offering of every sabbath, beside the continual burnt offering, and his drink offering.

Timed throughout all your generations every day; as it is expressed Exod. xxix. 42. For it was in the nature of a daily prayer to God, that he should continually continue his mercy unto Israel (as Abarbanel observes), and increase their corn, wine, and oil, which they acknowledged hereby they received from him.

Which was ordained in Mount Sinai! There Moses received both this law, and all the rest (which are mentioned in the book of Exodus), concerning the service of God, and the place where it was to be performed, and his ministers, &c. And this sufficiently shows, that he speaks here to those who were so young at the first institution of these laws, that they gave the less heed to them, or had forgotten them. And there are those who think that for eight-and-thirty years they had disused them; which they gather from Deut. xii. 8. But I do not find that this is so. Those Passovers were wholly omitted during that space; though perhaps not so regularly performed as when they came to Canaan. For to suppose that, is to suppose that the fire from heaven either went out, or burnt continually to go purpose; and that the Divine Majesty had no concernment set upon his table; and consequently did not keep house, and dwell amongst them all that time: in short, that there was no worship of God at the tabernacle. All these arguments may convince any man, there were offered at least the daily sacrifice, morning and even, and those on the sabbath.

For a sweet savour.] See Exod. xxix. 41.

Ver. 7. The drink offering thereof shall be the fourth part of an hin for the one lamb.] So it was ordained also in Mount Sinai, as appears from the same Exod. xxi. 40. And in this very book there is a general rule given to this new generation, that this should be the least quantity of wine which should be offered with a burnt-offering, or peace-offering (see Num. xv. 5). Which was a thing so commonly practised, that no wine being sacrificed, but they poured wine upon the flesh, as it flavoured the altar. thorough water was sometimes poured upon the sacrifices, yet Nommus saith (lib. iv. Dionysiac.), it was when men knew not the use of wine; for after that was found out, they never sacrificed without it (see Fort. Scaenius Myrothec. 2. cap. 42).

In the holy place.] Upon the altar of burnt-offerings, which stood in the holy place, near to the door of the tabernacle (Exod. xxix. 42). Shall that cause the strong wine to be poured unto the Lord? The Hebrew word skceor commonly signifies any sort of strong drink, but here the noblest and most generous wine; for it was not lawful to use any other liquor in their sacrifices. The heathens had this respect to their gods, that they always offered to them the most excellent wine they had; which appears by these words we meet withal so often in Homer (both in his Iliad and Odyssey) of men's pouring out upon their sacrifices,—οισαρια οινος, or black wine, of the deepest colour, red as blood; which was the richest of all other. And Herodian, speaking of the tabernacle, says (Hist. 2. 12.): "He who offered the cemeteries of oxen every morning with great multitudes of sheep, upon which he heaped all manner of spices, adds this also (lib. v.), ιδου εις τον καινοτοτον εις καινοτων καιλατων καιλατις αμερετας καιδειας, &c. "pouring on many flagons of the oldest and most excellent-wine upon the altar," so that rivers of wine and blood ran mixed together. Ver. 8. The other lamb shalt thou offer at even, &c.] All the foregoing verses relate to the morning sacrifice; and this only briefly prescribes, that the other lamb should be offered in the same manner at even, with the very same meat-offering and drink-offering. And I think there was no sacrifice to precede the morning burnt-offering, but it was to be offered first; so this at even was to conclude all the sacrifices of the day, and none to be offered after it. A sweet savour unto the Lord.] As acceptable to him as the morning sacrifice.

Ver. 9. On the sabbath day two lambs of the first year.] He is not mean, that, whereas every morning and evening they offered one lamb to the sabbath-day they should offer two; but that there should be two lambs offered on the sabbath, over and above the daily offering, as appears from ver. 10. Whether one of them were to be offered in the morning, and the other added at the evening sacrifice, it is not said: for it is probable the sacrifices on the sabbath were so ordered, for the Jews say, that, at the time of this additional sacrifice in the morning of the sabbath, they sang at the temple the song of Moses (Deut. xxxii.), dividing it into six parts, and singing one part every sabbath; so that in six weeks they had finished it, and then began again. And at the evening sacrifice they sang that song of his Exod. xv, at which time the priests were to anoint the trumpets three times more than they did at the ordinary songs.

Two tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, and the drink offering thereof.] As the burnt-offerings were doubled on this day, so a double quantity of flour is ordered for the meat-offering that attended the burnt-offering (for only a tenth part of an ephah, which was to accompany one offerer, and consequently there was to be as much more oil and wine daily. And here it may be fit to note, that, as soon as the drink-offering was poured out, then the song before mentioned began, with the trumpets and other instruments of music; but not till then; for the burnt-offering was not perfect, till the drink-offering, which was to accompany it, was offered; whereby it was completed (see Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service, ch. 7. sect. 2).

Ver. 10.] The daily sacrifice was not to be omitted on the sabbath, but this was to be added to it; and, thence, by the Jews, called musoph. Of which sort there were seven more, which were to be added to the sacrifice of the day; viz. that in the new moon (ver. 11), at the passover (ver. 12), and the feast of Pentecost (ver. 26), in the beginning of the year (ch. xxix. 1), on the day of expiration (ver. 7), on the feast of tabernacles there were peculiar sacrifices for seven days together (Lev. xxiii. 35), and on the last day of the feast another (Num. xxix. 35—37). All these were called musophim, or additional sacrifices to the daily sacrifice.
11 And in the beginnings of your months ye shall offer a burnt offering unto the Lord; two young bullocks, and one ram, seven lambs of the first year without spot;
12 And three tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, for one bullock; and two tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, for one ram;
13 And a several tenth deal of flour mingled with oil for a meat offering unto one lamb; for a burnt offering of a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord.

Ver. 11. In the beginnings of your months] This solemn sacrifice seems to have been ordained by God, to prevent the idolatry which was usual among the gentiles, to mark the commencement of the holy month falling out to be a sabbath. In which case, and all others, where several solemnities met together on the same day, the daily sacrifice was offered first, and then the rest of the sacrifices peculiar for that day were to be performed, every one in its order. As for example, if the sabbath and new moon, and the feast of trumpets, fell out on the same day, they began the daily offering, after which followed the sacrifices proper to the sabbath; and after that the sacrifice appointed on the new moon; and then, those that belonged to the feast of trumpets; and all was concluded with the evening sacrifice, as Abarbinel observes in his preface to the book of Leviticus.

Ver. 12. A several tenth deal of flour.] That is, three tenth parts of an ephah (ver. 5).

For a meat offering.] I. e. For each bullock there was to be this proportion of flour; which is exactly according to the general rule before given (ch. xv. 9).

Ver. 13. A several tenth deal of flour mingled with oil, &c.] Unto each of the seven lambs before mentioned (ver. 11), a meat-offering was to be joined in less proportion than the other, according to the rule there given (ch. xv. 4).

For a burnt offering, &c.] See ver. 6.

Ver. 15. A hin unto a lamb.] See there, ver. 7.

This is the burnt offering of every month] There are more sacrifices appointed on the new moons, than on the sabbath itself; because they returned seldomer. And the gentiles multiplying sacrifices on such occasions, if the Jews had not been thus employed in the worship of God, they might have been tempted to pay their services to idols.

Ver. 15. One kid for a sin offering] This sacrifice of a goat for a sin-offering, with the same Procopius, is coupled with the rest, being a shadow of the passion of Christ, for whose sake all our sacrifices are acceptable unto God the Father.

Unto the Lord] It is well observed by Grotius, that these words "unto the Lord" were added, to put them in mind at this time of the right object of worship, when they were in danger to offer sacrifice to the moon, after the manner of the heathens. This is the more to be regarded, because a goat being appointed to be offered at two other solemnities, and to be offered for a sin-offering (ver. 22. 30), it is not said "unto the Lord" (though certainly so intended), because there was no danger at those times to direct their sacrifices to a wrong object, as there was upon the new moons; when the heathen offered a goat unto the moon, it being a creature whose horns are like to those of a new moon. R. Beecham long ago observed this: "A goat (saith he) was offered to extirpate the religion of those who worshipped the moon, which makes the Scripture say expressly unto the Lord." And Grotius more largely in his More Neovochim, par. iii. cap. 46, where, after he had taken notice of the difference between sin-offerings and burnt-offerings, the latter of which being wholly burnt might be properly said to be unto the Lord, whereas sin-offerings were commonly eaten by the priests; he adds, that "this sin-offering is peculiarly said to be unto the Lord, lest any one should think this goat to be a sacrifice to the moon, after the manner of the Egyptians: which was not necessary to be said of the goats offered at other solemn times, because they were not in the beginning of the month, nor distinguished from other days by any natural sign, but only by the appointment of the law; which uses these words concerning this goat peculiarly, to pluck out of men's thoughts those inordinate and pernicious opinions of the gentiles; who had long sacrificed to the moon at this time, as they did to the sun at his rising, and when he entered into the several signs."

Beside the continual burnt offering, &c.] This is so often particularly mentioned, lest any should imagine it might be spared, when there were such liberal offerings of several sorts.

Ver. 16. See Exod. xii. 6. 18. Lev. xxiii. 5, where it is called the Lord's passover (see Exod. xii. 27).

Ver. 17. In the fifteenth day—Is the feast.] The fourteenth day at even the feast of the passover was according to his measure. Thus Procopius Gazaesus; in whom they that think such expositions useful may find entertainment.

CH. XXVIII. 711
18 In the first day shall be an holy convocation; ye shall do no manner of servile work therein:

19 But ye shall offer a sacrifice made by fire for a burnt offering unto the Lord; two young bullocks, and one ram, and seven lambs of the first year: they shall be unto you without blemish:

20 And their meat offering shall be of flour mingled with oil: three tenth deals shall ye offer for a bullock, and two tenth deals for a ram;

21 A several tenth deal shalt thou offer for every lamb, throughout the seven lambs:

22 And one goat for a sin offering, to make an atonement for you.

kept, as appears from Exod. xii. 11. But on the fifteenth day began another feast, called "the feast of unleavened bread" (see Lev. xxiii. 6).

See days] See Exod. xii. 15. xiii. 6, 7. Lev. xxiii. 6.

Ver. 18.] See Exod. xii. 16. Lev. xxiii. 7.

Ver. 19. Ye shall offer a sacrifice] The solemnity was ordained before, and offerings also in general prescribed to be made seven days (see Lev. xxiii. 8), but the particular sacrifices not set down till now.

Two young bullocks, &c.] The same sacrifices which were appointed to be offered upon every first day of the month (ver. 11).

Ver. 20.] The very same which were appointed on the first day of every month (ver. 12).

Ver. 21.] Just as it was in the forementioned sacrifice (ver. 13). And though the drink-offerings be not mentioned, they must be understood to be the same; because it always accompanied the meat-offerings of burnt-sacrifices, which were not complete without them.

Ver. 22.] As it was in the new moon (ver. 15). But meat and drink offerings did not accompany offerings for sin, save only in the case of a leper; who was to bring three offerings, a sin-offering, a trespass-offering, and a burnt-offering for his cleansing, with three tenth parts of an ephah of flour (Lev. xiv. 10, &c.).

Ver. 23.] There are two things that are here to be remarked: that these offerings (as I noted before) should not put by the continual burnt-sacrifice, but be added to it; and that all these were offered in the morning, after the day's morning sacrifice; and were not part of the evening sacrifice, which concluded all.

Ver. 24. After this manner ye shall offer daily.] Upon every one of the days of unleavened bread (ver. 17), which, though it was a great expense, yet was but a fitting acknowledgment of God's wonderful goodness to them, in bringing them out of the land of Egypt, with all their flocks and their herds; which was, according to the language of men, was called his eating of it: as the heathen gods also are said to eat the fat of their sacrifices (Deut. xxxii. 39).

Of a sweet savour unto the Lord.] Very acceptable to him: as hath been often observed.

It shall be offered beside the continual burnt offering.] There is the greatest care taken (by the frequent repetition of this), that they should not think to save their daily sacrifice by these others; which were to be added to it, and not to supply the place of it see verse 12.

Ver. 25.] This last day of the feast was equal to the first (Lev. xxvii. 7, 8), and is called "a feast unto the Lord," Exod. xiii. 6.

Ver. 26. Also in the day of the first fruits, &c.] Called "the feast of harvest, the first-fruits of their labours," Exod. xxiii. 16, and the feast of weeks, when they brought the first-fruits of the first-fruits, and of the New Testament called "Firstfruits," which is usually called "the feast of Pentecost," when the Jews in their writings, commonly call this feast by the name of aztereth, and so doth the Chaldee paraphrase upon this place; though Abarbinel observes, that this alone, of all the three great feasts, is never called so in the Holy Scripture. It is hard therefore to tell, why the Jews call it so in a singular manner; but our learned Dr. Lightfoot hath made several probable conjectures about it: one of which (and most pertinent to this place) is, because there was a restraint, as the word signifies, upon the people, from bringing their first-fruits till this feast. If any did, they received them not from them, but laid them by till this day came (see Temple Service, ch. 14. sect. 4).

Then shall ye bring the first fruits of your harvest, &c.] Mentioned Lev. xxii. 15, which were two loaves made of their first corn, ver. 17, where they are called "the first-fruits unto the Lord."

After your weeks be out.] That is, the seven weeks which they were to number from the morrow after the sabbath (Lev. xxvii. 15), i.e. after the first day of unleavened bread; when they offered another sort of first-fruits (which must be carefully distinguished from those here mentioned), viz. of the barley-harvest which began at the passover; when they were to bring a "sheaf of their first-fruits unto the priest" (Lev. xxvii. 10), the presenting of which sheaf was an introduction to, harvest, and procured them liberty to bring in their first-fruits into the corn, which now, after seven weeks, they reapèd, and carried in at this feast, when they brought these new first-fruits unto the Lord. All which is a description of that which in the New Testament is called the "feast of Pentecost;" being fifty days, as we read there in Leviticus, after the other great feast.

An holy convocation.] See Lev. xxiii. 31.

Ver. 27. Ye shall offer the burnt offering.] Over and above the burnt-offering which was prescribed to be offered with the two loaves before mentioned (Lev. xxiii. 18), unto which this was an additional sacrifice, plainly distinct from it.

Two young bullocks, &c.] The very same that were ordered to be offered upon every new moon, and every day of a feast of unleavened bread, ver. 11.
CHAPTER XXIX.

1 And in the seventh month, on the first day of the month, ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work: it is a day of blowing the trumpets unto you.

2 And ye shall offer a burnt offering for a sweet savour unto the Lord; one young bullock, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year without blemish:

3 And their meat offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals for a bullock, and two tenth deals for a ram,

19, &c. whereas that in Leviticus is "one young bullock, two rams, and seven lambs."

Ver. 29.] So it is ordained before in the former cases (ver. 13, 21).

Ver. 30.] Besides the kid prescribed for the same purpose, when the two loaves were offered (Lev. xxiii. 19), which was accompanied with "two lambs for a sacrifice of peace-offerings." So that there were a great many sacrifices offered at this famous festival; though it did not last so long as that of the passover.

Ver. 31.] Ye shall offer them beside the continual burnt offerings.] He still takes care that this daily sacrifice should not be omitted, by reason of such a number of other sacrifices, which were to attend upon it, but not to put it by (ver. 10, 15, 23).

[They shall be unto you without blemish] This might have been sufficiently understood, from what was said of the daily offering (ver. 3) and of all the other prescribed in this chapter (ver. 11, 19). But lest any profane person might think there was no need to be so scrupulous about these sacrifices, because it is only said, "two young bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year" (ver. 27); these words are also here added, to take away all doubt; + they shall be unto you without blemish," i.e. as perfect as all the rest are ordained to be.

CHAPTER XXIX.

1 The offering at the feast of trumpets, 7 at the day of affliction their souls, 13 and on the eight days of the feast of tabernacles.

30 And one kid of the goats, to make an atonement for you.

31 Ye shall offer them beside the continual burnt offering, and his meat offering, (they shall be unto you without blemish) and their drink offerings.

Vol. I.—90
Ver. 6. Beside the burnt offering of the month, and his meat offering. It was appointed before, that in the beginning of every month there should be a burnt-offering offered of two bullocks, &c. (ch. xxviii. 11, 12) which was not to be omitted in the beginning of this month; but these other sacrifices added to the offerings of every new moon: which made this a greater new moon than any other; being the first moon of the old civil year.

The daily burnt offering. With which the solemnity of the day began; and then followed the proper sacrifices belonging to it.

Ver. 7. An holy convocation. This solemn assembly is ordered twice before in this book of Leviticus (ch. xvi. 29. xxiii. 27.), and here repeated, perhaps, for the sake of Eleazar and Joshua, who were newly advanced to their several offices, that they might take special notice of it, and see it observed.

Ver. 8. Offer a burnt offering—for a sweet savour. Endeavour to procure acceptance of the rest of the sacrifices of the day, with this whole burnt-offering, besides the daily sacrifice; as it follows (ver. 11).

One young bullock, &c. The same that were appointed on the foregoing solemnity, ver. 2. (except the monthly offering, ver. 6.) to which was added another ram for a burnt-offering (Lev. xvi. 5), as a devout acknowledgment that they owned him alone for their sovereign Lord.

Ver. 9, 10.] The meat-offering attending these burnt-offerings was to be in the same proportion as before ordered (ver. 3, 4).

Ver. 11. One kid of the goats. As was appointed in the foregoing solemnity (ver. 5).

Beside the sin offering of atonement. Mentioned Lev. xvi. 9, &c. whose blood was carried by the high-priest into the most holy place; which was done in no other sacrifice but that, and the bullock which was offered as a sin-offering for the family of Aaron on the same day (Lev. xvi. 14).

And the continual burnt offering, &c.] These were no more to be omitted on the great day of atonement, than on any other day; but the service of the day was to begin with the continual burnt-offering; and then followed the burnt-offerings, with the meat and drink-offerings belonging to them, and the sin-offering here prescribed; and then the sacrifice of atonement, and all that is ordered in the sixteenth chapter of Leviticus, for the expiation of the sins of all the people of Israel: which sacrifice the present Jews now wanting, and yet being sensible of the necessity of some satisfaction, but not believing in our blessed Saviour, who hath fully made it for all mankind: they are in a lamentable plunge, and are put to most wretched shifts to devise something to supply the place of the sacrifice of atonement, which was wont to be made for them. One is their own death; it being the continual prayer of every one of them upon their death-bed, “Let my death be the expiation for my sins.” Another is (which is so absurd, that Leo Modina saith they do not use it now in Italy, nor in the eastern countries), the killing of a white cock (if one can be got) by the men, and a white hen by the women, on the eve of this day, saying, “Let this cock be an exchange for me; let it come in my stead; let it be my expiation; let it die, but I and Israel live happily.” Another is that it shows in his Synagog Judaeus, cap. 35. Which I should not here mention, were it not to show, that they have the very same notion still of a sacrifice for sin (even now that they can only make an imitation of it), which we have of the sacrifice of Christ, who was put in our place, and offered himself to God in our stead; and that it ought to be pure and innocent, which is offered instead of a sinner.

Ver. 12. An holy convocation. See Lev. xxiii. 35. And ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord seven days. viz. The feast of tabernacles (Lev. xxiii. 34), which was after the harvest and vintage (Deut. xvi. 13), and kept seven days with great joy and gladness of heart; but they were not bound to abstain from servile work all this time, but only on the first day and on the seventh.

Ver. 13. Ye shall offer a burnt offering. The same kind of sacrifice which was prescribed on the other festivals, to be offered up wholly in honour of God: but here is a far larger proportion than in any other solemnity. Thirteen young bullocks, &c.] On the other festivals two bullocks sufficed (ch. xxviii. 11. 19. 27.), and on the festival in the beginning of this month only one was appointed; but here are thirteen; and so they continued to be offered seven days successively, with 11 And their meat offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals unto every bullock of the thirteen bullocks, two tenth deals to each ram of the two rams, 15 And a several tenth deal to each lamb of the fourteen lambs:
16 And one kid of the goats for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering, and his drink offering.
17 ¶ And on the second day ye shall offer twelve young bullocks, two rams, fourteen lambs of the first year without spot:
18 And their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner:
19 And one kid of the goats for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, and the meat offering thereof, and their drink offerings.
20 ¶ And on the third day eleven bullocks, two rams, fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish;
21 And their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner:
22 And one goat for a sin offering; besides the continual burnt offering, and his meat offering, and his drink offering.
23 ¶ And on the fourth day ten bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish:
24 Their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner:
25 And one kid of the goats for a sin offering:

the decrease only of one bullock every day, till on the seventh day only seven bullocks were offered, which in all made seventy bullocks. The rams also and the lambs were in a double proportion to what was usual throughout the whole festival; which was a vast charge, but more easy at this time of the year than any other, because now their barns were full, and their winepresses overflowed; and their hearts might well be supposed to be more enlarged than at other times, in thankfulness to God for his great benefits. Yet this very gross, troublesome, and expensive way of serving God, made the best men among them groan, and long for the coming of Christ; in whose days, their own doctors say, “no sacrifices shall remain, but the new sacrifices of praise, and prayer.” With which they have been forced to be content for above sixteen hundred years; and, instead of these additional sacrifices unto the daily, have added peculiar prayers (which they also call musaphim) unto the common prayers they used every day (see Buxtorf concerning the feast of the new moon, in his Syr. Tract. Jud. cap. 29).

Ver. 17.] Here one bullock less, than on the day before, is ordered to be offered; and so on every succeeding day there is still a decrease of one bullock; which is all the difference between the offerings on the seven days of this feast, upon every one of which there was the same number of rams and lambs, without any diminution. Which Moses thought fit to set down distinctly from this verse to the thirty-fifth, that there might be no mistake. But little need be noted upon them.

Ver. 18.] Prescribed ver. 14, 15.

Ver. 35. A solemn assembly: ye shall do no servile work.] It was to be observed as the first day of the feast of tabernacles, both of them being called a sabbath, Lev. xxiii. 39.

Ver. 36. Ye shall offer a burnt offering.] Here is a peculiar sacrifice appointed upon this day, in the same terms as upon the first day of the feast of tabernacles (ver. 13).

One bullock, &c.] But though this was an extraordinary day, and a distinct festival (as I showed upon Lev. xxiii. 39), yet here are fewer sacrifices prescribed on this day, than upon any of the foregoing seven. For on every one of them two rams were offered and fourteen lambs; and here but half so many; and seven bullocks were the fewest that were offered upon any of those days (and on the first day 37 Their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullock, for the ram, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner:

38 And one goat for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, and his meat offering, and his drink offering.

thirteen), but here only one. By which God consulted, perhaps, the weakness of mankind, who naturally grew weary both of the charge and of the labour of such services, when they were long continued; and therefore he made them every day less toilsome and expensive; and put them in mind, likewise, that the multitude of sacrifices did not procure their acceptance with God; and in length of time they would come to nothing, and be utterly abolished, to establish something better in their room.

Ver. 37. In such proportions as God had before ordained in the fifteenth chapter of this book, in the beginning of it; as I have often observed.

Ver. 38.] This is never omitted upon any festival (ch. xxviii. 15. 32. 30. xxix. 5. 11. 16. 19, &c.), to put them in mind, that, after all their services, they stood in need of forgiveness.

Ver. 39. These things ye shall do (or offer) unto the Lord in your set feasts. All these feasts were fixed and stated at certain times; on which God was to be worshipped after the manner here prescribed in these two chapters. For all these offerings (except one sin-offering, upon each set day) were wholly burnt-offerings (as I have already observed), which may properly be said to be done, that is, offered unto the Lord; neither people nor priests having any share in them.

39 These things ye shall do unto the Lord in your set feasts, beside your vows, and your free-will offerings, for your burnt offerings, and for your meat offerings, and for your drink offerings, and for your peace offerings.

40 And Moses told the children of Israel according to all that the Lord commanded Moses.

CHAPTER XXX.

1 Vows are not to be broken. 3 The exception of a maid's vow. 6 Of a wife's. 9 Of a widow's, or her that is divorced.

1 And Moses spake unto the heads of the tribes concerning the children of Israel, saying, This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded.

CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1. Moses spake unto the heads of the tribes

There were wont to be extraordinary assemblies of these, or other great men, upon special occasions, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 14. n. 4), who are sometimes called, as they are here, “the heads of all the tribes, and the elders” (Deut. v. 23), and, in other places, “the heads of the people” (Deut. xxx. 5), “the whole congregation of the children of Israel” (Josh. xviii. 1. xxi. 12), “the chief of all the people” (Judg. xx. 2), “all Israel” (1 Sam. vii. 5), “all the princes of Israel, the princes of the tribes” (1 Chron. xxviii. 1), “all the elders of Israel, and heads of the tribes, and chief of the fathers” (2 Chron. v. 9), “the counsel of the princes and elders” (Ezra x. 8). And it is commonly said by the Hebrew doctors, concerning such assemblies, that “wheresoever the children of Israel were met together, or the greater part of them, there the Shechinah” (that is, the Divine Majesty, or the Holy Ghost, as they sometimes speak) “was wont to rest.”

Concerning the children of Israel.] Acquainted them with a matter which concerned all the people; willing them to communicate it to them.

This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded.

2 If a man vow a vow unto the Lord, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth.

It is very probable there had been some case pronounced to him about vows: concerning which he here gives such rules, as might direct them in time to come.

Ver. 2. If a man.] It is reasonable to think that this includes the other sex also; provided they be in their own power, and not subject to another, and be in their right mind.

Vow a vow unto the Lord.] Promise solemnly unto God something that is for his honour and service; for that seems to be meant by “unto the Lord;” as, that he will offer some sacrifice at the feast above mentioned, more than is prescribed; or afflict his soul on some other day, besides the day of atonement (see ver. 13).

Or swear an oath to bind his soul? Whether it be a simple vow, or bound also with a solemn oath; which made a double obligation, by calling God to witness the sincerity of his intentions.

He shall not break his word.] In the Hebrew it is, “he shall not profane his word,” for it being solemnly passed to God, it made him vile and contemptible if he did not keep it. The Jewish doctors very prudently advise their scholars not to accustom themselves to make vows, but to content themselves with doing what the law commands, and abstaining

3 If a woman also vow a vow unto the Lord, and bind herself by a bond, being in her father's house in her youth;

4 And her father hear her vow, and her bond wherewith she hath bound her soul, and her father shall hold his peace at her: then all her vows shall stand, and every bond wherewith she hath bound her soul shall stand.

5 But if her father disallow her in the day that he heareth; not any of her vows, or of her bonds wherewith she hath bound her soul, shall stand: and the Lord shall forgive her, because her father disallowed her.

6 And if she had at all an husband, when she vowed, or uttered ought out of her lips, wherewith she bound her soul; from what it forbids; but if they did make them, to lock upon it as a high affront to God not to perform them.

He shall do] If the thing be lawful, and possible. And if he appointed no time for the doing of it, he was to think himself obliged to do it presently, without delay (Deut. xxii. 21).

Ver. 3. [If a woman also vow a vow] As most interpreters think the word man, in the foregoing verse, comprehends women, who were in this perfect liberty at first men be speak of; so the word woman here comprehends all men, who are in the same circumstances with these women, whom he here directs in their vows: whom he considers in a threefold state: before they are married, and after marriage, and in their widowhood.

Bind herself by a bond.] By an oath, wherewith she covets her vow; as it seems to be interpreted, ver. 10. 13.

Being in her father's house in her youth.] That is, being a part of his family, and still under his government, and not married. For the father's power lasts no longer, as Grotius observes (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 5. n. 7). In which condition likewise are all sons, who remain in their father's family, undisposed of in marriage: and all servants, who are manifestly in subjection to their masters; and therefore could no more resolve to do what they pleased, than the women here mentioned.

Ver. 4. [And her father hear her vow, and her bond] The first of these may relate to her simpler vow: and the next to an oath wherewith she bound it, to make it firmer: which her father is supposed to hear, either when she spake the words, or when she acquainted him with her vow, as in duty she was bound to do. Her father shall hold his peace at her.] If he did not declare that he disallowed what she had promised, it was supposed he consented to it: unless he said he would take time to consider, and neither allow nor disallow it: in which case, in all reason, she was to wait for his resolution.

Then all her vows shall stand, &c.] It was not in his power afterward to disannul any of them, if he did not contradict them when he was told of them, or after the time he had taken for deliberation.

Ver. 5. [If her father disallow her in the day that he hear her] As soon as he comes acquainted with it. Not any of her vows, or of her bonds—shall stand.] Though she had bound her vows with an oath, they were not to be performed, when her father had declared his will to the contrary.

The Lord shall forgive her.] The not performing her vow shall not be imputed to her as a sin. Because her father disallowed her.] Whose consent was supposed to be necessary, before the vow could be binding: she being, while a part of his family, under his power, and not her own. Some have fancied, that when her father was dead the vow reviv'd, because then she was at her own disposal; but it is plain, her father wholly disannulled the vow, when he did not approve it; so that it could not recover a force it never had, being made without his consent. The same is to be said of a guardian, who was supposed to be in her stead, when he died and left his children to his care. And this power was fit to be reserved to parents (as a late learned man, Puffendorf, observes), not only lest women, in their imprudent years, should undo themselves, by vowing more than their fortunes could bear; but also lest the paternal estate should be burdened by such vows, and the necessity of their being hindered. So that this power did not flow from positive laws, but from natural reason; nobody that is subject to another having any right to dispose of those things which are under that power to which they are subject.

Ver. 6. [If she had at all an husband, when she vowed] Was a married woman, or espoused to a husband, though still in her father's house (as it appears from ver. 10. this must be interpreted), when she made this vow, then it was to be considered, not what her father, but her husband (under whose power she now was) should determine about it.

Or uttered ought—wherewith she bound her soul.] Said any thing, which she confirmed by an oath.

Ver. 7. And if her husband hear it.] The husband present when she spake it; or she told it him afterward. And hold his peace at her.] Said nothing to signify his disannulment of it (see ver. 4). Her vows shall stand, &c.] As before (ver. 4).

Ver. 8. See ver. 5. where there is the same case of a daughter under the power of her father, as here of a wife under the power of her husband.

Ver. 9.] The reason of this is so plain, that one would think it needed not to have been mentioned, because such women were wholly in their own power, being free from their husbands. Therefore it is very probable he speaks here of a widow, or divorced woman, returned to her father's house (as the manner frequently was, Lev. xxii. 12), who might be supposed to recover his ancient power over her, to disannul her vows, as he might before she was married: which is here absolutely condemned; for though she lived with him, she was her own woman (as we now speak), and might dispose of herself and her goods as she pleased, without his consent.

Ver. 10.] i.e. Engaged herself in a vow, and perhaps confirmed it with an oath, while she and her husband lived together, or before she was divorced from him.

Ver. 11.] She was bound, in this case, to make them
CHAPTER XXXI.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

2 Avenge the children of Israel of the Midianites: afterward shall thou be gathered unto thy people.

3 And Moses spake unto the people, saying, Arrm some of yourselves unto the war, and let them go against the Midianites, and avenge the Lord of Midian.

4 Providing for the Levites there (ch. xxxvi.), God had warned him to prepare for his death before this (ch. xxvii. 19), but he first let him have the satisfaction of seeing the Midianites punished; and gave him some time to settle the public affairs, and to make also a long exhortation to the Israelites, to observe all that he had commanded them.

5 Ver. 3. He speedily put his command in execution; which might possibly be in the ninth month of the fortieth year.

6 Arrm some of yourselves] He doth not at first determine the number; but as many as pleased might offer themselves voluntarily, to be ready to obey him.

7 Let them go—and avenge the Lord of Midian.] The Lord bade him “avenge the children of Israel” (ver.
4 Of every tribe a thousand, throughout all the tribes of Israel, shall ye send to the war.

5 So there were delivered out of the thousands of Israel, a thousand of every tribe, twelve thousand armed for war.

6 And Moses sent them to the war, a thousand of every tribe, them and Phinehas the son of Eleazar, 2), but Moses bids them "avenge the Lord:" for they had the same interest, and were both injured at the same time, and by the same means. And as God was so gracious as to resent the evil done to Israel, so Moses, in duty and gratitude to God, thought himself bound rather to consider the dishonour that was done to him, whose war this was; not only because undertaken by his command, but in his quarrel (with those who had drawn the Israelites to idolatry), and for the sake of his people.

Ver. 4.) When a great many, perhaps all the people, appeared ready to go to war, he ordered that only a select number should be sent, of a thousand out of each of the twelve tribes.

Ver. 5. So there were delivered—a thousand of every tribe.] Their officers picked out this number from among the rest; or they were chosen by lot for this service; or they stepped out and offered themselves volunteers (as we speak), which the twenty-seventh verse may seem to countenance, where they are called "appointed to go with the army," (ch. xxv. 8.) In aftertimes also, in the days taken by his command, but in his quarrel (with those who had drawn the Israelites to idolatry), and for the sake of his people.

Twelve thousand armed] This was but a small number, compared with the whole nation of the Midianites (who had five kings, ver. 8). But God would have them rely more upon him than upon the multitude of a host; and let them see, by their success against this people, that they needed not fear the conquest of Cushan-Rishathaim.

Ver. 6. Moses sent them to the war.] He gave them their commission to fight the Midianites.

Them and Phinehas] Who was not their commander-in-chief (or their general, as we now speak), for it did not belong to the priestly office to conduct armies: and it is said expressly in the words following, he went "with the holy instruments," &c. to be ready for the form of commandment, which was required by the general, who, it is most likely, was Joshua. It is true, indeed, that Phinehas was a man of great courage, and had lately performed a singular piece of service, which had won him great reputation. This hath made some think, he was the fitter to go and to avenge the Lord on Midian, as he had begun to do (cp. ch. xxi. 2). In aftertimes also, in the days taken by this man, the officers and the foot-soldiers, the armies of Israel were led by them against their enemies. But then it must be considered, that they were also the supreme governors of the people, and there were no other.

With the holy instruments.] By which Jonathan undertook the ark and thummim; which some think Phinehas carried along with him, wherewith to consult the Divine Majesty, in case of any difficulty that might arise about the management of the war. And to make out this, they suppose Eleazar to be old and crazy, or labouring under some infirmity; which was the reason that Phinehas his son was substituted in his room to perform this office (see our very learned Dr. Spencer, Dissert. De Urin et Thummim, cap. 6. sect. 2). But this may be justly doubted, whether Phinehas being only the son of the high-priest, and not yet capable of that office, could be substituted to perform this great charge, which belonged to the high-priest alone. Nor do we find any warranty for confiding to him by means of thummim, but only before the most holy place (see ch. xxvii. 21). And therefore it seems to me far more likely that he means the ark, which was wont to be carried, in following times, into the field, when they went to fight with their enemies (1 Sam. iv. 4, 5. xiv. 18. 2 Sam. xi. 1). Yea, Joshua himself, not long after this time, ordered the ark to be carried, with priests blowing the trumpets before it, when he surrounded Jericho (Josh. vi. 4. 6. 7, &c.). And therefore the "holy instruments" being here joined with "the trumpets to blow in his hand," it makes it the more probable, that the ark may be here meant; there being also something in this very book to countenance this opinion (see ch. xiv. 41, but especially xxxii. 20, 21).

But it must be confessed that it is never thus expressed in any other place of Holy Scripture, but always called the ark of God, or of the covenant, or the testimony, or the like. And therefore, perhaps, they give the truest sense of these words, who take the following words to be an explication of them; that is, the trumpets were the holy instruments, which he carried in his hand.

The trumpets.] Which he delivered to the priests who followed him, to sound an alarm when they went to fight, according to the direction, ch. x. 8, 9; and as the practice was in future ages (2 Chron. xiii. 15).

They were sent against the Midianites.] It is not certain whether the Midianites came out of their country to give them battle; or they first broke into their country, and then fought their army.

As the Lord commanded Moses.] One would think this meant no more, but that they obeyed the commandment of God before mentioned (ver. 2). But the Jews think he hath respect to another particular commandment, which they say was given by Moses when they went out to this war; that they should not, when they besieged any city, begin it quite round, but only on three sides; leaving one naked, that the besieged might flee away, if they pleased; by which means effusion of human blood was prevented. So Guil. Shickard observes out of Siphri in his Mischpah, Hanelech, cap. 5. Theor. 187 and Mr. Selden, in his, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 15, where he shows they understand this of all wars but those against the seven nations in Canaan and Amalek; towards whom this kindness was not shown, as appears by the siege of Jericho. But the laws about managing wars, which are mentioned in the book of Deuteronomy, there may, they say, have been never given; though the Jews fancy this law was now given about Midian, and observed ever after.

They slew all the males.] Who were in this fight, and did not save themselves by flight.

Ver. 8. They slew the kings of Midian.] Little kings, called princes, Josh. xiii. 21, where they are said to be dukes of Sihon, i.e. great men tributary to Sihon, while he continued king of the Amorites. But after the Israelites had conquered him, they took, perhaps, the title of kings.

Beside the rest of them that were slain.] They made not only a great slaughter of the people, but killed their chief commanders, who led them on.

Eli, and Rekem, and Zur, &c.] They are particularly named, that all their neighbours might be seen... and Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba, five kings of Midian: Balaam also the son of Beor they slew with the sword.
9 And the children of Israel took all the women of Midian captives, and their little ones, and took the spoil of all their cattle, and all their flocks, and all their goods.
10 And they burnt all their cities wherein they dwelt, and all their goodly castles, with fire.
11 And they took all the spoil, and all the prey, both of men and of beasts.
12 And they brought the captives, and the prey, unto Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and unto the congregation of the children of Israel, unto the camp at the plains of Moab, which are by Jordan near Jericho.

13 ¶ And Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and all the princes of the congregation, went forth to meet them without the camp.
14 And Moses was wroth with the officers of the host, with the captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, which came from the battle.
15 And Moses said unto them, Have ye saved all the women alive?
16 Behold, these caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the Lord in the matter of Peor, and there was a plague among the congregation of the Lord.
17 Now therefore kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him.

(though sometimes it includes in it men and women); and the third their money and goods.

Unto Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and unto the congregation] Unto the seventy elders, and princes of the tribes, who were assembled with them (see ch. xxxix. 1), as it seems to be expounded in the next verse.

At the plains of Moab.] From whence they marched against Midian; and had been encamped there a great while (Deut. xxxi. 1, xxvi. 63).

Ver. 13. Hearing they were returned victorious, they went to congratulate them before they came into the camp; for which there was also another reason, mentioned ver. 19. This shows that Eleazar was not so infirm as some suppose; and affords an argument to strengthen their opinion, who think Joshua was now greater in age (Ex. xxxi. 11) than R. Johanan makes answer, ver. 13. He went to receive his reward for the death of the twenty-four thousand Israelites which he had procured (ch. xxv. 9). And thus, saith another, it happened unto him, according to the proverb, The camel went to desire horns, and they cut off his ears.

Ver. 9. Took all the women of Midian captives, and their little ones.] After they were masters of the field (as we speak) by the overthrow of their armies, they fell upon their cities; and, according to the ancient custom in the most bloody wars, they killed only the men, but no women nor children (Gen. xxxiv. 25, 1 Kings xi. 16). And so the law of God afterward required they should do, when they took any city that did not belong to the Canaanites (Deut. xx. 13, 14), who were utterly to be destroyed, ver. 16, 17, where he saith, Thou shalt save nothing alive that breatheth.

Took the spoil of all their cattle, &c.] As belonging to them, by the right of conquest, in a just war.

Ver. 10.] Made the country desolate, that they might never encourage to return again; nor be able, without great hazard, to settle themselves there, where they had not a fortress left to defend them. This was but a necessary care; notwithstanding which they had peopled the country again so well, in the space of about two hundred years, that they were able to oppress the Israelites; as we read Joshua iv. 1.

Ver. 11.] They had possessed themselves of them before (ver. 9), but now they carried them away.

Ver. 12.] They brought the captives, and the prey, and the spoil.] Here are three different words to express their booty, which they brought to the camp of Israel: the first of which signifies the women and children which were taken; the second, the cattle and the flocks fied of the truth of this history. And he that is called Zur, is thought to have been the father of Cozbi, whom Pharaoh took as w.

Balaam—they slew with the sword.] He had seen such good success of his wicked counsel (which he gave either as he went home, or returning again to them: see ch. xxiv. ult.) that, presuming the Israel-ites were forsaken of their God, he ventured to go along with the Midianites unto this battle; hoping he might curse the Israelites; so that iniquity (i.e. idolatry) was found among them; which he could not do while they were free from it. Thus he perished by his own wicked devices; and was so far from having his wish, that he might "die the death of the righte-ous" (that is, live long), that (as the Jews say) he was slain in the thirty-fourth year of his age. The deers in the Sciein of the Sun that iniquity (i.e. idolatry) was found among them; which he could not do while they were free from it. Thus he perished by his own wicked devices; and was so far from having his wish, that he might "die the death of the righte-ous" (that is, live long), that (as the Jews say) he was slain in the thirty-fourth year of his age. The deers in the Sciein of the Sun been the chief seducers (ver. 6, 17, 18), and, perhaps, he feared might be so again.

Ver. 17. Kill every man: That the nation might be exiriputed, as far as lay in their power.

Kill every woman that hath known men: For these, it is to be supposed, had been the most instrumental in the crime before mentioned; either by prostituting themselves, or their daughters, to the lust of the Israelites; and thereby drawing them to idolatry: in which sin they were so settled, that there was no hope of reclaiming them; but they might rather (if they had attempted to do so) have exacted the Israelites to commit the same again.

Ver. 18. All the women children, that have not known a man—keep alive: Being young, there was some hope they might be brought off from idolatry, and become proselytes to the true religion.

For yourselves: To be sold as slaves to any other nation, or to be kept as squaws, or taken to be their wives, after such preparation as the law required (Deut. xxii. 16, 17, &c.). This was a peculiar case, wherein a middle course was held between those that were of the seven nations of Canaan, and those that were not. If they were not of those seven nations, the Israelites might take the women and little ones unto themselves (Deut. xx. 14, 15), if they were, every thing they breathed was to be destroyed (ver. 16, 17).

But here the Midianites, being guilty of a very great crime against the Lord, and against his people, are punished more heavily than other nations; though not so heavily as those of Canaan were to be: for they killed all the women that were not virgins, as well as all the males, both little and great; but spared the rest together with the cattle, &c. Such an exception was made, in all respects, upon one of the tribes of Israel, upon a high contempt of public authority, in a very great exigency (Judges xi. 11). There is a rule in Deut. xx. 10, that when they came to fight against any city, they should proclaim peace to it; and if they should accept it, they should only make the inhabitants tributaries to them. From whence a question arising, whether this extended to the seven nations of Canaan? It is resolved by Maimonides, that it did; which he proves from Josh. xi. 19, 20. But so great was the sin of this people, that they neither sent offers of peace to them now, nor were they to make any peace with them hereafter (Deut. xxiii. 6). And the reason is there given; because they had slain and cursed those who were true descendants of the Midianites as of the Midianites. Notwithstanding which, Maimonides determines, that though the Israelites did not send messengers of peace to them: yet if they, of their own accord, sent to desire peace of the Israelites, they were not to reject them (see Cunnes De Hebr. Repub. lib. ii. cap. 20).

Ver. 19. Abide without the camp seven days: As unclean persons. For though it was lawful to kill men, in a just war against them, yet δια την ἀναβάσει καὶ κοιταίοις (as Philo speaks), "because of the most ancient and common kindred between all mankind," it was fit men should use some purification to cleanse themselves from that which looked like a crime, though it was none.

Whosoever hath killed any person,] The whole army that went to the war, were to stay without the camp seven days; and such of them as had had their hands in blood, or had touched a dead body, though killed by another, were to use a special purification; which was made by the water of separation, mentioned ch. xix. 9, &c.

Your captives: Or the prey that they had taken; of garments, and other things, mentioned in the next verse: and so the word is translated ver. 26. For we cannot think that the persons they had taken, being gentiles, were to be purified with that water which was peculiar to the Jews.

On the third day, and on the seventh] So the law was, ch. xix. 11, 12. And such purifications were common among the Gentiles, especially the Greeks, upon the like occasions, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. ult. Grotius, lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 21. n. 10). To whom add our late learned Dr. Spencer, lib. iii. dissert. 3. sect. 1, where he takes this to have been a custom, derived from ancient time, before the law of Moses (which may be questioned): and Bonfrienus, upon this place, hath alleged the very same proofs, and several more; particularly this out of the scholiast upon Sophocles, in his Ajax Mastigoph. ᾿εγο γὰρ τοὺς παῖδας ὑπὸ τῆς δύναμιν ζησόντας, &c. "it was the custom among the ancients, when they either killed a man," or made any other slaughter, to wash their hands in water, ἵππος ἀνέκτην μύλαμεν, "for the purification of the defilement."

Ver. 20. Purify all your raiment, &c.: With the same water of separation (or else by washing them in running water, as the manner was in other cases, (Lev. xi. 32, 33), for they might all be supposed to be defiled by dead bodies, and so come under the law (ch. xiv. 11). Ver. 21.] This law was to be observed hereafter by those who went to war; for though the law before was, as I observed, that he who touched a dead body should be purified with the water of separation, yet nothing is there said of him that killed a man in war, but did not, perhaps, touch his body; which now is brought under the same rule.

Ver. 22, 23. Only the gold, and the silver, the brass, the iron, the tin, and the lead,] And Eleazar the priest said unto the men of war which went to the battle, This is the ordinance of the law which the Lord commanded Moses.

Ver. 22. Only the gold, and the silver, the brass, the iron, the tin, and the lead.

Ver. 23. Every thing that may abide the fire, ye shall make it go through the fire, and it shall be clean: nevertheless it shall be purified with the water of separation: and all that abide not the fire ye shall make go through the water.
24 And ye shall wash your clothes on the seventh day, and ye shall be clean, and afterward ye shall come into the camp.

25 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

26 Take the sum of the prey that was taken, both of man and of beast, thou, and Eleazar the priest, and the chief fathers of the congregation:

27 And divide the prey into two parts; between them that took the war upon them, who went out to battle, and between all the congregation:

28 And levy a tribute unto the Lord of the men of war which went out to battle; one soul of five hundred, both of the persons, and of the beeves, and of the asses, and of the sheep:

29 Take it of their half, and give it unto Eleazar the priest, for an heave offering of the Lord.

30 And of the children of Israel's half, thou shalt take one portion of fifty, of the persons, of the beeves, of the asses, and of the flocks, of all manner of beasts, and give them unto the Levites, which keep the charge of the tabernacle of the Lord.

31 And Moses and Eleazar the priest did as the Lord commanded Moses.

32 And the booty, being the rest of the prey which the men of war had caught, was six hundred thousand and seventy thousand and five thousand sheep,

33 And threescore and twelve thousand beeves,

Both of the persons.] i.e. Of the women and the children.

Of the beeves, and of the asses, and of the sheep.] The Hebrew word lekhon signifies goats as well as sheep; and both being here intended, the LXX. express them both. Here is no mention of camels, which it seems their country was not stocked withal at this time (see ver. 34, and what I have noted upon Gen. xxxvii. 25. This tribute to God was but a very small proportion, in comparison with what their kings challenged in following times, if we may believe the Talmudists; who say, they had all the gold and silver, and such rich things that were taken, and half of the rest of the prey, which was divided between them and the people (see Selden in the place above mentioned).

34 And immediately they had only the tenth part (see Gen. xiv. 20).

Ver. 29. Give it unto Eleazar] For the maintenance of the priests, among whom this part of the tribute was divided. And it was just a tenth part of what the Levites had, as they had a tenth part of their tithes, which was paid them for their constant support.

So the law was, ch. xviii. 21, 24, 26, &c. which was observed in this levy; which is called trunma, as the offering for the making of the sanctuary is called Exod. xxv. 2, where we translate it, as here, a heave-offering.

Ver. 30. Of the children of Israel's half, &c.] A larger share is demanded of the people (ten times as much as was paid by the soldiers) because they came more easily by it, without any pains or danger. And they pay it in a very just proportion to the number of those who went to the war, and of those who stayed at home, but were able to go to war, who were above six hundred thousand (ch. xxvi. 2, 51), of which twelve thousand, who were employed in this expedition, were the fifteenth part.

Give them unto the Levites.] Who were far more numerous than the soldiers, and therefore had a greater proportion of the tribute.

Which keep the charge.] See ch. i. 50. iii. 6–8.

Ver. 31.] This command is peculiarly to Moses, (ver. 25), but Eleazar was to assist him in the execution of it (ver. 30), and accordingly they took the sum of the prey both of man and beast, and divided it between the soldiers and people; and levied a tribute upon each for the Lord, who ordered it to his ministers.

Ver. 32. The booty.] i.e. Besides what was necessary spent for their subsistence during the war, and while they lay out of the camp (ver. 19).

Was six hundred thousand and seventy thousand and five thousand sheep.] A vast stock; far exceeding the number of men of war which were in Israel.
CHAPTER XXXI.

34 And three score and one thousand assed,
35 And thirty and two thousand persons in all, of women that had not known man by lying with him.
36 And the half, which was the portion of them that went out to war, was in number three hundred thousand and seven and thirty thousand and five hundred sheep:
37 And the Lord's tribute of the sheep was six hundred and three score and fifteen.
38 And the beaves were thirty and six thousand; of which the Lord's tribute was three score and twelve.
39 And the asses were thirty thousand and five hundred; of which the Lord's tribute was three score and one.
40 And the persons were sixteen thousand; of which the Lord's tribute was thirty and two persons.
41 And Moses gave the tribute, which was the Lord's heave offering, unto Eleazar the priest, as the Lord commanded Moses.
42 And of the children of Israel's half, which Moses divided from the men that warred, Ver. 33. Three score and twelve thousand beaves.] It seems their country had good pasture in it, as well as sheep-walks: for, as Arabia Felix, it is certain, had agros latissimos et fertilissimos, (as Pliny speaks, lib. vi. cap. 25), "most spacious and fertile fields:" so Arabia Petraea, (in which Midian was) did not wholly want them.

Ver. 34. Three score and one thousand assed.] The countries about Judenta abounding with camels also, particularly Arabia, in which Job had a great number, it may seem strange that we read of none here; especially since they had vast numbers in following times (Judg. vi. 5; vii. 12), and the Ishmaelites (with whom they were associates in trade) had them long before this time (Gen. xxxvii. 36, 37). But it is likely they did not yet find it for their profit to feed camels (of which they learnt to make a traffic afterward), no more than mules, of which we read nothing here, nor indeed in Juden, till the times of David. It may be supposed, that, if they had camels, they were of that kind called dromedaries, which were famous in this country in afterages (Isa. lx. 6), and that the people, who escaped the slaughter, fled away upon them: and that there were other beasts in this country, besides beasses, and asses, and sheep, and goats, seems to be plain from ver. 30, where, after the mention of these, he adds of all manner of beasts, he should take a portion for the Levites; but if of camels or dromedaries, I suppose, none were found.

Ver. 35. Thirty and two thousand persons in all, &c.] It appears by this to have been a very populous country, in which were so many virgins.

Ver. 36.] There is no difficulty in this, or in the following verses; this being exactly the half of the whole number of sheep mentioned ver. 32.

Ver. 37.] Which is exactly one in five hundred, out of this half of the booty; as God ordered, ver. 28.

Ver. 38.] The very same proportions are observed here, as in the sheep, which appears by comparing this verse with ver. 33. And the two next verses (39, 40), give the same account of the asses and the persons, which were as exactly divided; and the Lord had the same portion of them, as ver. 34, 35, compared with these, demonstrate.

43 (Now the half that pertained unto the congregation was three hundred thousand and thirty thousand and seven thousand and five hundred sheep, 44 And thirty and six thousand beaves,
45 And thirty thousand assed and five hundred,
46 And sixteen thousand persons;) 47 Even of the children of Israel's half, Moses took one portion of fifty, both of man and of beast, and gave them unto the Levites, which kept the charge of the tabernacle of the Lord; as the Lord commanded Moses.
48 ¶ And the officers which were over thousands of the host, the captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds, came near unto Moses:
49 And they said unto Moses, Thy servants have taken the sum of the men of war which are under our charge, and there lacketh not one man of us.
50 We have therefore brought an obligation for the Lord, what every man hath gotten, of jewels of gold, chains, and bracelets, rings, earrings, and

Ver. 41.] This is recorded to show how faithful Moses was in performing obedience to God's commands (ver. 29), and far from desiring the smallest portion for himself out of so great a booty, which, if he had acted by his own private spirit, he would scarce have avoided.

Ver. 42.] There is nothing here, nor in the following verses, to ver. 48, but a repetition of what was said concerning the other half before mentioned; to show that the same exactness was observed both in the division of the prey among the people, and in taking out of it such a portion as God assigned to the Levites; which was one out of fifty; as out of the men of war's part, one out of five hundred (ver. 28, 30).

Ver. 48.] The first words of this verse seem to suppose, that there were other great officers, as well as the general, who were above the captains over thousands, and the captains over hundreds: which is very probable.

Ver. 49. Thy servants, &c.] The greatest men speak with the greatest reverence to Moses; who was in the place of God.

Have taken the sum of the men of war.] Made a muster of them (as we now speak) at our return from the war.

There lacketh not one man of us.] A wonderful victory; which shows the war was the Lord's (ver. 3), who struck such a terror into them, that one would think they turned their backs, and did not strike a stroke against the Israelites.

Ver. 50. We have therefore brought an obligation.] For the use of the sanctuary; either in purchasing sacrifices, or maintaining God's ministers, &c. For korban signifies every thing that is given to God, though not sacrificed upon the altar.

What every man hath gotten.] All of them offered something to the Lord out of the spoil he had gotten, according to the pietie of ancient times (Gen. xiv. 20). For we find no precept in the law for this; and yet it was constantly practised by David in after times (2 Sam. viii. 11, 12), and by the officers of his army (1 Chron. xxv. 26, 27), and by other men, Samuel, Saul, Abner, &c. (ver. 29, &c.).

Jewels of gold.] Vessels, as the Hebrew word
NUMBERS.

51 And Moses and Eleazar the priest took the gold of them, even all wrought jewels.

52 And all the gold of the offering that they offered up to the Lord, of the captains of thousands, and of the captains of hundreds, was sixteen thousand seven hundred and fifty shekels.

signifies, or all manner of ornaments made of gold; the particulars of which follow, viz. chains, bracelets, &c. but the Jerusalem Targum takes these jewels (as we understand it) to have been the golden attire about the heads of their women.

Chains.] These are commonly thought to have been the ornaments of their arms. But they may as well be thought to have been used about their legs, or their necks.

Bracelets.] These, it is apparent, were ornaments about their wrists or hands (Gen. xxiv. 47. Ezek. xvi. 11).

Rings.] They were ornaments of the fingers (Gen. xli. 42. Esther iii. 10).

Earrings.] Nothing more common in those countries, especially among the Midianites and Ishmaelites; as we find, Judg. viii. 21—26, where there is a different word used to express the ornament; yet the word earring, here used, certainly signifying something round, and the ornaments encompassing the arms and other parts, being before mentioned, it cannot well be thought to denote any thing but rings in the ears. And so we translate it, Ezek. xvi. 12.

Talbots.] Some ornaments about the breasts (see Exod. xxxv. 29).

To make an atonement.] For the guilt of which Moses accused them, ver. 14, or any other, which they had contracted in the war.

Ver. 52.] It hath been observed before, that three thousand shekels made a talent: and therefore their offering amounted to above five talents and a half.

Ver. 53. The men of war had taken spoil.] Or rather, "had taken the spoil," mentioned ver. 13, of which part of the booty no division was made between the men of war and the people (ver. 28), but they kept it entirely to themselves, and now very gratefully made a present of a very considerate part of it to the Lord; see ver. 12, where the word spoil is used strictly for a part of the booty, distinct from the other two, the captives and the prey; and so it signifies here.

Ver. 54. Moses and Eleazar—took the gold] This was said before, (ver. 51), and therefore the sense here is, that having received it as an offering to the Lord, they brought it into the tabernacle of the congregation; as it here follows in the conclusion of this verse.

Of the captains of thousands and of hundreds.] It was not their oblation only, but the oblation of every one of the men of war (ver. 50, 51). But the commanders received it from the common soldiers, and presented it unto Moses and Eleazar, from the whole host.

For a memorial] That God might be mindful of them, i.e. propitious to them, who were so grateful to him for his benefits.

The Jerusalem Targum upon ver. 50, fancies those officers to have represented to Moses their great chasms and their victory, when this number was given away, "We broke into the chambers and closets of the kings of Midian; and there we saw their beautiful and charming daughters, from whom we took the golden ornaments upon their heads, and in their ears, and on their arms, their fingers, and breasts; but did not cast a warrant look upon one of them:" and therefore they hoped this oblation they made would rise up for them, in the day of the great judgment, as a reconciliation for their souls before the Lord.

CHAPTER XXXII.

1 The Reubenites and Gadites sue for their inheritance on that side Jordan. 6 Moses reproved them. 16 They offer him conditions to his content. 33 Moses assigneth them the land. 39 They conquer it.

1 Now the children of Reuben and the children of Gad had a very great multitude of cattle; and when they saw the land of Jazer, and the land of Gilead, that, behold, the place was a place for cattle; 2 The children of Gad and the children of [| Gilead. | A noble country, so called from the mountain Gilead, which bounded it on the east, as Jordan did on the west, the river Jabbok on the south, and Mount Libanus on the north.

The place was a place for cattle.] Which in the fourth verse is called "a land of cattle;" מִשְׁפָּרֶת שְׁפָרֶת, as the LXX. translate it, "fit for feeding of cattle;" being famous for pasture and other grazing ground. For Bashan was in this country (Deut. iii. 12, 13), where every one knows the largest and fattest oxen were bred (Ps. xcvii. 12), and sheep also (Deut. xxxvii. 14), and therefore is joined with Gilead (Micah vii. 14), which, being woody and mountainous in some parts of it, was no less famous for breeding goats (see Cant. iv. 1), which delight to browse on such trees as Mount Gilead abounded withal (see Bochartus in his Hierozoic. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 51). |}
Reuben came and spake unto Moses, and to Eleazar the priest, and unto the princes of the congregation, saying,

3 Ataroth, and Dibon, and Jazer, and Nimrah, and Heshbon, and Elealeh, and Shubam, and Nebo, and Beon,

4 Even the country which the Lord smote before the congregation of Israel, is a land for cattle, and thy servants have cattle:

5 Wherefore, said they, if we have found grace in thy sight, let this land be given unto thy servants for a possession, and bring us not over Jordan.

6 And Moses said unto the children of Gad and to the children of Reuben, Shall your brethren go to war, and shall ye sit here?

7 And wherefore discourage ye the heart of the children of Israel from going over into the land which the Lord hath given them?

8 Thus did your fathers, when I sent them from Kadesh-barnea to see the land.

9 For when they went up unto the valley of Eschol, and saw the land, they discouraged the heart of the children of Israel, that they should not go into the land which the Lord had given them.

10 And the Lord's anger was kindled against them, and he spake, saying,

11 Surely none of the men that came up out of Egypt, from twenty years old and upward, shall see the land which I sware unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob; because they have not wholly followed me:

12 Save Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenite, which went with the spy Ban. This man was in my secret, and I gave him for a husband of peace into the land which thou shalt give.

Ver. 4. Even the country which the Lord smote before the congregation] And gave it to them for a possession, as he intended to do the land of Canaan (see ch. xxiv. 24, 25).

Is a land for cattle.] Is very fit for us (ver. 2).

Ver. 5. If we have found grace in thy sight.] A phrase often used by humble petitioners; even by Moses himself, when he speaks to God, ch. xi. 15.

Let this land be given unto thy servants] The Israelites in common possessed it hitherto, as belonging to them all (ch. xxx. 13.), but they desire to have it assigned to them, as their particular portion.

Bring us not over Jordan.] We desire nothing in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 6.] Can you think it reasonable, that the rest of the tribes should fight still for what they are to possess?

Shall ye sit here?] And you take up your rest here, and settle in their conquests, which they have already made?

Ver. 7.] He seems to have suspected that mere cowardice, and a vile love of ease, made them desire to stay where they were, and go no further: which ill example might dishearten all the rest of their brethren, and make them have the same inclination to settle in the land they had conquered; and not engage in a war with the Canaanites.

Ver. 8.] Thus did your fathers] i. e. They disheartened all their brethren.

When I sent them from Kadesh-barnea] See ch. xiii. 3. 26.

Ver. 9. When they went up unto the valley of Eschol.] Men do not go up into a valley; therefore the meaning is, they went up to search the country (as it is said they did, ch. xiii. 21, 22), and went on in their search, till they came to the valley or brook of Eschol, ch. xiii. 23, where they cut down a branch with a cluster of grapes, to show what fruit the country afforded.

[Saw the land.] Had taken a full view of the country.

They discouraged the heart of the children of Israel] Represented the people and the cities to be so strong, that they should not be able to deal with them (ch. xiii. 28, 29).

That they should not go into the land] And, therefore, persuaded them not to attempt to possess themselves of it. For they said expressly, "We are not able to go against the people, for they are stronger than we" (ch. xiii. 31).

Ver. 10.] See ch. xiv. 21. 28.

Ver. 11. None of the men, &c.] See ch. xiv. 22. 29. 35.

Shall see the land] See ch. xiv. 23.

3 p 2
nezite, and Joshua the son of Nun: for they have wholly followed the Lord.

13 And the Lord's anger was kindled against Israel, and he made them wander in the wilderness forty years, until all the generation, that had done evil in the sight of the Lord, was consumed.

14 And, behold, ye are risen up to your fathers' stead, an increase of sinful men, to augment yet the fierce anger of the Lord toward Israel.

15 For if ye turn away from after him, he will yet again leave them in the wilderness; and ye shall destroy all this people.

16 ¶ And they came near unto him, and said, We will build sheepfolds here for our cattle, and cities for our little ones:

Have not wholly followed me: See there, ver. 22.

Ver. 12. See Caleb] See ch. xiv. 24. The Kenites. A great deal has been said by many to prove that Caleb is called a Kenezite, because his father's name was Kenaz. And this they prove, because Othniel's father was Kenaz, and he was Caleb's brother (Josh. xv. 17), his younger brother (Judg. i. 13. iii. 9). So that their father must have two names, Kenaz and Jephunneh. But it is very strange, if this be true, that Caleb is nowhere called the son of Kenaz, but constantly that of Jephunneh (even there where Othniel is just before called the son of Kenaz, 1 Chron. iv. 13. 15), nor is Othniel anywhere called the son of Jephunneh, but always of Kenaz. And, indeed, there is a demonstration against this opinion; for Othniel married Caleb's daughter, which by the law of Moses was utterly unlawful, whatsoever the practice might have been before the law was given. Therefore, others think it more probable, that Othniel was one of his brother's younger sons (for uncles and nephews are often called brethren, as Abraham and Lot were), and that from this brother, whose name was Kenaz, Caleb is also called a Kenezite: but this is very absurd; for the name of Kenezzi in the Hebrew, denotes the descendants from one who gave the name of Kenez to one brother, and did not know to whom the other brother gave it. It is most probable, therefore, that Kenez was some common ancestor both of Othniel and Caleb, from whom Othniel's father took also his name. Accordingly we find Jephunneh called a Kenezite in Josh. xiv. 11, where it is said, that "Hebron became the inheritance of Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite." Wholly followed] Fully, ch. xiv. 24. 30. 38.

Ver. 13. The Lord's anger was kindled] He had said this before (ver. 10), but repeats it again, to make them the more sensible of a thing that was done thirty-eight years ago; and to deter them from giving him the like provocation.

He made them wander in the wilderness forty years,] See ch. xiv. 31—33. xxi. 34. 65.

Ver. 14. Behold] Mark what I say. Ye are risen up in your fathers' stead, &c.] Are multiplied to as great a number as your fathers, only to succeed them in their sins, and thereby bring down still more heavy punishments upon the nation.

Ver. 15. If ye turn away from after him,] As your fathers did, who refused to go and possess the good land which he had bestowed upon them.

He will yet again leave them in the wilderness; Lead them back again into the desert, where your fathers perished; and there forsake you. Ye shall destroy all this people.] Who, following your example, will refuse to go over Jordan (ver. 5), to take possession of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 16. They came near unto him.] As petitioners are wont to do when they are assured of their integrity, and hope to obtain their request (Gen. xli. 19). We will build sheepfolds] There are five words in the Hebrew language for folds for sheep and cattle; all signifying a place fenced in, that they might live safely and be defended from wild beasts. And so this word gedera plainly importeth (see Bochartus in his Hierozon. par. i. lib. i. cap. 45).

Cities for our little ones.] Which stood in need only of repairing and fortifying (ver. 17), for they already dwell in those cities of the Amorites (ch. xxii. 25).

Ver. 17. We ourselves will go ready armed] That is, a considerable number of them, as many as should be thought necessary (Deut. iii. 18), in all forty thousand (Josh. iv. 12).

Our little ones shall dwell in the fenced cities] Where it was necessary to leave some men to guard them from their bad neighbours, and to take care of their cattle.

Because of the inhabitants] That is, the Moabites, who were the ancient owners of this country (ch. xxi. 36), and the Amorites, who had shown no good-will to the Israelites, as they passed through the wilderness.

Ver. 18.] Be settled in the possession of the land of Canaan, as we desire to be in this country.

Ver. 19. We will not inherit with them on yonder side Jordan.] We will not desire any share in the country beyond Jordan, though it lie near to us; nor in that country which lies still further westward.

Because of our inheritance is fallen to us on this side.] We look upon this as our inheritance (with which we shall be fully satisfied), here in the land of Gilead: which lay eastward of Jordan, and of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 20. If ye will do this thing.] Be as good as your word.

If ye will go armed before the Lord to war.] To go "before the Lord," was to go before the ark; which was the symbol of God's presence, over which his glory resided. And it is to be observed, that these two tribes, Reuben and Gad (together with Simeon) always lay encamped before the sanctuary; as appears from the second chapter of this book, ver. 10. 14—17. And accordingly, when the camp removed, they marched immediately before it; as is particularly noted, ch. x. 18—21. So that here he requires them only to hold their usual place, when they went to the war against the Canaanites; and accordingly it is expressly said, they did (together with half the tribe of before the Lord, until he hath driven out his enemies from before him, 22 And the land be subdued before the Lord: then afterward ye shall return, and be guiltless before the Lord, and before Israel; and this land shall be your possession before the Lord.

23 But if ye will not do so, behold, ye have sinned against the Lord: and be sure your sin will find you out.

24 Build you cities for your little ones, and folds for your sheep; and do that which hath proceeded out of your mouth.

25 And the children of Gad and the children of Reuben spake unto Moses, saying, Thy servants will do as my lord commandeth.

26 Our little ones, our wives, our flocks, and all our cattle, shall be there in the cities of Gilead:

27 But thy servants will pass over, every man armed for war, before the Lord to battle, as my lord saith.

Manasseh, who were joined with them) "pass over before the Lord unto battle," Josh. iv. 12, 13.

Ver. 21. And will go all of you] As many as shall be required, and can be spared (ver. 17).

Until he hath driven out his enemies] Not only bring the war, but continue with us, till we have expelled the inhabitants of that country: which he encourages them to undertake, by representing the Canaanites as the enemies of the Lord, who would therefore fight for them.

Ver. 22. The land be subdued before the Lord:) By this expression, and that in the foregoing words, it appears that the army was to carry along with them to the war every where till it was ended; as it was when it began, at the taking of Jericho (Josh. vi. 6, 7, &c.).

Afterward ye shall return, and be guiltless, &c.] Not only be free from all blame in this desire, but have what you desire.

Before the Lord.] By his order and appointment.

Ver. 23. If ye will not do so;] If this be not your intention; or if you go back from your word.

Behold,] Observe what I say.

Ye have sinned, &c.] Your guilt is exceeding great, and shall be most certainly punished, as it deserves.

Ver. 24.] As for the rest of their proposals, about their children and cattle, he consented to them, without any exception.

Ver. 25. The children of Gad and—Reuben spake unto Moses.] The word for spoke, in the Hebrew, being jomer, in the singular number, instead of jonrus, in the plural, their doctors take it for an indication that some one principal person spake in the name of all the rest. But there is no need of this; for the singular number in this language is often used for the plural; and they never spake all of them together, but some one in the name of their brethren. And it had been better, if they had observed, that this signifies one and all (as we now speak) were of the same mind.

Thy servants will do as my lord commandeth.] And as they themselves had proposed (ver. 17).

Ver. 26.] Here they promise to leave all that was dear to them in this country, and go to serve their brethren.

Ver. 27.] We ourselves will go and fight for our brethren. It hath been often said (ver. 17, 21), that this doth not signify all the men of war among them should go, but as many as could be spared, and as

28 So concerning them Moses commanded Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the chief fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel:

29 And Moses said unto them, If the children of Gad and the children of Reuben will pass with you over Jordan, every man armed to battle, before the Lord, and the land shall be subdued before you; then ye shall give them the land of Gilead for a possession:

30 But if they will not pass over with you armed, they shall have possession among you in the land of Canaan.

31 And the children of Gad and the children of Reuben answered, saying, as the Lord hath said unto thy servants, so will we do.

32 We will pass over armed before the Lord into the land of Canaan, that the possession of our inheritance on this side Jordan may be our's.

33 And Moses gave unto them, even to the children of Gad, and to the children of Reuben, were thought sufficient. For it is manifest, the far greater half of them were left in this country to defend their wives and children, and look after their flocks and herds; as will appear by computing all that were found in the tribes of Gad and of Reuben, which were above fourscore and four thousand (ch. xxvii. 18), to which, if we add half the tribe of Manasseh (who were, in all, above fifty-two thousand), there were much above a hundred thousand men able to bear arms; and not above forty thousand of them marched into Canaan, as was before observed.

Ver. 28.] He left this in charge with the principal persons, who had the government of affairs under him; particularly with Joshua, who was not unmindful of it, but remembered these tribes what Moses had said when he was about to attempt the conquest of Canaan (Josh. i. 13, 14, &c.).

Ver. 29. Moses said unto them.] He repeats to these great men, who were to see it executed, what he had said to the Gadites and Reubenites themselves (ver. 21, 22).

Then ye shall give them the land of Gilead for a possession:] They had not a right to it till they had performed the condition upon which it was granted, viz. till their brethren were in possession of their inheritance in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 30. If they will not pass over:] Perform their promise, ver. 17.

They shall have possessions among you in the land of Canaan.] Take what falls to their share there; and this country be disposed of, as God shall order.

Ver. 31.] They confirm what they had promised to Moses, ver. 25, and here take all that he had said, as spoken by the order of God, who bestowed this land upon them on the condition often mentioned.

Ver. 32. We will pass over armed:] This they offered at first of themselves (ver. 17), and solemnly promised, when Moses accepted their proposal (ver. 27), and again here ratify and confirm it before Eleazar, and Joshua, and all the princes (ver. 29).

That the possession of our inheritance:] Which we have desired to have for our inheritance.

On this side Jordan] They were now in the land of Gilead, and so might properly call it "on this side Jordan;" but when they were in the land of Canaan, it was said to be "on that side Jordan.

May be our's.] Settled upon us and our posterity.

Ver. 33. Moses gave unto them.] Not an absolute and unto half the tribe of Manasseh the son of Joseph, the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, and the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, the land, with the cities thereof in the coasts, even the cities of the countries round about.
34 ¶ And the children of Gad built Dibon, and Ataroth, and Aroer;
35 And Atroth, Shophan, and Jaazer, and Jogbehah; 36 And Beth-nimrah, and Beth-haran, fenced cities: and folds for sheep, 37 And the children of Reuben built Heshbon, and Elealeh, and Kirjathaim, 38 And Nebo, and Baal-meeon, (their names being changed,) and Shibmah: and gave other names unto the cities which they built.
39 And the children of Machir the son of Manasseh went to Gilead, and took it, and dispossessed the Amorites which was in it.
40 And Moses gave Gilead unto Machir the son of Manasseh; and he dwelt therein.

grant, but a conditional; if they did as they engaged (ver. 29—31, &c.).
Even to the children of Gad, and—Reuben, and unto half the tribe of Manasseh] This half tribe is not mentioned before, because they did not put in any claim till they saw how the other tribes had succeeded in their petition; which being granted, it is likely that thereupon they represented also what store of cattle they had; and that the country would be more than enough for those who had desired it. This being found to be true, Moses thought fit to give them a portion of it, rather than any other; because the children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, had, by their valour, subdued part of this country (ver. 39. Josh. xvii. 1).

The kingdom of Sihon—and the kingdom of Og See ch. xxi. 24. 29. Which were the first countries that the Israelites possessed; and were the first that were carried captive out of their land (2 Kings xvii. 19).

The land, with the cities thereof, &c. The land with the cities, within such a compass or limits; and all the towns within that circuit.

Ver. 34. The children of Gad built Dibon and Ataroth. Repaired and fortified these towns, which are mentioned before, ver. 3, for they were not destroyed, but only their inhabitants (Deut. ii. 34, 35), and if they had not time now of God and Reuben would succeed in their petition; which being granted, it is likely that thereupon they represented also what store of cattle they had; and that the country would be more than enough for those who had desired it. This being found to be true, Moses thought fit to give them a portion of it, rather than any other, because the children of Machir, the son of Manasseh, had, by their valour, subdued part of this country (ver. 39. Josh. xvii. 1). Thus Jeroboam is said to have built Shechem (1 Kings xii. 25), which was a city before, but gone to decay; and Azariah to have built Elath (2 Kings xiv. 22), which he restor'd to Judah as a city formerly belonging to them.

Aroer. A city of the Amorites, upon the brink of the Arnon. Moses tells us, Deut. iii. 11, iv. 48. It formerly belonged to the Moabites, but was taken from them by Sihon.

Ver. 35. We do not read of any of these towns elsewhere, but only of Jaazer, which seems to be that called Jazer, ver. 3.

Ver. 36. Beth-nimrah. Called, ver. 3, Nimrah for shortness sake; as (it may be further observed) Jemini is put for Benjemiini, Esther ii. 5, Sheba for Beersheba, Josh. xix. 2, where we find these two mentioned; but they do not signify two several cities, but are two names for one and the same city; as if he had said Beersheba, which is also called Sheba. This is clear to a demonstration; for otherwise there would be more than thirteen cities in the tribe of Simeon, contrary to ver. 6, of that chapter.

Beth-haran. A place, some say, between Dibon and Jordan.

Fenced cities; and folds for sheep. All these cities the children of Gad fortified, and built folds for sheep in the pastures near to them.

Ver. 37. Reuben built. Repaired and fortified; as I said ver. 34.

Heshbon and Elealeh. Mentioned above, ver. 3.

Kirjathaim. A place where a giant-like people formerly dwelt, called Emins, Gen. xiv. 5, who were expelled by the Moabites, as they were by the Amorites.

Ver. 38. Nebo. This city is mentioned in Jer. xlvii. 9, when it was fallen again into the possession of the Moabites, as was also Kirjathaim. It seems to be the same with Nebo, which was given to the tribe of Manasseh, Gen. xlviii. 22: "a place where the temple of the Moabites was built." And St. Jerome suspects that there was an oracle at this place; the word Nebo importing prophecy, or divination, as he speaks.

Baal-meeon. Another place, where, it is likely, Baal was worshipped; which made them change the names of these places, as it here follows.

Their names being changed. For Nebo, as well as Baal, was the name of a god; as we learn from Isaiah xlii. 1. and seems to have been an Assyrian deity; there being footsteps of it in the names of several great men there; such as Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzaran-dan, and many others. And it is not unlikely, that they therefore changed the names of these cities into those others, because they would abolish all remains of idolatry in this country, according to the precept, Exod. xxi. 13. that they should not take the name of their gods into their mouth; but, notwithstanding this, they still retained their ancient names; as appears from Josh. xiii. 17. Ezek. xxv. 9, so hard it is to alter any thing for the better!

Ver. 39. Here Gilead is used in a strict sense, not so largely as before, ver. 1. 26. 29, where it is taken for all the country on that side Jordan where Gilead was; but here, for a part of it about Mount Gilead. This is plain from the next verse; and Gilead the son of Machir, one would think, was the person that took it (Josh. xvii. 1).

Ver. 40. To the children of Machir (for he was dead long ago), who had a considerable portion of that half of the land of Gilead, which was given to the half tribe of Manasseh. For one half was given to the Reubenites and Gadites, and the other half to them, Deut. iii. 12. 13. where Gilead signifies all that country properly so called; neither so much as the whole territory, which these tribes demanded, ver. 1, nor so little as was given to Machir, ver. 15. where Moses says, "And I gave Gilead unto Machir," i.e. to that family of Manasseh, which were properly called Machirites, Numb. xxvi. 29. and to that family descended from his son, which from him were called Gileadites. For as Manasseh had only this son Machir, so Machir had only Gilead; but he had many (ch. xxvi. 30—32), who all raised families. And as to the Machirites (and I suppose the Gileadites) was given a portion in this country (Josh. xiii. 29, 30, &c.), so Joshua gave to the rest an inheritance in the land of Canaan (ch. xvii. 2). And he gives a reason, in the foregoing verse, why he gave Gilead and Bashan to the posterity of Machir, because they were a warlike people, inheriting their father's valour, who was a man of war; and therefore fit to be placed in the frontiers of that country.

Ver. 41. Jair the son of Manasseh.] One of the posterity of Manasseh, by his mother's side; for he was the grandson of Gilead, the son of Machir, by his daughter (1 Chron. ii. 21, 22), but his father was of the tribe of Issachar. It seems he joined with the children of Machir in their expedition against Gilead (mentioned ver. 39), and was so successful, that he took several small towns in that country, and so had his inheritance among the children of Manasseh, on this side Jordan, where they now were. There were three score of them in the whole, which were afterward called cities (Josh. xiii. 12. I Kings iv. 29), but he had only twenty-three for his possession (1 Chron. ii. 22, 23).

Havoth-jair.] That is, the "habitation of Jair."

42 And Nobah went and took Kenath, and the villages thereof, and called it Nobah, after his own name.

For havah is a dwelling, as Bochart observes in his Phalag. lib. iv. cap. 29. And among the Arabians the word Havoth properly signifies many tents orderly disposed in a ring or circle; which in those countries made that which we call a village. For havah in their language signifies to compass. The same he observes in his Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 44. p. 466.

Ver. 42. Nobah] Who he was we find in no other place; but an eminent person, no doubt, in some of the families of the Manassites; either of the Machirites or the Gileadites. For they only, as I take it, inherited on this side Jordan.

Went and took Kenath.] At the same time, I suppose, that Jair took the towns above mentioned; of which this was one (1 Chron. ii. 23). But, though Jair was the chief conductor of that expedition, yet he kept, as I said, only twenty-three towns to himself: the rest were given to them who accompanied him. Of whom, it is probable, Nobah was one. Called it Nobah, after his own name.] But it retained its old name also: for St. Jerome says, in his time there was a city called Canatha, in the region of Trachonitis, not far from Bosra.

Thus this country being settled upon these two tribes and a half, the land of Canaan was divided, by God's command, for an inheritance to the remaining nine tribes, and the other half of the tribe of Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 7).
3 And they departed from Rameses in the first month, on the fifteenth day of the first month; on the morrow after the passover the children of Israel went out with an high hand in the sight of all the Egyptians.

4 For the Egyptians buried all their firstborn, which the Lord had smitten among them: upon their gods also the Lord executed judgments.

5 And the children of Israel removed from Rameses, and pitched in Succoth.

6 And they departed from Succoth, and pitched in Etham, which is in the edge of the wilderness.

7 And they removed from Etham, and turned again unto Pi-hahiroth, which is before Baal-zephon: and they pitched before Migdol.

8 And they departed from before Pi-hahiroth, and passed through the midst of the sea into the wilderness, and went three days’ journey in the wilderness of Etham, and pitched in Marah.

9 And they removed from Marah, and came unto Elim: and in Elim were twelve fountains of water, and threescore and ten palm trees; and they pitched there.

10 And they removed from Elim, and encamped by the Red sea.

11 And they removed from the Red sea, and encamped in the wilderness of Sin.

12 And they took their journey out of the wilderness of Sin, and encamped in Dophkah.

13 And they departed from Dophkah, and encamped in Alush.

14 And they removed from Alush, and encamped at Rephidim, where was no water for the people to drink.

Pitched before Migdol. This is explained in Exod. xiv. 2.

Ver. 8. Passed through the midst of the sea] See Exod. xiv. 23. Where Pharaoh and his host were drowned; as they could not but call to mind when they read this brief history: which, it might be expected, would also call to remembrance their own distrust of God, notwithstanding which he most graciously delivered them (Exod. xiv. 11, 13, &c.).

Wilderness of Etham.] Called in Exod. xv. 22, “the wilderness of Shur:” where they were very much distressed for want of water.

Pitched before Marah.] Where God obliged them by a new miracle, in making the bitter water sweet (Exod. xiv. 23, 25).

Ver. 9. And came unto Elim.] See Exod. xv. ult.

Ver. 10. And encamped by the Red sea.] Not by that part of it, where they lately came out of it; but by a more southerly part of it, where it bends towards Arabia. For the Red Sea, which Ptolemy calls the Arabian Gulf, runs a long way, like the Adriatic, now called the Gulf of Venice, or the Baltic Sea, as David Clavert accuses observers; who compares these three together as much of a length, and all in some places broader, and some narrower. This station is not mentioned in the book of Exodus.

Ver. 11.] Exod. xvi. 1, where manna first began to rain upon them, with which God fed them forty years.

Ver. 12.] This and the next station (Alush) are not mentioned in Exodus; because nothing remarkable (it is supposed) fell out in these two places, as there did in the next; and they made no long stay there.

Ver. 13.] The Jewish doctors find something remarkable here, though Moses with nothing of it. For, as the sabbath was first commanded at Marah, which was their fifth station, so it was first observed here at Alush, as they fancied, which was their tenth. And more than that, this was the only sabbath, in their opinion, which they exactly kept; the very next being profaned (see Selden, lib. iii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. &c. cap. 11, and lib. ii. De Synod. cap. 1). The author of Sopher Coser smith, the ancient tradition is, "that at this place the manna first descended" (par. ii. sect. 90).

Where was no water?] And thereby an occasion given to the Almighty Goodness to show his wonderful power, in bringing forth water out of the rock (Deut. v. 6). And here also "Amalek lay in wait for Israel, in the way when they came out of Egypt (1 Sam. xv. 2), and smote some that lagged behind (Deut. xxv.

16], but were vanquished by Joshua in a pitched battle (Exod. xvi. 8, 9, &c.). And hence Jethro also came to see Moses, and gave him advice about the government of the people with more ease both to himself and them (Exod. xviii.).

Ver. 15.] Exod. xix. 1, 2. This was forty-seven days after they came from Rameses, on the first day of the third month: three days after which (viz. on the fiftieth day after they came out of Egypt) God gave them his law from Mount Sinai; where Moses was called up to stay with him twice forty days; and was instructed there how to make the tabernacle, and set it up when it was made, with all the furniture belonging to it. All sorts of sacrifices were ordered while they remained in this place; priests consecrated; laws given about clean and unclean things; and about marriages, and feasts, and the year of jubilee, with several other things, mentioned in the book of Leviticus. Here also the people were numbered: their encampment ordered; a second passover kept; laws given about the water of jealousy and the Nazarites, with several other matters; and then, after they had been there eleven months and twenty days, they are commanded to leave this famous station; the most remarkable of all other (Exod. x. 11, 12).

Ver. 16. Kibroth-hattaavah.] A place in the wilderness of Paran, three days' journey from Mount Sinai, Numb. x. 23, xi. 34, where there was a dreadful slaughter of the people, that wanting despaired many, and lusted after flesh. Yet here God was pleased to vouchsafe to send his Spirit upon the seventy elders, for the assistance of Moses.

Ver. 17. And they departed from Kibroth-hattaavah, and encamped at Hazeroth.] See ch. xi. 35, where Miriam was punished for her envy at Moses, ch. xii. 1. 10.

Ver. 18. Rithmah.] A place also in the wilderness of Paran, as appears from this book (ch. xii. 16), and was not far from, and Kadesh-barnea, from whence the spies were sent to search out the land of Canaan (see ch. xiii. 26). In which place they lay a long time (Deut. i. 46).

Ver. 19. Rimmon-parez.] This and the following stages are nowhere else mentioned: and seem to have all been in the wilderness of Paran before spoken of; which was a broad tract of ground, from Elusa, a port in the Arabian Gulf, to Kadesh-barnea; which, as David Chytraeus computes it, was thirty German miles.

25 And they removed from Haradah, and pitched in Makkeloth.
26 And they removed from Makkeloth, and encamped at Tahath.
27 And they departed from Tahath, and pitched at Tarah.
28 And they removed from Tarah, and pitched in Mithecah.
29 And they went from Mithecah, and pitched in Hashmonah.
30 And they departed from Hashmonah, and encamped at Moseroth.
31 And they departed from Moseroth, and pitched in Bene-jaakan.
32 And they removed from Bene-jaakan, and encamped at Hor-hagidgad.
33 And they went from Hor-hagidgad, and pitched in Jobathah.
34 And they removed from Jobathah, and encamped at Ebronah.

Ver. 20. Libnah.] This and the rest to ver. 31, are places of which, as I said, we nowhere else read, and so can give no account of them. They were all uninhabited, and out of the road of all travellers; and perhaps had no names till they were given by the Israelites: who encamped in so many various places (sometimes in mountains, as appears from ver. 25, and sometimes in the plain), that they might be taught, that God was alway present there to protect, defend, and provide for them; even there where no man dwelt. The Jews make this use of their travels, here recorded by Moses, through so many unknown places, by which he brought them at last to Canaan; to keep up their spirits under this long captivity (as they call it) wherein they now are, and have wandered uncertainly from mountain to mountain, from kingdom to kingdom, from banishment to banishment (as they themselves speak), till their Messiah come to redeem them: which he will do, when their eyes are opened to see what one of their ancient rabbins (Moses Hadarschan) hath told them, as he is quoted by Paulus Fagius, that “the Redeemer was born before him who reduced Israel into this last captivity.”

Ver. 21. In the desert.] In Deut. x. 6, Moses seems to say the quite contrary, that they “took their journey from Beeroth of the children of Jaakan to Mosera.” But there he may be thought to speak of a different place, as Drusius notes upon those words: or if he doth not, it is no wonder if, while they wandered in this tedious wilderness, they went backward and forward from Bene-jaakan to Moseroth, which he mentions in Deuteronomy; and from Moseroth back again to Bene-jaakan, which he mentions here.

Ver. 32. Hor-hagidgad.] This place was also called Gudgodah, Deut. x. 7, if Moses speaks there of the same places he doth here.

Ver. 33. Jobathah.] Called Deut. x. 7, Jobath.

Ver. 34. Ebronah.] All their removals mentioned from ver. 16, this and the next place, are an account of their wanderings in the wilderness, from the second year after their coming out of Egypt till the fortytenth year; in which time all the congregation, above twenty years of age, were consumed, and buried in some part or other of this great desert.

Ver. 35. Ezion-gaber.] A place on the Red Sea, upon which they were brought before they ended their travels (1 Kings ix. 26, xxi. 18). It had its name from the snagged rocks, like to the backbone, which stretched out a great way on that shore, as Bochart observes: which rocks made this part so dangerous, 35 And they departed from Ebronah, and encamped at Ezion-gaber.
36 And they removed from Ezion-gaber, and pitched in the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh.
37 And they removed from Kadesh, and pitched in mount Hor, in the edge of the land of Edom.
38 And Aaron the priest went up into mount Hor at the commandment of the Lord, and died there, in the fortieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the first day of the fifth month.
39 And Aaron was an hundred and twenty and three years old when he died in mount Hor.
40 And King Arad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south in the land of Canaan, heard of the coming of the children of Israel.
41 And they departed from mount Hor, and pitched in Zalmonah.

that it was forsaken in aftertimes, and Elah frequented as a safer harbour (see lib. i. Canaan, cap. 41). It is not recorded how long they remained in any of these places; but it is likely a considerable time in some of them; for they spent thirty-eight years in these removals.

Ver. 36. The wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh.] See ch. xx. 1. He doth not mean Kadesh-burnea, which was on the borders of Canaan; but another Kadesh, of this description, towards the south, not far from the port I now mentioned (which the Greeks call Elana), on the border of Edom: where Miriam died, and where water was brought out of a rock (see ch. xx. 8. 14. 16).

Ver. 37. Mount Hor.] See ch. xx. 28.
Ver. 38. At the commandment of the Lord.] See ch. xx. 23. 24. 37. Deut. xxxii. 50. The Hebrew doctors are too conceited in their observation, that, because it is said of him, and of Moses, that they died at pi (at the mouth) of the Lord, the Lord took their souls out of their bodies with a kiss. But Maimonides endeavours to make a sober sense of this, by making their meaning to be, that they "expired with the transcendent pleasure of Divine love" (More Neb. vol. iv. cap. 41).

Died there.] A few months before his brother Moses.

Ver. 39. He was just eighty and three years old, when he and Moses first went with a message to Pharaoh (Exod. vii. 7). By which it appears, that they were not long in working all the miracles in Egypt, before they brought the people forth; for now, forty years after, he was but a hundred and twenty-three years old.

Ver. 40. And king Arad] See ch. xxi. 1.

Heard of the coming.] Had news brought him, that the Israelites were coming towards his country; wherupon he went out to oppose them; and God gave them time (as we read there) a glorious victory over him. This shows that Moses intended, in the recital of all these places where they had been, to bring to remembrance the most remarkable passages of God’s providence over them; some of which he expressly sets down.

Ver. 41. Zalmonah.] We read in the twenty-first chapter of this book, ver. 4, that they journeyed from Kadesh, compassed the land of Edom, but are not told there where they pitched; which is here supplied, the name of the place being Zalmonah; which carries in it the signification of an image; and therefore, here, perhaps, the brazen serpent was erected (see ch. xxi. 9.)

Ver. 42. Punon.] Where Boetharthus rather thinks the brazen serpent was set up; because after Moses hath given us the history of that, he saith, they set forward and pitched in Oboth (ch. xvi. 10), which was the place of their abode next to Punon, as it here follows, Hieroziac. par. i. lib. iii. cap. 12, in the latter end of it.

Ver. 43. Oboth.] See ch. xxi. 10.
Ver. 44. Jee-abarim.] See ch. xxi. 11. This name is translated in the margin, “heaps of Abarim;” which may possibly signify many heaps of stone, which lay not far from the mountains of Abarim (ver. 47).

Ver. 45. Dibon-gad.] Here half the name of the first place is omitted; as is usual when the names are long. This may seem not to agree with ch. xxi. 12, where it is said they removed from thence, and pitched in the valley of Zered; near unto which, in all probability, was this Dibon-gad. See what I have noted there.

Ver. 47. The mountains of Abarim, before Nebo.] We read of them when they came to this transition; but it is plain they were not far from thence, when God bade Moses to go into one of these mountains, and take a view of Canaan (see ch. xxvii. 12). But this followed their last mansion; and therefore it is most likely this is the place mentioned, (ch. xxi. 20.) See there; where I have observed other places mentioned, ver. 18, 19, of which there is no notice taken in this catalogue. But they seem to have been places where they only touched, and made no encampment in them; which is the thing of which Moses here gives an account.

Ver. 49. Beth-jesimoth.] A place where there was a temple, in all likelihood, to some deity; for so Beth means in many compositions; as Beth-Peor (the house or temple of Baal on the top of Peor), Beth-Astaroth, and Beth-Baal-berith (Judges iv. 4), and Beth-Shemesh is often mentioned; where the sun was worshipped. And possibly Jesimoth may be the same with Jeshimon (ch. xxi. 20).

Beth-shittim.] Called simply Shittim, ch. xxv. 1. Which some fancy had the name of Abel added to it, (which signifies mourning), because of that lamentation which was made there, by some, for the grievous sin there committed; and by others, for the heavy punishment inflicted in that place. But it seems to plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho, saying, 51 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye are passed over Jordan into the land of Canaan; 52 Then ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their cities, and destroy all their molten images, and quite pluck down all their high places: 53 And ye shall dispossess the inhabitants of the land, and dwell therein: for I have given you the land to possess it. 54 And ye shall divide the land by lot for an inheritance among your families: and to the have been anciently called Abel-Shittim, before this time (see there).

Ver 50.] After he had prepared them for their entrance into Canaan, he ordered the first and principal work they should there undertake.

Ver 51. Accordingly Moses did deliver this command unto them (Deut. vii. 1, 2).

Ver 52. Drive out all the inhabitants] Not suffer them to dwell in the land any longer; but either destroy, or expel them; because they were abominable idolaters, devoted to extermination (Exod. xxiii. 33, Deut. xx. 16-18), by whom the Israelites would have been in danger to be corrupted, if they were not rooted out. [Destroy all their pictures,] Or their temples, or houses of worship, as Onkelos interprets it. But others (particularly the Jerusalem Targum), understand it of the idols or statues set up in those temples; or some representations of their gods (see concerning the Hebrew word masculine, Lev. xxv. 1).

[Their molten images.] Exod. xxiii. 31, xxxiv. 13. for if they suffered them to remain, they might be enticed to worship them. These were idols, perhaps, in public places, or private houses, out of their temples.

Quite pluck down all their high places:] They could not throw down the mountains, upon which the people of Canaan worshipped; but the meaning is, that they should cut down the groves which were there planted, and demolish all the altars that stood in them. For there were no other temples, at first, but these groves upon mountains; where the ancient heathen worshipped the sun, moon, and stars; unto which they thought the mountains approached nearer than the rest of the earth; and therefore their sacrifices there would be most prevalent. But of this I have said enough elsewhere.

Ver 53.] Yet he did not intend they should dispossess the old inhabitants all at once, but by degrees; as he himself saith in Exod. xxiii. 29, 30.

Deut. vii. 22.

Ver 54. Divided the land by lot:] Follow the directions I have already given for the dividing of the land, after the old inhabitants are expelled (ch. xxvi. 53, 55).

more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less inheritance: every man's inheritance shall be in the place where his lot falleth; according to the tribes of your fathers ye shall inherit.

55 But if ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before you; then it shall come to pass, that those which ye let remain of them shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides, and shall vex you in the land wherein ye dwell.

56 Moreover it shall come to pass, that I shall do unto you, as I thought to do unto them.

To the more, &c.] See ch. xxvi. 54, 56.

Ver 55. If ye will not drive out the inhabitants] At the first they could not drive them all out; nor was it God's design, as I before observed. Therefore Joshua could not expel all while he lived; but left several nations, or part of them, unsubdued (Judges ii. 21-23), of which he himself takes notice a little before he died, Josh. xxi. 4, 7, where he warns them to have nothing to do with them; promising them that God would in time expel them quite (ver. 5). But when the Israelites grew slothful and cowardly, and negligently suffered the people of Canaan to dwell among them, and made friendship with them (as they did after Joshua and all that generation were dead), then followed what is here threatened in the next words.

Those which ye let remain] Voluntarily permit to live among you, without endeavouring to dispossess them.

Shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides:] Bring very sore calamities upon you: as grievous and as mischievous as a wound made in the eye, which is a most tender part; or in the side, when a thorn sticks and festereth in it. Some are so curious, as, by the first part of these words (pricks in your eyes), to understand their being stimulated to idolatry, by beholding the abominable rites of religion and manner of worship: and the next they take to signify the effect of it in sharp punishments, which should befall them for their forsaking God. Joshua threatened the same before he died, ch. xxi. 13. Of which an angel, or messenger of the Lord, minded them, Judges iii. 3. And so it came to pass, as we read there, ver. 11, and throughout that whole book.

Shall vex you:] Make you very uneasy, nay, sigh and groan, in the good land which God gives you, by reason of their oppression (Judges ii. 18, iv. 3, vi. 6, &c.).

Ver 56. I shall do unto you, as I thought to do unto them:] As I purposed to do unto them; i. e. make you their slaves; as they were to several people whom they served many years, Judges iii. 8, 11, vi. 2, and many other places. Or make you die before them; and at last expel you from the land I give you.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

1 The borders of the land. 16 The names of the men which shall divide the land.

1 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 2 Command the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land of Ca-
3 Then your south quarter shall be from the wilderness of Zin along by the coast of Edom, and your south border shall be the utmost coast of the salt sea eastward:

4 And your border shall turn from the south to the ascent of Akrabbim, and pass on to Zin; and the going forth thereof shall be from the south to Kadesh-barnea, and shall go on to Hazar-addar, and pass on to Azmon:

5 And the border shall fetch a compass from Azmon unto the river of Egypt, and the going out of it shall be at the sea.

6 And as for the western border, ye shall even have the great sea for a border; this shall be your west border.

7 And this shall be your north border: from the great sea ye shall point out for you mount Hor:

8 From mount Hor ye shall point out your border unto the entrance of Hamath; and the going forth of the border shall be to Zedad:

viding their land among their tribes; it was fit to describe the bounds of their country, that they might know whom they were to destroy, and into whose possessions they were to enter.

Canaan, with the coasts thereof.] The land beyond Jordan; and the limits or bounds thereof.

Ver. 3. Your south quarter shall be from the wilderness of Zin.] Mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 36.

Along by the coast of Edom.] Which bordered upon this wilderness (ch. xx. 1, 14).

Your south border shall be the utmost coast of the salt sea.] From the very tongue of it, as it is expressed, Josh. xv. 2, where it appears this was the portion of the tribe of Judah. The Salt Sea is that which is called sometimes the Dead Sea, and in other authors, Lacus Asphaltites (see Gen. xiv. 3). The Hebrews call all great lakes by the name of seas; and this is called the Salt Sea, because the water of it is very salt, or, as some express it, bitter; and the Dead Sea, proper aqua immobiliatem, as Justin speaks, lib. xxxi. "because of the immovableness of the water," which is never stirred by the greatest winds (see Vossius De Orig. et Progr. Idolol. lib. ii. cap. 65).

Eastward.] Where the eastern and southern borders meet.

Ver. 4. Your border] That is, this south border.

Ver. 5. Your border go on in a straight line; but bending towards the west.

From the south to the ascent of Akrabbim.] Or, to Maale-Akrabbim, a mountain on the south end of the Dead Sea (Josh. xv. 3. Judges i. 30), so called, as Bochartus conjectures, from the vast multitude of scorpions found here; from which mountain also, it is probable, the region called Acrabaten, near toIdumea, was called (see Acc. v. 3). See Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 29.

Pass on to Zin.] Either to a place called Zin, or part of the wilderness of Zin; which lay on the south of the land of Canaan (ch. xiii. 21).

From the south] That is, still on towards the south; as appears from what goes before and follows after.

To Kadesh-barnea.] From whence the spies were sent from Kadesh-barnea, and from the south end of the land; this was said to have gone up by the south, ch. xiii. 22, 26.

And shall go on to Hazar-addar.] Or, to the village of Addar, as the Vulgar Latin renders it; which seems to be justified by Josh. xv. 3, where it is simply called Addar. There is indeed a place called Hazron joined with it, which may be thought to be the same with Hazar; but so is another place also called Karka; both which may as well be thought to be here omitted, for brevity’s sake.

And pass on to Azmon.] A place lying on the west end of the mount of Edom.

Ver. 5. And the border shall fetch a compass] There shall be a greater turn than that mentioned ver. 4, bending still more towards.

From Azmon unto the river of Egypt.] By the river of Egypt is properly understood Nile; and so Jo-CHAPTER XXXIV.

And the border shall go on to Ziphoron, and the goings out of it shall be at Hazar-enan: this shall be your north border.

And ye shall point out your east border from Hazar-enan to Shepham:

And the coast shall go down from Shepham to Riblah, on the east side of Ain; and the border shall descend, and shall reach unto the side of the sea of Chinnereth eastward:

And the border shall go down to Jordan, and the goings out of it shall be at the salt sea:

two Hamaths; one called by the Greeks Antiochia, the other Epiphania. The former called Hamath the Great, Amos vi. 2, to distinguish it from the latter, which is the city that is always meant, when we read the bounds of Juden were to the entrance of Hamath northward; as here and ch. xiii. 21. For it is certain, as Bochartus observes, they did not reach to Antiochia, but came near to Epiphania (lib. iv. Phaleg. cap. 30). And this makes it probable, that Hor, as I said before, more properly, -is Hor; of Libanus: because in Josh. xiii. 5, Hermon is joined with the entrance of Hamath, as Hor is here. Now Hermon was certainly a part of Libanus: by some called Sirion; by others Senir (Deut. iii. 9), and by others Sion (Deut. iv. 48).

Z'dad.] Which in Ezekiel's time was reckoned the northern border (together with Hamath from the Great Sea) just as it is here (Ezek. xxvi. 15, 16). Ver. 9. Ziphoron.] Another town in those parts; of which I find no mention anywhere else.

Hazar-enan.] Here it ended; which was a place that retained its name till Ezekiel's time (eh. xlvi. 17). David Chytraeus seems to have given a full account of this northern border in a few words. It extended, south he, from the Mediterranean, by the mountains of Libanus, to the fountain of Jordan; in which tract are the towns of Hamath, Zedad (in the tribe of Naphtali), Ziphoron, in the same tribe at the foot of Libanus), and Hazar-enan, which he takes to signify a village at the fountain, viz. of Jordan.

Ver. 10. Hazar-enan.] From the fountain of Jordan, and said before, to Shepham.

To Shepham.] A place not far from thence; for the river Jordan was certainly the eastern limits.

Ver. 11. And the coast.] The limits or bounds.

From Shepham to Riblah.] A place, no doubt, near to Jordan; with which river the eastern limits go along. St. Jerome takes Riblah to be Antiochia; but that was in Syria, to which the promised land did not reach.

The east side of Ain.] The Vulgar reads it the fountain of Daphne." And, indeed, Ain signifies a fountain; and both Jonathan and the Jerusalem Targum takes Riblah for Daphne; as they do Shepham before mentioned for Apanam. But this is only a vain conceit of the Jews, who would extend their bounds beyond the Canaan the Canaan.

And therefore Daphne (which was in the suburbs of Antiochia) cannot be here meant, unless we understand another place, mentioned by Josephus (lib. iv. De Bello Judaice, cap. 1), which lay near the lake of Semechonites, through the middle of which Jordan ran; and then Ain must signify another fountain of Jordan, for it had more than one. And thus David Chytraeus explains this part of the verse, and the foregoing; The eastern bounds were the river Jordan, near to which were these places; Enan, which had its name from the fountain of the river; and Shepham, not far from thence; Riblah, which was also near to Jordan, lying between the lake of Semechonites and Gennesaret.

Reach unto the side of the sea of Chinnereth eastward.] To the east side of this sea, or lake, which had its name from a city so called, Josh. xix. 35, and a country, 1 Kings xv. 20, or else it gave them their names: for David Chytraeus will have it called Chinnereth, eastward, and walk through the lake signifies hort, or late, the lake being of that shape and figure, about four German miles long, and two and a half broad. It is called the sea of Galilee, or Tiberias, in the gospel.

Ver. 12. The border.] i. e. This eastern border. Shall go down to Jordan.] That is, to the river which was espensively so called (and was on the east part of Canaan, Gen. xiii. 11), for it was very small till it came to the lake of Gennesaret before mentioned. From whence, being augmented by several torrents and rivulets, it ran in a wider stream, till it fell into the Salt or Dead Sea (see Bonfierus out of Josephus, lib. iv. De Bello Judiceo, cap. 1).

Salt sea.] There was the end of this border; where it met with the southern, as was observed above (ver. 3).

This shall be your land.] As was said before (ver. 2), therefore they were not to extend their right any further; this being the country he promised Abraham, when he bade him lift up his eyes, and look from the place where he was, "northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward, and see if there be any place fair and pleasant to the habitation of this land, and breadth of it," which he assures to his posterity, Gen. xiii. 14-17, which now he lays out for them, with the exact limits of it, in all those four quarters.

Ver. 13. This is the land which ye shall inherit by lot.] He repeats it so often, that they might know what people they were to possess, and with whom they might make friendship; and not to extend their desires beyond the bounds of God's gracious grant to them. By which they were placed in a very fertile and pleasant country, bounded, as appears by the foregoing description, on the south (ver. 4, 5), by great mountains, which sheltered them from the burning air of the deserts of Arabia; on the west, by the Midland Sea; on the north to the diminishing breed; and on the north, by Mount Libanus, which kept off the colder blasts from that quarter; and on the east, the delightful plains of Jordan, abounding with pomegranates, especially about Jericho, which yielded them a great revenue.

Unto the nine tribes and to the half tribe.] This he had not said plainly before, though it was necessarily inferred, from his granting to two tribes and a half their inheritance beyond Jordan.

Ver. 11.] Upon condition they performed their promise, to help the rest of their tribes to win their inheritance in Canaan. So those words are to be 15 The two tribes and the half tribe have received their inheritance on this side Jordan near Jericho eastward, toward the sunrising.
16 And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
17 These are the names of the men which shall divide the land unto you: Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun.
18 And ye shall take one prince of every tribe, to divide the land by inheritance.
19 And the names of the men are these: Of the tribe of Judah, Caleb the son of Jephunneh.
20 And of the tribe of the children of Simeon, Shemuel the son of Ammiuhd.
21 Of the tribe of Benjamin, Elidad the son of Chislon.
22 And the prince of the tribe of the children of Dan, Bukki the son of Jogli.

understood, I observed xxxii. 33, "Moses gave unto them the kingdom of Sihon," &c.

Vers. 15.] By the gift of God, as they themselves understood it, xxxii. 31. The bounds of which the Jerusalem Targum here undertakes to set down, and makes them extend eastward as far as the great river Euphrates; having respect, I suppose, to Gen. xv. 18, and Exod. xxiii. 30, where he sets down the utmost bounds of the countries he intended to bestow upon them in future times (see there), but here only describes the limits of that land, which they were to enjoy in present possession; and was all that God granted to Abraham, when he brought him out of Chaldéa, and made his first promise unto him (Gen. xii. 1, 7. xiii. 14, 15, 17. xv. 7).

Vers. 16.] Having told them what they should divide, it was proper to appoint some persons to take care to see the division made.

Vers. 17.] These are the names] Though the land was to be divided by lot, yet it was fit there should be some persons to oversee the business, and take care there should be no fraud in the drawing of them; and when they were drawn, to prevent all quarrels, by determining what portion those who had too much should give to those who had too little (xxvi. 54, 55).

Eleazar—and Joshua] These were the principal persons concerned in this great affair; who were so conscientious therein, that they did it in the presence of God, at the door of the tabernacle (Josh. xviii. 6. 8. 10. xix. 51).

Vers. 18. Prince of every tribe.] They are called in the place last named, "the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel."

Vers. 19. Of the tribe of Judah, Caleb] I have nothing to observe upon this and the following verses, to the end of the chapter, but that the tribes are not mentioned in such order as they were at their first numbering (i. 5, 6, &c.), or at their second (xxvi. 5, &c.), yet great exactness and a particular direction of God may be noted in their placing here; for they are set down according to their situation which they had afterward in the land of Canaan; as if Moses foresaw who should be next neighbours one to another. For Judah having his inheritance given him first (Josh. xv.), Simeon, who is here next mentioned, was so near him in the land of Canaan, that he had a portion given him out of the lot of Judah, which proved too large for that tribe (Josh. xix. 9. Judg. i. 3, 17). Then Benjamin, who here follows, in the third place, was so near to Judah, that they never separated when the ten tribes were rent from them. Dan was not far from Judah; and the children of Joseph also were their neighbours. And the rest of the tribes, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, are set down here just in the order wherein their lots fell to them in Canaan (Josh. xix. 10, 17, 24, 32). An evidence that Moses was guided by a Divine Spirit in all his writings.

CHAPTER XXXV.

1 Eight and forty cities for the Levites with their suburbs and measure thereof. 6 Six of them are to be cities of refuge. 9 The law of murder. 31 No satisfaction for murder.

And the Lord spake unto Moses in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho, saying, CHAP. XXXV.

Ver. 1.] See xxii. i. Hitherto nothing had been said of the Levites; but that they should have no lot in the land of Canaan. But now God provides that they should have habitations assigned them to dwell in, though they had no fields, nor olive yards, &c. as the rest of their brethren had. They might, indeed, have been able to purchase houses for themselves out of the tithes, and other things, which God had long ago bestowed upon them for their portion: but it was not fit that God's ministers should be left without any certain dwelling. And besides, God would have them live comfortably, and not only have houses, but a little ground about them, for their more commodious subsistence.

Ver. 2. Give unto the Levites of the inheritance.] Out of their share that shall fall to them in the land of Canaan, and on this side Jordan.

Cities to dwell in.] That they might not be in danger to wander up and down to seek a habitation.

Suburbs for the cities round about them.] Some ground lying round about their cities, the reason of which is given in the next verse.
possession cities to dwell in; and ye shall give also unto the Levites suburbs for the cities round about them.

3 And the cities shall have to dwell in; and the suburbs of them shall be for their cattle, and for their goods, and for all their beasts.

4 And the suburbs of the cities, which ye shall give unto the Levites, shall reach from the wall of the city and outward a thousand cubits round about.

5 And ye shall measure from without the city on the east side two thousand cubits, and on the south side two thousand cubits, and on the west side two thousand cubits, and on the north side two thousand cubits; and the city shall be in the midst: this shall be them the suburbs of the cities.

6 And among the cities which ye shall give unto the Levites there shall be six cities for refuge, which ye shall appoint for the manslayer, that he may flee thither: and to them ye shall add forty and two cities.

7 So all the cities which ye shall give to the Levites shall be forty and eight cities: they shall ye give with their suburbs.

8 And the cities which ye shall give shall be of the possession of the children of Israel: from them that have many ye shall give many; but comprehends the fields also. And Maimonides saith, that, by the constitution of the elders, they set forth also a burying-place for every city beyond these limits: for they might not bury their dead within the suburbs or fields; which they ground upon the foregoing verse, which appoints them for other uses (Schemitha ve Jobel, cap. 13).

Ver. 6. Six cities for refuge.] Three in the land of Canaan, and three on the other side Jordan (ver. 14), the names of which are set down, Josh. xx. 7, 8, and those on the other side Jordan were set apart by Moses himself before he died (Deut. iv. 43). The reason of their being called cities of refuge is given in the next words.

For the manslayer,] Such a manslayer as is afterward described; who killed another against his will. That he may flee thither.] And there be preserved and kept in safety, if he was not found guilty of wilful murder. The cities of the Levites were appointed for this purpose, rather than any other, because they were a kind of sacred places, inhabited by sacred persons. And here men might spend their time better than in other cities, being among God's ministers; who might make them sensible of the negligence which men were commonly guilty of in such cases, and of such sins as they might have otherwise committed.

To them ye shall add forty-two cities.] Which had all the same privilege, if we may believe the Hebrew doctors; but not equally with the six. For in the six a manslayer was to have a house to dwell in, and some place of fortification, as well as a refuge; but in the other two, he was to pass for it. And the Levites could not refuse him sanctuary into the six; but as for the rest it was in their choice whether they would receive him or not. Thus Maimonides, out of their ancient authors. See Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Discipl. Hebr. cap. 2, where he observes, that the altar also was a place of refuge, according to Exod. xxi. 14, but with many exceptions; both with relation to the parts of the altar, and to the persons who fled thither, and to the quality of the offence, and their stay there; which very much lessened the privilege of this refuge.

Ver. 7.] Accordingly we read Joshua gave them so many, Josh. xxi. 41. Thirteen of which the priests had; and the rest the Levites. And in the days of the Messiah (whom they vainly still expect), other cities shall be added given to them (said Maimonides), which shall belong to the Levites.

Ver. 8. The cities—shall be of the possession.] And so it is said, Josh. xxi. 3, that "the children of Israel gave unto the Levites, out of their inheritance, these cities and their suburbs." Where we read also, they were given them by lot, as the children of Israel had their inheritance given to them. From them that have many ye shall give many, &c.] According to the rule in distributing their inheritances to the Israelites, xxxiii. 54. According to his inheritance which he inheriteth.] 3a2 from them that have few ye shall give few: every one shall give of his cities unto the Levites according to his inheritance which he inheriteth.

9 ¶ And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,

10 Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come over Jordan into the land of Canaan;

11 Then ye shall appoint you cities to be cities of refuge for you; that the slayer may flee thither, which killeth any person at unawares.

Thus they gave nine cities out of the two tribes of Judah and Simeon (Josh. xxi. 16), and but four out of Benjamin, which was a small tribe (ver. 18), out of the tribes of Issachar and Asher, four apiece (ver. 28, 31), and out of Naphtali, no more than three (ver. 35).

Ver. 9.] This being a matter of great importance, that guiltless men should not suffer, nor the guilty escape punishment, the Lord gives Moses further direction about it, as he promised he would in Exod. xxi. 13.

Ver. 10. Speak unto the children of Israel.] Repeat this command to them; which God himself repeated to Joshua, xx. 1, 2.

When ye be come—into the land of Canaan.] When they had possession of it, and divided it, and were settled in it: so it is explained Deut. xix. 1, 2.

Ver. 11. Then ye shall appoint—cities of refuge.] This seems to signify, that all the cities of the Levites were in some sort a protection to the manslayer, as I said upon ver. 6. Such places the temples were among the Athenians, as Sam. Petit. Petrus observes in Leges Atticas, p. 12, 13, yet not all of them; for he can find only six; that of Mercy, and that of Eume-nides and Minerva, and those dedicated to Theseus (one of them within the city, the other without the walls), and that in Mycenis.

Which killeth any person at unawares.] Or, as it is Josh. xx. 3, unwittingly, Deut. xix. 4, ignorantly; that is, besides his intention, having no such design, nor hatred to him, as is there expressly said, and here below (ver. 29). This is repeated ver. 15. And the instances of it are such as these, mentioned by Georg. Ritterhusius De Jure Asylorum, cap. 4. If a man cutting wood, the hatchet flying from the helve, should hit a man, and kill him; or a huntsman shooting his arrows, a thicket should kill a man, whom he did not see lying there: an example of which we have in Adrastus, mentioned by Herodotus, lib. 1.

Ver. 12. Cities for refuge from the avenger.] From him who had a right to call a murderer to account for the blood he had shed, and is therefore called "the avenger of blood," ver. 19, who, being stimulated with anger and grief for the death of a near relation, might, in a heat of rage, hastily kill him who was not guilty of murder. And therefore this provision is made for the preservation of an innocent person against the violent prosecution of the avenger. In the Hebrew, the word for avenger is goel, which signifying a redener, plainly denotes that the next of kin to him that was slain is here meant. For to that person belonged the right of redemption of estates (Lev. xxv. 25), and of marrying the wife of a kinsman deceased without issue (Ruth iii. 12, 13). And consequently such a person, that is the nearest of kin, is here intended to be the revenger of blood: and therefore no man might undertake this office, but he alone who was the next heir to him that was slain; as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1. p. 469. Grotius observes the like custom among the ancient Greeks, of private men taking revenge for the death of their relations or friends (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. sect. 8. n. 6).

That the manslayer die not, until he stand before the congregation in judgment.] And they shall be unto you cities for refuge; that the manslayer die not, until he stand before the congregation in judgment.

And of these cities which ye shall give six cities shall ye have for refuge.

Ye shall give three cities on this side Jordan, and three cities shall ye give in the land of Canaan, which shall be cities of refuge.

These six cities shall be a refuge, both for the children of Israel, and for the stranger, and for the sojourner among them: that every one that killeth any person unwares may flee thereby.

16 And if he smite him with an instrument of iron, so that he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall be put to death.

17 And if he smite him with throwing a stone, wherewith he may die, and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall be put to death.

that the country beyond Jordan was as long as the land of Canaan, though not so broad: and they also beyond Jordan might flee to any of the cities in Canaan, if they were nearer to them. And besides, God commanded those in Canaan, if he enlarged their coast, to add three cities more, besides these (Deut. xix. 8, 9).

Why six cities are appointed for this purpose, and no more; and why three on one side of Jordan, and three on the other, Philo alleges some mystical reasons: but so far-fetched, that I do not think fit to mention them.

Ver. 15. Those six cities shall be a refuge.] They all began to be so at the same time, according to the Talmudists. For till those three in Canaan were set out, the whole space between Jordan and Canaan (though set out by Moses before they went into Canaan, Deut. iv. 43.) did not receive any manslayer. Which they prove in the fornamed title, Maccot, cap. 2, sect. 1. from these very words, "these six shall be cities of refuge;" that is, when the other three were appointed, then they all received those that fled to them.

And for the stranger, and for the sojourner] Both strangers and sojourners had renounced idolatry, but had not equally embraced the Jewish religion; yet both of them had the same share in this benefit, with the native Israelites; it being a natural right, that every man who was innocent should be protected.

The difference between a stranger and a sojourner has been often observed, particularly upon Lev. xix. 33, 34. Numb. xv. 15, 16.

That every one that killeth any person unwares may flee thereby.] That is, every one before mentioned, whether Israelites, strangers, or sojourners. But as for such as were mere gentiles, and not so much as proselytes of the gate, if they killed another, though a gentile, they had not the benefit of this law; because they were not suffered to dwell among them, though they trafficked in the country. And if a proselyte at the gate killed an Israelite, or one that was circumcised, he also, if we may believe the Jewish doctors, was denied protection in these cities. But if he killed one like himself (i.e. a proselyte of the gate,) then he had the same privilege with the Israelites, as they explain it (see Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2, p. 477.).

Ver. 16. And if he smite him] Or rather, "but if he smite him."

With an instrument of iron,—he is a murderer.] For it was to be presumed, that he who ran at a man with a sword, or any such weapon, intended to do him a mischief; though perhaps he had no malice to him, beforehand, but did it in a passion.

So that he dies.] He never going abroad after he was wounded (Exod. xxi. 19, 20).

The murderer shall surely be put to death.] Be taken away by the judges, though he were in a city of refuge; and, the fact being proved, condemned to die for it.

Ver. 17. If he smite him with throwing a stone.] In 18 Or if he smite him with an hand weapon of wood, wherewith he may die, and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death.

19 The revenger of blood himself shall slay the murderer: when he meeteth him, he shall slay him.

20 But if he thrust him of hatred, or hurl at him by laying of wait, that he die;

21 Or in enmity smite him with his hand, the Hebrew it is, "with a stone of the hand." That is, say the Jews, with a great stone that fills the hand; not with a small stone, with which he could not be presumed to intend to kill him; though he chanced to do it, by hitting him in the eye, or some other very tender part.

Wherewith he may die,] With a stone big enough to kill him.

And he dies.] So that it appears he died of that blow.

He is a murderer.] He is as guilty as the forenamed person, who smote with an instrument of iron; and his fleeing to the city of refuge shall not protect him from death.

Ver. 18. If he smite him with an hand weapon of wood.] Such as a baton (as we now speak), or a club, or any such kind of instrument, as is likely to kill him.

Wherewith he may die, &c.] It made no difference with what kind of weapon or instrument he was killed, whether it were of iron, wood, or stone; if he were killed with an instrument of iron, and knowingly, it was murder; and the guilty person was to suffer for it. Aul. Gellius hath collected the names of the several weapons, which were mentioned in ancient history; of which there are near thirty (lib. x. Attic, cap. 25), one of which, called ligula, he is pleased to explain, being then not common; and saith, it was a little sword, in the form of a tongue, like our poniard, I suppose, or dagger, or long knife; which was a dangerous weapon; because men might hide it under their clothes, and kill others while they were in familiar discourse with them.

shall slay the murderer.] This is thought by many to be a mere permission, not a precept; but the Jews think otherwise: that the next kin (i.e. the heir of him that was slain) stood bound to do his endeavour to avenge his blood. If he would not (saith Maimonides), or if he was not able; or if no such avenger was to be found (i.e. the murderer himself was the next heir, or the man slain was a proselyte of justice without issue), he was to be prosecuted, and put to death, by the court of judgment, and that by the sword (see Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 1).

When he meeteth him he shall slay him.] He was not bound to stay to the sentence of the court, but might kill him wheresoever he found him (see ver. 31).

Ver. 20. But if he thrust him of hatred, &c.] Or rather, "for if he thrust him," &c., that is, if by any other means, besides those mentioned, ver. 16—18. he killed a man witlingly, either by pushing him down violently from a high or steep place; or throwing him into the water; or hurling a stone at him; or letting anything fall down upon his head, though never so slowly; if death followed, and it appeared he bore a hatred to him, he was to suffer death, as in the former cases (see Deut. xix. 11). Now this was a sufficient proof of hatred to him; if being a neigh-that he die; he that smote him shall surely be put to death; for he is a murderer: the avenger of blood shall slay the murderer, when he meeteth him.

22 But if he thrust him suddenly without enmity, or have cast upon him any thing without laying of wait, 23 Or with any stone, wherewith a man may die, seeing him not, and cast it upon him, that bourn, and they having some difference, he had not spoken to him for three whole days together.

Ver. 21. Or in enmity smite him with his hand, that he die.) If he gave him only a blow with his fist, of which he died, and it was proved he had enmity to him, it was sufficient to make him a murderer; and it warranted the avenger of blood to kill him, or obliged him to prosecute him, so that the city of refuge should not save him.

The avenger of blood shall slay the murderer.) The civil law declared him to be unworthy to enjoy the inheritance of one that was murdered, if he neglected to prosecute the person that killed him in some court of justice: but the Jewish law allowed, or rather required, a great deal more; that the next of kin should kill the murderer with his own hands, if he met him. And thus the Abyssines, at this day (as Ritterhusius observes out of Alvarez), deliver the murderer into the hands of the next kinsman, to torture him. The reason of which law, among the Jews, was (as the same Ritterhusius observes, De Jure Asyl. cap. 4), because they being all descended from one and the same stock, and equally taking of the same right, they were all concerned in the shedding of the blood of any one of them, especially they who were nearest to him in blood, who seemed to be all struck at and injured in him. So that the law, with great reason, allowed them to avenge the blood of him that was slain. With which these verses of Ovid, he thinks, agree:

"Cum tibi sint fratres, fratres uliiscre lassos. Cunque pater tibi sit, jura tuere patris."

Ver. 22. If he thrust him suddenly without enmity.) Kildare has (in the manner before mentioned, ver. 21b) in a prudent possession, having no such intention, and being perhaps highly provoked by him, or by chance, as we speak, and unawares, it being proved that there was no enmity between them, no signs of hatred before this fact.

Or have cast upon him any thing?] Happen to hit him with any thing, without design to hurt him (see Exod. xxi. 13, Deut. xix. 5).

Ver. 23. Or with any stone.) See ver. 17.

Seeing him not.) Throwing it at something else, or playing with it; and having no thought of him, because he did not see him.

Was not his enemy.) Not having any quarrel with him, not threatening, or any other way discovering that he sought to do him mischief.

Ver. 24. Then the congregation.) That is, the judgment to whom the trial of such causes belonged: see ver. 12, where I observed, that the elders of the city of refuge judged whether the manslayer, who fled thither, should be received or not, upon a summary hearing of the cause, and such examination as they could make at present. But the full examination of it was reserved to the judges of the place where the fact was committed.

Shall judge between the slayer and the avenger of blood) They sent for him out of the city of refuge, to be brought before them; who heard what could be alleged against him, and what he could say for himself.

According to these judgments.) Upon trial they proceeded to give judgment according to the foregoing rules; which, in brief, are these: if a man had no intention to kill another, but it was purely involuntary, he was to be acquitted. If there appeared any design upon his life, or such hatred and enmity as might move them to conclude he had an intention to kill him, he was to be put to death. But here the Hebrew doctors (as Mr. Selden observes) distinguish the killing of a man into three kinds: the first was, if the slayer, though it was from pure ignorance and error, yet there was some negligence in it, which a prudent man might have avoided. The second, when a man kills another ignorantly, and cannot be blamed for any negligence, because such a thing seldom happens. An example of the first they make to be, when a man, coming down a ladder, falls upon another and kills him. An example of the second, when going up a ladder, a man happens to do the same. The former is more frequent, and therefore they say hath some kind of blame in it; the other seldomer, and therefore hath none. A third kind, when a man kills another out of ignorance and error also; but it approaches nearer to voluntary murder: as when a man, intending to kill one man, happens to kill another with a stone, or otherwise. In none of these cases, they say, the court of judgment could put any man to death. And the cities of refuge were not provided for the second or third sorts, but only for the first; and that when the man died presently, and did not lie and languish of the wound; for if he did, it might be supposed he died by his own negligence, or otherwise, as well as by the wound. In which case, there was no need that the manslayer should repair to the city of refuge; nor could the avenger of blood meddle with him, no more than he could with a father, when he gave his son, or a master, when he gave his scholar, correction, and happened to kill him. The same was the case of him, whose office it was to arrest men, by public authority, and bring them before the judges, if he struck a man that refused to go along with him, and killed him (see Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. justa Disciplin. Heb. cap. 2).

Ver. 25. The congregation shall deliver the slayer.) If the court found the man was killed casually, as the person accused pretended (Josh. xx. 4), then they charged the avenger of blood not to prosecute any farther.

Both here and in the foregoing verse, and in the next words to these, by congregation is meant the judges of the city (as I observed, ver. 12), who were to determine in the presence, and in the behalf of the people, whether the manslayer were capable of the privilege of the city of refuge or not; as we read, Josh. xx. 46. Now these things (as a very learned person of our own age) which were done by the elders (or judges), being said to be done by the congregation, or assembly of the people, in whose behalf abide in it unto the death of the high priest, which was anointed with the holy oil.

26 But if the slayer shall at any time come they were done; it is no wrong to the Holy Scriptures, when we say, that which they report to have been done by the church was acted by the chief power of the apostles and elders, with the consent of the people. For it is manifest from the New Testament that in the apostles' time all the public acts of the church were passed at the public assemblies of the same. As ordinances (Acts l. 23, v. 36), excommunications (Matt. xviii. 18—20, 1 Cor. v. 4, 2 Cor. ii. 10), councils (Acts xv. 4, 22), and other acts (2 Cor. vii. 19).

And there is no agreement the primitive custom of the church for divers ages; whereby they gave satisfaction to the people of the integrity of their proceedings, and by the same means obliged superiors to that integrity, by making the proceedings so manifest, and so to preserve the unity of the church. And from this interest of the people in such acts is, at this day, that the people of the church of England are demanded, what they have to say against ordinances and marriages to be made (see Mr. Thorndike, in his Rites of the Church in a Christian State, ch. iii. p. 153, &c.).

The congregation shall restore him to the city of his refuge. They were to send him back again, from the place where he was tried, to the city where he had taken refuge, there to remain till the time prescribed in the next words.

And if he was moreComic Condemnament by the Attic laws (which plainly show they were borrowed, in great part, from Moses), for he who slew a man involuntarily was forced to fly his country. So the scholiast upon the last of Homer's Iliads, ἲδος ἐν παρά ταῖς παλαιοῖς, τῶν ἀκούοντων φωνῶν ἑταίρους ἐν τῆς παρ- τίδος, &c. "It was the manner, in ancient times, for a man that had killed another involuntarily, to flee his country; and, betaking himself to some neighbouring place, to sit with his face covered, begging to be expiated." But this was only for a certain time, as Demosthenes tells us (in his oration in Aristocratam): οὐ μόνος κελευν, τῷ ἀληθείᾳ ἵνα καταθύμω νρώ ὡς ἦν τοὺς ἔοιμον κρατοὺς ἐπάνω εἰς τὴν ἐλικα- τομένον φοίνικι, &c. The law of killing a man involuntarily, for some limited time to go away, and keep at an appointed distance, till he can make his peace with the kindred of him that was slain: after which he may return again, &c.

He shall abide in it? Not stir out of the limits of the city, that is, beyond the suburbs, and the two thousand cubits which encompassed them (ver. 4, 5), within which bounds he was to keep.

Unto the death of the high priest. This looks like a punishment to the manslaughter; whereby others were taught to be very watchful over themselves, lest by negligence they chance to kill any body, and so be forced to leave their own home. But Maimonides takes it for a prudent charity to the manslaughter, and to the relation of him that was slain: for by this means the manslayer was kept out of the sight of the avenger of blood, who might have been tempted, some time or other, to fall upon him, if he had come in his way: but by long absence his anger might be mitigated, at least by the death of the high-priest, the most excellent of all other persons, and most dear to every one in the nation. Which made the public grief so great when he died, that men forgot their private resentments: for nothing could fall out more grievous to all people (saith he) than the death of the high-priest, which swallowed up all other grief" (More Neveoh. par. iii. cap. 40). And in the mean time the Jews say, that the citizens of the place were bound to teach him some trade, whereby he might provide himself with necessaries; during his absence from his own family, that the mother of the high-priest sent him many gifts, that he might remain there more contentedly, and not pray for the death of the high-priest. So they tell us, in the place forementioned, Maccoth, cap. 2, sect. 6, where they also observe, that if a man killed the high-priest, or the high-priest himself happened to kill a man involuntarily, they were to stay in the city of refuge as long as they lived: yet they found this temperance, that if one who had been high-priest, but removed from his office, was alive when the slaughter was committed; after his death, both he that killed the high-priest himself, and any other unwares, and the high-priest himself, might do them as in three cities of refuge from the city of refuge (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synod. cap. 9, sect. 6, and lib. iii. cap. 8, sect. 3).

There may seem to be some inequality in this law, because, as some high-priests lived long, and others but a short time, so some manslayers fled to the city at the beginning of their priesthood, and others just before their death. But it must be considered, that the man that could not have better ordered than to make the manslayer’s liberty depend upon the death of the high-priest, whenever it fell out, that a higher value might be set upon him; and that it might represent our deliverance only by the death of the Son of God: of which many great men looked upon this as a type or shadow; though it must be confessed, there is not that satisfaction: but the expiation, which the great expiation, which the high-priest made every year on the day of atonement, did not procure such men their liberty, I cannot look upon it as the effect of the high-priest’s death, but only as that which followed upon it, by virtue of this law. For the high-priest having a great power everywhere, and particularly the high-priests and other officers over whom he was the chief, it is possible the manslayer might be confined here by some peculiar act of his authority; which expiring together with himself, he was released.

Ver. 26. But if the slayer shall at any time] During the life of the high-priest.

Come without the border of the city of his refuge. If he went beyond the bounds of the fields, in which he had liberty to walk, and might not be touched. For if a tree was planted (as the Mischna resolves in Maccoth) within the borders of the fields of the city, though the boughs stretched themselves beyond the borders, yet the manslayer was safe under the tree. In like manner, when churches became places of refuge, the civil law allowed the privilege to extend to the church gate: and the council of Toledo to thirty paces from the church; which pope Nicholas enlarged to forty. Thus, among the heathen, the bounds of the refuge at the temple of Diana at Ephesus were sometimes more, and sometimes less, as Ritterhusius observes in his book before named, where he shows how far it was himself with necessaries: And Tacitus, lib. iii. Annalium, mentions a temple of hers, to which was granted, by several emperors, duobus millibus passuum candonem sanctitatem, "the same sanctity for two miles round about it."

Ver. 27. And the revenger of blood find him without out the borders of the city of his refuge, and the revenger of blood kill the slayer; he shall not be guilty of blood:
28. Because he should have remained in the city of his refuge until the death of the high priest: but after the death of the high priest the slayer shall return into the land of his possession.
29. So these things shall, for a statute of judgment unto you throughout your generations in all your dwellings.
30. Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses.
but one witness shall not testify against any person to cause him to die.
31. Moreover ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, which is guilty of death:
but he shall be surely put to death.
32. And ye shall take no satisfaction for him that is fled to the city of his refuge, that he should come again to dwell in the land, until the death of the priest.
33. So ye shall not pollute the land wherein ye are: for blood it defileth the land: and the One witness shall not testify—to cause him to die.] This was such an established rule in the civil law, that it ruled, that unless two witnesses gave sufficient doe; “where the number of witnesses is not mentioned, two suffices.” Pluralis enim locutioni, duorum numero contenta est: “for where witnesses in the plural number are spoken of, two are enough to answer the intention of the law.” Which number, therefore, is frequently mentioned expressly in Scripture, as necessary in all cases (Deut. 17. 6); but particularly in this case of murder (xix. 15). Yet, where there was but one witness, or not two who both together saw the man killed, so that he who was accused of the murder could not be put to death, he was thrown into a very strait prison, and there fed with bread and water of affliction, till his bowels were sorely pinched, &c. if we may believe the Jewish doctors,

cap. 1.

Ver. 31.] If a murderer would have given all his estate to save his life, or the avenger of blood would have accepted a compensation, or freely let him go, the judges (when they had found him guilty) could not restore him to the city of refuge, but he was to suffer death. For the life of him that was slain, was not (as Maimonides speaks) part of the goods of the avenger of blood, but belonged to Almighty God; who set such a value on a man’s life, that he would not suffer any price to be taken for it (see Selden in the same chapter, p. 470).

Ver. 32.] No money was to purchase his liberty to save his life. More else but, till the time appointed by the law: but this punishment for manslaughter was as indispensable as death for murder.
And therefore, if any man happened to kill another in the city of refuge, to which he was confined, he was forced to flee to another city of refuge, and there abide till the death of the high-priest.

Ver. 33.] So ye shall not pollute the land.] By this it appears, that the next of kin was bound to prosecrate the murderer unto death, for the good of his country, which otherwise would have had a guilt upon it, and that very grievous. For they are the greatest crimes, as Maimonides observes, which are said to pollute the land, or them, or God’s sanctuary, viz. idolatry (Lev. xx. 9), all the filthiness that is in the blood, and murder, here mentioned (More Nevech, par. iii. cap. 47).
The land cannot be cleansed—but by the blood of him that shed it.] The same Maimonides observes, in the forty-first chapter of that book, “That it is a piece of universal justice, to make a man suffer what he hath made another suffer. If he hath hurt his body, he must suffer for it in his own body; if in his money, his own purse must pay for it; if he has taken away his life, he must die for it himself.
And the punishment can neither be mitigated, nor any compensation accepted for it. For which he quotes these words; and upon this account resolves, that if the borders, &c.] The court of judgment were not to put him to death; though perhaps he was ob-noxions to the judgment of God, because he had killed an innocent person; but he was free from the punishment of the law, that manslayers might be the more careful to keep within their bounds; which was a profitable restraint upon them, for the public good. All men seeing how much God hated murder, by the condemnation of him who had slain a man unlawfully, to a kind of imprisonment. But they may be said, on the other side, that he who killed a manslayer in this case was perfectly guiltiless; because he did not herein act as a private person, but executed a sentence against him, who was condemned by public authority. Which gave no protection to the manslayer, but within the borders of his city of refuge; leaving him to the avenger of blood, and he himself, if he chose, till the death of the high-priest. After which, if the avenger of blood killed him, no doubt he was to be punished as a murderer.

Ver. 28. He should have remained in the city of his refuge.] These words give the reason, why the avenger of blood was not to be punished in this case; because the manslayer was guilty of breaking another law, and so in some sort accessory to his own death;
for he might have been safe, if he had pleased.

After the death of the high priest, the slayer shall return Where he was not only to remain safe, but to be restored to all his honours, if he had any before he fled to the city of refuge.

Ver. 29.] A statute of judgment.] A rule whereby the courts of manslayers are punished.

Throughout your generations] The like clauses are usual in the ancient civil law: “Hoc perpetu-num lege sanctissim.” Hoc generali et in perpetuum valuitu lege decrenissim,” &c.

In all your dwellings.] This the Jews interpret as an obligation upon them to have courts of judgment wheresoever they dwell. Thus R. Solomon, upon these very words: “They teach us (saith he) the use of courts of judgment, which ought to be even out of the land, all the time that they were used in the land.” So the ancient book Siprihi, and many others mentioned by our most learned Selden, lib. ii.
De Synod. cap. 5. n. 1.

Ver. 30. The murderer shall be put to death by the judgment of witnesses.] This direction for their proceedings in this case, was to be the rule in all others of like nature, by examining witnesses, who were to be competent. Upon which account ten sorts of persons were incapable to be witnesses, according to the Hebrew doctors: viz. women, servants, minors, fools, the deaf and dumb, the blind, impious, and ungodly people, dear relations, and those that had been convicted of bearing false witness: and they endeavour, after their manner, to find reasons against all these in the law itself (see Selden, lib. ii.
De Synod. cap. 13. n. 11).
CHAPTER XXXVI.

1 The inconvenience of the inheritance of daughters 5 is remedied by marrying in their own tribes; 7 lest the inheritance should be removed from the tribe. 10 The daughters of Zelophehad marry their father's brothers' sons.

1 And the chief fathers of the families of the children of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, of the families of the sons of Joseph, came near, and spake before Moses, and before the princes, the chief fathers of the children of Israel:

2 And they said, The Lord commanded my lord to give the land for an inheritance by lot to the children of Israel: and my lord was commanded by the Lord to give the inheritance of Zelophehad our brother unto his daughters.

3 And if they be married to any of the sons of the other tribes of the children of Israel, then shall their inheritance be taken from the inheritance of our fathers, and shall be put to the inheritance of the tribe wherewith they are received: so shall it be taken from the lot of our inheritance.

4 And when the jubilee of the children of Israel shall be, then shall their inheritance be put unto the inheritance of the tribe wherewith they are received: so shall their inheritance be taken away from the inheritance of the tribe of the out fathers.

5 And Moses commanded the children of Israel according to the word of the Lord, saying, present to Moses the inconveniences which from thence would follow.

Then shall their inheritance be taken from the inheritance of our fathers; i.e. go out of our tribe, to which it originally belonged.

And shall be put to the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they are received: become a part of the inheritance of that tribe unto which they married.

So shall it be taken from the lot of our inheritance.

For it must have descended unto their children, who were of another tribe by the father's side; which alone was considered, and not the mother's, in this case.

Ver. 4. When the jubilee—shall be. Which was ordained for the preserving estates in the tribes and families to which they originally appertained (Lev. xxv. 10, 13).

Then shall their inheritance be put unto the inheritance of the tribe whereunto they are received: the jubilee will not help us in this case, by making their inheritances return as other lands do; because they are become the inheritance of another tribe by the right of marriage.

So shall their inheritance be taken away. So will their estate go out of our tribe, without remedy, because the jubilee itself will give us no relief.

Ver. 5. And Moses commanded—according to the word of the Lord. Whom, I suppose, he consulted about this matter (as he did when the first doubt was
The tribe of the sons of Joseph hath said well.

6 This is the thing which the Lord doth command concerning the daughters of Zelophehad, saying, Let them marry to whom they think best; only to the family of the tribe of their father shall they marry.

7 So shall not the inheritance of the children of Israel remove from tribe to tribe; for every one of the children of Israel shall keep himself to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers.

8 And every daughter, that possesseth an inheritance in any tribe of the children of Israel, shall be wife unto one of the family of the tribe of her father, that the children of Israel may enjoy every man the inheritance of his fathers.

9 Neither shall the inheritance remove from one tribe to another tribe; but every one of the moved about the inheritance of these women, xxvii. 5), and received the answer by which he here commanded the Israelites to govern themselves.

The tribe—of—Joseph] In whose name the chief fathers of their several families made this representation to Moses; as became men who took care of the concerns of the whole tribe.

(That said well] In desiring the inheritance of these women might not go out of their tribe, which was prevented by the following law.

Ver. 6. Let them marry to whom they think best] They were not confined to any particular persons; but might have their choice among those who were descended from the same stock as it immediately fell.

Only to the family of the tribe of their father they shall marry] Only with these two limitations, that they might not marry a man of another tribe, nor a man of another family in their own tribe. For it is very manifest, that they are tied to marry into the family of their father; and accordingly they did actually marry their cousins—germans, as we now speak (ver. 11). For this law was made for the preservation of families (as well as of tribes), as the law for the redemption of lands was. And therefore these words, "the family of the tribe of their father," are well translated by Grotius (upon Matt. i. 16), familia stirpis paternae, "the family of the stock of their father," which was that they desired might not perish (Gen. vi. 18), and was the ground of the law, which commanded a man to marry the wife of his brother, who left no issue (Dent. xxv. 16). Therefore, there being several families in the tribe of Manasseh (xxvi. 29—32), these women could marry only into the family of the Heberites.

Ver. 7. So shall not the inheritance—remove from tribe to tribe] For preserving it in the family to which it was given, it was necessarily preserved in the tribe.

Every one—shall keep himself to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers.] And not endeavour to get any part of the inheritance of another tribe, by marrying an heiress in it. Plato himself took care of this, that when a man left only a daughter, his estate should not be carried by her to a stranger, but she should be bound to marry βαρη γυναικα, "one that was nearest of kin to her." And if there was a want of near kindred, μηδον μηδεν δευτερον γυναικη, &c. "it should descend to the children of her father's brother, or the children of the grandfather, some of which he ordains should marry her" (Lib. xi. De Legibus, p. 394, 404, 411. So Spen.

Ver. 8. Every daughter that possesseth an inheritance in any tribe.] Here this law is made general, that all women who were heiresses, as the daughters of Zelophehad were, should do as they are here commanded. And this was one of the Attic laws, which, as Grotius observes, were plainly borrowed from the law of Moses, Matt. xxii. 29., 30.; 1 Cor. xiv. 26; Heb. xi. 23. "That an heiress should not marry out of her kindred," but dispose of herself and estate, τη γυναικα την εσω, "to one nearest of kin to her," which was one of the laws of Solon, as Sam. Petitus observes out of Isaeus, Pollux, and others, in his Comment. in Leges Atticas, lib. vi. tit. 1. p. 441.

Shall be wife to one of the family of the tribe of her father.] Here she is confined to her family, and not merely to her tribe. But this concerned only such as were possessed; all other women might marry into what tribe they pleased; as appears by those very books, wherein we read that Aaron himself married the sister of the prince of Judah (Exod. vi. 22). And if any object, that this was before the giving of the law, it is evident that Jehoada, a priest, and consequently of the tribe of Levi, married king Jehoram's sister, who was of the tribe of Judah (2 Chron. xxii. 11). And long before this, all the tribes of Israel, being in great sollicitude how to find wives for their brethren of Benjamin, did not scruple their having them out of any tribe, if it had not been for their oath (Judg. xxi. 18). And, to add more, David himself, of the tribe of Judah, married Michal, the daughter of Saul, who was of the tribe of Benjamin.

The Talmudists add, that even these heiresses might marry into what tribe they pleased, after the first division of the land by Joshua; to which they imagine this law was restrained; it being a common saying among them, "that it did not belong to any age, but that in which it was made." In the following ages they pretend a man might purchase land in any tribe possessed; or, by reason of the relations of marriage, though he were of another tribe, as Selden shows their opinion to be (lib. De Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 18, and lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 4. p. 1, and Buxtorf. De Sponsal. et Divortiis, sect. 44). But this is well confuted by Grotius in his Annotations upon Matt. i. 16.

(Ver. 10. And her—shall the inheritance remain from one tribe to another tribe.) This establishes in general what he had said before (ver. 7), with particular respect to the daughters of Zelophehad. But Moses ben Nachman, upon these very words, asserts the Talmudic opinion before mentioned, that this concerns only the present time, not future ages. And puts this ease (which is the strongest that can be thought of), if a woman were married into another tribe, after which marriage, her father and all her brethren dying without children, the inheritance fell to her, and consequently, saith he, the possession must devolve from one tribe to another, into which she had married. But, according to the letter of these words, the inheritance was rather to descend to the next of her kindred, if there were, than for her be carried out of the tribe to which it belonged.

But every one of the tribes—shall keep himself to his own inheritance.] Shall clave or stick close to his own inheritance, as the Hebrew word signifies; and as the Greek and Latin express it. The reason of the command was, as Procopius Gazaurus observes, to prevent the confusion of tribes, to keep them distinct, and to deserve so much from the Hebrew text, and from the intention of this law (as it hath done in this and the two preceding verses), I shall not here examine.
CHAPTER XXXVI.

tribes of the children of Israel shall keep himself to his own inheritance.

10 Even as the Lord commanded Moses, so did the daughters of Zelophehad:

11 For Mahlah, Tirzah, and Hoglah, and Milcah, and Noah, the daughters of Zelophehad, were married unto their father’s brothers’ sons:

12 And they were married into the families of the sons of Manasseh the son of Joseph, and their inheritance remained in the tribe of the family of their father.

13 These are the commandments and the judgments, which the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses unto the children of Israel in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho.

It is sufficient to note, that Onkelos hath expressed the Hebrew text word for word; and the LXX. do not depart from the sense of it.

Ver. 10. So did the daughters of Zelophehad:] Accordingly they followed this direction when they came into the land of Canaan, and had received their portion there. Now there being no such words added here, as there are in other cases, “this shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment” (xxvii. 11), much less “a statute of judgment throughout your generations” (xxxv. 29), it led, I conjecture, the Talmudic doctors into the forementioned opinion, that this law concerned only the present generation.

Ver. 11. For Mahlah, Tirzah, and Hoglah, and Milcah, and Noah,] Thus they are called both in xxvi. 33, and xxvii. 1, though they are not there mentioned in the same order; for Tirzah is there named last, who is here named in the second place. Perhaps they are set down here in the order wherein they were disposed in marriage; and Tirzah, who was the younger, was married in the second place.

Were married unto their father’s brothers’ sons:] For Hepher, no doubt, had other sons besides Zelophehad, who had issue male, though Zelophehad had not. What their names were, or how many of them, we do not know; but some suppose them to have been six; one of which died in the wilderness without issue. See Selden, De Successionibus, cap. 23, where he discourses at large of the portion which fell to them in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 12. They were married into the families, &c.] In the margin, more exactly out of the Hebrew, to “some that were of the families;” i.e. to one of the families of Manasseh, from whom several families descended (xxvi. 29, &c.)

Their inheritance remained in the tribe.] The word for tribe signifies sometimes merely a family in a tribe. And so the LXX. (as Grothus observes in the place before named) in this very business, uses sometimes the word ἀδελφών, and sometimes ἀδελφών; the former of which signifies a part of a whole tribe. And thus Josephus also uses the word καταφύγα, to signify a family. Mr. Selden hath the same observation in his book De Successionibus, cap. 18. that παρεδόθεν is sometimes translated καταφύγα; and then it signifies not a tribe, but παρίκαιόν, νομότατον, &c. familiar, cognationem, seu genus sanguine proximum: “a family, a kindred, or those that are next in blood.” But there is no need of these observations, if the words be translated, as they may rightly; “And their inheritance remained in the tribe and the family of their fathers” (see ver. 6.)

Ver. 13.] He began to deliver the precepts here intended at chapter xxvi. (see ver. 3), and continues them to this place. By commandments, seem to be meant the precepts about the worship of God (ch. xxviii. xxix. xxx.), and by judgments, the civil laws about dividing their inheritances, and regulating their descent to their posterity, and establishing cities of refuge for manslayers, which are expressly called a statute of judgment (xxvii. 11. xxxv. 29). Some other things are interspersed, as God’s commandment to number the people (which was in order to the assigning them their inheritances proportionable to their families), to execute judgment on the Midianites, and to set down in writing their travels in the wilderness; of which I have given an account in their proper places.

THE FIFTH BOOK OF MOSES,

CALLED

DEUTERONOMY.

This book had the name of Deuteronomy given it by the Greeks, from the principal scope and design of it; which was to repeat unto the Israelites, before Moses left them, the chief laws of God, which had been given them; that they who were not then born when they were first delivered, or were incapable to understand them, or had not sufficiently regarded them, might be instructed in them, and awakened to attend them, (see ver. 1, 5.) In order to this, he premises a short narrative of what had befallen them since they came from Mount Sinai unto this time, in the first three chapters; and then in the fourth urges them, by a most pathetical exhortation, to the observance of those laws which he had taught them, especially the ten commandments, with which he begins the fifth chapter; where he makes a solemn rehearsal of the covenant God made with Vol. L—54 them in Horeb; and what immediately followed upon the delivery of the law by God himself from Mount Sinai. And then, having earnestly pressed the observation of the first commandment, in the former part of the sixth chapter, and in the latter part of it, and in the several chapters that follow (to the end of the eleventh), reminded them of a great many things which God had done for them, and given them several cautions, lest they let them slip out of their minds, and used many arguments, from several topics (as we call them), to move them to be obedient to all the other commandments; he proceeds in the twelfth chapter, and so forward to the twenty-eighth, to remember them of a great many other laws besides the ten commandments, which he had delivered to them. Some of which he explains; others he enforces with further reasons; and in several places adds new laws for the greater security of the whole (particularly, he orders the writing of God's law upon stones, when they came into the land of Canaan, ch. xxvii.), and then pronounces those promises which God had made to the obedient, and his threatenings to the disobedient, more largely, and with greater force, than he had done in the twenty-sixth of Leviticus. After which he again remembers them of several wonderful works of God for them (ch. xxxix.) and renews the covenant between God and them; using several arguments to persuade them to a dutiful observance of God's law: which he commands (ch. xxxi.) to be read to all the people in the conclusion of every seventh year, that none might pretend ignorance of it. And then concludes all with a most admirable song, which he orders every one to learn; and with a blessing upon the twelve tribes.

All this was done in the last two months of the last year of Moses' life. But not all at once, as plainly appears by several parts of the book; in which he writes what he delivered to them at several times. Which is the reason of the repetition of the very same thing over and over again: that he might make it sink into their minds by being often inculcated. Some have been so foolish as to make this an objection against this book being composed by Moses. But it shows their great ignorance; all wise men having ever judged it necessary to say, τα αυτά παρέτεινας αυτόν, "the very same things concerning the same subjects;" that they might be thoroughly understood, and fixed in the memory of their auditors, and settled in their hearts and affections. Particularly Epictetus (as David Chytræus long ago observed) delivered this as a profitable rule in all studies: "Εἰ διδαχῇς ζητήςιν ἐκείνον ἑγγόνυμον τέκνον, ἵνα μην ἀπελαύνονταί τὰ αὐτά καὶ λίγα τις καὶ άλλα καὶ άλλα λόγως τοίς τοῦ διδάσκειν. This must be known (as a certain truth), that it is not easy for a man to attain the solid knowledge of any thing, unless he both read and hear the same things every day, and also set himself to the practice of them." This course Moses took with the children of Israel: spending every day, it is likely, of the latter end of his life in calling to their mind, again and again, what he had taught them, and the reason they had to do accordingly.

CHAPTER I.

1 Moses' speech in the end of the fortieth year, briefly rehearsing the story 6 of God's promise, 13 of giving them officers, 19 of sending the spies to search the land, 34 of God's anger for their incredulity, 41 and disobedience.

1 These be the words which Moses spake unto all Israel on this side Jordan in the wilderness, in the plain over against the Red sea, between Paran, and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Dizahab.

Ver. 1 These be the words: This book contains the words, Which Moses spake unto all Israel]. All the people could not hear what he said, but he ordered the elders and heads of the several tribes to communicate to the whole congregation what he delivered to them, in the audience of many of the people who were assembled with them. Thus these words are commonly understood. But, considering the great weight of what is here said, I rather think that Moses himself, at several times, spake what here follows in the ears of the people (see v. 1.)

On this side Jordan. The Vulgar Latins having translated the Hebrew words [βεβελε] "on the other side Jordan," it hath furnished some ill-disposed minds with an argument, that Moses was not the author of this book: for he that wrote plainly shows that he was in Canaan when he wrote it. But a very little consideration would have prevented this false objection; there being nothing more certain, than that the Hebrew words signify indifferently, either one side or the other; and may be literally translated, "in the passage over Jordan," or as they were about to pass over it; as Huetius observes and proves, by plain examples, that the Hebrews have no other word to express their mind, when they would say either on this side or beyond (see Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 14). To which another learned writer, since him (Hermannus Witsius, lib. i. Miscel. Sacr. cap. 14), hath added several other places which evidently show, that βεβελε is a word that indifferently belongs to either side of any place (see 1 Sam. xiv. 40, and must be determined by the matter in hand, to which it is to be applied. And here, undoubtedly, it is to be rendered "on this side Jordan" (see iii. 8).

In the plain. In the plain of Moab, where they had remained many long years; as appears from the foregoing book (Num. xxxii. 1, xxxvi. 3. 6. xxxi. 12. xxxiii. 48. 59. xxxv. 1. xxxvi. 13).
reb by the way of mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea.)

3 And it came to pass in the fortieth year, in the eleventh month, on the first day of the month, that Moses spake unto the children of Israel, according unto all that the Lord had given him in commandment unto them;

Over against the Red sea,] There is no word in the Hebrew text for sea; and therefore the marginal translation is to be preferred, which is, “over against suph,” which was a place in the country of Moab (Hazoroth, xxxii. 14), on the very eastward of the sea, and so far distant from the Red Sea, that there can be no respect to it here.

Between Paran.] He doth not mean the wilderness of Paran frequently mentioned in the foregoing book (for that was as remote from hence as the Red Sea), but some place in the country of Moab, as Suph was, and the rest of the places which here follow.

When Moses spake here mentioned, to have been frontier-towns in the country of Moab, which lay upon the borders of this plain. The last of which, Dizahab, is translated by the LXX. and the Vulgar, as it if signified a place where there were mines of gold.

Oukelis and the Jerusalem Targum, who take Suph to signify the Red sea, and Paran for the wilderness which here mentioned, “It which cannot be understood of the whole time they spent between these two places, but only of the time they spent in travelling: for they stayed a month at Kibrolh-battaavah, and a week more at Hazeroth (Numb. xi. 21. xii. 15, 16), before they came to Kadesh-barnea. This he represents to them, to make them sensible they had been kept in the wilderness so many years as had passed since they came out of Egypt; not because it was a long way to Canaan, but for the reason mentioned in the fourteenth of Numbers. For from Horeb (whither he ordered them to go when they came out of Egypt) they came in eleven days, and took no long journeys, to the borders of the land of Canaan, where Kadesh-barnea lay. So Maimonides: The way was plain and known between Horeb (whither God brought them on purpose to serve him) and Kadesh: which was the beginning of a habitable country; according to what he saith, Numb. xx. 16. (see More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. I. see Numb. xii. 26). By the way of Mount Seir] The country of the Edomites (ch. ii. ver. 12).

Unto Kadesh-barnea.] How they were ordered to come hither, and what they did here, he relates, ver.

4 After he had slain Sihon the king of the Amorites, which dwelt in Heshbon, and Og the king of Bashan, which dwelt at Ashtaroth in Edrei:

5 On this side Jordan, in the land of Moab, began Moses to declare this law, saying,

6 The Lord our God spake unto us in Horeb,
DEUTERONOMY.

saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount: 7 Turn you, and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereunto, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vale, and in the south, and by the sea side, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river, the river Euphrates.
8 Behold, I have set the land before you: go in and possess the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give unto them and to their seed after them.

thing seem dubious, let him come that I may explain it. And so they say in Siphri, "If any one has forgotten any constitution, let him come and hear it the second time; if he need to have any thing unfolded, let him come and hear the explanation of it." For which he quotes this verse; and says that Moses spent all his time in this, from the beginning of the month Shebat to the seventh day of Adar. And what he now said was likely to be more regarded, because these were, in a manner, his dying words; for he lived the next month day of the month of Sh Baveth; and seems to have composed this book as a compendium of his whole law, for the familiar use of the children of Israel; from whence it is called Deuteronomy, i.e. a second law (see Huetius in his Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 1).

Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount:] From the third month of the first year (Exod. x. 1), to the twentieth day of the second year after they came out of Egypt (Numb. x. 11), they stayed at Mount Sinai, which is the same with Horeb, they being only two tops of the same mountain, one of them something higher than the other, as they are described by those who have taken a view of them. For Moses was twined up with God, for the space of forty days, in this mount; and here the tabernacle and all things belonging to it were made, according to the orders he there received; and then was erected and consecrated; and the people all numbered and disposed under several standards, to march in such order as God appointed (Numb. ii. 3. 10. 17. &c. x. 14, 15, 16.

Ver. 7. Turn ye.] From this mountain.
Take your journey.] Resume your journey, which you have so long intermitted.

Go to the mount of the Amorites,] A mount on the south part of Canaan, inhabited by the Amorites, together with some Canaanites and Amalekites (Numb. xiv. 23. 43. 49. But the principal possessors of it were Amorites, as is expressed more than once in this chapter, ver. 19. 20. 41. This is the mountain to which Moses bade the spies go up, Numb. xiii. 17, and so they did, ver. 22.

Unto all the places nigh thereunto,] And so pass into all the neighbouring country which lies near it.
In the plain, in the hills, and in the vale,] This is a description of the country round about the mountain: some of which was champaign (as we speak) and other parts of it consisted of bills and dales.
In the south, &c. unto the great river, the river Euphrates.] And so go into all the rest of the land of Canaan: the several quarters of which he here sets forth. The southern part lying towards this mountain; the western upon the sea (where the people properly called Canaanites dwelt); the northern towards Lebanon; and the eastern towards the river Euphrates. Which by other authors, as well as Moses, is called the great river. So Callimachus, in his hymn to Apollo, v. 103.

9 If And I spake unto you at that time, saying, I am not able to bear you myself alone:
10 The Lord your God hath multiplied you, and, behold, ye are this day as the stars of heaven for multitude.
11 (The Lord God of your fathers make you a thousand times so many more as ye are, and bless you, as he hath promised you!) 12 How can I myself alone bear your cumbrence and your burden, and your strife? 13 Take you wise men, and understanding,

"Aσσηρων ποταμω μιγας γος—
"The great flood of the Assyrian river;" which the scholiast observes is meant of Euphrates. And Luecan, "Cum Tigride marinus Euphrates"—Lib. iii. ver. 232.

Ver. 8. I have set the land] In the Hebrew, "given the land," i.e. bestowed it upon you, and am ready to bring you into possession of it. Before you?] That every one of you may have his share of it. Or, that you may go with him, ye please, and settle yourselves in it (Gen. xiii. 9. xxxiv. 10). Go in and possess] Therefore make no longer stay here in the wilderness; but go and take possession of my gift. Which the Lord sware unto your fathers,] Gen. xv. 18. xvii. 7. 8. xxvi. 1. xxviii. 13.

Ver. 9. I spake unto you at that time:] About the time of the departure of the people from Horeb, or Mount Sinai. For the story of Jethro, unto which this relates, preceded that immediately (Exod. xviii. 18). Many great men place it after the giving of the law: of which see Selden, lib. ii. Do Synedr. cap. 2. n. 4.
I am not able to bear you myself alone:] We do not read, before now, that Moses spake thus to the people, But Jethro spake in this manner to him, Exod. xviii. 18, and gave him advice to take some others to his assistance (ver. 21), which advice he followed (ver. 24). And then spake to the people what Jethro had said to him; and enlarged upon it, in the words we read here, in the following verses: where he gives them the reason why he could not perform the office of judge alone.

Ver. 10. Hath multiplied you.] Increased unto a greater number than can easily be told.

Ver. 11. Make you a thousand times so many more as you are,] As if he had said, I am not troubled at your vast increase, but bless God for it; and beseech him to make you a thousand times more numerous than at present you are.
Bless you, as he has promised you!] In the promise often repeated to their fathers (Gen. xii. 2. xv. 5. xvi. 5. 6. xviii. 18. xxii. 17. xxvi. 4. xxviii. 14).

Ver. 12. How can I myself alone bear your cumbrence, and your burden, and your strife?] But how is it possible for one man alone to undergo the labour of hearing all the complaints of such a multitude; share of it; and all their grievances, and determining all their controversies? So the last word signifies, suits at law (as we speak), as the two former signify other differences, which arose between one man and another, about such things as are mentioned in the twenty-first, twenty-second, and twenty-third chapters of Exodus. The first word, which we translate cumbrence, signifies tedescom litigium sermon (as Hottinger interprets it; in his Njomma Orientalis, lib. i. cap. 6); the tedious pleadings of those that manage causes before a judge, by bills and answers (suppose) and rejoinders, &c.

Ver. 13. Take you] In the Hebrew it is give ye, i.e. and known among your tribes, and I will make them rulers over you.

14 And ye answered me, and said, The thing which thou hast spoken is good for us to do.

15 So I took the chief of your tribes, wise men, and known, and made them heads over you, captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, and captains over fifties, and captains over tens, and officers among your tribes.

present unto me such persons as you think fit, according to the following characters.

Wisemen, and understanding.] Men of known wisdom, prudence, and integrity; skilful in Divine and human laws (see Exod. xvii. 21). Some take wise men to signify such as knew much; and understanding, such as had prudence to make use of their knowledge, being men of experience, and they were to be noted for both these; otherwise the people would not have reverence them.

Ver. 14.] This consent of the people is not recorded before; but sufficiently implied in their submission to this regulation, mentioned Exod. xviii. 20.

Ver. 15. So I took the chief of your tribes, wise men, and known.] From among those men that they presented to him, he took, I suppose, such persons among the chief of their tribes, as were endowed with the qualities here named, and were known by all so to be. For obscure persons, either for birth, or experience in affairs, would have been contemned; and therefore he chose the noblest of those that were presented to him (called after the chief of your tribes), if they were no less worthy than others. For some such, no doubt, there were among their great men, as might be thought fit for this high employment. And they were the fitter, because, being men of quality (as we speak), they were less liable to be corrupted by bribery. From which Moses took care all judges should be so free, that the expressly requires, they should be men having consciousness (Exod. xviii. 21). And Solon did not forget to make this a part of the oath, which every judge in Athens took (which is mentioned at large by Demosthenes: in his oration against Timocrates). ult. &c. I will receive no gift upon the account of my sentence; neither do I myself, nor any body else for me, buy up my knowledge, by any artifice or device whatsoever.

"Made them heads over you." Set them to govern and rule the people (as it is expressed ver. 13), by deciding all causes which were brought before them; as far as they were able to understand them.

Officerstover thousands, &c.] it is a question whether they were commanders over so many families, or persons; as I observed upon Exod. xviii. 25. Hermannus Conringius thinks they were rulers (as the word signifies) over so many fathers of families, understanding by a family that which we now call a household (De Republic. Hebræorum, sect. 18).

Officers among your tribes.] The same great men, in the twenty books of the same book, takes shothrim to have been judges, as well as the rest. His great reason is, because the seventy elders were ordered to be chosen out of them, among others (Numb. xi. 16). Now it is altogether improbable, he thinks, that such a prophetical college as that was, should be chosen out of such mean officers, as the Hebrew doctors make these shothrim to have been. But I hear them, Exod. v. 14; and Numb. xi. 16. And let me here add, that if they were judges (and not attendants upon them), they were very mean ones, being put below the rulers of ten.

16 And I charged your judges at that time, saying, Hear the causes between your brethren, and judge righteously between every man and his brother, and the stranger that is with him.

17 Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man; for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it.

But howsoever this be, it is certain some of these judges had greater authority than others, being entrusted with a larger jurisdiction; and, it is likely, greater abilities were required in those over thousands than in those over tens. As in the great Sanhedrin afterward, the Jews make more things necessary to qualify men for a place in it, than were requisite for those in lower courts; where no man could sit (much less in the highest) unless these seven things were remarkable in him, as Maimonides saith (Halachah Sanhedrin, cap. 4. sect. 7), "wisdom, humility, the fear of God, contempt of riches, love of truth, a good fame; and he was beloved also of others."

Ver. 16. I charged your judges at that time.] As the quality of their persons, and their endowments made them considerable, so they were dignified with the honourable name of shofetim, and were also called elders, which had been a long time a title of honour among the Jews, and in other nations.

Hear the causes between your brethren.] This was a necessary quality in a good cause, to give audience to every one that brought a cause before him; and not to delay any matter, nor to let these words, that it was not lawful to hear any man when his adversary was absent; but both parties were to be there present. And they were also to be heard speak for themselves, if they pleased: which was part of the forenamed oath which Solon ordered all the Athenian judges to take, διακονομάς τοι ἐκτός ἡμῶν καὶ τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ δικαίου, τιμήσωσόν τε καὶ ἐνίκησόν τε. "We will hear the accuser and the defender, both alike."

Judge righteously.] The next thing required of a judge was to be upright and impartial, not considering what a man was, but his cause. This is implied in the following words.

Between every man and his brother.] i. e. Between one Israelite and another.

And the stranger that is with him.] i. e. Between an Israelite and a proselyte: whether he were received into the covenant by circumcision, or no. For of this latter sort there were, no doubt, a great number, amongst that mixed multitude, who came with them out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 38). And while they were in the wilderness, there was not a distinct court for Israelites and proselytes: but their causes were tried in one and the same, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. De Synedriis, cap. 3. n. 1.

Ver. 17. Ye shall not respect persons in judgment;] Not be swayed by particular affection or interest; but judge sincerely, without respect to relation, or any benefit or injury received.

"Ye shall hear the small as well as the great;] Be equally disposed patiently to attend to the cause of a poor man, as of a great; and to do him as speedily and impartial justice (see Lev. xix. 15). And here the Hebrew doctors tell us of some singular practices in their courts, to preserve the dispensation of exact justice: for if one of the contending parties came into them richly clothed, and the other poorly, they would not suffer the one to sit till both were clothed and made as they would suffer one of them to sit, and the other stand; but both of them either sat, or stood. And if they sat, one of them was not permitted to sit higher 18 And I commanded you at that time all the things which ye should do.
19 ¶ And when we departed from Horeb, we went through all that great and terrible wilderness, wherein ye travelled by the way of the mountain of the Amorites, as the Lord our God commanded us; and we came to Kadesh-barnea.
20 And I said unto you, Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the Lord our God doth give unto us.
21 Behold, the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee: go up and possess it, as the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee; fear not, neither be discouraged.

than the other; but they sat by each other's side, &c. (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 19).
Ye shall not be afraid of the face of man.] Courage and undaunted resolution is another necessary qualification in a judge; who must not be overawed by what any man can do unto him; but remember (as it here follows) that he is in God's place.
For the judgment is God's.] God gave them their commission by Moses so that they were his ministers, and acted by his authority: and therefore might be confident he would defend them in the discharge of their office. This shows, that though Moses alone acted by immediate authority from God, yet these always being constituted by him, were to be looked upon as pronouncing sentence in his name; who, after a peculiar manner, was the King and supreme judge of all the people of Israel.
The cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me.] Another quality is humility, in not undertaking to judge of things above their reach. Some think there were certain causes reserved to the cognizance of Moses (as I observed upon Exod. xviii. 12), but the contrary appears by these words, that all manner of causes were brought before these judges; and they, not the people, brought such causes before Moses, as they found too hard for them to determine. So that they, not the person whose cause it was, judged of the difficulty of the cause (see Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 16).

Ver. 18.] As he rightly informed their judges, so he instructed the people also in their duty, before they went from Horeb. &c. There are the judgments which God commanded him to set before them. Exod. xxii. 1, contained in that and in the two following chapters; whereby both they and their judges were to govern themselves.
Ver. 19. When we departed] See Numb. x. 2.
That great and terrible wilderness.] It may well be called great because it extended a great way. For after three days' journey (Numb. x. 19), they settled at Kibroth-hattaavah; which was in this wilderness of Paran. From whence they went to Hazeroth, which is still said to be in this wilderness (Numb. xi. 35). And when they went from thence, they were in the same wilderness (xii. 16), where Kadesh was (xiii. 26, and see xxxii. 18). And this wilderness was very terrible, or dreadful; because there were no inhabitants in it but wild beasts.
By the way of the mountain of the Amorites.] All the way you went towards that mountain (see ver. 7.)
As the Lord our God commanded us: According to the direction which God gave them, by the motion of the cloud that went before them. (see xxiii. 21.) Where they rested at the foot of that mountain, in the wilderness of Paran (Numb. xxii. 2, 25).

Ver. 20.] For this was part of the country which God bestowed upon them for their possession; as appears from Numb. xxxiv. 4, where Kadesh-barnea is mentioned as a frontier place in their south border. And indeed the Amorites, whosoever they found them, were to be expelled; as they had already dispossessed them of the whole kingdom of Sihon, who was king of the Amorites (Numb. xxii. 21, 25, 26).

Ver. 21. Hath set the land before thee:] All the country beyond this mountain (ver. 8).
Go up:] For there was a great ascent to it (Numb. xiii. 17).
And possess it:] Enter upon the possession of it.
As the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee:] According to the promise made by God long ago, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (see ver. 8), which is now renewed in a more certain form.
Pear not, neither be discouraged.] Do not dread either their number or their strength; but trust in the Lord (whose name he repeats four times in these three verses), that he will make good his word.
Ver. 22. Ye came near unto me every one of you:] The heads of every tribe, in the name of the whole congregation, whose desire this was.
We will send men:] Some select persons.
They shall search us out the land:] Give us an account how it lies, and what kind of country it is.
Bring us word again:] Inform us which way to direct our march into it.
Into what cities we shall come:] What cities we shall first attack, to make our way the clearer into the land, which God has charged the men that went to search the land with many other inquiries (Numb. xiii. 18—20), that the people might receive the fullest satisfaction.
Ver. 23. The saying pleased me well:] He thought this a reasonable motion, proceeding only from a prudent caution; whereas, in truth, they were timorous and distrustful of God's promise.
I took twelve men of you:] That every body might be satisfied when they heard the report of their brethren, Numb. xiii. 2—1, &c. and God directed him so to do, as we read there.
Went up into the mountain:] Numb. xiii. 17, 21.
 Came into the valley of Eshcol:] It appears by the relation (Numb. xiii. 21—23), that this was the last place unto which they came when they had ended their search.
Searched it out:] After they had gone through all the quarters of the country.
Ver. 25. They took of the fruit of the land:] Both grapes, pomegranates, and figs (Numb. xiii. 23). It is a conclusion that they did unanimously, and brought along with them a demonstration of it (Numb. xiii. 27), only they added, that they were not able to deal with the inhabitants of it.
CHAPTER I.

26 Notwithstanding ye would not go up, but rebelled against the commandment of the Lord your God:
27 And ye murmured in your tents, and said, Because the Lord hated us, he hath brought us forth out of the land of Egypt, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us.
28 Whither shall we go up? our brethren have discouraged our heart, saying, The people is greater and taller than we; the cities are great and walled up to heaven; and moreover we have seen the sons of the Anakims there.
29 Then I said unto you, Dread not, neither be afraid of them.
30 The Lord your God which goeth before you, he shall fight for you, according to all that he did for you in Egypt before your eyes;
31 And in the wilderness, where thou wast long a time, and sawest not any seed, or fruitful ground, or any water;
32 But which the Lord thy God brought thee out of the land of Egypt, to give it thee, a land flow with milk and honey, as the Lord thy God spake.
33 Then said I unto you, Fear not, stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord your God, which he will shew the Egyptians before your eyes.
34 And he brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, drove out before you the nations, and gave you their land.
35 And the Lord said unto me, Thou art not able to carry them alone: go to the people, and take men of understanding, and such as fear God, and are mighty, and set over them commanders.

Ver. 26.] Who bade you go up and not be afraid (ver. 8. 21). Which was the greater sin, because he had not only brought them to the borders of the land, but convinced them that he had not delivered them with fair promises of a better country than really it was: for they all saw the goodly fruit which it produced; and ought therefore to have believed he would fulfill his word, and give them the possession of it.

Ver. 27. Ye murmured in your tents.] After great lamentations for a whole night together (Numb. xiv. 1).

He hath brought us forth out of the land of Egypt.] Unto which therefore they desired and conspired to return (Numb. xiv. 4).

To deliver us into the hand of the Amorites.] Nothing can be more pernicious (as Grotius here observes) than such a resolution that God doth not love us, but hath a design upon us to destroy us.

Ver. 28. Whither shall we go up?] Moses, I suppose, still pressed them to go up, and take possession of the land; to which they gave him this suppliant answer.

Our brethren have discouraged our heart.] The men that you shall send to the land, discontented by the report they have brought us. Which would not have had that effect upon them, if they had minded one part of it as much as the other, and calmly considered what Caleb and Joshua said, who made no doubt of success.

The people is greater and taller than we.] More numerous, and of far greater stature and strength (Numb. xiii. 28, 33).

The cities are great and walled up to heaven.] The spies only told them, that their "cities were walled, and very great" (Numb. xiii. 28), but their fear and confusion of thoughts augmented the danger of attempting the conquest of them: yet Moses himself thinks good afterward to use the same hyperbole (ix. 1), which is common in the ancient authors. For thus Homer, in Odyss. E. ver. 239, speaks of a fir-tree as high as heaven, i. e. exceeding tall:

—ιδαγέ τι τε οὐρανομισάς.

Many other instances may be seen in Bochartus's Phalag. lib. i. cap. 13.

We have seen the sons of the Anakims there.] See Numb. xiii. 32, 33. Const. L'Empereur will rather have it translated "the sons of the giants," as the LXX. and Onkelos take it. Yet he acknowledges that Anak seems to have been the first parent and propagator of the race of giants after the flood: and, therefore, it may be properly translated as we do (see Annot. in Rimer. Benjamini Tudelensis, p. 136).

Ver. 29. Then I said unto you.] Moses here at large relates what he said unto their fathers upon this occasion; which he doth not mention in the book of Numbers (where we read only of his falling down before God), that he might awaken this generation to a greater confidence in God, and a dread of his judgment.

Dread not, neither be afraid of them.] Do not consider so much how strong they are, as how powerful the Lord your God is, who hath promised you this good land.

Ver. 30. The Lord your God which goeth before you.] In a glorious pillar of cloud and fire. He shall fight for you.] As he had done hitherto (Exod. xiv. 14. xvii. 8. &c.).

According to all that he did for you in Egypt?] Why should you think he is less able to bring you into Canaan, than he was to redeem you from Egypt, where you were oppressed by very powerful enemies?—Ver. 31. And in the wilderness.] Ever since they came from thence through the wilderness of the Red Sea (Exod. xiii. 18), and in the wilderness of Sin (Exod. xvi. 1), and the wilderness of Sinai (Exod. xix. 1, 2), and then through that terrible wilderness of Paran (see above, ver. 19).

Wherefore then wast thou that thou saidst unto me how that the Lord thy God bare thee? The long experience they had of his tender care he had over them (which was as indulgent as that of a kind father towards his only son, when he is a child, whom he carries in his arms), should have made them confident of his gracious providence for the future.

In all the way that ye went.] He made provision for them in the most desolate places; bringing them water out of a rock; sending bread down to them from heaven; defending them from wild beasts, and from their fiercer enemies, &c.

Ver. 32.] He could not prevail with them to trust God; and go up, as he commanded, in his power and might to possess the land. Nor could all that Caleb and Joshua said at all move them (Numb. xiv. 9—20).

Ver. 33.] Who went in the way before you.] Never failed constantly to direct and guide you in your journeys (Exod. xiii. 22).

To see you out a place to pitch your tents in.] But always marked your encampments where they should be (Numb. x. 17).

In fire by night,—and in a cloud by day.] That they might be able to travel by night, as well as by day; which was most convenient in summer-time, when the sun was very scorching in a wilderness where there was no shelter (Exod. xiii. 21. Numb. x. 16. 21).

Ver. 34. The Lord heard the voice of your words.] They not only distrusted God (ver. 32), but murmured against their leaders, and against God, in a mutinous manner; consulting to return into Egypt.
this evil generation see that good land, which I swear to give unto your fathers, 36 So Caleb the son of Jephunneh: he shall see it, and to him will I give the land that he hath trodden upon, and to his children, because he hath wholly followed the Lord.

37 Also the Lord was angry with me for your sakes, saying, Thon also shalt not go in thither.

38 But Joshua the son of Nun which standeth before thee, he shall go in thither: encourage him: for he shall cause Israel to inherit it.

39 Moreover your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, and your children, which in that day had no knowledge between good and evil, they shall go in thither, and unto them will I give it, and they shall possess it.

(Numb. xiv. 1—4). And moreover spake of storving Caleb and Joshua for their good advice (ver. 10).

Wits wrath and aweard.] Which so provoked the Divine Majesty, as to have pronounced what follows; confirming it with an oath (Numb. xiv. 21).

Ver. 35. See Numb. xiv. 21, 28, 29.

Ver. 36. Save Caleb] And Joshua the son of Nun (see xiv. 24, 30, and see below, ver. 35).

He shall see it, and to him will I give the land, &c.] This was as exactly fulfilled as their disbelieving was, Josh. xiv. 9, 12, where the particular portion of land is mentioned which God promised to him, and which Joshua gave him in the mountain where the Anakims dwelt. For such was the wonderful faith and courage of Caleb, that he doubted not to dispossession those whom the rest of the Israelites dreaded as invincible.

Ver. 37. Also the Lord was angry with me.] Not at that time, but afterward; when they came into the wilderness of Zin, to another Kadesh (Numb. xx. 1, 19).

For your sakes.] By occasion of their fresh discontent and mutinous uprising of him (Numb. xx. 2—4), which provoked him so, that he spake unadvisedly with his lips, as the Psalmist observes, Ps. cxvi. 31, 32. This was a high aggravation of their guilt; that they not only undid themselves, but brought upon their own head the honor of their captain and governor, whom they wearied with their tumults and rebellions. Or the meaning may be (which doth not much differ from the account now given), that they murmuring in a tumultuous manner, when they saw the water did not flow out of the rock at the first stroke, he himself also was put into such a commotion, that he began to doubt, and say God would do nothing for such a rebellious people, though he had declared he would. If this be true, he soon recovered himself, and smote the rock again, in confidence God would be as good as his word. But God was so angry at the words he had spoken, that he so far punished him for them, as to deny him entrance into Canaan.

He shall not go in thither.] Which threatening is renewed a little before his death (Numb. xxviii. 13, 14), and he could not get repealed by any entreaties, as we read in this book, iii. 26.

Ver. 38. But Joshua—which standeth before thee, i.e. Waits upon thee.

He shall go in thither.] So God promised, when he, as well as Caleb, endeavoured to put courage into the people to go and possess the land (Numb. xiv. 6, 7, &c. 30).

Encourage him: for he shall cause Israel to inherit it. Not only go thither, and have his portion there, but be the captain of Israel, and conquer the land for them, and divide it among them. This intimation as if Joshua was afraid he might be excluded as well as his master; being extremely troubled, it is likely, that he thought it was a great fruit of his long labours. Therefore God bids Moses encourage his hope and command him to take heart (as we speak), for undoubtedly he should do more than go into Canaan, Which may be the reason why his name is not put into the exception (ver. 35, 36), together with Caleb's; but they are mentioned separately, because there was something peculiar to each of them.

Had no knowledge between good and evil.] And consequently, did not provoke God by their disobedience.

They shall go in thither, &c.] Their innocence moved pity towards them: though children, in some cases, were cut off for their fathers' sins.

Ver. 40. But as for you, turn ye,] From the land of Canaan; to which they were not permitted to go.

Take your journey into the wilderness,] And get you back again into the wilderness, out of which I have brought you (Numb. xiv. 25).

By the way of the Red Sea.] Thus they had their desire, in some part, of returning into Egypt (Numb. xiv. 4), which was not granted (as the Red Sea commanded).

Ver. 41. We have sinned.] They repented that then was too late to do them any good (see Numb. xiv. 40.

We will go up and fight.] Now they resolve to encounter those enemies of whom they were before so afraid, as to speak of storing those who exhibited them not fear them (Numb. xiv. 9, 10).

When ye had girded on every man his weapons of war, &c.] They not only made a stout resolution, but actually prepared themselves for the onset: as if there were no difficulty in that, which a little before they dreaded to think of. So De Dieu translates the last words, "Ye thought it an easy matter to ascend the hill," or, ye despaired going up the mountain; in our language, I made nothing of it.

Ver. 42. Go not up.] See Numb. xiv. 41, 42.

Neither go up in thither.] Much less think of fighting.

For I am not among you.] By my powerful presence to subdue your enemies, or to defend you from them (so the phrase is often used): for the ark of the covenant, the token of God's presence, did not go with them (Numb. xiv. 44).

Lest ye be smitten.] Which would be a far greater disgrace than marching away from them.

Ver. 43. So I spoke.] See Numb. xiv. 42, 43.

Ye would not hear.] No more than before; when he bade them go up.
44 And the Amorites, which dwelt in that mountain, came out against you, and chased you, as bees do, and destroyed you in Seir, even unto Hormah.

45 And ye returned and wept before the LORD;

But rebelled against the commandment of the LORD:] For now it was against his will, as before it was his will, that they should go up. Who rebelled against the commandment of the Lord, and was corrected by the commandment of the Lord. They would venture against the express command of God, which was the highest presumption.

Ver. 44. The Amorites—came out against you.] As soon as they saw the Israelites ascend to assault them they came down upon them (Numb. xiv. 45).

Chased you, as bees do.] Which pursue those that disturb their hives in great swarms, and with great fury (Ps. cxviii. 12). For though bees have very small bodies, yet they have great spirits, and a vast force, as Bochart observes in many instances, to make out the aptness of this comparison, in his Hierozoic, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 10.

Destroyed you in Seir.] It seems they fled towards the part of Idumea where Mount Seir was; which they afterward compassed many days (li. 1), when they removed from Kadesh-barnae. And there some of them fell by the sword of the Amorites, who were the fiercest of all the people of Canaan, and might set on that account, be well compared to bees, who cease not their pursuit till they have fixed their stings.

Even unto Hormah.] See Numb. xiv. 45.

Ver. 45. Ye returned.] After the Amorites retreated. Wept before the Lord.] Beseeching him to go along with you, and assist you to conquer the land. But the Lord would not hearken to your voice.] To consent that they should now go and possess the promised land, or stay near to it; but remained fixed in his resolution, that they should go back again, but the Lord would not hearken to your voice, nor give ear unto you.

46 So ye abode in Kadesh many days, according unto the days that ye abode there.

CHAP. II.

1 The story is continued, that they were not to meddle with the Edomites, 9 nor with the Moabites, 17 nor with the Ammonites, 24 but Sihon the Amorite was subdued by them.

1 Then we turned, and took our journey into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea, as the Lord spake unto me: and we compassed mount Seir many days.

2 And the Lord spake unto me, saying,

3 Ye have compassed this mountain long enough: turn you northward.

4 And command thou the people, saying, Ye till they came over the brook Zered (ver. 14). For when they were at Ezion-Gaber (which was farthest from Canaan), they were, as I said, upon the borders of Edom; and so they were when they came back again, seven-and-thirty years after at Mount Hor (Numb. xx. 23. xxxi. 4). But this must not be understood, as if all the stations mentioned Numb. xxxii. after they left Kadesh-barnae till they came hither again, were near to the country of Edom; some of them might be remote, though they all lay in that wilderness, which reached from one end of Idumea to the other.

Ver. 2. The Lord spake unto me.] This was in the end of the thirty-ninth year after their coming out of Egypt; when they had spent thirty-seven years going to and fro since their departure from Kadesh-barnae. In all which time he gives us no account what passed either in the foregoing book, or in this: but only sets down the places of their abode, as I observed in the thirty-third of Numbers.

Ver. 3. Ye have compassed this mountain] i.e. The mountainous country of Edom, mentioned ver. 1.

Vol. 1. 95 are to pass through the coast of your brethren the children of Esau, which dwell in Seir; and they shall be afraid of you: take ye good heed unto yourselves therefore:
5 Meddle not with them; for I will not give you of their land, no, not so much as a foot breadth; because I have given mount Seir unto Esan for a possession.
6 Ye shall buy meat of them for money, that ye may eat; and ye shall also buy water of them for money, that ye may drink.
7 For the Lord thy God hath blessed thee in all the works of thy hand: he knoweth thy walking through this great wilderness: these forty years the Lord thy God hath been with thee; thou hast lacked nothing.

Turn you northward.] From Ezion-Gaber, which was in the south, towards the north, that is, directly towards the land of Canaan.

Ver. 4. Ye are to pass through the coast of your brethren] For they went from Ezion-Gaber to Kadesh (Num. xx. 1), and from thence to Mount Hor (ver. 22, which was in the edge of the land of Edom, Num. xxxiii. 47), and from thence they travelled to compass the land of Edom (xxi. 4), i.e. the eastern quarter of it. So that though they did not pass through the coast of Edom, as we translate it, yet they passed by it, and very near unto it: as the particle both frequently signifies (Gen. xxxvii. 13. Josh. v. 13. I Sam. xxix. 1). Though they may be truly said to "pass through their coast," if thereby we understand their border, or the confines of their country.

They shall be afraid of you.] Last, wanting a settlement, the Israelites should seize upon their country. Accordingly we find, they raised all the force they could make to oppose them, Num. xx. 20.

Take ye good heed unto yourselves.] Let not that encourage you to assault them.

Ver. 5. Meddle not with them.] Make not the least attempt upon them.

Not so much as a foot breadth; i.e. Not the smallest portion.

Because I have given mount Seir unto Esau] So Joshua saith expressly, Josh. xxiv. 4, wherein he made good the blessing of Isaac (Gen. xxvii. 39).

Ver. 6.] If you have a mind to any provision that their country affords, you shall not take it, but pass by it; as they did their very water (ver. 29), which was a scarce thing in those dry countries. And so the Israelites offered to do, when they treated with them about a passage through their country (Num. xx. 19).

Ver. 7. For the Lord thy God hath blessed thee.] Or though the Lord hath blessed thee, &c. that is, though there was no need of it, God having abundantly provided you with all things necessary. But if we follow our translation, the sense is plain: "You have wherewith to buy of them what you want or desire; therefore do not take it away by force."

He knoweth thy walking.] Had directed and prospered thee (as the word knoweth signifies in many places, Ps. i. 6. xxxi. 7), in thy travels through a dangerous wilderness.

Thou hast lacked nothing.] He had mercifully provided for them so constantly, that he let them want nothing necessary for their support. This was the sum of the argument why they should not molest the Edomites, nor take any thing by stealth from them, because they were in no need; and God had given that country to the children of Esau, as he intended to give Canaan to the Israelites.

8 And when we passed by from our brethren the children of Esau, which dwell in Seir, through the way of the plain from Elath, and from Ezion-gaber, we turned and passed by the way of the wilderness of Moab.

9 And the Lord said unto me, Distress not the Moabites, neither contend with them in battle: for I will not give thee of their land for a possession; because I have given Ar unto the children of Lot for a possession.

10 The Emims dwell therein in times past, a people great, and many, and tall, as the Anakims;
11 Which also were accounted giants, as the Anakims; but the Moabites call them Emims.
12 The Horims also dwelt in Seir beforetime;

Their being in the wilderness forty years is mentioned also viii. 2, xxix. 5, besides other places of Scripture. For, from the fifteenth day of the first month, in which their fathers came out of Egypt (Num. xxxiii. 5) to the tenth day of the same month in which they went over Jordan into Canaan (Josh. iv. 19), there were but five days wanting of complete forty years. I cannot but here note also, that this is one of those places where Onkelos makes Menmra, i.e. Word of Jehovah, which can signify nothing but a Divine person: for thus he translates these words, "The Word of the Lord thy God hath been thy helper; thou hast not wanted any thing any thing."

Ver. 8. Of the plain.] i.e. Through the wilderness of Zin.

From Elath, and from Ezion-gaber.] Two places upon the Red Sea; the last of which [Ezion-Gaber] signifies as much as the spine, or backbone of a man. So called, because there were great ragged rocks in that port (as Bochart observes), like those at Dyrachium in Macedonia; which had its name also from thence (lib. 1. Canaan, cap. 44).

We turned.] After they were denied passage through their country, and had gone through those stations mentioned, Num. xxxiii. 41, 42, &c.

Passed—the wilderness of Moab.] See Num. xxi. 11. Going by the east side of their country (Judges xii. 18).

Ver. 9. Distress not the Moabites.] He would not have them force their way through his country; because they were not taken, but passed by them, as the king of Edom had done (Judges xii. 17). For their country now was but small, since Sihon king of the Amorites had taken from them all the best of it, which lay between Arnon and Jabbok; of which the Israelites had possessed themselves by the conquest of Sihon. So that they had only that portion remaining which lay upon the Dead Sea; which David, in advertizing his triumph, says,

I will not give thee of their land.] No more than of Edom (ver. 5).

Because I have given Ar.] It is likely the capital city gave name to the whole country about it. At least Ar (which was the chief city of Moab, Num. xxi. 13, 28;) is put here for all the land of Moab; as Mount Seir for all the land of Edom (ver. 1).

Unto the children of Lot.] Though the Moabites were now a wicked people; yet for their pious ancestor’s sake, from whom they were descended, God would not have them dispossessed.

Ver. 10. The Emims dwell there.] A terrible people, as the very name imports, both for their number, and for the dread they had of being of a large size, like Anakims (see Gen. xiv. 5).

Ver. 11. Which also were accounted giants, as the but the children of Esau succeeded them, when they had destroyed them from before them, and dwelt in their stead; as Israel did unto the land of his possession, which the Lord gave unto them.

13 Now rise up, said I, and get you over the brook Zered. And we went over the brook Zered.

14 And the space in which we came from Kadesh-barnea, until we came over the brook Zered, was thirty and eight years; until all the generation of the men of war were wasted out from among the host, as the Lord spake unto them.

15 For indeed the hand of the Lord was against them, to destroy them from among the host, until they were consumed.

16 ¶ So it came to pass, when all the men of Amalekins, &c. Which seems to have been their name; or else Rephaim: but to distinguish them from others of that name in Canaan, the Moabites called them Emims.

Ver. 12. The Horims also dwelt in Seir.] They were the ancient inhabitants of Mount Seir; as the Emims were of the country of Moab (Gen. xiv. 6, xxxvi. 20). But the children of Esau succeeded them.] Planed themselves in that mountain.

When they had destroyed them.] When the children of Esau expelled the Horites, or the children of Lot the Emims, is nowhere recorded; nor who were their leaders in these expeditions. But they seem to be here remembered, as an encouragement to the Israelites to hope that they might drive out the inhabitants of Canaan (who were not stronger than these), as they had already driven the Amorites out of the country of Sihon, as it here follows.

As Israel did unto the land of his possession.] Some have argued from hence, that this book was not written by Moses, but by somebody else, after they had got possession of the land of Canaan. But it is manifest, this may relate to what they had done already in dispersing Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og king of Bashan of their country: which, it is expressly said, Moses had given for a possession to the tribe of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, and that by God’s direction, Numb. xxxii. 33, xxxiv. 14, 15, and in this book, xxxiv. 8. This hath been observed by many; particularly by Huetius, in his Demonstratio Evangelica, proposit. iv. cap. 11. n. 15.

Ver. 13. The brook Zered.] Which elsewhere we translate “the valley of Zered” (see Num. xxi. 19).

Ver. 14. The space was—thirty and eight years:.] For it is evident, by the story in Numbers, that they came to Kadesh-barnea about the fourth month of the second year after they came out of Egypt (see upon Numb. xii. 16). And if we suppose that they removed from hence in the seventh or eighth month of that year, it is certain that they could not come out of this brook till the seventh or eighth month of the fourth year. For Aaron died at Mount Hor on the first day of the fifth month of this year; and we must allow two or three months’ time, for all that followed both then and this, viz. the conquest of king Arad. and of Sihon, and Og, &c.

The generation of the men of war] So they were called, who were above twenty years old (Numb. i. 3).

Were wasted] Utterly consumed, so that not one of them was left (Numb. xxxvi. 64, 65).
22 As he did to the children of Esau, which dwelt in Seir, when he destroyed the Horims from before them; and they succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead even unto this day:

23 And the Avims which dwelt in Hazerim, even unto Azzah, the Caphtorims, which came forth out of Caphtor, destroyed them, and dwelt in their stead.

24 ¶ Rise ye up, take your journey, and pass over the river Arnon: behold, I have given into thine hand Sihon the Amorite, king of Heshbon, and his land: begin to possess it, and contend with him in battle.

25 This day will I begin to put the dread of thee and the fear of thee upon the nations that are under the whole heaven, who shall hear report of thee, and shall tremble, and be in anguish because of thee.

26 ¶ And I sent messengers out of the wilderness of Kedemoth unto Sihon king of Heshbon with words of peace, saying, 27 Let me pass through thy land: I will go along by the highway, I will neither turn unto the right hand nor to the left.

28 Thou shalt sell me meat for money, that I may eat; and give me water for money, that I may drink: only I will pass through on my feet;

29 (As the children of Esau which dwell in Seir, and the Moabites which dwell in Ar, did unto me;) until I shall pass over Jordan into the land which the Lord our God giveth us.

30 But Sihon king of Heshbon would not let us pass by him: for the Lord thy God hardened his spirit, and made his heart obstinate, that he might deliver him into thy hand, as appeareth this day.

31 And the Lord said unto me, Behold, I have begun to give Sihon and his land before Unto Sihon—words of peace.] A friendly message, desiring there might be no quarrel between him and the Israelites, who desired nothing but the common offices of humanity.

32 Ver. 27. Let me pass through thy land.] Which was the direct way from the lands of Jordan.

33 I will go along by the highroads.] Not turning into the fields or vineyards, as it is expressed, Numb. xxii. 32. In the Hebrew the word is doubled, bederek, bederek, by the way, by the way; which seems to be a vehement affirmation, to assure them they would not stir out of the highway.

34 If will neither turn unto the right hand, nor to the left.] A common word of the Lord—side out of the way, (called the king's highway), which was free for all people.

35 Ver. 28. Thou shalt sell me meat for money, &c.] They offered to pay for whatsoever they wanted; which is included in meat and drink.

36 Only I will pass through on my feet.] Barely have a passage through his country.

37 Ver. 29. As the children of Esau] He doth not mean that they granted Israel a passage through their country; but that they did not deny to sell them meat and drink for their money, as they passed by their coasts.

38 Until I shall pass over Jordan.] This was said to move Sihon to consent to their desire, by letting him understand they intended nothing against his country; being secure of a settlement in the land of Canaan, unto which they prayed him to let them pass quietly.

39 Ver. 30. But Sihon—would not let us pass by him.] Refused to agree to this reasonable demand.

40 For the Lord thy God hardened his spirit, and made his heart obstinate, &c.] Gave him over to his own inflexibility and obstinacy upon violent courses; from which God did not divert him (because he intended to destroy him), but rather ordered things so, that his mind should be enraged and disturbed, and so unable to consider things prudently, and discern what belonged to his peace; which is the utmost that can be meant by hardening his spirit, and making his heart obstinate. Which, as it is a sin, cannot be ascribed unto God: but, as it is a punishment, might justly be inflicted by him upon Sihon, for his former sins.

41 Ver. 31. I have begun to give Sihon and his land.] This was said when Moses saw him coming out to battle against them (as it here follows in the next verse), at which time he is said to begin to give them his country, because he had absolutely resolved it;
CHAPTER III.

1 Then we turned, and went up the way to Bashan: and Og the king of Bashan came out against us, he and all his people, to battle at Edrei.

2 And the Lord said unto me, Fear him not: for I will deliver him, and all his people, and his land, into thy hand; and thou shalt do unto him as thou didst unto Sihon king of the Amorites, which dwelt at Heshbon.

3 So the Lord our God delivered into our hands Og also, the king of Bashan, and all his people: and we smote him until none was left to him remaining.

4 And we took all his cities at that time, there was not a city which we took not from them, three score cities, all the region of Argo, the kingdom of Og in Bashan.

5 All these cities were fenced with high walls, gates, and bars: beside unwalled towns a great many.

6 And we utterly destroyed them, as we did unto Sihon king of Heshbon, utterly destroy-

Ver. 4. [Three score cities.] See Numb. xxxii. 41. All the region of Argo.] A small province lying between Jordan and the mountains of Gilead, a little above the sea of Tiberias; which region was afterward called Trachonitis, from the asperity of the mountains.

The kingdom of Og in Bashan.] Belonging to his kingdom in Bashan (ver. 13, and 1 Kings iv. 13).

Ver. 5. [So they are described] 1 Kings iv. 13.

32 Then Sihon came out against us, he and all his people, to fight at Jahaz.

33 And the Lord our God delivered him before us; and we smote him, and his sons, and all his people.

and, it is probable, so confounded his forces, that they were as good as already conquered.

Begin to possess.] In the same sense he bids Moses "begin to possess;" i.e. prepare to take possession of it (see iii. 9).

Ver. 32.] See Numb. xxi. 23.

Ver. 33.] They won the field, and killed him, his sons, and all that came out to fight with them. And R. Solomon saith his sons were like himself, very great men.

Ver. 34. [We took all his cities at that time.] After this victory they took his whole country, as is related Numb. xii. 24, 25, and the cities belonging to it are mentioned xxxii. 34, 35, &c.

And utterly destroyed the men, &c.] They being part of those wicked people the Amorites; whom God had condemned to utter destruction: for the Amorites came out of Canaan, and took this country from the Moabites and the children of Ammon.

Ver. 35.] They had the Divine warrant for this, no doubt, as they had for the extermination of the people.

Ver. 36. [From Aror, which is by the brink of the river of Arnon.] This river divided Moab from the kingdom of Sihon (Numb. xxi. 13. 24), upon which the city of Aror stood; which was now in the possession of Sihon, though belonging formerly to the Moabites.
...ing the men, women, and children, of every city.

7 But all the cattle, and the spoil of the cities, we took for a prey to ourselves.

8 And we took at that time out of the hand of the two kings of the Amorites the land that was on this side Jordan, from the river of Arnon unto Mount Hermon;

9 (Which Hermon the Sidonians call Sirion; and the Amorites call it Shenir;)

The curse of God; being part of the seven nations of Canaan, devoted to destruction (see ii. 34).

Ver. 7. As they had done before, when they destroyed Sihon and his people (ii. 35).

Ver. 8. We took—the land that was on this side Jordan.] Which was given to the two tribes of Reuben and Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh (ver. 12, 13). If men were not blinded with prejudice, they could not but see from hence, that the word beuche, in the first verse of this book, is rightly translated on this side: for beyond Jordan (as they would have it signify) in the land of Canaan, these two kings had no possessions; nor did Moses make any conquest there.

From the river of Arnon unto Mount Hermon.] This was the bounds of their country on the south, and Hermon, which was one of the mountains of Gilead (where it joins to Libanus), was their bound on the north.

Ver. 9. Which Hermon the Sidonians call Sirion.] And so it is called in Ps. xxix. 6, and joined with Lebanon: for it was as much a part of Lebanon as of Gilead, these two mountains there meeting together. Whence Jeremias calls Gilead the head of Lebanon (xxviii. 6). Lebanon begins where Gilead ends. The Amorites call it Shenir.] And so it is called Ezek. xxvii. 5, and had this name, as Bochart conjectures, from the multitude of wild cats which were in this mountain: for the Arabsians called that creature sinaur or sinar (see Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 14).

Ver. 10. All the cities of the plain.] All the flat country which the LXX. thought was called Mesor; for they retain here that Hebrew word.

All Gilead,] i. e. All that part of it which belonged to him; which was but half as I observed before, ii. 36.

All Bashan,] That part of his country which was properly and peculiarly called Bashan; which being the most rich and fertile (as the word signifies), gave denomination to his whole kingdom.

Unto Salchah and Edrei.] The former of these is mentioned Josh. xiii. 11 (just as it is here), as the bounds of Bashan towards Mount Hermon, or Lebanon: so Chytrzeus, “A town in Bashan in the mountains of Libanus near to Machtatt.” And Edrei was the place where they fought with Og, and overthrew him (Num. xxxi. 23).

Ver. 11. For only Og—remained of the remnant of giants.] Or of the Rehovim, a very ancient people in that country (Gen. xiv. 5), who were either descended from the Amorites, or mingled with them; and Og was the very last of them; so that he and his kingdom was destroyed, none of them remained.

His bedstead was—of iron.] Which was no unusual thing in ancient days, though far later than this. For Thucydides says, that when the Thobans took Plateae, they made beds of the brass and iron they found there; which they dedicated to Juno. And beds of silver and gold are mentioned by divers authors, as Huetius observes in his Demonstr. Evangel. propos. iv. cap. 11. n. 7.

10 All the cities of the plain, and all Gilead, and all Bashan, unto Salchah and Edrei, cities of the kingdom of Og in Bashan.

11 For only Og king of Bashan remained of the remnant of giants; behold, his bedstead was a bedstead of iron; is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon? nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits the breadth of it, after the cubit of a man.

12 And this land, which we possessed at that... time, from Aroer, which is by the river Arnon, and half mount Gilead, and the cities thereof, gave I unto the Reubenites and to the Gadites.

13 And the rest of Gilead, and all Bashan, being the kingdom of Og, gave I unto the half tribe of Manasseh; all the region of Argob, with all Bashan, which was called the land of giants.

24 Jair the son of Manasseh took all the country of Argob unto the coast of Geshuri and Maachath; and called them after his own name, Bashan-havoth-jair, unto this day.

15 And I gave Gilead unto Machir.

16 And unto the Reubenites and unto the Gadites I gave from Gilead even unto the river Arnon half the valley, and the border even unto the river Jabbok, which is the border of the children of Ammon;

17 The plain also, and Jordan, and the coast thereof, from Chinnereth even unto the sea of the plain, even the salt sea, under Ashdoth-pisgah eastward.

18 ¶ And I commanded you at that time, saying, The Lord your God hath given you this land to possess it: ye shall pass over armed before your brethren the children of Israel, all that are meet for the war.

Ver. 15. I gave Gilead] All that was not possessed by the Gadites.

Unto Machir.] To the posterity of Machir (Numb. xxxii. 40).

Ver. 16. Unto the Reubenites, and unto the Gadites] Here is a more exact description of that part of the country, which was given to the other two tribes.

I gave from Gilead] Half of which, as I observed, was given to the Gadites (ver. 12).

Even unto the river Arnon] Which was the bounds of the country towards Moab (see ii. 36).

Half the valley.] The same word in the Hebrew language, signifies both a valley and a brook or river; and being translated in the foregoing words, the river, it should, be so here likewise, half the river; that is, to the middle of the river Arnon; by which the bounds of their country are most exactly set. And thus not only the LXX. and the Vulgar, but Onkelos also translates it, "the middle of the torrent;" yea, we ourselves also in the twelfth of Josh. ii. where there are the same words, which in the Hebrew run thus, "unto the river Arnon, the midst of the river;" where the city of Aroer stood, encompassed by the river, as I observed in the foregoing chapter, ver. 36.

And the border] Something is understood, viz. west (as the phrase is Josh. xv. 6, 7, &c.) or reached, or some such word. Or the meaning must be, the country bordering on the river.

Unto the river Jabbok] This river was the other boundary of the country.

Ver. 17. The plain also, and Jordan.] The flat country towards the river Jordan: which was the western bounds of this country of Sihon; as the river Arnon was the southern, and the river Jabbok the northern; the country of the children of Ammon being on the east.

The coast thereof, from Chinnereth] The word thereof is not in the Hebrew: therefore these words may be better rendered "the coast of Chinnereth." Called the Sea of Chinnereth," Josh. xii. 33. 27.

It lying upon a country and a city called by that name (Josh. xi. 2. xix. 55), which gave the name to this sea, called in a New Testament, "the Sea of Galilee," and "the Sea of Genesareth," and at last "the Sea of Tiberias;" in honour of the emperor Tiberius (see upon Numb. xxxiv. 11).

Even unto the salt sea.] The Dead Sea, as it is called in other places; which, before the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah, had been a most pleasant plain.

Under Ashdoth-pisgah.] The name of a city in this country (Josh. xiii. 20).

Eastward.] Which lay east of the Salt Sea and Jordan; which was the western bounds, as I said, of this country.

Ver. 18. I commanded you at that time.] That is he gave this charge to the two tribes of Reuben and

lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 3), of which no man can doubt who is now resolved to disbelieve all the world. In his Demonstratio Evangelica also he observes, that Homer makes Tityon, when he was dead, to have lain stretched out upon (not nine cubits, but) nine acres of ground:

\[\text{\textit{τρία και εξάρη το πέλαγος.}}\]

Which hyperbole may excuse the Jewish rabbins, when they say that Og was nine cubits long when he lay in his cradle (see propos. iv. cap. 8. n. 4).

Ver. 12. By the river Arnon.] See ii. 36.

Half mount Gilead—gave I unto the Reubenites and to the Gadites.] See Numb. xxxii. 34, 35, &c., but especially Josh. xii. 15, &c., where he distinctly relates what portion of this country was given to the Reubenites; and ver. 23, 24, &c., what was given to the Gadites. And it appears, that none of Gilead belonged to the Reubenites: but the Gadites had one half of it, as the Manassites had the other.

Ver. 13. The rest of Gilead.] Which was not given to the Gadites.

All Bashan, being the kingdom of Og.] That is, all that was taken from Og, of which he was king.

All the region of Argo.] It is repeated again, lest any one should think that Argo, which was a distinct province in that kingdom, was not given to them by this grant (see ver. 4).

Called the land of giants.] Where the Replains formerly inhabited; of whom Og was the last (see Gen. xiv. 5, exx. 12, Josh. xii. 12.).

Jair the son of Manasseh took all the country of Argo] This is one reason why he gave this country to them (see Numb. xxxii. 41).

Geshuri and Maachath.] We had no mention of these places before; which were in the northern part of this country, as appears from Josh. xii. 4, 5, xiii. 11. But the people of these places they could not expel (Josh. xiii. 12).

Called them after his own name.] Numb. xxxii. 4.

Unto this day.] From whence, likewise, cavils are raised against Moses being the author of this book: when the most that can be concluded from hence is, that, upon the revising of these books by Ezra, he put in these words to certify the reader, that still they retained this name; as somebody, no doubt, added this history of Moses' death at the end of this book.

This the greatest defenders of the authority of these books, as written by Moses himself, make no scruple to allow; particularly Huetius, and since him Hermannus Witzius, in his Miscellanea Sacra, lib. 1. cap. 14. sect. 47. But there is no necessity to yield so much; for Moses might say this himself, though it was not long before he wrote this book. For so the holy writers do sometimes mention places, which had their name but newly given them, from a particular fact, that posterity might know the original of it (see Acts i. 19).
19 But your wives, and your little ones, and your cattle, (for I know that ye have much cattle,) shall abide in your cities which I have given you;

20 Until the Lord hath given rest unto your brethren, as well as unto you, and until they also possess the land which the Lord your God hath given them beyond Jordan: and then shall ye return every man unto his possession, which I have given you.

21 ¶ And I commanded Joshua at that time, saying, Thine eyes have seen all that the Lord your God hath done unto these two kings; so shall the Lord do unto all the kingdoms whither thou passest.

22 Ye shall not fear them: for the Lord your God he shall fight for you.

23 And I besought the Lord at that time, saying,

24 O Lord God, thou hast begun to shew thy servant thy greatness, and thy mighty hand: for God is there in heaven or in earth, that can do according to thy works, and according to thy might?

25 I pray thee, let me go over, and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon.

26 But the Lord was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me; and the Lord said unto me, Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter.

27 Get thee up into the top of Pisgah, and lift up thine eyes westward, and northward, and southward, and eastward, and behold it with thine eyes: for thou shalt not go over this Jordan.

28 But charge Joshua, and encourage him, and strengthen him: for he shall go over before this people, and he shall cause them to inherit the land which thou shalt see.

29 So we abode in the valley over against Beth-peor.

Ver. 36. The Lord was wroth: See i. 37. And would not hear me: Refused to grant my petition.

Speak no more unto me of this matter: This suggests that Moses renewed his petition, after the first denial; and more earnestly begged this favour of God: which he could not obtain; but was enjoined silence. This argues great displeasure; and is mentioned by him as an admonition to the Israelites, to be fearful to offend the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 27. Get thee up into the top of Pisgah, See what I have noted upon Numb. xxvii. 13. Lift up thine eyes westward, &c.: Take a full view of the country in all the quarters of it; which might be seen from the top of this mountain, which was called Nebo (see xxiv. 1-3).

28 But charge Joshua, &c.: Bid him not doubt that I will bring my people thither under his conduct, though I deny thee entrance into it.

29 It is likely that there was a temple built to Baal-Peor, which fronted this valley; for so Beth signifies, a house or temple of Peer. Which gave the name to a city wherein it stood; which was part of the inheritance of the Reubenites (Josh. xiii. 20).

In this valley Moses was buried, xxxiv. 6, where he made this most excellent exhortation to all the people.
CHAPTER IV.

1 An exhortation to obedience. 41 Moses appelleth the three cities of refuge on that side Jordan.

1 Now therefore hearken, 0 Israel, unto the statutes and unto the judgments, which I teach you, for to do them, that ye may live, and go in and possess the land which the Lord God of your fathers giveth you.

2 Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it, that ye may keep the commandments of the Lord your God which I command you.

3 Your eyes have seen what the Lord did because of Baal-peor: for all the men that followed Baal-peor, the Lord thy God hath destroyed them from among you.

4 But ye that did cleave unto the Lord your God are alive every one of you this day.

5 Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the Lord my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it.

6 Keep therefore and do them; for this is the sum of the thing, that ye may be thrifty, and that it may well with you in the land which ye go to possess.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. Hearken.] Having commemorated several benefits which God had bestowed upon them, since their coming out of Egypt, and the giving of the law at Mount Sinai, with several severe punishments which he had inflicted on them for their disobedience to it, Moses proceeds now to exhort them earnestly to the observance of it.

Unto the statutes.] These seem to be such laws as concerned the worship of God; the books of the law.

And unto the judgments.] And then these were such as concerned their dealings one with another, Which two words comprehend all that is signified by testimonies and precepts also, in other places.

Which I teach you.] Which he was about to set before them; and press upon their practice.

Ver. 2. Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it.] This is thought by some to signify, that they should not make the least alteration in the laws he had given them, about the rites of Divine worship, and abstinence from several meats, and such like things; which were distinctive marks, whereby they were separated from other nations to be a peculiar people to him. Thus Chasikuni interprets these words, "Thou shalt not add fear, upon the fear of the blessed God." That is, any other worship to the Divine worship prescribed by these laws, nor diminish that worship: which interpretation seems to be warranted, by what follows: "Thy eyes have seen what the Lord thy God did, because of Baal-peor." But in the words before going (which introduce these), judgments being mentioned as well as statutes, there must be a larger sense of this injunction, which relates to all the laws of God: and the meaning seems to be, Ye shall not transgress any of these precepts, either by doing any thing contrary to them, which was to add; or omitting any thing which they required, which was to diminish. Thus Grotius interprets it, upon 2 Cor. xi. 24. Addere ad legem est facere quod lex vetat, diminuere est omittere quod lex jubet. But which way ever we take it, nothing is more certain than that this prohibition preserved these books from any alteration, since the time they were written: for the whole body of the people acknowledging their Divine authority, none of them dared to change any thing, either by addition or diminution. Of which there is a wonderful instance in the people that came out of Assyria (in the room of the Israelites, who were transported thither), to inhabit the country of Samaria; who receiving this law, their posterity have kept it all along to this day, as uncorrupted as the Jews themselves have done; although they were their mortal enemies, and have been exposed to all the changes and revolutions that can befall a nation during the interval of two thousand and four hundred years. Thus the most learned Dr. Alix observes, in his Reflections upon the last Four Books of Moses, p. 141. And I do not see, why the perfection of the Scripture, without the oral law of the Jews, should not be thought to be established by these words, as another learned person (J. Wagenseil) understands them, in his Confut. Carminis Lipmanni, p. 555. Yet, as the forenamed Chasikuni notes, it does not seem reasonable to conclude from hence, that they were prohibited to add any constitutions as a hedge and fence to the law; or as an explication of it, when the sense was doubtful (see Dr. Thorndike, in his Rites of the Church in a Christian State, p. 150, &c).

That ye may keep the commandments of the Lord your God.] This justifies the explication I gave of the foregoing words, as respecting all God's laws; and xii. 33, makes it more plain. And, indeed, God being their lawgiver, it was the highest presumption to make any alteration in any of his laws.

Ver. 3. Your eyes have seen what the Lord did because of Baal-Peor, &c.] How he cut off twenty-four thousand by a plague, and by the hand of justice, who had been guilty of idolatry by the enticements of the Midianitish women (Numb. xxvi. 5, 9). Which seems to be a reason, why they should take a special care about the worship of God; that nothing was done contrary to the laws he had ordained concerning it.

The Lord thy God hath destroyed them.] The judges put to death all those that they knew to be guilty; and the hand of God found out all the rest: so that there was not a man of them left, who was not swept away by the pestilence.

Ver. 4. But ye that did cleave unto the Lord!] Did not depart from this worship, but bewailed the apostasy of some of their brethren (Numb. xxxv. 6).

Are afore.] A singular providence watched over them, to preserve them in such good health, that not one in so many thousands was dead since that time. Nor in the war with the Midianites, wherein they slew all the males, did they lose so much as one man (Numb. xxxi. 7, 49).

Ver. 5. I have taught you statutes.] See ver. 1. Even as the Lord my God commanded me.] Sincerely and uprightly, without adding any thing of myself, or diminishing any thing that he said.

That ye should do so in the land.] To be the rule of your life, when ye come into the land of Canaan.
your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people.

7 For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the Lord our God is in all things that we call upon him for?

8 And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as this law, which I set before you this day?

Ver. 6. Keep therefore and do them:] It is your interest to observe them, as you will soon find by experience; which will teach you, that it is not only the wisest course in itself, but will get you the reputation of being a wise people among all your neighbours.

Which shall hear all these statutes:] There being mention before (ver. 1. 5) of judgments as well as statutes, and here only of the latter, Abarbinel thence infers, That even those laws which depended wholly upon the will and pleasure of God, and for which they could give no reason (for such they understood by chukkim), would procure them very good honour, if they were carefully observed. For the nations there knew how wonderfully they prospered, would be apt to impute to these extraordinary prescriptions which they followed. Just, saith he, as a physician, who cures desperate diseases, by some small triling remedies (as they seem to others), is highly applauded for the profoundness of his knowledge and wisdom. But Maimonides takes this word statutes to comprehend all the laws of God; and undertakes to show that all the six hundred and thirteen precepts have a wise end in them, for the profit and benefit of those that observe them; either to beget some wholesome opinion in their mind, or to pull out some perverse one; either to institute some good order, or to take away iniquity, &c. (see More Nevochim, par. ii. cap. 31).

Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people:] Who continued in safety, liberty, and prosperity, abounding with all manner of blessings, while they continued all to go up to worship one God sincerely at one place, at certain set times, as if the whole nation was but one family. All the rest of their laws, also, were addressed to the people, both as to the public and private use, being, as it were, the prudent advice of a father to his children, to keep their persons, and for the security of their families, and their posterity.

Moses, the Elders of the nation, and the Prophets, in the Targum, lib. i. cap. 10, thus extols this nation:

Moses, the Elders, the Prophets, all, in essence, call thee his son, and may our Lord, who filleth all with wisdom, and giveth thee the way of understanding, bestow upon thee a long life, and a prosperous acquaintance with all things.

"The Chaldeans and the Hebrews (who came from Chaldea) are the only wise people, who worship God, the Eternal King, in a pure manner." And the oracle of Apollo Charius, recorded by Macrobius, lib. i. Sat. cap. 18, is no less remarkable:

θεου· των πάντων έκαστον θεόν ιθειν γελών.

"Acknowledge Jao (so they pronounced the name Jehovah) to be the highest God of all." For though many manuscripts have the word being called έλαθον (nobody can tell why); yet Diodorus Siculus acknowledges ιθειν to be the God, from whom Moses pretended to have his laws, i. e. Jehovah.

9 Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life: but teach them thy sons, and thy sons' sons;

10 Specially the day that thou stoodest before the Lord thy God in Horeb, when the Lord said unto me, Gather me the people together, and I will make them hear my words, that they may learn to fear me all the days that they shall live upon the earth, and that they may teach their children.

11 And ye came near and stood under the mountain; and the mountain burned with fire unto the midst of heaven, with darkness, clouds, and thick darkness.

12 And the Lord spake unto you out of the midst of the fire: ye heard the voice of the words, but saw no similitude; only ye heard a voice.

13 And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments: and he wrote them upon two tables of stone.

CHAPTER IV.

14 ¶ And the Lord commanded me at that time to teach you statutes and judgments, that ye might do them in the land whither ye go over to possess it.

15 Take ye therefore good heed unto yourselves; for ye saw no manner of similitude on the day that the Lord spake unto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire:

16 Lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure, the likeness of male or female.

17 The likeness of any beast that is on the earth, the likeness of any winged fowl that flieht in the air, but he let them hear his voice, that they might not go and worship any other's gods, which the heathens pretended spake to them.

Ver. 13. He declared unto you his covenant.] These were the principal laws which they covenanted with him to observe; and afterward he added others. "After the tenor of which he made a covenant with them" (Exod. xxxiv. 27).

He wrote them.] See Exod. xxiv. 12, xxxiv. 28.

Ver. 14. To teach you statutes and judgments.] This doth not signify, that they themselves did not hear the ten words from Mount Sinai, but were taught them by Moses; (as Maimonides fancies in the foregoing place,) for it plainly relates to the rest of the laws, which God immediately after gave him (Exod. xxii. xxiii.) It being their own desire, that God would speak to them no more by himself, but communicate the rest of his will by Moses (Exod. xx. 19).

And accordingly he told the people "all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments," which he delivered to him (Exod. xxiv. 2).

All this will appear more plainly from the next chapter of this book, ver. 22, &c.

It is a mere imagination of those Jews, who take the statutes and judgments here mentioned for their oral law, as Aben Ezra, R. Solomon, R. Bechah, and others do, upon this place; who say, that when God gave Moses the greatest of his laws, he exprest it to him, which exposition he delivered to Joshua, and he to the seventy elders, &c. so that it came down to them in a successive tradition.

Ver. 15.] He gives them a special caution about this, because the nations of the world were so prone to make images of their gods; which he expressly forbids in the second commandment. Upon this text the present Jews ground the third article of their faith, which is, that God is incorporeal.

Ver. 16. Lest ye corrupt yourselves.] By worshiping any thing but God himself alone. Unto whom they being espoused, the giving Divine worship unto any thing else was such a corruption, as adultery is in a married woman.

And make ye not a graven image.] See the second commandment, Exod. xx. 3, 4.

The likeness of male or female.] The representation of God in human shape is first forbidden, because it was most common among the heathens. Therefore I cannot think this relates to the Egyptian worship, who honoured oxen as sacred to Osiris, and cows as sacred to Isis. Unto which Mr. Selden thinks the LXX. had respect, when they translated these words, "Ομοια δορικου και σφιχτου" (De Diis Syris, Synag. cap. 4).

Ver. 17.] The word or is to be here supplied, and in all that follows, in this manner: "Or the likeness of any beast that is on the earth; or the likeness of any winged fowl that flieht in the air? where col-
The likeness of any thing that creepeth on the ground, the likeness of any fish that is in the waters beneath the earth:

And lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, and the zipper canoph, which we translate, “any winged dowl,” signifies, all birds and insects that fly in the air: for in the shape of such creatures else the heathen represented, or deified, the sun, and moon, and together some other heavenly things. Thus, not only oxen were sacred to Apis, and rams to Jupiter Ammon, but hawks and eagles, and even beetles, to other deities.

Ver. 18. The likeness of any thing that creepeth Nothing was more common among the heathen than the worship of serpents.

The likeness of any fish: The famous Dagon, whom the Philistines worshipped, was a fish with a human face, hands, and feet. Certain it is, the Syrians worshipped a fish, as Cicero tells us, in his third book of the Nature of the Gods, Syri piscem veneranur: which Mr. Selden thinks relates to the famous goddess Atargatis; which is a word made out of the Hebrew, addinad, i.e. “magnificent, or potent fish,” (see De Dios, cap. 9.) The Egyptians were famous in aftertimes for worshipping all sorts of animal; and if one could find they were so in the days of Moses, it might be assigned as the most probable reason of his cautioning the Israelites against these things so particularly, they being lately come out of Egypt.

Ver. 19. Lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven.
From hence, I believe, that common speech among the Arabians was derived, “Take heed how thou gazest on the splendour of the stars:” which is, in the first century of Arabic proverbs, set forth by Erpenius (Prov. xxviii.), who saith he knew not what to make of it: but I take it to be a caveat against idolatry, to which the ancient Arabians were addicted.

When thou seest the sun, &c.] The most ancient idolatry of all other seems to have been the worship of the sun, and the rest of the heavenly bodies, which began among the Chaldeans: for there is not any god, or goddess, among the ancient gentleites, but hath a respect to the sun, or the moon, as Gijsbertus Cuperus hath very plainly demonstrated, in his Harpoocrates, p. 4. And a very learned man of our own lately said a great deal on the same subject (Appendix to the Antiquity of Palmira, cap. 4.
by Mr. A. Seller; and Maimon. More Nevou. par.
iii. cap. 30).

Shouldst be driven to worship them,] Drawn in, enticed, and deceived (as Onokeo, and the LXX. translate it), either by the instigation of some evil genius, or admiration of their splendour, or imitation of other nations, or a vain opinion that some divinity inhabits such illustrous bodies, or out of a sense of the benefits mankind receive by them: for the chief philosophers themselves were led by their weak reasonings into this error, as appears even from Plato, who saith, it is most just that the heaven should be worshipped with all the gods and demons, and that we should της αυτή της προστάσιας (προστάσιας, &c. as he speaks in his Epinomis. See Eusebios, in his Prepar. Evang. lib. xiii. cap. 18. where he shows how much the Hebrews speak in this matter; and quoten some words of Plato, out of a work of his, not now extant, for the explication of these words of Moses. And, to make this idea seem more reasonable, all the philosophers asserted the sun to be endeared with understanding; and, therefore, is called by Proclus, παρονοστος διασκεδαστις, “the intellectual fire,” to distinguish it from other fires which are moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, shouldst be driven to worship them, and serve them, which the Lord thy God hath divided unto all nations under the whole heaven.

20 But the Lord hath taken you, and brought without understanding: and from hence, in one of the coins of Caracalla, there is over the sun, surrounded with rays, the word Providentia. In short, the worship of the sun was distinguished in his written at a time that it was no easy matter, when the Son of God came, to root it out: for the Essenes (the best sect among the Jews) seem to have had a tangle of this superstition, as Josephus represents them, lib. ii. De Bello Judaico, cap. 7. Some, indeed, excuse them, as if they only admired the sun as the most excellent work of God, which they expressed by some kind of adoration: but Josephus expressly tells us, that, early in the morning, they directed to him πατριος τοις ἄγγελοις, as if they besought him to rise. And this stuck still in the minds of some who professed Christianity, particularly the followers of Basildes, and the Manichees, who called the sun and moon by the name of gods, and sometimes called the sun Christ, as Theodoret tells us, lib. i. cap. 26. And Epiphanius and St. Austin say the same in more places than one. No wonder, therefore, that Julian the apostate should say, that God produced, ἡμῶν θεὸς μητρότος πατρότος ομοίως ἐγγονίζεται, “Out of himself the sun, the greatest god, in all things like unto himself;” for which he quotes Plato, in his book of the Sun. This most famous section of the Praise of the Sun, which he saith
The same sun hath filled the heaven with immensable other gods, p. 116. οὐκ ἐπαγαίνει θεὸν ἐκ οὐρανοῦ, σήμαινε, “The whole heaven is full of gods from the sun.”

Which the Lord thy God hath divided unto all nations] The sense is very plain, that all nations under heaven have the benefit of the sun, moon, and stars, as well as the Jews; who were therefore to worship him alone, who is the Lord of them all, and hath made them to be ministers unto us.

This K. Solomon saw, and yet he could not stick to it, but fell into the vain fancy of the generality of the Jews, that God hath distributed the nations of the world under the government of several stars, and so much of the ancient writers: and even the Jews under the government of God alone, and not subject to any planet. Which hath no foundation at all; much less can we think that God appointed the nations of the world to worship the heavenly host.
lest they should be atheists, as Clemens Alexandrinus and Justin Martyr fancy from this place; unless they mean that God for their sins delivered them up to this impiety; which several great men since have thought to be the true meaning of these words: for there are no such words found in the LXX. as they allege, και ἰδος κατ' ἄνθρωπον ἰδος θεὸς. Πατρίς: Οὐκ οἰκεῖον καὶ οἰκεῖον.

There is one who takes the word chaluk, which we translate divide, to signify the blendish, and makes this the sense, that God hath not divided the heavens, to invite and allure all nations to admire and adore him, the creator of them. And, indeed, in the conjunction which the Hebrews call hiphil, this word doth signify to soften and smooth, and consequently to allure; but it never signifies so in that they call kal.

Maimonides makes the sense of Moses’ argument to be thus: God hath made the sun and moon to be ministers; not to be worshipped; according to that, Gen. i. 18. Which made the Psalmist so particularly call upon all the heavenly bodies to praise the Lord, Ps. cxlviii. (More Nevou. par. ii. cap. 5).
you forth out of the iron furnace, even out of Egypt, to be unto him a people of inheritance, as ye are this day.

21 Furthermore the Lord was angry with me for your sakes, and swore that I should not go over Jordan, and that I should not go in unto that good land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance:

22 But I must die in this land, I must not go over Jordan: but ye shall go over, and possess that good land.

23 Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant of the Lord your God, which he made with you, and make you a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, which the Lord thy God hath forbidden thee.

Ver. 20. Brought you forth out of the iron furnace.] This is a phrase used also by Solomon, 1 Kings vii. 51. and by Jeremiah, xi. 4. to express the most cruel servitude; wherein God suffered them to be tried, as means to try and confirm their obedience.

Ver. 21. Furthermore.] Or rather, but.

The Lord was angry with me, or, he remembered this again. (though he had mentioned it twice before, i. 37, 38.) 25, 36.), that they might be deeply sensible of the danger of offending God, since such a man as he was excluded from the good land for one single fault. Or hereby he would magnify the goodness of God to them, who, though great offenders, had a privilege granted to them which was denied him.

24 For the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, even a jealous God.

25 "When thou shalt beget children, and children's children, and ye shall have remained long in the land, and shall corrupt yourselves, and make a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, and shall do evil in the sight of the Lord thy God, to provoke him to anger:

26 I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall soon utterly perish from off the land whereto ye go over Jordan to possess it; ye shall not prolong your days upon it, but shall utterly be destroyed.

27 And the Lord shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, whither the Lord shall lead you.

And swear that I should not go over Jordan, &c.] He only told him so at the first (Numb. xx. 12), but upon Moses' importunate entreaty, that he would re-voke the sentence (of which we read in the foregoing chapter), because it was not delivered by Moses, but by God in a vision, when he had commanded him; by confirming his threatening with an oath.

Ver. 23. But I must die in this land.] See Numb. xxvii. 12-14. His frequent repetition of this, shows how near it went to his heart. "But ye shall go over, and possess that good land." God's promise to him, he would have them think, was as invocable as his threatening against them.

Ver. 25. A consuming fire.] So he appeared upon the mount, when he delivered his laws from thence in a flaming fire (Exod. xxiv. 17). The learned Hucullus thinks, that from these words of Moses, the ancient Persians took up the worship of fire; at first, only the image of the god had a symbol of fire (as Maximus Tyrius saith, Dissert. xviii.), but afterward, as God himself (Demonstr. Evangel. p. 91).

Even a jealous God.] Who cannot endure any rival in your affection (see Exod. xx. 5). These were two awakening arguments to keep them from idolatry; that God cannot endure it, and will be very terrible in his punishment of it.

Ver. 26. I call heaven and earth to witness] As soon as the measure of your iniquity is filled up, ye shall speedily be destroyed without remedy. Which the Hebrews refer to the captivity by Salmanazar and Nebuchadnezzar, after they had been almost eighteen hundred years in this country; and so might he said to have remained long in the land.

Ver. 27. Shall scatter you] See Lev. xxvi. 33. Ye shall be left few] See Lev. xxvi. 22.
DEUTERONOMY.

32 And there ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell.

33 But if from thence thou shalt seek the Lord thy God, thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thy heart and with all thy soul.

34 And thou shalt put the art in tribulation, and all these things are come upon thee in the latter days, if thou turn to the Lord thy God, and shalt be obedient unto his voice;

35 (For the Lord thy God is a merciful God,) he will not for sake thee, neither destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers which he sware unto them.

36 For ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask from the one side of heaven unto the other, whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it?

37 Did ever people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as thou hast heard, and live?

38 Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation out of the midst of another nation, by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by an outstretched arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the Lord thy God did for you in Egypt before your eyes?

39 Unto thee it was shewed, that thou might-

Ver. 28. There ye shall serve gods, &c.] The idols of the heathen: to the worship of which he threatens to add them, as a punishment for their apostasy from God. And the heathen sometime compelled them to worship their gods, as we read in the third of Daniel.

Which neither see, &c.] This is a description of the most stupid idolatry, to which they should be delivered, if they fell from God (see Numb. xxi. 29).

Ver. 29. But if... thou shalt seek the Lord thy God.] When they were scattered among the heathen (ver. 27).

Thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thy heart:] If they then repented sincerely, and became unfeigned worshippers of the Lord their God alone, he promises them forgiveness.

Ver. 30. When thou art in tribulation.] In great distress, by the execution of the foregoing threatenings.

Even in the latter days:] In future times, or in their most declining state. The Jews themselves apply this to the present state, wherein they are now, and have been many years; as appears by the ancient Nitzacoon, set forth lately by Wagenseil, p. 234; where he saith, the word God, must repent, before God send deliverance unto them.

If thou turn to the Lord thy God.] The great end of punishment was to convert them, and make them more observant of God's commands.

Ver. 31. The Lord thy God is a merciful God.] See Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7. Numb. xiv. 17, 18.

He will for sake thee, &c.] He will not, or he will not suffer them to be cast off, or destroy them entirely (though they were utterly thrown out of their land, ver. 36), but restore them to his favour, according to the covenant made with their fathers, and confirmed by an oath, Gen. xvii. 19, xxii. 16, 17 (see Lev. xxvi. 44, 45).

Ver. 32. For ask] Turn over the annals of the whole world, from one end of it to the other, ever since God created the world, and search whether thou canst find any thing like to that which God hath done for you. Which R. Isaac thus glosses in his Munimen Fidei (lately set forth by Wagensen, p. 103), "From the creation of the world, till their going out of Egypt, there were passed two thousand four hundred and forty-eight years; yet in all that long tract of time, there never were seen or heard in any part of the world such prodigies, such miracles and great terrors as were wrought to bring them out of Egypt: and afterward, in leading them through the Red Sea; raising manna on them; and the appearance of the Divine Majesty at Mount Sinai," &c.

Ver. 33. Here was a double, or rather triple prodigy, never heard of before, that God should speak to them, audibly and distinctly, so long as to inform them in their duty towards himself and one another; and this out of the midst of devouring flames, and without the least hurt to any one of them (Exod. xx. 18, xxiv. 12).

Ver. 34. Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by an outstretched arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the Lord thy God did for you in Egypt before your eyes?

This signifies all the ten plagues of Egypt: for Pharaoh would not let the Israelites go, till God had "multiplied his wonders on the land of Egypt," as we read Exod. vii. 3, x. 1, 2, xi. 9, 10.

By war.] This seems to relate to the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea: where the Lord is said to fight for Israel (Exod. xiv. 14. xv. 3), while they, by no other means, could have been delivered without striking a stroke.

By a mighty hand, and by a stretched out arm.] These are phrases which we often meet withal, when Moses speaks of their deliverance out of Egypt, Exod. ixi. 19. xi. 6. xv. 12, and many other places. And the Hebrews think, that his mighty hand particularly refers to the grievous murrain, and the pestilence, which are spoken of in the end of the Lord, Exod. x. 15. And his stretched out arm to have a particular respect to the killing of the first-born; the angel that was going to smite Jerusalem appearing with a "drawn sword," and his hand stretched out" (1 Chron. xxi. 16).

By great terrors,] where with the minds of those were struck who heard of these things (Exod. xv. 14. 16), and by no other means, as the{figure} in which the Egyptians were, while they remained three days in most dismal darkness (Exod. x. 23.), for the conclusion of this verse signifies, that he speaks of "all that the Lord their God did for them in Egypt before their eyes."

Ver. 35. Unto thee it was shewed.] This was a particular kindness to the Israelites, which God never before manifested to any other nation.

That thou mightest know that the Lord he is God;
CHAPTER IV.

That they might believe him to be the only true God, and worship none but him. Which two articles, saith Maimonides (More Nochum, par. ii. cap. 33), that God is, and that he is but one, are fundamentals of religion, which were known not only by prophets, but by every body else.

That he might instruct thee] Teach them his will, which was chiefly declared in the ten commandments. He showed thee his great fire:] He means either that they saw it as they stood upon the earth; or, that it burnt upon the top of the mountain in their sight (Exod. xxvii. 17).

Thou hearest his words] See ver. 11, 12, and Exod. xx. 18, 19.

Ver. 37. Because he loved thy fathers] See Gen. xv. 5-7, and many other places in that book, Exod. iii. 15-17.

Brought thee out in his sight with his mighty power] For, as he led them the way out of Egypt in a pillar of cloud, and of fire (Exod. xiii. 21), so, when they were in danger by Pharaoh’s pursuit of them, he came behind them, and they marched in his sight (Exod. xiv. 20-22).

Out of Egypt:] This is mentioned in Scripture as the highest benefit, never to be forgotten by them. So G. Schickard observes, in his Mischna Hammalech (cap. iii. Theor. 10). That they are put in mind of this in the frontispiece of the decalogue (Exod. xx. 2), in the institution of sacrifices (Lev. xxii. 33), in the promise of a blessing (xxvi. 19), and here, in the enumeration of God’s wonderful works; and afterward in the commendation of his love (Deut. vii. 8), in his dehoration from ingratitude (viii. 14), in his institution of the passover (xvi. 6), in the speech which the reprobating angel made to them (Judges ii. 1), in the hope he gave them of victory over the Midianites (vi. 9), in his answer to their petition for a king (I Sam. x. 19), and on a great many other occasions: for this was “velut fundamentum et ininitum reipublicae,” &c., as another learned German speaks (Gerus on Dan. ix. 15), the foundation, as we may call it, and the beginning of their commonwealth founded by God; which comprehended in it abundance of miracles, far exceeding all the power of nature.

Ver. 38. To drive out nations—greater and mightier] So mighty, that they frightened their fathers from attempting the conquest of them (Numb. xiii. 28, 29, 31).

To bring thee in—as it is this day.] That is, as he had given them a late experiment, by overthrowing the two kings of the Amorites, and giving them their land for a possession.

Ver. 39.] Be sensible, therefore, and settle this belief in thy heart, that the Lord is the sole governor of the whole world.

Ver. 40. Keep therefore his statutes, &c.] Worship and obey him, as the only way to make them and their posterity live happily in the land, which God was about to give them.

That it may go well with thee, &c.] Though Moses spoke of their long life upon earth, yet the better sort of Jews did not set up their rest here; but from this word prolong, extended their hope as far as the other world: for thus Maimonides saith (in his preface to Pereck Cheleek) they were taught by tradition to expound these words, “That it may be well with thee” in the world, which is all good; and “mayest prolong thy days” in the world, which is all long, i.e., never ends.

Ver. 41. Then Moses severed three cities] I observed in the preface to this book, that Moses did not deliver all that is contained in this book, in one continued speech; but at several times, as appears even from the beginning of the next chapter, where it is said, “He called all Israel, and said unto them,” &c. Which supposes, that after this preface in these four chapters, he dismissed them to consider what he had said; and then some time after assembled the people again, to put them in mind of the laws which he so earnestly pressed them to observe. But between these two times (after he had spoken all that is contained in these four chapters, and before he rehearsed the decalogue), he put in execution the command of God lately given, to set apart three cities of refuge on this side Jordan; which he here relates, in the order, I suppose, wherein it was done.

Toward the sun rising:] On the east side of Jordan, according to what was ordered, (Numb. xxxiv. 14)

Ver. 42.] See there, ver. 11, 12, &c.

Ver. 43.] Thus they are set down also in the book of Joshua, xx. 8, xxi. 37, 36, 38.

Ver. 44.] Now follows the law, which (after the forementioned assignation of the cities of refuge) Moses set before all the people, and pressed them to the observance of it.

Ver. 45. These are the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments, As the next chapter contains the law, that is, the ten commandments, which Moses set before them; so, in several following chapters (after new earnest exhortations to obedience), he re-children of Israel, after they came forth out of Egypt.

46 On this side Jordan, in the valley over against Beth-peor, in the land of Sihon king of the Amorites, who dwelt at Heshbon, whom Moses and the children of Israel smote, after they were come forth out of Egypt:

47 And they possessed his land, and the land of Og king of Bashan, two kings of the Amorites, which were on this side Jordan toward the sun rising;

48 From Aroer, which is by the bank of the river Arnon, even unto mount Sion, which is Hermon, 49 And all the plain on this side Jordan eastward, even unto the sea of the plain, under the springs of Pisgah.

The forty-eighth year after their departure thence; as appears from Num. xxi. 24, xxxii. 38.

Ver. 47.] See Num. xxi. 33, &c.

Ver. 48.] The mount here called Sion is not that which was so famous in aftertimes, when David made it the royal seat; for that was on the other side Jordan, and is written with different letters in the Hebrew; but, in all probability, is a contraction of Sirion; which is the name by which the Sidonians called Hermon: for the bounds of this country are so described (iii. 8, 9, 12), to extend from the river Arnon to Mount Hermon, which is called Sirion.

Ver. 49. All the plain.] See ch. iii. 17.

Under the springs of Pisgah.] The same place there called Ashdoth-Pisgah. Which is exactly described after the same manner, by Benjamin Tudelensis, in his Itinerary, set forth by L’Empereur, p. 51, where he saith, that Jordan is called at Tiberias the Sea of Gennesareth; and, coming from thence with a great force, falls at the foot of this hill into the Sea of Sodom, which is called the Salt Sea.

CHAPTER V.

The covenant in Horeb. 6 The ten commandments. 92 At the people’s request Moses receiveth the law from God.

And Moses called all Israel, and said unto them, Hear, O Israel, the statutes and judgments which I speak in your ears this day, that ye may learn them, and keep, and do them.

The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb.

The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even we, who are all of us here alive this day.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. Moses called all Israel.] That is, summoned all the elders, and heads of their tribes, who were to communicate what he said to the rest; thus it is commonly expounded. But that which he saith, xxix. 10, 11, seems to direct us to another interpretation; that he himself went from tribe to tribe, and repeated these ten words (as they are called), placing himself in several parts of their camp, that every one might hear what he said. And this was some time after he had, in like manner, exhorted them to obedience in the foregoing preface (see iv. 41).

Hear, O Israel.] Mind what I now say unto you. That ye may learn them, and keep, and do them.] That ye may not be ignorant of such important truths nor negligent in the practice of them; which is the end of knowledge.

Ver. 2.] See Exod. xxiv. 3, 5—9.

Ver. 3. The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers.] viz. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; with whom he covenanted to give their posterity the land of Canaan; but did not make to them this discovery of his will, which was the matter of the covenant at Horeb.

But with us.] A great part of those who were then at Horeb were now alive: viz. all under twenty years old. And if they had been all dead, Moses might have said, “He made it with us;” because they were still the same people, though the particular persons were dead, with whom the covenant was made, not only for themselves, but for their posterity.

Ver. 4. Face to face.] Openly, clearly, and distinctly; or by himself, without the mediation of Moses: but in no visible shape: for that is expressly denied in the foregoing chapter, iv. 12, 15.

Ver. 5. I stood between the Lord and you at that time.] As a mediator, whom God employed to prepare them to meet him (Exod. xix. 10, 11, &c.), and to prescribe them the bounds, at what distance they should keep (ver. 12), and to bring them forth to meet with him (ver. 17), and to charge them to keep within their bounds (ver. 21). And on the other side, viz. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; with whom he covenanted to give their posterity the land of Canaan; but did not make to them this discovery of his will, which was the matter of the covenant at Horeb.

And Moses called all Israel, and said unto them, Hear, O Israel, the statutes and judgments which I speak in your ears this day, that ye may learn them, and keep, and do them.

The Lord our God made a covenant with us in Horeb.

The Lord made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even we, who are all of us here alive this day.

But with us.] A great part of those who were then at Horeb were now alive: viz. all under twenty years old. And if they had been all dead, Moses might have said, “He made it with us;” because they were still the same people, though the particular persons were dead, with whom the covenant was made, not only for themselves, but for their posterity.

Ver. 4. Face to face.] Openly, clearly, and distinctly; or by himself, without the mediation of Moses: but in no visible shape: for that is expressly denied in the foregoing chapter, iv. 12, 15.

Ver. 5. I stood between the Lord and you at that time.] As a mediator, whom God employed to prepare them to meet him (Exod. xix. 10, 11, &c.), and to prescribe them the bounds, at what distance they should keep (ver. 12), and to bring them forth to meet with him (ver. 17), and to charge them to keep within their bounds (ver. 21). And on the other side, viz. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; with whom he covenanted to give their posterity the land of Canaan; but did not make to them this discovery of his will, which was the matter of the covenant at Horeb.

And Moses called all Israel, and said unto them, Hear, O Israel, the statutes and judgments which I speak in your ears this day, that ye may learn them, and keep, and do them.
7 Thou shalt have none other gods before me.
8 Thou shalt not make thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the waters beneath the earth;
9 Thou shalt not bow down thyself unto them, nor serve them: for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, 10 And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments.

Ye were afraid; Exod. xx. 18.
Went not up; Exod. xix. 17. xx. 21.
Ver. 6.] This preface to the ten commandments is explained, Exod. xx. 2.
Ver. 7.] See Exod. xx. 3. It is wisely observed by Grothus (lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 20. sect. 49), that true religion was ever built upon these four principles: First, that there is a God, and that he is one. Secondly, that God is nothing of those things that we see with our eyes, but something more sublime than them all. Thirdly, that he takes care of human affairs, and judges them most justly. Fourthly, that he is the maker of all things whatsoever. Which principles are explained in these first four precepts of the Decalogue. This is the meaning of the Godhead being delivered in the first place.
Ver. 8-10.] The second principle, that God's nature is invisible, is contained in this second commandment; being the ground of this prohibition, to make any image of him: which the best of the heathen forbade also for this very reason, as our Graecius Eusebius

CHAPTER V. 769

11 Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain: for the Lord will not hold him guiltyless that taketh his name in vain.
12 Keep the Sabbath day to sanctify it, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee.
13 Six days thou shalt labour, and do all thy work:
14 But the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy manservant, nor thy maidservant, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor thy purposes, that they might give to the blessed God the seventh part of the week (as Abbariel speaks upon these words,) and might learn the Divine law, together with the Kebabah, or traditional exposition of the words, and mark well the niceties of it: for which he quotes a saying out of the Gemara of the Jerusalem Talmud, "Sabbaths and feasts were not given, but to set the law upon the people." Which is another speech of theirs, in their Midrash, or allegorical exposition upon Exodus, that "the sabbath weigheth against all the commandments;" because it was a principal means to make them known and observed. There is not much said, indeed, in express words, concerning this end of the sabbath; but common reason told the Jews, it could not be intended merely as a day of ease from labour, but for the solemn service of God, and instruction in their duty to him.

As the Lord thy God hath commanded thee. At Me- rah, say the Jews commonly, where he gave them a "statute and an ordinance" (see Exod. xx. 25). But one of them saith better; "At March it was designed, and at Sinai it was commanded." But they do not look back far enough for the original of this commandment; for there being two things in this day, the rest of it, and the religion; the rest of it was in remembrance of their deliverance out of Egypt, and the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea, which completed their deliverance immediately after which they were kept their first sabbath rest. The reason is, in remembrance of the creation of the world; and so this day had been observed from the beginning by the patriarchs, though we find no mention made of their resting; and that may possibly be the meaning of these words; "as the Lord thy God commanded thee;" that is, immediately after he had finished the creation of the world.

Ver. 13.] See upon Exod. xx. 9.
Ver. 14. But the seventh day is the Sabbath, &c. The reason why they might not do any work on this day is given in Exod. xx. 11, which is wholly omitted here, because Moses had another reason to add, for the enforcement of this precept; and refers them (in the foregoing words, ver. 12. "As the Lord thy God hath commanded thee") to that he had said in the books of Genesis and Exodus; where he had set down the reason which God himself gave with his own mouth, for the religious observation of this day; because in six days the Lord made heaven and earth," &c. So that this commandment was designed to establish the fourth principle I mentioned, that God is the maker of all things. To preserve the memory and sense of which (as the author of the answer, Ad Orthodoxos, observes, lxix.) this rest was instituted, to be observed with a more than ordinary sanctity; it being of such great moment, that the first sabbath-breaker was punished with death, because the voluntary violation of it contained in it a denial that the world was created by God.
stranger that is within thy gates; that thy manservant and thy maidservant may rest as well as thou.

15 And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm: therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day.

16 Honour thy father and thy mother, as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee; that thy days may be prolonged, and that it may go well with thee, in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

17 Thou shalt not kill.

18 Neither shalt thou commit adultery.

19 Neither shalt thou steal.

20 Neither shalt thou bear false witness against thy neighbour.

21 Neither shalt thou desire thy neighbour's wife, neither shalt thou covet thy neighbour's house, his field, or his manservant, or his maidservant, or his ox, or his ass, or any thing that is thy neighbour's.

That thy manservant and thy maidservant may rest] Mercy towards men, as well as piety towards God, was a reason for the observation of the sabbatical rest.

Ver. 15.] This is a new ground for the observation of the sabbath; because God had given them rest from their hand labour in Egypt. Which obliged them to keep that seventh day, which God appointed at the giving ofvrvbon (being the day of which he overthrew Pharaoh in the Red Sea), as the memory of the creation of the world obliged them to keep one day in seven. So our Mr. Mede hath explained it (see my annotations on Exod. xiv. 30). And Maimonides hath something to the same purpose, in his More Ne-vochim, par. ii. cap. 31 (see upon Exod. xx. 11).

Ver. 16. Honour thy father and thy mother.] In the twentieth of Exodus, ver. 12, see there. To which I shall here add, that the laws of Solon made those children infamous, who did not afford sustenance to their parents, and provide them a habitation. And by the ancient laws of Athens, he that repromised his parents was disinherited; if he struck them, his hand was cut off; if he left them unprovided, he lost their inheritance, and was banished his country: and another law punished this ingratitude with death. See J. Mensis, in his Themis Attica, lib. i. cap. 2, 3, where he shows, that by parents, they understand not only father and mother, but grandfather and grandmother; &c. when a man and a woman, or a master and a servant, committed a fault, or killed a man, or did any damage, all the community were obliged to have taken part with them, or suffered with them, in the punishment: and the great number of all these laws, was a sense they had, as their obesines, for the punishment of others. But the great part of this law, that men should honour their parents, as they did the gods, and keep the sabbath, the third day (see Sam. Petitus, in Leges Atticas, lib. iii. tit. 3). Whence Hierocles calls parents, Dei fiti, &c. "earthly gods," and Philo, upon the dialogue, Dei &c. visible gods, which imitate him that is unbegotten, by giving life." And accordingly, next to the precepts concerning the worship of God, Moses here places immediately the duty owing unto parents.

That thy days may be prolonged, &c.] These last words are added to what God spake, Exod. xx. 12, as an explication of the foregoing. Whereby they are excited to obedience, by the promise not only of a long life, but of a happy. A new obligation is given for that is included in honour, as the apostle explains it, Col. iii. 29, "Children obey your parents in all things:" that is, where God hath not commanded the contrary, and where it is not inconsistent with the public good; which is always to be preferred, even before the duty that is owing to natural parents. Insomuch, that common reason taught the heathen, that for the good of the society, the son is to lay aside the reverence he should pay to his father, and the father to pay it unto the son, that is, when he is in public office; thus the famous Fabius Cunctator commanded his son, for making him light off from his horse, when he met him in his consulsip, as Plutarch tells us. And see A. Gel-...
CHAPTER V.

22. These words the Lord spake unto all your assembly in the mount out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice: and he added no more. And he wrote them in two tables of stone, and delivered them unto me. 23 And it came to pass, when ye heard the voice out of the midst of the darkness, (for the mountain did burn with fire,) that ye came near unto me, even all the heads of your tribes, and your elders; 24 And ye said, Behold the Lord our God hath shewed us his glory and his greatness, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire: we have seen this day that God doth talk with man, and he liveth. 25 Now therefore why should we die? for this great fire will consume us: if we hear the voice of the Lord our God any more, then we shall die. 26 For who is there of all flesh, that hath heard the voice of the living God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as we have, and lived? 27 Go thou near, and hear all that the Lord our God shall say: and speak thou unto us all that the Lord our God shall speak unto thee; and we will hear it, and do it. 28 And the Lord heard the voice of your words, when ye spake unto me; and the Lord said unto me, I have heard the voice of the words of this people, which they have spoken unto thee: they have well said all that they have spoken.

29. O that there were such an heart in them...

Ver. 25.] It is an ungrounded conceit of Maimonides (in the place above mentioned), that, when they had heard the first words, they fell into a swoon, and did not recover themselves till all the rest were spoken; which made them conclude, that they should really die, and never come to themselves again (as we speak), if they should hear him speak to them any more. The plain meaning is, that mortal men could not endure to hear him speak in that manner; for the voice was so loud, and accompanied with such flashes of fire, and such claps of thunder, as made them conclude, if it had continued longer, they should have expired.

Ver. 26. Who is there of all flesh, i.e. Of all men who are weak and frail, as the word flesh denotes. That hath heard the voice of the living God—and lived? There is no instance of such a thing as this, which made them afraid of hearing him speak, in this manner, any more: for they did not mind God’s end and intention in this (which Moses suggests to them in Exod. xx. 20), but in a confusion of thoughts imagined, that though they had escaped once, the flames out of which he spake might devour them, if they came near them again.

Ver. 27. See Exod. xx. 19. This shows their opinion of Moses, that he could not enable them only to endure that voice of God, which made them ready to die, but go into the very midst of the darkness out of which those flames came.

Ver. 28.] As Moses here reports more largely what they said to him than he did in Exodus, so he likewise gives a larger account what God bade him say to them, in answer to their desire.

They have well said all that they have spoken.] It very much becomes them, out of a sense of their meanness and unworthiness, and of the inconceivable majesty of God, to desire he would speak to them by a mediator.

Ver. 29. O that there were such an heart in them.] The words are wonderful emphatical in the Hebrew, Who will give, that there may be such a heart in them. Which is an expression of the most earnest desire; but withal signifies, that if what he had done for them would not move them to fear and obey him, it was impossible to persuade them to it. Not but that he could miraculously work upon them, and change their hearts (saith Maimonides), if he pleased, as he miraculously changed the nature of other things; but if this were God’s will to deal with them after this fashion, there would have been no need to send a prophet to them, or to publish laws full of precepts and promises, rewards and punishments; by which (saith he) God wrought upon their heart, and not by Which touch a man’s life: next those that wrong his family, the foundation of which is matrimony: then, those that wrong him in his goods, either directly by stealing, or more craftily by bearing false witness. Then, in the last place, those sins are mentioned which are not consummate, being gone no farther than desire; which in Exod. xx. 17, are expressed by one and the same word, but here by two; which we translate desire and covet; between which I know no difference, unless they express higher and lower degrees of the same sin. The contrary to which is, contentedness with our portion, and thankfulness to God for it; which will not let us covet any thing belonging to another man, with his loss and damage.

Ver. 29. These words the Lord spake unto all your assembly] Exod. xix. 16, xx. 18. This confutes the foolish fancy of the Jewish doctors, that the people heard only the first words of God, “I am the Lord thy God, &c. thou shalt have no other gods but me;” i.e. they heard him declare his existence, and his unity; but all the rest were reported to them by Moses. Nothing can be more contrary to what he here saith, that “all these words” (that is, the ten words before mentioned) were spoken to “their whole assembly” (see More Novochim, par. ii. cap. 23).

With a great voice. That is, so loud, that it might be heard by the whole camp. H. added no more.] All the rest of the commandments, which follow in Exod. xxi. xxii. and xxiii. were delivered to Moses alone, and by him to the people, according to their own desire (Exod. xx. 19, xxi. 1. xxiv. 3).

He wrote them in two tables of stone:] That is, the ten commandments, and no more (Exod. xxiv. 12, xxxi. 18, xxxiv. 1. 28). Lest what they heard with their ears should quickly slide out of their minds, he took care to have it engraven with his own hands in these tables.

Ver. 23.] After they had recovered out of the fright wherein they were at the conclusion of these words: when the thunderings, lightnings, and noise of the trumpet were so terrible, that they removed, and stood afar off (Exod. xx. 18).

Ver. 31.] Here Moses relates more largely what he said in short, Exod. xx. 19.

We have seen this day that God doth talk with men, and he liveth.] This looks like a thankful acknowledgment of the great goodness of God, in showing them such a favour as never any men had before and which they could not expect again. And accordingly Moses makes use of it as an argument to be very observant of God’s commands (Exod. xx. 22, 23).
that they would fear me, and keep all my commandments always, that it might be well with them, and with their children for ever!

30 Go say to them, Get you into your tents again.

31 But as for thee, stand thou here by me, and I will speak unto thee all the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which thou shalt teach them, that they may do his absolute omnipotence (Mere Nevoehim, par. iii. cap. 32).

That it might be well with them.] For God desired nothing more than this, which they themselves promised (ver. 27), which moved him to vouchsafe such a special privilege to them, as first to speak to them himself, and, at their desire, consent to speak to them by his prophet.

Ver. 31.] All this shows that Moses was a mediator between God and them, and between them and God.

Ver. 31. As for thee, stand thou here by me.] He invites Moses unto the nearest approaches unto his majesty; and the most familiar converse with him (Exod. xx. 21. xxiv. 2. 18). For this was the highest degree of prophecy, as Maimonides calls it, in his More Nevoehim, par. iii. cap. 51. And in his preface to that book, he saith, this is the greatest degree of illumination of a prophet, concerning whom it is said, "Stand thou here with me!" and again, "The skin of his face shone." Which he supposed signified, that his mind was always full of light; whereas other prophets were sometime in darkness, and saw nothing.

fear in their hearts, as the true principle of obedience; which so certainly flows from it, if it be preserved in its power and force, that it frequently in Scripture signifies the whole duty we owe to God. But here, more particularly, it seems to signify their adhering to him as the only God: so it is used, 1 Kings xviii. 3. 12, and in the New Testament most plainly, Acts x. 2. 35.

Ver. 35. Hear therefore, and observe to do it.] Mark therefore so well what I say, as to do accordingly.

That it may be well with thee, &c.] As the only way to be happy, and to grow a mighty nation, and, in short, enjoy all that God had promised to their pious ancestors.

Ver. 4. Hear, O Israel:] He repeats it again, because what he was going to say is of the highest importance.

The Lord our God is one Lord:] Being to remind 5 And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might.

them of all the laws which God delivered to them by him, and to endeavour to beget a holy fear of him, as the principle of obedience, he most earnestly presses upon them, before he proceeds further, the first of the ten commandments; which is, that there is but one God, who alone is to be worshipped; and that he is their God: whose laws therefore could not be controlled by the authority of any other pretended god.

Many of the ancient fathers, particularly Theodoret and Greg. Nyssæns, think there is a plain intimation of the blessed Trinity in these words "The Lord our God is one Lord:" and some of the Jews themselves have thought there was something extraordinary in it, that the name of God should be thrice mentioned as it is in this sentence: which signifies three midoth, or properties, they confess; which they sometimes call three faces, or emonations, or sanctifications, or nations; before they three persons; as Joseph de Vossïns observes, in his book against an Anonymous Anti-trinitarian, p. 58. 63. 71. 72. And the cabalists say as much, who, asserting septirvoloth in God (which they take to be something different from the essence of God, and yet not creatures, but emonations from it, as Manasseh ben Israel explains their words,) they make the first three of them to be more than the other seven, and call them primordial. The first of which they call the "Wonderful Intelligence," and the "First Intellectual Light" (as St. James calls God the Father of lights;) and the "First Glory." The second they call, among other names, the "Illuminating Intelligence" (just as St. John saith, the eternal Word "enlightens every one that cometh into the world"), and the "Second Glory." And the third they call the "Sanctified Intelligence" (so the word נבךז, which is in Paul, must be translated, not sanctifying, as Rittangilus takes it,) or they may mean no more than the Holy Intelligence: which is the very same with the Holy Spirit. All this we find in the book Jetizia, which they fancy was made by Abraham: from whom they think they had an obscure notion of the blessed Trinity: and that the apostles used no other language about it, than what was among the Jews. The best of which are so sensible of such things, as I have mentioned, that they think we Christians are not idolaters though we believe three persons in the Godhead (which they fancy inclines to polytheism), because we believe the unity of God: and therefore may be saved as well as they. So J. Wagensen shows in his annotations upon Sota, cap. 7, p. 751. &c. and Arnoldus, in his Spiegell, after him, p. 1218.

Ver. 5. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God] Our blessed Saviour, alleging these two verses, (Mark xii. 29, 30.) looks upon these words as a part of the first commandment: for, after he had said, "The first of all the commandments is, Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord; and, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul," &c. he thus concludes, "this is the first commandment." For, to own him to be the only God, the author of our being and of all things, doth necessarily include in it a love of him above all things whatsoever, which requires us to love him, who hath made them so lovely. This is another principle or spring of obedience, inseparable from the fear of God before mentioned: which doth not drive us away from him, but draws us to him; being such a reverence towards him as children have to their kind parents, which is ever mixed with love to them.

7 And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up:

[With all thine heart.] For there being no other God but he alone, none else could have any right to their love and service, but he only whose nature is so excellent, that it requires the utmost we can do to testify our regard to him. This one of the Jewish writers hath admirably expressed in this manner: "Whosoever serves God out of love, he gives himself to the study of his laws, and unto good works, &c. which excite him to love God with the most flagrant affection; not for the sake of anything in this world, nor for the fear of any evil; but he serves God truly because he is the truth, and the chiefest good, that he may be admitted to communion with him. And a man ought to love him with the most vehement and intense affection, not that he be thought just as a man that is in love with one he desires to make his wife; whosesoever he is, at home or abroad, when he eats and drinks, when he lies down and rises up, he thinks of her. To which Solomon compares the love of the spouse, who saith, I am sick of love," (Cant. ii. 5.) To this purpose, Daul Chasidim, mentioned by Wagensen, upon Sota, cap. 5. p. 611.

By the heart may be here meant the will, which is the original of all that a man doth (as the Jews speak) whether good or evil: by the soul, the affections (to which St. Mark adds the mind, i.e. the understanding, or rational faculty); and by might or strength, is meant the power of the body for action; which four all together make up the whole man. And the word all added to each of these, doth not exclude all other things from any share in our thoughts and affections, but only from an equal interest in them. The love of God ought to be superior, and direct all our other motions to serve him, as Maimonides expresses it in his preface to Pirke Avot.

Ver. 7. Teach them diligently unto thy children] In the Hebrew these words are (as our margin observes) shall teach or sharpen them: signifying, as some think, that they should endeavour to make them pierce their hearts. But De Dieu rather thinks it signifies beat them into them, as things are hammered on an anvil with repeated strokes. Which the famous Boecharius doth not so well approve; who observes, that the word הכתה, which in Arabic signifies, in the first place, to sharpen or whet, signifies also, exquisitely, &c. "to teach exquisitely;" so that he who is taught he made thereby more acute and perspicacious. Which is the intention he thinks of the Hebrew word here, lib. ii. Canaan, cap. 17. However it be expounded, it imports the diligence they should use (as we translate it), to instil this principle into their children's minds, that there is but one God; and to work in them a fear and love of his Divine Majesty. To that which goes before (ver. 4—6) these words have a particular respect. By which it appears, that Moses thought his law was so plain, that every father might be able to instruct his sons in it, and every mother her daughters.

Talk of them when thou sittest in thine house.] As much as to say, they should take all occasions to inculcate this great thing, at home and abroad, night and day; never ceasing their most earnest endeavours to persuade their children not to worship any other

9 And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates.

10 And it shall be, when the Lord thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not,

11 And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full;

12 Then beware lest thou forget the Lord, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt from the house of bondage.

13 Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name.

14 Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you;

15 (For the Lord thy God is a jealous God among you) lest the anger of the Lord thy God be kindled against thee, and destroy thee from off the face of the earth.

God; nor to fall to worship the Lord their God with sincere affection.

The Jews have made from hence one of their affirmative precepts, that twice a day, at least, they should recite these words, "Hear, O Israel," &c. which is a very dilute sense of this precept: wherein Moses requires not merely their saying these words (in which there might be a great deal of superstition), but taking all opportunities to imprint them upon the minds and hearts of their children.

Ver. 8.] Just thus he commands them to preserve the memory of their deliverance out of the land of Egypt, almost in the same words: see Exod. xiii. 9, 16, where this is sufficiently explained. And it appears to be a proverbial speech from Isa. xlix. 16.

There are some learned men, indeed, who take these words literally, notwithstanding St. Jerome hath delivered his opinion to the contrary, that there is no command for phylacteries, which are grounded upon these words, particularly Jos. Scaliger, in his Elenech. Trihæres. Nic. Serarii, cap. 7, 8, where he thinks God gave this commandment to the Israelites, to prevent their following the rites of other nations, who armed themselves against dangers with superstitious amulets in their foreheads; which the Egyptians, he thinks, called iotaphot. But since, neither here nor in Exodus there are any such words as "thou shalt make thee frontlets," but Moses only saith the things that he is speaking of "shall be for frontlets between their eyes!" I take it not to be meant literally; though it is likely they intended well who so understood it: for our historians do not seem to approve the Jews for wearing phylacteries, but for their ostentation, in making them broader than ordinary.

Ver. 9.] This looks more like a literal command than the former; and it might have been very useful to them, when they went in and out of their house to read these words, "Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord," &c. But the Jews are too scrupulous about the words they should write, and upon what part of the posts and gates they were to put them, &c. as Mr. Selden observes (lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 2.) Though, after all, it may be, this was not intended, but only that they should never let this principle slip out of their mind, but think of it when they went out and came in, as well as when they were in their houses, and when they rose up, and when they lay down. Yet it must be observed, that other nations used to write their laws upon their gates, as Huetius notes in his Demonstratio Evangelica. (p. 53) which, it is likely, they did in imitation of the Jews, who, to this day, have written in a parchment these words from ver. 4. to the end of this verse, (with that other passage, chap. xi. from ver. 13 to ver. 20) which they roll up, and writing on it the name of Shaddai, put into it a piece of cane or other hollow wood, and fasten it to the doors of their houses, and of each particular room in them; and, as often as they go in and out, they make it a part of their devotions to touch this parchement, and kiss it; as Leo Modena tells us, in his History of the Jews, par. i. cap. 3.

Ver. 10. It shall be, when the Lord thy God shall have brought thee into the land) Of this he speaks with the greatest assurance, there being no doubt to be made, that God would immediately give them possession of the good land promised to them. The only difficulty is, lest they should be thrown out of it for their disobedience.

Great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not,) For they did not lay all waste, as they did Jericho (for which there was a particular reason), but dwelt in them, after they had destroyed the inhabitants.

Ver. 11. And houses, &c.) In this, and what follows in the rest of the precept, the meaning of God to them; who intended to enrich them with all manner of good things, without any labour of their own to purchase them.

Ver. 12. Then beware, &c.) In prosperity we are too prone to forget our benefactors.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God, and serve him,) Preserve an awful sense of him in thy mind, and be constant in his worship and service; which was never more necessary, than when they enjoyed so many blessings from him.

And shalt swear by his name,) When there was any need of it; as in making covenants with their neighbours, or in bearing their testimony before a judge, they were to swear only by the name of God, not by his attributes. Nor can any other name of God to them; who intended to enrich them with all manner of good things, without any labour of their own to purchase them.

Ver. 14.] This shows that his intention in this chapter is, to press upon them the observation of the first commandment, which our Saviour justly calls the great commandment.

Among you!] In the Hebrew, in the midst of you; to observe all you do, though never so secretly.

Lest the anger]) For this was the most provoking of all other sins; and therefore we never read either in the law, or in the prophets, the word chasam (i. e. fury), or asp. (the common translation) or exath. (jealousy,) ascribed unto God, but when mention is made of idolatry. So Maimonides observes, More Nevoch. par. i. cap. 36.

DEUTERONOMY.
CHAPTER VI.

16 Ye shall not tempt the Lord your God, as ye tempted him in Massah.
17 Ye shall diligently keep the commandments of the Lord your God, and his testimonies, and his statutes, which he hath commanded thee.
18 And thou shalt do that which is right and good in the sight of the Lord: that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest go in and possess the good land which the Lord spake unto thy fathers, 19 To cast out all thine enemies from before thee, as the Lord hath spoken.
20 And when thy son asketh thee in time to come, saying, What mean the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments, which the Lord our God hath commanded you?

Ver. 16.] Never distrust God's good providence, nor murmur against him in any distress: for this was the temptation at Massah (Exod. xvii. 2—7).

Ver. 17.] As if he had said, I cannot too often press this upon you; nor can you use too great care in this matter.

Ver. 18. Thou shalt do that which is right and good] As they loved themselves, he charges them not to follow their own desires (which is called "doing that which is good in their own eyes," but govern themselves by his holy will.

That thou mayest go in and possess the good land] Or rather, "after thou hast gone in, and possessed the good land which the Lord spake unto thy fathers:" for there was no doubt of their going in; but only of their behaviour there, after they were made so happy, ver. 19—23.

Ver. 19.] He seems particularly to charge them to drive out the people of Canaan, as God hath commanded (Numb. xxxiii. 32). For otherwise they would tempt them to forget this great principle of their religion, that the God of Israel was the only God, and entice them to serve their idols (ver. 14).

Ver. 20.] Abardin thinks, that their posterity, in future times, might have three sorts of precepts in the law, viz. testimonies, which in Hebrew are called eduth, which were such constitutions as bear witness of some great thing God had done for them, and preserved the memory thereof: such was the passover. And then, secondly, there were chukkim (statutes), which are such precepts the reason of which is unknown. And, thirdly, mishkatim (judgments), which are such whose reason is evident. Now they might desire to know the reason why such several laws were given; and he thinks Moses teaches them to give a distinct answer to their children about each of these.

Ver. 21.] As if he had said, tell them the reason why he gave us the first sort of precepts, particularly that about the passover, because we were slaves, and God brought us a state of liberty; which he would have always thankfully remembered, by the observation of that feast which testified what God wrought for us by his power alone. The like may be said of the other two great festivals, which were to preserve the memory of such-like benefits.

Ver. 22.] Particularly slew all their first-born, and spared those of the Israelites: the memory of which he ordered to be preserved, by giving their first-born unto him (Exod. xiii).

Ver. 23.] This is the reason, Abardin fancies, of giving them the judgments before mentioned: God brought us out, saith he, to place us in this good land, and settle us here under a government of our own. Now civil society cannot be preserved without just judgment: and therefore, that we might live in good order, God gave us these political laws.

Ver. 24. The Lord commanded us to do all these statutes.] As for the third sort, which are statutes, give your children this answer: that though we do not know the reason of them, yet the benefit of them is manifest; for they lead us to the fear of God. And nothing is so much for our good as that, both for the eternal good of our souls, and for the long life of our bodies. So he interprets the last words of this verse; and so doth Maimonides.

For our good always, that he might preserve us alive, as it is at this day. The first words in the Hebrew are, "that it may be well with us all our days:" or, more literally, "for good to us all our days:" that is, say our rabbins (they are the words of Maimonides, par. iii. More Nevechim, cap. 27, where he repeats what I observed before upon IV. 40), "That it may be well with us in that world which is wholly good; and our days may be prolonged in that world which is wholly long:" or, in short, that thou mayest come into the world which is good and long, which is a perpetual subsistence. As for the last words, they belong, he thinks, to their corporeal subsistence here, which endures but for a time; and therefore he saith, as at this day; to show he speaks of the present world, wherein they should live happily by observing his laws.

Ver. 25. It shall be our righteousness.] Their children might say, if there be such benefits in observing the statutes, which lead to the fear of God, and to happiness hereafter, what need we trouble ourselves about the other two? Unto which, Abardin imagines, they are taught to give this answer, "It is our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments," i.e. we cannot be righteous before God, if they have not respect to all his precepts, whether testimonies, statutes, or judgments, which are all comprehended in this word mitzvah, or commandments. This is something nice and curious, but there is a great deal of truth in it.

The word righteousness also, it must be acknowledged, often comprehends mercy in it: and thus the LXX. and the Vulgar Latin here understand it. And to take in this sense, these words may be thus expounded: If we observe to do all these commandments, God will account us a righteous people, and be kind to us.

Before the Lord our God.] Having a sincere respect to God in all that we do.
CHAPTER VII.

1. All communion with the nations is forbidden, 4 for fear of idolatry, 6 for the holiness of the people, 9 for the nature of God in his mercy and justice, 17 for the assuredness of victory which God will give over them.

1. When the Lord thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and hath cast out many nations before thee, the Hittites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, seven nations greater and mightier than thou;

2. And when the Lord thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them:

3. Neither shalt thou make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son.

4. For they will turn away thy son from following me, that they may serve other gods: so will the anger of the Lord be kindled against you, and destroy thee suddenly.

5. But thus shall ye deal with them; ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. The land whither thou goest to possess it.] That is, when he had put them into possession of it.

And hath cast out many nations before thee, &c.] There were ten nations inhabited in this country in the days of Abraham: but three of them were either worn out since that time, or, being but a small people, were soon overpowered: for the Kenites and the Kenizites (see Gen. xvi. 19.) are not mentioned after that time, and the Rephaim possessed but a little part of Canaan, the great body of them being in Bashan, on this side Jordan, where Moses now was (see upon Gen. xv. 19.)

Seven nations greater and mightier than thou.] The Amorites alone seem to have been mightier than the Israelites (for there were no less than five kings of them that dwelt in the mountains, Josh. x. 5, 6, besides those in other parts), and therefore all the seven nations were much superior to them in strength.

Ver. 2. When the Lord thy God shall deliver them before thee, &c.] He still pursues his intention, to preserve in them a due care to observe the first commandment, of which he began to treat in the foregoing chapter: for that is the reason why they were to destroy these seven nations, that they might not be in danger to be seduced by them to serve other gods (ver. 1). But whether they were not first to offer them terms of peace, according to the directions in the twentieth chapter of this book, is a question which I have endeavoured to resolve in another place, upon Exod. xxiii. 33. Certainly it is, that if they refused their offers, there was the greater reason to be severe to them: and without offering them any terms, God might in justice order the Israelites to destroy them: for every king hath power in his dominions to cut off evil-doers; and therefore much more the King of kings: who might order whom he pleased (as other kings do) to be executioners in his vengeance on these seven nations, for their abominable idolatries, beastly lusts, and horrid cruelties, and other such like sins, of which they were guilty.

This was a thing of such moment, that God ordered Moses to give them this charge some time ago (Numb. xxxiii. 52), which he now reneweth.

Make no covenant with them.] For that had been cruelty to themselves and their posterity, to spare such incorruptable idolaters. How far the Talmudists extend this, see in Dionys. Vossius, upon Maimonides Tretise of Idolatry, p. 139, and Maimonides himself, in the following paragraphs, 4—6.

Ver. 3. See Exod. xxxiv. 15. Some of the Jews think they might marry with them, if they became proselytes of justice (as they called those who received circumcision, and undertook to observe the whole law); and that they might think this was not lawful, yet think that they might marry with the children of such proselytes (see Selden, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent. &c. cap. 14, 15). And the Talmudists say, this law did not extend to the proselytes, who might marry with any of these nations, as he shows there, cap. 18.

Ver. 4.] There was great danger, if they loved their wives, that they might draw them to their idolatry; in which they were so rooted, that there was little hope of converting them to the true religion. Therefore they had prevailed with the Lord these God, for the preserving of which in their hearts they are forbidden such marriages (Josh. xviii. 11, 12). And indeed it was but a piece of natural equity, that they should abstain from such familiarities with those who would certainly undo them. Which made Abraham, before this law, charge his son Isaac not to take a wife from among the Canaanites; and the same care was taken of Jacob. And when this law of Moses was abolished, the apostle warns Christians themselves against such unequal matches (2 Cor. vi. 11). The danger of which David had noted, Ps. cvi. 35, 36. "So will the anger of the Lord be kindled against you," &c. (see vi. 15).

Ver. 5. But thus shall ye deal with them.] Or, "therefore thus shall ye deal with them:" that is, to prevent the forementioned mischief, he orders them to leave no relic of their idolatry remaining.

Ye shall destroy their altars.] The very same precept, Exod. xxxiv. 13.

Break down their images.] The very same words with these are in Exod. xxxiii. 21 (only there it is said, "quite break down"), and in Exod. xxxiv. 13.

Cud thou their groves.] There is the same mention of asherim (which we translate groves) in the place last named; only another word for cut down (see there). But Mr. Selden, both there and here, understands by asherim, wooden images of Astarre, a great goddess worshipped in that country: for which among other reasons, he gives this, that Gideon is said to have burned down the altar of Baal, and cut down the grove that was by it. So we translate it, Judg. vi. 25. 28, where, in the Hebrew, the last word is elau, which signifies upon it, and not by it: and so the LXX. "Εστείλατε τα άσηρα αὐτῶν. And therefore the asherah, which is said to be upon the altar, must not signify a groove, but an image; and none more likely than that of Astarre (see De Dils Syris, Syntagm. ii. cap. 2 and 2 Kings xxxiii. 6, 7).
CHAPTER VII.

6 For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God: the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth.

And the Lord did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people:

8 But because the Lord loved you, and because he would keep the oath which he had sworn unto your fathers, hath the Lord brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you out of the house of bondmen, from the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt.

9 Know therefore that the Lord thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations;

10 And repayeth them that hate him to their face, to destroy them: he will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him to his face.

11 Thou shalt therefore keep the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which I command thee this day, to do them.

12 If Wherefore it shall come to pass, if ye hearken to these judgments, and keep, and do them, that the Lord thy God shall keep unto thee the covenant and the mercy which he sware unto thy fathers:

13 And he will love thee, and bless thee, and multiply thee: he will also bless the fruit of thy womb, and the fruit of thy land, thy corn, and

Burn their groaven images] As he was commanded to destroy their molten images (Num. xxxii. 52), that so no sort of image, nor any monument of their worship might be left in the country, but all so entirely abolished, that they might have no incentive to idolatry. For this was the work of the supreme governor, as Grotius prudently observes: for though of private places it belonged to the lord of the place, or, if he were negligent, to the king, to remove idols, yet none but the supreme power might remove them out of public places, or such persons who were delegated thereby to that office (see L. De Imper. Sum. Potest. circa Saera, cap. 8, sect. 3).

For the Lord is a holy people] This is an argument frequently used, particularly in the book of Leviticus, why they should cleave to God alone; because he had separated them to himself by many peculiar laws, which no other people had but they (Lev. xi. 43, 45. xix. 2. xx. 7. 20).

The Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself] As he had distinguished them from all other people by peculiar laws, so by special favours and singular privileges which no other nation whatsoever enjoyed (see Exod. xix. 5, 6). Some interpret the words special people, to signify that they belonged to none but him; and he had no other people but they; whom he had espoused to himself. From whence it is, that, as the Israelites are called God's people, so the land (Ps. xxxx. 1), for there he dwelt by his special presence. And the king of that country is called God's king (Ps. xlvii. 50), and he is said to sit on God's throne, and to be Melech le Jehovah, “king for the Lord” (2 Chron. ix. 8), and the kingdom is called the “kingdom of the Lord” (xiii. 8), and therefore with this argument Asa addresses himself to God in the next chapter (xv. 11), for help in time of distress, because “he was his God;” and would not, he hoped, let their enemies “prevail against himself.” And accordingly these enemies are said to be “destroyed before the Lord, and before his host!” (ver. 13). Jehoshaphat also exHORTS the judges in that book to great caution (2 Chron. xix. 6), because they “judged not for man, but for the Lord, And the prophet exhorts, in the following chapter (xx. 15), not to be afraid of a mighty host which came against him, because “the battle is not yours, but God’s;” the cause in which they fought being his, more than their own.

Ver. 7. The Lord did not set his love upon you] To be his special people, as he calls them in the foregoing verse:

Because ye were more in number] When God declared his love first to Abraham and his posterity he had no child, Gen. xi. 1—3. xv. 1, 2. And when he had, his family continued so small, after there were twelve heirs of the promise, that in the space of two hundred years they were but seventy persons (Gen. xlvii. 27). Nor do we read of any great increase of them till after the death of Joseph, which was near fourscore years more (Exod. i. 7, 8, &c.). So St. Stephen observes, Acts vii. 17. “When the time of the promise drew nigh, which God had sworn to Abraham, the people grew and multiplied in Egypt.”

Ver. 8. But because the Lord loved you] Because it was his good pleasure to single them out from all other people, to receive special tokens of his favour to them.

Because he would keep the oath which he had sworn, &c.] Not for any desert of theirs; but to make good his promise confirmed with an oath, did he work their wonderful deliverance out of Egypt (Gen. xv. 13, 14. xxii. 16, &c.).

Ver. 9. Know therefore that the Lord thy God, he is God] He exhorts them therefore to preserve this sense in their mind, that their God is the only God.

The faithful God, which keepeth covenant, &c.] Who will not only faithfully keep his word and make good his promises, but do abundantly more than he hath promised to those that cleave unto him alone, and serve no other God: for it appears by the second commandment, that is peculiarly meant by loving him.

To a thousand generations] See Exod. xx. 6. Ver. 10. And repayeth them that hate him] Punisheth all idolaters, who are peculiarly called “haters of God,” as I have often observed (see Exod. xx. 5).

To their face] They themselves should live to see and feel the punishment of their idolatry. So the Chaldees paraphrises it, Bacejehon, “in their life.”

He will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him] Though he do not punish him immediately, yet he will not defer it long, but he avenged of him before he die. Therefore, when he threatens to punish them to the third and fourth generation, the meaning is not that he will only punish their posterity, but them with their posterity: whom they shall see destroyed before their face, as the first generation (as Maimonides observes) is as much as the oldest men commonly live to see.

Ver. 11. All the laws of God (see vi. 1), especially this great commandment, to have no other God but him.

Ver. 12. As faithfully fulfil his promises to them, as he did to their fathers.

Ver. 13. He will love thee,] Continue his love to them.

And bless thee, and multiply thee] This was the great promise made to their fathers, that he would
DEUTERONOMY.

19 The great temptations which thine eyes saw, and the signs, and the wonders, and the mighty hand, and the stretched out arm, whereby the Lord thy God brought thee out: so shall the Lord thy God do unto all the people of whom thou art afraid.

20 Moreover the Lord thy God will send the hornet among them, until they that are left, and hide themselves from thee, be destroyed.

21 Thou shalt not be affrighted at them: for the Lord thy God is among you, a mighty God and terrible.

22 And the Lord thy God will put out those nations before thee by little and little: thou mayest not consume them at once, lest the beasts of the field increase upon thee.

23 But the Lord thy God shall deliver them unto thee, and shall destroy them with a mighty destruction, until they be destroyed.

24 And he shall deliver their kings into thine hand, and thou shalt destroy their name.
CHAPTER VIII.

An exhortation to obedience in regard of God's dealing with them.

1 All the commandments which I command thee this day shall ye observe to do, that ye may live, and multiply, and go in and possess the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers.

2 And thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldest keep his commandments, or no.

3 And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to , and thou shalt be smitten therein: for it is an abomination to the Lord thy God.

26 Neither shalt thou bring an abomination into thine house, lest thou be a cursed thing like it: but thou shalt utterly detest it, and thou shalt utterly abhor it; for it is a cursed thing.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 1. All the commandments—shalt ye observe to do.] He seems still to press them to have a special care to observe the ten commandments, and especially the first of them (vi. 4—6). For it appears by the latter end of this chapter that he hath a regard to that. That ye may live.] Long and happily; for life, every one knows, frequently signifies all the comforts of life, as death signifies all manner of miseries. And multiply.] Which is the effect of a long and happy life.

Go in and possess the land, &c.] See vi. 18.
hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live.

4 Thy rainment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years.

5 Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee.

6 Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him.

And to prove thee, To try whether they would be better, by being kept so long out of the good land promised unto them.

Doth know what was in thine heart, God knew perfectly how they were disposed towards him; but it was fit, that they should know themselves better, and posterity be instructed by their behaviour.

Ver. 3. He humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, He afflicted thee, by suffering thee to want bread to eat (Exod. xvi. 2, 3). Which were in vain, But it was that he might have an opportunity to make a bountiful provision for such a vast multitude of people, as were fed by him every day from heaven, and teach them to depend on his good providence.

Which thou knewest not,] Exod. xvi. 15. He made an unusual, as well as an unexpected provision for them.

Man doth not live by bread only,] That it is not only our common food that preserves us.

But by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord doth man live,] But by any thing whatsoever (for so word often signifies) which God shall please to command to give us nourishment. This was a wonderful encouragement to obedience, that God would rather work a miracle, than suffer them to want necessities; and by a light aerial sort of bread, give them as great strength and vigour, as the most solid nourishment was wont to afford them. The remembrance of which could not but excite their posti- tr. vety to love God, and serve him, if they often and seriously reflected on it.

These were two other wonderful benefits, which, if well considered, could not but incline them to be obedient to him, who multiplied miracles to nourish and strengthen their faith and hope in him. The Jews, to increase the miracle, say, their clothes enlarged as they grew bigger, from children to men; and so did their shoes also: but there was no need of this; for the clothes and shoes of those men that died might serve their children when they grew up to their stature. And it was sufficiently amazing, without such additions, that their clothes should not so much as decay, nor their feet, by so long travelling in hot or stony places, have the least swelling in them, or, as some translate it, grow callous. There are those that refer this last clause not to their feet, but to their shoes, according to what we read, xxi. 5.

Ver. 5. Consider in thine heart,] Often reflect and ponder.

That as a man chasteneth his son,] All the afflictions which God had sent upon them, he would have them think, were not for their undoing, but for their amendment, and correcting what was amiss in them; and therefore ought to be thankfully acknowledged as well as his benefits.

Ver. 6.] Howsoever therefore he dealt with them, it ought to have led them to obedience. In the repetition of this so often, Moses doth but practise his own lesson, which he had taught them, vi. 7, that they should teach these words diligently to their children, &c.

Ver. 7. For the Lord thy God bringeth thee into a good land,] Therefore there was the greater need they should enter into it with the pious resolution before mentioned, "to fear God and walk in his ways." Otherwise, they would be in great danger to be corrupted by such plenty and variety of all good things as their land contained.

A land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths] The Hebrew word tehom, which we translate deep, and in the plural number depths, signifies sometimes those great caverns of water that are within the ground, which were made by the plentiful rains, which God sent upon this country while they were in cities, and valleys, and plains, (as which both made it fruitful though now barren,) and abounding also with water for their cattle (Ps. Ixxxviii. 15. Ezek. xxxi. 4). But it is here commonly interpreted lakes, or wells of water.

Ver. 8. A land of wheat, &c.] Plenitly stored with all things necessary for the support and pleasure of life.

A land of oil olives, and honey,] The same word debas, which signifies honey, signifies also dates. And so De Dieu thinks it most reasonable to translate it here, being joined with four other sorts of fruits; and so Kimchi saith, the ancient Jews expanded it in this place, and in 2 Chron. xxxi. 5, where it is said, that "Israel brought in abundance, the first-fruits of corn, wine, oil, and honey, or dates," as we there translate them in the margin.

Ver. 9. Wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness,] Be in no want of any sort of provision, which is comprehended under the name of bread.

Thou shalt not lack any thing,] No other conveniences of life.

A land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass,] Where there are useful minerals, as plentiful as stones are in other places. These are the rather mentioned, because there were no such mines in Egypt, where they had long dwelt, and were stored with plenty of other things (Num. xi. 5).

Ver. 10. When thou art full,] After a liberal meal.

Then thou shalt bless the Lord thy God for the good land,] Give solemn thanks to God, not only for that present repast, but for the plentiful provision he had made for them of all good things, in the land he had bestowed on them. From this place the Jews have made it a general rule, or as they call, it an affirmative precept, that "every one bless God at their meals," that is, as I said, give him thanks for his benefits: for he blesses us when he bestows good things upon us: and we bless him when we thankfully acknowledge his goodness therein: which is a natural duty which we owe to the Fountain and Original of all good.
11 Beware that thou forget not the Lord thy God, in not keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day:

12 Lest when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein;

13 And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied;

14 Then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage:

15 Who led thee through that great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, and scorpions, and dried up the water, where there was no water; who brought thee forth water out of the rock of flint;

16 Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna, which thy fathers knew not, that he might humble thee, and that he might prove thee, to do thee good at thy latter end;

17 And thou say in thine heart, My power, and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth.

18 But thou shalt remember the Lord thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day.

Ver. 11.] He would have their thanksgiving for his benefits leave such a sense of God upon their minds, as should make them careful to yield him an entire obedience.

Ver. 12.] Feasted in stately houses, wherein they enjoyed their ease.

Ver. 13.] The sense of these two verses is, when they had great abundance of all good things within doors and without.

Ver. 14. Then thine heart be lifted up.] Which is a mark of great riches; as Enriques observes in that known saying of his, "Tiue est via recta potestas, "wealth breeds pride, scorn, and contempt of others," This Moses Kozenshis thought so great a sin, that he puts it among the negative precepts; and pretends it was warned in a dream so to do, though Maimonides, and others, had omitted it. And when he awakened, he was confirmed in it, by reading a place in the Gemara on Neta, cap. 1, which saith, wheresoe'er you find these words in Scripture, take heed lest there be a prohibition, as there is ver. 11, and here, to take heed of pride: "for whosoever is proud, he shall be brought low," as the Gemara there adds, which are, in a manner, the words of our blessed Saviour (St. Luke xviii. 14.)

Then forget the Lord thy God.] This is another common effect of large possessions, which makes the owners of them fall into sloth and luxury, and such forgetfulness of the Donor of all good things, that they trust in uncertain riches (as the apostle speaks), and not in the living God, imagining now they can never want; not because God is so good, but because they have such store of good things laid up, for many years.

Which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt,] No wonder if they forgot all his former benefits, when they were unthankful for the present.

Ver. 15. Terrible wilderness.] See i. 19.

Wherein were fiery serpents.] See Numb. xxi. 6. Scorpions.] These are commonly joined with serpents, even in the New Testament (Luke x. 19. xi. 13. 12.), being found in the same places, especially in this desert of Arabia.

Drouguts.] The Hebrew word ismamaath signifies a dry place, as we translate it, Ps. cvii. 33. Isa. xxxv. 7. And that best agrees with what here follows, where there was no water.

Who brought thee forth water out of the rock?] From which one would have sooner expected fire than water (Numb. xx. 11).

Ver. 16. Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna.] Ver. 3. The great Sammarins, in a treatise on purpose about manna hath said a great deal to prove that the manna which God sent the Jews did not differ in its form or substance from that which commonly fell in those countries, and doth so at this day; but herein consisted the miracle, that he gave them in a prescribed measure, and so abundantly, as to suffice such a vast number, and that every morning, in all seasons of the year. This was truly a Divine manna; for the common fell only in small quantities, and not always, but at some times in the year.

That he might humble thee.] This word is commonly understood of humbling by affliction; which may seem not to belong to manna; for that was a singular benefit, being an excellent nourishment, and of a delicious taste: but he means, they having nothing else besides this to live upon, were soon tired with it (as we find Numb. xi. 6). And much more did it seem an affliction to them, to live upon one thing alone for forty years together; and God intended by it to humble them, at the same time that he was extraordinary kind to them.

Prove thee.] Whether they would be thankful that they might be more than ever before, and more highly enjoyed. So Maimonides expounds this passage, in his More Novochim (par. iii. cap. 31), "God was pleased to accustom them to labour in the wilderness, that he might increase their happiness when they came into the land of Canaan. For this is certain, a transition from labour to rest is far sweeter than continual rest. Nor could they so easily have subdued the land, and overcome the inhabitants of it, unless they had endured some hardship in the wilderness. For rest and idleness take away men's courage, but labour and hard fare augment it. And this is the good (saith he) which was in the issue to redound to them by this wise dispensation of God's providence;"

Ver. 17.] Such vain conceits are apt to arise in men's minds, if they preserve not a sense of God, and of all his mercies to them.

Ver. 18.] Remember the Lord thy God, for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth.] Continually call to mind that they owed all they had, and the increase of it, to his almighty providence; without whom they could never have gotten possession of this land, nor have prospered in it.

That he may establish his covenant, &c.] He would have them sensible of their own unworthiness also (which would make them more grateful to him) of all the blessings God had bestowed on them, and acknowledge them to his mere goodness, and fidelity to his promises; for they had been a murmuring and rebellious people.
DEUTERONOMY.

And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the Lord thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish.

Ver. 19. It shall be, if thou do at all forget the Lord thy God.] Luxury and pride (the usual effects of fulness) naturally made them unthankful and unmindful of God: and neglect of God's service made them corrupt and idolatrous.

And walk after other gods.] The two last expressions are the explication of the first; for then they walked after the idols of the people (as Oekeles paraphrases it), when they worshipped and adored them. It is evident by this, that the drift of Moses, in all this discourse, is (as I observed before) to press upon them the first and great commandment.

I testify against you this day.] See iv. 26.

Ver. 20. As the nations which the Lord destroyed before your face, so shall ye perish.] He speaks in the present tense, because he was about to destroy them: and when he began, he destroyed them by little and little (vii. 22), and there were still more to be destroyed.

So shall ye perish.] It was but just that they should perish as those nations did, because they fell into their sin.

CHAPTER IX.

Moses dissuadeth them from the opinion of their own righteousness, by rehearsing their several rebellions.

1 Hear, O Israel: Thou art to pass over Jordan this day, to go in to possess nations greater and mightier than thyself, cities great and fenced up to heaven.

2 A people great and tall, the children of the Anakims, whom thou knowest, and of whom thou hast heard say, Who can stand before the children of Anak?

3 Understand therefore this day, that the Lord thy God is he which goeth over before thee; as a consuming fire he shall destroy them. and he shall bring them down before thy face: so shalt thou drive them out, and destroy them quickly, as the Lord hath said unto thee.

4 Speak not thou in thine heart, after that the Lord thy God hath cast them out before thee, saying, For my righteousness the Lord hath brought me in to possess this land: but for the wickedness of these nations the Lord doth drive them out from before thee.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. Hear, O Israel.] He begins a new exhortation to them, at some distance of time from the former, but still aiming at the same thing, to represent to them the danger of idolatry.

Thou art to pass over Jordan this day.] That is, shortly, and not long hence; for it cannot be meant precisely: all these things being spoken in the eleventh month of the last year of their travels, and they passed not over Jordan till the first month of the next year. Between which and this time Moses died, and they mourned a whole month for him.

To go in to possess nations] A country inhabited by nations; for the people themselves they were to destroy.

Greater and mightier than thyself.] Whom notwithstanding God would deliver up into their hands.

Cities great and fenced up to heaven.] As the spies had represented them (i. 29). And they were, indeed, very strong cities, whose walls could not easily be scaled.

Ver. 2. Great and tall.] See Num. xiv. 28, 32.

The children of the Anakims.] Who seem to have been the chief of those Nephilim or Rephaim (which we sometimes translate giants) in those parts (Num. xiii. 22, 32, 33).

Who can stand before the children of Anak?] A common proverb in those days. The children of Anak being so famous, that the whole nation (as Bochartus thinks) took its name from them. For Benc-Anak (i.e. children of Anak), or Pheneanek, is easily changed into Phemicka. These Anakims were vanquished by Joshua, who drove them out of the cities where they dwelt, and made them flee to the Philistines. Where a remnant of them seemed to have lived till the days of David. For Goliah, and his brethren Lahimi, Sippai, and Ishbibanob (1 Chron. xx. 4, &c.) were Anakims; and so was that man with six toes on each foot, and six fingers on each hand (2 Sam. xxii. 16), for they were all born at Gath; which was one of the cities to which the Anakims fled (Josh. xi. 22). Some think that from hence kings, among the Greeks, were called "Anaxiteis, because commonly they chose those to rule over them who were persons of a great stature, and carried majesty in their faces. But it is not improbable (as I observed before) that some of the Anakims fled into Greece, and settled there, when they were driven out of Canaan.

Ver. 3. Understand therefore this day.] Settle this therefore in your minds, before you go over Jordan, as undoubted truth.

Goeth over before thee.] Over Jordan (Josh. iii. 3, &c.).

Consuming fire] Before whom none can stand (iv. 24).

He shall destroy them.] See Josh. iii. 10, 11. The Hebrews have a conceit, that the fire which burnt upon the altar appeared in the form of a lion; to show what God would be to their enemies, if the Israelites obeyed him; otherwise what he would be to them.

So shalt thou drive them out.] Not the whole seven nations together; but whom he said God would drive out by little and little (vii. 22) but so many, as to make a settlement for themselves, in Canaan without much difficulty.

Ver. 4. Speak not thou in thine heart.] When this is done, do not so much as entertain a thought.

For my righteousness] Nothing is more dangerous than pride and self-conceit; and therefore, as he taught them before (vii. 7) to have an humble opinion of their own power, so now not to arrogate any thing to themselves, on the account of their own righteousness.

But for the wickedness of these nations] Lev. xviii. 24, 25, 27, 28.
5 Not for thy righteousness, or for the uprightness of thine heart, dost thou go to possess their land: but for the wickedness of these nations the Lord thy God doth drive them out from before thee, and that he may perform the word which the Lord sware unto thy fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.

6 Understand therefore, that the Lord thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness; for thou art a stiffnecked people.

7 Remember, and forget not, how thou provokedst the Lord thy God to wrath in the wilderness: from the day that thou didst depart out of the land of Egypt, until ye came unto this place, ye have been rebellious against the Lord.

8 Also in Horeb ye provoked the Lord to wrath, so that the Lord was angry with you to have destroyed you.

9 When I was gone up into the mount to receive the tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant which the Lord made with you, then I abode in the mount forty days and forty nights, I neither did eat bread nor drink water:

10 And the Lord delivered unto me two tables of stone written with the finger of God; and on them was written according to all the words, which the Lord spake with you in the mount out of the midst of the fire in the day of the assembly.

Ver. 5.] It was of great moment (which makes him repeat it again) that they should understand the true causes why God expelled these nations, and gave their land to the Israelites; which were these two; first, the abominable wickedness of the Canaanites; for which they deserved to be rooted: secondly, God's gracious promises to the pious ancestors of the Israelites, with whom he made a covenant, and confirmed it with an oath, to plant them there, in the room of the former inhabitants.

Ver. 6. Understand therefore.] He repeats it a third time, that, if it were possible, he might root out the Israelites the opinion of their own deserts, before he rooted the Canaanites out of their country.

Thou art a stiffnecked people.] So far from being righteous, that they were very refractory. Of which God often complained (Exod. xxxii. 9, xxxiii. 3, 5), and Moses acknowledges it in his prayer to God for them (xxxiv. 9).

Ver. 7. Remember,—how thou provokedst the Lord] In order to destroy the opinion of their own righteousness, it was necessary to call to mind some of their most notorious provocations; which he exhorts them carefully to preserve in their mind, as a means to keep them humble.

Ye have been rebellious] This appears by the many murmurings we read of in the first two years after they came out of Egypt, and likewise in the last; of which only we have a particular account: but their behaviour, all the rest of the time they spent in the wilderness, was no better.

Ver. 8. Or rather, even in Horeb (for there is an emphasis in this, and he speaks it with some indignation); when they had newly received the law, and had a visible appearance of God in great glory upon Mount Sinai, and had entered into covenant with him, they so shamefully revolted from him, that he thought to have destroyed them (Exod. xxxii. 7, 8, &c.).

11 And it came to pass at the end of forty days and forty nights, that the Lord gave me the two tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant.

12 And the Lord said unto me, Arise, get thee down quickly from hence; for thy people which thou hast brought forth out of Egypt have corrupted themselves; they are quickly turned aside out of the way which I commanded them; they have made them a molten image.

13 Furthermore the Lord spake unto me, saying, I have seen this people, and, behold, it is a stiffnecked people:

14 Let me alone, that I may destroy them, and blot out their name from under heaven: and I will make of thee a nation mightier and greater than they.

15 So I turned and came down from the mount, and the mount burned with fire: and the two tables of the covenant were in my two hands.

16 And I looked, and, behold, ye had sinned against the Lord your God, and had made you a molten calf: ye had turned aside quickly out of the way which the Lord had commanded you.

17 And I took the two tables, and cast them out of my two hands, and brake them before your eyes.

18 And I fell down before the Lord, as at the first, forty days and forty nights: I did neither eat bread, nor drink water, because of all your sins which ye sinned, in doing wickedly in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger.

19 For I was afraid of the anger and hot displeasure, wherewith the Lord was wroth against you to destroy you. But the Lord hearkened unto me at that time also.

20 And the Lord was very angry with Aaron to have destroyed him: and I prayed for Aaron also at the same time.

21 And I took your sin, the calf which ye had made, and burnt it with fire, and stamped it, and ground it very small, even until it was as small as dust: and I cast the dust thereof into the brook that descended out of the mount.

22 And at Taberah, and at Massah, and at Kibroth-hattaavah, ye provoked the Lord to wroth.

23 Likewise when the Lord sent you from Kadesh-barnea, saying, Go up and possess the land which I have given you; then ye rebelled against the commandment of the Lord your God, and ye believed him not, nor hearkened to his voice.

24 Ye have been rebellious against the Lord from the day that I knew you.

25 Thus I fell down before the Lord forty days and forty nights, as I fell down at the first; because the Lord had said he would destroy you.

26 I prayed therefore unto the Lord, and said, O Lord God, destroy not thy people and thine inheritance, whom thou hast redeemed through thy greatness, whom thou hast brought forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand.

27 Remember thy servants, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: look not unto the stubbornness of this people, nor to their wickedness, nor to their sin:

Ver. 18. I fell down] To pray God for pardon; though not presently: but after he had broken the calf, in pieces, reproved Aaron, and made a slaughter among the people (Exod. xxxii. 20, 21 &c.)

As at the first. When he first heard of their sin, Exod. xxxii. 11—13, and the next morning after he had broken the calf, and done execution upon the offenders (ver. 30—32).

Forty days and forty nights: Exod. xxxiv. 2, 28. Because of all your sins: He spent this time, very much, in earnest supplication to God, to forgive not only this, but all other sins, whereby they had deserved to be cast off by him. For they provoked him at Marah (Exod. xv. 23), and in the wilderness of Sin (xvi. 2—3), and at Massah (xvii. 2—4).

Ver. 19. I was afraid of the anger and hot displeasure: Which God had expressed both before he came down from the mount and after (Exod. xxxii. xxxiii. 3, 5). Inasmuch, that the Lord removed out of the camp; and would not, for the present, dwell among them (ver. 7).

But the Lord hearkened unto me. See Exod. xxxiv. 8—10, where the Lord tells him, he expected they should be more faithful hereafter, in observing their covenant with him, particularly this part, of worshipping no god but him there, (ver. 9, 11)

Ver. 20.] This shows the heinousness of this sin, which had like to have cost Aaron his life; though he merely complied with the impetuous desire of the people, out of fear and want of courage to resist them.

Ver. 21. I took your sin. So idols are termed in Isa. xxxi. 7. The object or occasion of sin, as well as the punishment of it, being called by the name of sin.

Burnt it with fire: This he did before he went up the second time into the mount (Exod. xxxii. 20).

I cast the dust thereof into the brook. From the rock which Moses smote with his rod (Exod. xvii. 6), which constantly supplied them with drink; which for the present they could not but have mixed with their sin, as we read Exod. xxxii. 39.

Ver. 22. At Taberah. Besides this great sin committed at Horeb, he puts them in mind of several other, that they might be more humbled, and have no opinion of their own righteousness remaining in them (see concerning this, Numb. xi. 1—3).

At Massah. As the foregoing sin was committed after the making the golden calf, so this was before it. (Exod. xvii. 7).
CHAPTER X.

1 God's mercy in restoring the two tables, 6 in continuing the priesthood, 8 in separating the tribe of Levi, 10 in hearkening unto Moses his suit for the people. 12 An exhortation unto obedience.

Ver. 1. How thee two tables of stone?] After his anger was somewhat appeased, he ordered Moses to come up to him, where he had been before, and bring with him two tables of stone like those he had broken, that God might renew his covenant with them. But there was this difference (as I observed Exod. xxxiv. 1), that God himself made the former tables, but he bade Moses make these: which signifies some abatement of his favour.

Make thee an ark of wood.] This command was given at his first going up into the mount (Exod. xxv. 10), and, perhaps, was renewed again now, upon the occasion of making these new tables which were to be put into it.

Ver. 2. I will write on the tables] So we read he told him, Exod. xxxiv. 1.

Put them in the ark:] As soon as it was made to receive them.

Ver. 3. I made an ark of shittim wood:] This looks as if he made an ark before he made the tables; that when he brought them down, it might be ready to receive them. And it hath given some ground to the Jewish doctors, to say that there were two ark; one made by Moses, wherein he put the tables of stone that were broken, and those that were renewed, until the other was made by Bezaleel: for we read expressly, "that Bezaleel made the ark," Exod. xxxvii. 1, and here it is said that Moses made it. So that they conclude there were two made; and this made by Moses they fancy was the ark that went before them in their marches and battles; which the other never did by God's order, but only when they entered into Canaan (Josh. iii.), for when of their own selves they carried it forth in the days of Eli, God was angry with them, and delivered it into the enemy's hand (1 Sam. iv. 3, 4, 11). But Aben Ezra, Nachmanides, and Abarbinel, have confuted this by strong reasons to the contrary, as may be seen in Buxtorf's Histor. Area, p. 35, 36, &c. And as to this place they are of opinion, that Moses speaks of the ark made afterward by Bezaleel, which Moses is said to have made, because he commanded him to make it. Just as Solomon is said to have built the temple, because he caused it to be built. Or, if it be granted that Moses made an ark before he went the second time into the mount (which this verse seems to countenance) it will not follow that there were two ark in use among the Israelites; for this ark now made of wood, not overlaid with gold, and designed only as a chest where-in to keep the tables handsomely, till the ark could be made by Bezaleel, and then the tables were translated into that, and this chest of Moses laid aside.

Heved two tables of stone.] See Exod. xxxiv. 4.

Ver. 1. He wrote on the tables.] Exod. xxxiv. 28.

Which the Lord spake unto you:] When the whole congregation was gathered together at the foot of the mount (see ix. 10).

The Lord gave them unto me.] To carry down to the people.

Ver. 5. I turned myself.] From the Divine presence, where he had been suppling for mercy, and had received from thence the tables of the covenant.

Came down from the mount.] At the end of forty days and nights (Exod. xxxiv. 28, 29).

Put the tables in the ark.] Which he commanded to be made by Bezaleel (Exod. xxxvii. 1), and put into the tabernacle as soon as it was built, with these tables in it (Exod. xl. 20, 21).

There they be.] Though Moses mentions his making the ark before his hewing the tables, and going up into the mount (ver. 3), yet these words seem to determine that he speaks of the ark made by Bezaleel, according to his directions. For now that they were going over Jordan, the tables were in the ark, which he is said here to have made. Which was certainly "the ark of the covenant," not that chest, but that table.
had made; and there they be, as the Lord commanded me.

6 ¶ And the children of Israel took their journey from Beerot of the children of Jaakan to Mosera: there Aaron died, and there he was buried; and Eleazar his son ministered in the priest's office in his stead.

7 From hence they journeyed unto Gudgodah; and from Gudgodah to Jobath, a land of rivers of waters.

which some suppose Moses to have made to keep the tables in till the other could be fitted for their reception.

Ver. 6. The children of Israel took their journey] Not immediately; but after they had passed through several other places, and made some stay in them; for they went from Bene-Jaakan to Gudgodah (or Hor-hagidgad), and so to Jobath, and the rest of the mansions mentioned Numb. xxxiii. 32, 33, &c. until they came to Mount Hor.

There Aaron died, and there he was buried:] At Mosera, or the top of Mount Hor; which was another part of the same mountain, as Horeb was of Sinai.

Eleazar his son ministered in the priest's office in his stead.] The greatest difficulty is to give an account how these were there, and what connexion this and the following verse have with what went before. All the satisfaction that I can give to it is, that Moses having told them, that he put the tables of the testimony or covenant into the ark, as a token God was reconciled to them, and that there they still were as the Lord commanded, he puts them out of all mention of it, by telling them, that though Aaron (who had the special care of the holy place, and all things in it committed to him) was dead, yet Eleazar his son was still alive, who could testify those holy things remained, as when Moses first placed them there, he being consecrated to the priest's office in stead of Aaron, and in this very mount (Numb. xx. 25, 26, &c.), which is the occasion of mentioning this place now, though most of the rest are omitted.

Ver. 7. From thence] Not from Mosera, but from Bene-Jaakan, as appears from Numb. xxxiii. 32, where a full account is given of their removals, which are but just touched here.

They journeyed unto Gudgodah.] Called in the book of Numbers by the name of Hor-hagidgad. And none will think it strange that there is such a variation in the proper names of places and of men, in profane writers, as well as in the Scriptures, who considers (as Conradus Pellicanus here notes) how differently the names of places are pronounced now, from what they were in former ages; and how much one nation differs from another, when they speak of them; and what alterations are made from the first founders of nation to nation, wherein most of the rest are omitted.

Ver. 8. At that time] Not long after Moses came down from the mount the second time; of which he had been speaking, ver. 5.

8 ¶ At that time the Lord separated the tribe of Levi, to bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord, to stand before the Lord to minister unto him, and to bless his name, unto this day.

9 Wherefore Levi hath no part nor inheritance with his brethren: the Lord is his inheritance, according as the Lord thy God promised him.

10 And I stayed in the mount, according to the first time, forty days and forty nights; and

The Lord separated the tribe of Levi.] To his own special service, as we read Numb. iii. Some think that God renewed his choice of them to the employment here mentioned after Aaron's death, when he confirmed them in their office. But we read of no such thing; and it cannot be inferred merely from these words, at that time, which may well relate to the time mentioned, ver. 5. To stand before the Lord] This is a phrase used of servants that wait upon their masters, before whom they are said to stand. Thus Gehazi attended the prophet Elisha (2 Kings v. 25). And the prophets themselves are thus said to stand before the Lord (1 Kings xviii. 1, xviii. 10). Therefore it here signifies that they who were separated to be God's ministers, as it follows. To minister unto him.] As assistants to the priests in the tabernacle (Numb. iii. 6), and as a guard to the tabernacle (ver. 7, 8). Which was the second part of their office. To bless in his name.] This was the greatest thing of all that was peculiar to the priests, who were a part of the tribe of Levi, but had the sole privilege among them to bless in the name of the Lord, as we read expressly Numb. vi. 23, 24. If, indeed, it could be made out, that by "blessing in the name of the Lord," is meant only to "bless the name of the Lord," that was common to all the Levites, who sang praises and gave thanks continually to him in the temple, as I suppose they did in the other parts, but I find no example of the use of this expression in this sense; and therefore it must be restrained to the priests, who were sons of Levi, as well as the rest; and are so called when Moses mentions this part of their office, Deut. xxi. 5.

Ver. 9. Wherefore Levi hath no part nor inheritance with his brethren.] Because God would have them only attend to this service, and not look after other affairs; particularly of guarding the sanctuary, and keeping constant watch there, to secure all the holy things, especially the ark, which they took care none should meddle withal. And therefore the people might be sure it remained as Moses left it, when he put it into the tabernacle with the tables of the covenant.

The Lord is his inheritance.] He took care to provide for the Levites, without having any land to plough or sow, &c. (see Numb. xviii. 20).

Ver. 10. I stayed in the mount, according to the first time.] This doth not signify, that after the separation of the Levites he went up again into the mount, but having confirmed what he said concerning his the Lord hearkened unto me at that time also, and the Lord would not destroy thee.

11 And the Lord said unto me, Arise, take thy journey before the people, that they may go in and possess the land, which I sware unto their fathers to give unto them.

12 ¶ And now, Israel, what doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but to fear the Lord thy God, to walk in all his ways, and to love him, and to serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, 13 To keep the commandments of the Lord, and his statutes, which I command thee this day for thy good?

putting the tables of stone in the ark, which he made after he came the second time down from the mount (ver. 3), he returns to what he was speaking of in the beginning of the chapter, and had begun to say before (ix. 29), how he prayed to God for them, when he went to carry the tables he had hewn up unto God in the mount, that now he might relate to them the success of his prayers, which follows in the next words.

The Lord would not destroy thee.] As he feared he would, because he had so threatened, ix. 15.

Ver. 12. To what he said unto him after the making the golden calf (as I find some take it from Exod. xxxiii. 1), for that was before he went up into the mountain again; but to what he said at the conclusion of their removals from place to place (some of which he mentions here, ver. 6, 7), for them he orders them what to do when they entered into Canaan, which, he said, [I have given you to possess it.] (Num. xxxii. 51—53.)

Ver. 12. What doth the Lord thy God require of thee?] Unto whom he hath given tables, wherein he himself hath written his will with his own hand (ver. 4, 5), and hath graciously pardoned your foul breach of his covenant upon my intercession (ver. 10).

But to fear the Lord thy God.] The fear of God sometimes includes in the religion; but here it seems to signify one of the great principles of obedience (see vi. 2).

To walk in all his ways.] Unto which the fear of God inclines men, when their hearts are possessed with it.

To love him.] Especially if the love of God be in them; which is still a stronger principle of obedience (vi. 1).

To serve the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul.] Being constant in his worship and service, and worshipping him alone (vi. 13, xiii. 3). For loving him with all the heart and soul, seems here to have particular respect to their having no inclination to serve other gods (1 Kings viii. 23, 49), which perhaps they had smarted for their idolatry, understood to be the great commandment. As their father Jacob, they say, taught his twelve sons, when they came about him on his death-bed, saying to them: ʻYe perhaps worship the idols which Terah, the father of Abraham, worshipped; or those which Laban, my mother's brother, worshipped. Turn ye away from the God of your fathers, whom all they made this answer, with a perfect fear: Hear, O Israel, our father, The Lord our God is one Lord. Whereupon Jacob said, Let his great name be blessed for ever.' Thus the Jerusalem Tar- gum upon vi. 4. of this book.

Ver. 13.] Self-love should have inclined them to obedience to God's commands, which he gave them 14 Behold, the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the Lord's thy God, the earth also, with all that therein is. 15 Only the Lord had a delight in thy fathers to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people, as it is this day. 16 Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no more stiffnecked. 17 For the Lord your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and a terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward: 18 He doth execute the judgment of the fa-for their good; though he rewarded their obedience to them as if he had received the benefit thereof.

And the heaven of heavens] And all the glorious regions beyond them.

Is the Lord's thy God.] Are all his possession, as they are his work.

The earth also.] As well as this earth, and all the creatures that are in it.

Ver. 15.] He would have them sensible, therefore, that the possessor of heaven and earth could have no need of them, or of their services, who were a very inconciderable part of his creatures: but it was his own mere good will and pleasure which moved him to show such love to Abraham as he had done, and to his posterity for his sake, above all other nations on earth.

Ver. 16. Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart.] Do not satisfy yourselves therefore with the bare circumcision of your flesh (and the observance of such external rites and ceremonies), but cut off and cast away all your naughty affections, which make you insensible both of God's mercies and corrections, and disobedient to his commands.

Be no more stiffnecked.] As he had often before complained they were, particularly Exod. xxxii. 9, and see ix. 6. of this book. It is a metaphor, as I observed, from oxen, when, when they are drawn in a yoke, and go forward, pull back their neck and their shoulder to withdraw themselves from the yoke. To both which the Scripture alludes, Neh. ix. 29. And sometime severally we find mention of them, as in one place before named in Exodus, he speaks of their stiff neck; and Zechar. vii. 11. he saith, ʻthey pulled away the shoulder.ʼ St. Stephen puts both these together in his character of the wicked Jews that killed our blessed Saviour, Acts vii. 51. that they were stiffnecked and uncircumcised in heart. Therefore the contrary disposition God promises towards the conclusion of this book, as the greatest blessing we could bestow on them (xxx. 6).

Ver. 17. For the Lord your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords.] Superior to all other beings, whether kings on earth or angels in heaven.

A great God.] Who can do what he pleases everywhere; and therefore is to be greatly dreaded.

Which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward.] The most righteous judge of men, who will not conside at your sins because you are circumcised, nor be bribed by any sacrifices to overlook your wickedness (Exod. xxi. 8. Lev. xix. 15. Deut. i. 17), nor, on the contrary, reject those that uprightly obey him, though they be not Jews. So St. Peter learnt to understand these words, Acts x. 34.

Ver. 18. He doth execute the judgment of the father-
21. He is thy praise, and he is thy God, that hath done for these great and terrible things, which thine eyes have seen.

22. Thy fathers went down into Egypt with threescore and ten persons; and now the Lord thy God hath made thee as the stars of heaven for multitude.

And speak by his name. See vi. 13.

Ver. 21. He is thy praise. Whom thou oughtest therefore to praise; or rather, in whose love and favour thou oughtest to glory; and to think it the highest honour to be his servant, and to have him for thy God, as it here follows.

Ver. 22. Thy fathers went down into Egypt with threescore and ten persons; See Gen. xvi. 27. Exod. i. 5. Their family, he would have them remember, was very small about two hundred years ago.

And now the Lord thy God hath made thee as the stars of heaven] Vastly increased them, according to his promise unto Abraham, Gen. xv. 5. Exod. xii. 37. Numb. xxvi. 51. 62. Which alone (as Comenius Pelicanus here notes) was sufficient to fill their hearts with his love, and their mouths with his praise.

CHAPTER XI.

1 An exhortation to obedience, 2 by their own experience of God's great works, 3 by promise of God's great blessings, 16 and by threatenings. 18 A careful study is required in God's words. 26 The blessing and curse is set before them.

1. Therefore thou shalt love the Lord thy God, and keep his charge, and his statutes, and his judgments, and his commandments, alway.

2. And know ye this day: for I speak not with your children which have not known, and which have not seen the chastisement of the Lord your God's highness, his mighty hand, and his stretched out arm.

3. And his miracles, and his acts, which he did in the midst of Egypt unto Pharaoh the king of Egypt, and unto all his land;

4. And what he did unto the army of Egypt, his mighty hand, and his stretched out arm. These are more words to express the same thing.

Ver. 3. And his miracles, and his acts.] Or, "his miraculous acts," &c. He uses so many words, to make them sensible how much they were obliged to God for their deliverance out of the slavery of Egypt; which nothing could have effect but God's almighty power, declared in various instances. This is the first argument wherewith he excites their love to God (which he pressed in the foregoing chapter, and begins this again with it), that God had loved them so much, as to work many astonishing miracles, rather than let them continue slaves to Pharaoh.

Ver. 4. What he did unto the army of Egypt.] Who pursued after the Israelites, and overtook them (Exod. xiv. 6—8); whereby the kindness of God appeared, after he had delivered them, in preserving them from being brought back to their slavery.

How he made the water of the Red sea to overflow them? See Exod. xiv. 23. 24. 27. 28.

How the Lord hath destroyed them unto this day? Brought them so low, that they have not recovered

5. For I speak not with your children which have not known. The words I speak are not in the Hebrew: and they may as well be supplied thus, "For not with your children have these things been done," &c. Which agrees well with ver. 7.

6. The chastisement of the Lord your God. The plagues he sent upon the Egyptians.

His greatness.] Which appeared by the many great things he did, only upon the stretching out of Moses' rod.

Ver. 1. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God.] Who of so small hath made thee so great a nation.

And keep his charge. A phrase used frequently concerning the Levites, Numb. iii. 7, 8, &c. But here comprehends all the particulars following, his statutes, and his judgments, and his commandments, which he had charged them to observe (see vi. 1).

Ver. 2. And know ye this day.] Consider seriously what I have said to you, till you be sensible of it (viii. 5. ix. 6.)

7. The chastisement of the Lord your God.] The plagues he sent upon the Egyptians.

His greatness.] Which appeared by the many great things he did, only upon the stretching out of Moses' rod.

Ver. 1. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God.] Who of so small hath made thee so great a nation.

And keep his charge. A phrase used frequently concerning the Levites, Numb. iii. 7, 8, &c. But here comprehends all the particulars following, his statutes, and his judgments, and his commandments, which he had charged them to observe (see vi. 1).

Ver. 2. And know ye this day.] Consider seriously what I have said to you, till you be sensible of it (viii. 5. ix. 6.)

8. The chastisement of the Lord your God.] The plagues he sent upon the Egyptians.

His greatness.] Which appeared by the many great things he did, only upon the stretching out of Moses' rod.
unto their horses, and to their chariots; how he made the water of the Red sea to overflow them as they pursued after you, and how the Lord hath destroyed them unto this day;

5 And what he did unto you in the wilderness, until ye came into this place;

6 And what he did unto Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab, the son of Reuben: how the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their households, and their tents, and all the substance that was in their possession, in the midst of all Israel:

7 But your eyes have seen all the great acts of the Lord which he did.

their strength, to attempt anything against you since that time.

Ver. 5.] Provided for them, protected and preserved them forty years: giving them possession also of the country of Sihon and Og, two kings of the Amorites. These benefits, if they considered, which they could not but see, owed to his love alone, were powerful arguments to move them to love him.

Ver. 6. [What he did unto Dathan and Abiram.] Num. xvi. 1, &c. The remembrance and consideration of the terrible vengeance the Lord took upon rebellious people, he uses as another argument to make them obedient. And there was none more remarkable than this upon Dathan and Abiram. He doth not mention Korah; but they would not well forget him, when they thought of his confederates, though he suffered another punishment.

How the earth opened.] See Num. xvi. 32, &c.

Ver. 7.] In Egypt, at the Red Sea, and in the wilderness (ver. 2—5). Some of which all of them had seen; and there was none of them who had not seen some.

Ver. 8. {Therefore shall ye keep all the commandments.] Remembering what had befallen both their enemies and themselves.

That ye may be strong, and go in.] In hope that the same God would empower them to subdue the Canaanites, and give them full possession of their country.

Ver. 9. Ye may prolong your days.] This may relate both to their present generation, and to their posterity; who, after their fathers had lived long in the land of Canaan, should succeed them, and enjoy it in future ages (see ver. 21).

A land that floweth with milk and honey.] This is a common description, in all authors, of a rich and pleasant country. Particularly in Euripides:

Pri δι γάλακτος πίθαν,
Pri δι αμηρά μαι δι μέλισσον

And the like Bochart has observed in Virgil, Horace, and other writers (Hierozoic. lib. iv. par. i. cap. 12).

Ver. 10. For the land,—is not as the land of Egypt.] He uses all manner of arguments to persuade them to obedience; from a grateful remembrance of God's former mercies (ver. 2, 3, &c.), from the terrible punishment of the disobedient (ver. 6), from the benefits that would redound to themselves by their obedience (ver. 9), and now he represents to them what a noble country he was going to bestow upon them; but of such a condition as would keep them in a constant dependence upon his favour for the blessing of it.

When thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs.] This doth not signify that the land of Egypt was not so fruitful as the land of Canaan (for their fertility is not to be compared), but that there they reaped the fruits of their labour with more pains. Diidorus Siculus, indeed, and Herodotus, say, that the Egyptians take the least pains of all other men about their corn, insomuch that it may be affirmed, διαπηρηκτικα και τοιν μελετημεν, they bring in the fruits of the earth without labour or toil, as no such thing as ploughing as other are, &c. (see in his Euterpe, cap. 14). Yet it must be considered, that as the Nile, which made this fruitfulness, failed them sometimes, and did not overflow all the flat country, so the upper parts of Egypt had not the benefit of it; nor all the lower neither, without great pains in cutting rivers to bring the water to them. Which Pliny calls rigius Nile; for the word rigius properly signifies the "little rivers" and δωρίγραφον "cuts," which were made to derive water from the Nile into places at a distance from it, as Salmasius observes, p. 588. in Solinus. Hesychius calls them δοξας ἐκτασεως, "receptacles of water, ditches, or dikes," which we now call canals, as the same author observes, p. 908. And this I find Strabo speaks so plainly in his Geography, (lib. xvii. p. 788), that his words may serve as a good commentary upon those of Moses: "Nature (saith he) doth much for Egypt by the Nile; but industry and art about that river doth a great deal more. For the higher it flows, the more ground it naturally waters and makes fruitful; "αλλα τα ἑπινίδαι συνάλλαξ τα και τοιν ψίχοι έκενθήμεναι, but industry sometimes hath prevailed when nature hath failed," insomuch, that as great a part of the country hath been watered in the smallest rise of Nile, as in the highest. Which was effected, δια τον δωρίγραφον και των παρασχωματων, by the cuts and banks which were made by art. For before the time of Petronius (he saith) there was the greatest fruitfulness when the Nile rose fourteen cubits; and when it rose only eight there was a famine: but in the time of his government there was as great plenty when it rose only twelve cubits: and no man felt any want when it rose only eight. This was by the care and industry of the people, who were forced also sometimes to carry water from these cuts, as well as from the river, to their vessels, to prevent their want; but that which the Nile left was baked into a crust by the great heat of the sun. So that the ground of Egypt might properly be said to be watered by the foot, as we water our gardens when there wants rain." Concerning which expression, see Dr. Hammond upon the Psalms, p. 7, col. 2, of the first edition.

is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven:

12 A land which the Lord thy God careth for: the eyes of the Lord thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year.

13 And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments which I command you this day, to love the Lord your God, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul, 14 That I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thy oil.

15 And I will send grass in thy fields for thy cattle, that thou mayest eat and be full.

16 Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived, and ye turn aside, and serve other gods, and worship them;

17 And then the Lord's wrath be kindled against you, and he shut up the heaven, that there be no rain, and that the land yield not her fruit; and lest ye perish quickly from off the good land which the Lord giveth you.

18 Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart and in your soul, and bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be as frontlets between your eyes.

19 And ye shall teach them to your children, which is meant of this latter rain, whereby their corn was brought forward, when it was but in the blade to earing:

That thou mayest gather in thy corn.] Till the corn and all the fruits of the earth be brought to maturity.

Ver. 15. I will send grass in thy fields for thy cattle.] To make them fat; or to give plenty of milk.

That thou mayest eat and be full.] Eat flesh if they pleased, as well as the fruits of the earth, in that plenty.

Ver. 16. Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived.] By the specious colours that other nations put upon their idolatry (as, the antiquity of it, universal consent, &c. there being no part of the world at that time, as Maimonides observes, where all were not accustomed to worship images, &c.) whereby they were more apt to hearken to things being in danger to be seduced into an imitation of their neighbours.

Ye turn aside, and serve other gods,] By this it is evident that Moses is still pressning them to care in observing the first and second commandments.

And he shut up the heaven.] The contrary to this is called "opening his good treasure," Deut. xxviii. 12, signifying that they lived upon the royal bounty of the King of heaven, which their sins would hinder from flowing to them.

That the land yield not her fruit.] To withhold rain from them was a sore judgment, which quickly brought a famine; which was very grievous to those who used to live so plentifully. And it was frequently attended with various diseases, whereby they were wasted and harassed.

Ver. 18. Lay up these my words.] See ch. vi. 6.

Bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be as frontlets.] Always in sight: as the rule whereby they should order their steps, lest they trod amiss. This is one of the portions of Scripture (from ver. 13. to the end of ver. 21), which the Jews write in their tripliim, as they call them, which they use when they pray their prayers, which they fancy are thereby made more acceptable unto God. This conceit began, not long before our Saviour's time, in the school of Hillel and Shammai, and took such root in the minds of the most religious, that it hath grown to a great superstition ever since. See upon ch. vi. ver. 8, 9, which is another portion of Scripture, that they wrote in these parchments; though at the first (St. Jerome saith,

Deuteronomy.
CHAPTER XI.

791 speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up.

20 And thou shalt write them upon the door posts of thine house, and upon thy gates:

21 That your days may be multiplied, and the days of your children, in the land which the Lord sware unto your fathers to give them, as the days of heaven upon the earth.

22 ¶ For if ye shall diligently keep all these commandments which I command you, to do them, to love the Lord your God, to walk in all his ways, and cleave unto him;

23 Then will the Lord drive out all these nations from before you, and ye shall possess greater nations and mightier than yourselves.

24 Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be yours: from the wilderness and Lebanon, from the river, the river Euphrates, even unto the uttermost sea shall your coast be.

25 There shall no man be able to stand before you: for the Lord your God shall lay the fear of you and the dread of you upon all the land that ye shall tread upon, as he hath said unto you.

26 ¶ Behold, I set before you this day a blessing and a curse;

27 A blessing, if ye obey the commandments of the Lord your God, which I command you this day:

28 And a curse, if ye will not obey the commandments of the Lord your God, but turn aside out of the way which I command you this upon Matt. xxiii. 5), they wrote only the ten commandments.

Ver. 19. Ye shall teach them your children.] This is repeated very often (ver. 10. vi. 7). And out of this place, and v. 1, the Jews have framed this as one of the affirmative precepts, “that they ought themselves to learn the law of God, and teach it unto others.” And this they do so diligently, that as soon as their children are capable to understand anything, they make them carefully read the holy books, and instruct them so, that before they can be called youths, they are acquainted with the whole law of God. In which we must confess, they shame a great many Christians, who scarce understand so much of our religion when they are men and women, as the Jews do of theirs when they are mere children.

From the Hebrew word limamalethkim, in this verse, “ye shall teach them,” the Jews have framed a con- ceit that their Talmud hath its name; signifying teaching and instruction, as R. Jechiel smith, in his disputation with Nicolius, p. 9.

Speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, &c.] Taking all occasions to inculcate these precepts upon them (see ch. vi. 7.), and upon their daughters as well as their sons; though the Jewish doctors commonly fancy there is no command to instruct their daughters in the law (see Mischoa Sota, cap. 3. sect. 3. from Warneke’s Annotations, and the Gemara there, p. 471. 501).

Ver. 20. Write them upon the door posts] See ch. vi. 9. By this means God’s word being so rooted in the hearts of the parents (to use the words of Dr. Jackson), as to bring forth this good fruit in their practice, the seed of it might be sown in the tender hearts of their children, and be propagated from one generation to another.

Ver. 21. That your days may be multiplied.] Nothing is wont to move men more than love to themselves, and love to their children, whom they love next to themselves.

As the days of heaven upon the earth.] As long as this world shall last. Which the Psalmist, speaking of David, expresses in this manner, “His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven.” (Ps. lxxxxx. 20), which doth not signify absolutely for ever, but a long time. For thus Baruch says, the Jews in Babylon were commanded to pray for the life of Nebuchadnezzar, and the life of Baltasor his son, (see 2 Macc. x. 40). And accordingly the spies whom Joshua sent brought him an account of the great consternation wherein the whole country was, when they were about to enter into it (Josh. ii. 9. 24).

Ver. 26. I set before you this day a blessing and a curse.] That is, he proposed them to their choice.

Ver. 27. A blessing, if ye obey the commandments] Which he more largely explains xxviii. 2—17, &c.

Ver. 28. A curse, if ye will not obey] Which is also more particularly laid before them, xxviii. 15—17, &c.

The whole historical part of the Old Testament witnesses the truth of this, that God blessed or cursed day, to go after other gods, which ye have not known.

29 And it shall come to pass, when the Lord thy God hath brought thee in unto the land whither thou goest to possess it, that thou shalt put the blessing upon mount Gerizim, and the curse upon mount Ebal.

30 Are they not on the other side Jordan, by them, according as they observed or broke his laws. And if the people of Israel had diligently marked, and considered, and laid to heart, that their happiness or misery was always corresponding to their good and bad behaviour towards God, it would have confirmed their belief of their law, as much as if they had seen all the miracles done before their forefathers, and supplied the want or the rarity of them in after ages; nay, this would have done more than all the miracles did, which were forgotten in a short time; whereas their own daily experience of the happy fruits of obedience, and the mischief of disobedience, would have sealed these truths unto their conscience.

But turn aside out of the way! It was not every sin that turned God's favour from them; but their idolatry and apostasy from him; against which he principally warns them, throughout all these chapters, iv. 3, 4, 15, 16, 23. v. 32. vi. 4. 14. vii. 4. 5, 25. viii. 19. ix. 19. x. 20.

Ver. 29.] To quicken them unto a strict care in their obedience, blessings and cursings were to be pronounced with great solemnity at their first entrance into the land of Canaan; as is more fully ordered xxvii. 11, 13, &c., and performed by Joshua (viii. 33—35). And Moses seems to enjoin them the like solemnity, every seventh year, xxxi. 10—13.

Ver. 30. Are they not on the other side Jordan?] With respect to the place where Moses now was, the mountains he mentions were on the other side of Jordan, in the land of Canaan. In which they had no sooner got footing; but Joshua took care to execute this command; that their hearts might be possessed with a sense upon what terms they were to enjoy it. And he describes the places so particularly, that they might be sure to know them.

CHAPTER XII.

1 Monuments of idolatry are to be destroyed. 5 The place of God's service is to be kept. 15, 23 Blood is forbidden. 17, 20, 25 Holy things must be eaten in the holy place. 19 The Levite is not to be forestaken.

1 These are the statutes and judgments, which ye shall observe to do in the land, which the Lord God of thy fathers giveth thee to possess it, all the days that ye live upon the earth.

2 Ye shall utterly destroy all the places,
CHAPTER XII.

4 Ye shall not do so unto the Lord your God.
5 But unto the place which the Lord your God shall choose out of all your tribes to put his name there, even unto his habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come:
6 And thither ye shall bring your burnt offerings, and your sacrifices, and your tithes, and your刍 offerings, and your tithes, and

Ver. 4. Ye shall not do so unto the Lord your God.] That is, not serve him upon the mountains, nor in groves, nor under green trees. Which appears to be the sense, both from the foregoing words (ver. 2, 3), and from the following opposition in the next verse. And it is very probable, that, during their continuance in the wilderness, none sacrificed in high places, but offered all at the door of the tabernacle, which was not far from them. When they came into Canaan, and were many of them at a distance from the tabernacle, they did sacrifice in high places; and we do not find them reprobated for it while they worshipped the Lord alone, and had priests who officiated there, and in other places, according to the precepts of the law: but when the temple was built, and the ark of God’s presence no longer removed to the place, the prophets required that they be not to sacrifice any longer in high places, nor anyplace else, but only at the temple. And they blamed even good kings for not taking away the high places; though no sacrifices were offered upon them to any strange god, but to the true God alone. Which compliance proved in a time a great mischief; for here they began to worship strange gods, the Israelites being so prone to choose mountains and such shady places (as the posterity of the world did), wherein to set up their images (2 Kings xxvii. 10, 11. Ezek. xx. 28. Hosea iv. 13).

Ver. 5. Unto the place Unto one certain place which God intended to set apart; unto which all the tribes should resort, as the only place where they might sacrifice. By which means the notion of the unity of God was preserved, and his worship kept pure and sincere, as long as they kept to this one place, where the priests of God constantly attended, to see his service rightly performed.

To put his name there.] By the name of God is meant God himself (as to call upon his name, is to call upon him), and therefore the sense is, when he would make his dwelling-place, when he would settle the ark, and the cloud of glory there, which was the token and emblem of his presence. This place at first seems to have been Mispeh, and afterward Shiloh. And when that was destroyed, the ark removed to several places (Kirjath-jearim, Mizpeh, Gilgal, Nob, Gibeon, the house of Obed-Edom, till at last it settled at Jerusalem. Where, when the temple was built, God saith to Solomon, “I have chosen this place to myself, for a house of sacrifice” (2 Chron. viii. 13). Which is the plain sense of these words, “choose a place to put his name there.”

Even unto his habitation shall ye seek.] This explains what he means by the place where he would put his name, viz. the place where his sanctuary was settled, which was his habitation; where he placed his majesty (as Ockesles paraphrases), that all might repair thither to seek his grace and favour.

Ver. 6. Your burnt offerings, and your sacrifices.] By sacrifices, as distinct from burnt-offerings, must be meant their sin-offerings and peace-offerings. And the latter of these were sometimes for merces received, and sometimes free-will-offerings, or vows, as we read in Lev. vi. 12, 16. Which, if they had been bound, and there was occasion, to bring to one certain place (Jerusalem suppose), though they were at never so great distance from it, it would have heave offerings of your hand, and your vows, and your freewill offerings, and the firstlings of your herds and of your flocks:

7 And there ye shall eat before the LORD your God, and ye shall rejoice in all that ye put your hand unto, ye and your households, wherein the LORD thy God hath blessed thee.

8 Ye shall not do after all the things that we do here today, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes.

9 For ye are not as yet come to the rest and to the inheritance, which the LORD your God giveth you.

10 But when ye go over Jordan, and dwell in the land which the LORD your God giveth you to inherit, and when he giveth you rest from all your enemies round about, so that ye do dwell in safety;

11 Then there shall be a place which the LORD your God shall choose to cause his name to dwell there; thither shall ye bring all that I command you; your burnt offerings, and your sacrifices near the altar which was erected after they came over Jordan. This being a profession of the true religion, to eat at God's altar, as to eat of things sacrificed to idols was to profess the heathenish religion. So all have understood it, as Elenchusists both shown from a great heap of authors, in his Annot. ad Minutium Felicium, fol. 69.

Ye shall rejoice This signifies either that they should rejoice at these feasts in the goodness of God, who had blessed the labour of their hands (of which the tithe they brought thither was a fruit), or that, doing thus, God would bless all their future labours, and make them dwell in their dwellings prosper, and take comfort in all their enjoyments.

Ver. 8. Ye shall not do after all the things that we do here today.] This doth not signify, as if there was no civil government, or that the courts of justice did not sit and execute judgment between man and man, but relates to the place of offering sacrifice (as Mr. Selden observes, lb. ii. De Synod. cap. 15. p. 4), which, in their wandering condition, they did not so strictly observe as God expected when they came to be settled. Our learned Dr. Spencer it thinks relates also to other old customs, which were rather childish than profane; and therefore tolerated by God for the present. To which he thinks these words of St. Paul have respect, Acts xiii. 18. Many things also perhaps they omitted, which they could not, or did not, observe in the wilderness; as their new moons, and other solemn days; with several rites of purification and cleansing prescribed by the law of Moses.

Every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes.] This doth not import that there was no good order kept among them, or that they were left at liberty to sacrifice where they pleased; but that, in such an unregulated state, when they were removing from place to place, many took the liberty in such matters to do as they thought good.

Ver. 9. For ye are not yet come to the rest] This explains what goes before, and gives the reason why God conformed at some irregularities, because they were not fixed to a place, but uncertain when they should have a sign to pack up their goods, and be gone to another station.

To the inheritance.] Where they were to abide, as long as they observed God's commands.

Ver. 10. But when ye go over Jordan] When their condition was altered for the better, God expected that they should be so too.

When he giveth you rest] This intimates, that the fear they were in, while they wandered in the wilderness, of the incursions of their enemies, might make them sometimes offer sacrifice where they ought not, and commit other disorders.

Ver. 11. Then there shall be a place which the Lord your God shall choose] God was not pleased (as Monomades observes) to declare anywhere in the law where this place should be; but though he often determined them to one place (ver. 26. xiv. 23. xvi. 6), yet he leaves the place undetermined. Which he imafices might be for these three reasons: first, lest the gentiles should get possession of it, and make war upon that account; thinking that this place was the end of the law (as he speaks). And, secondly, lest they, in whose hands it was, should do all they could to destroy it. And, thirdly (which is the truest reason), lest every tribe should desire to have it in their lot, and strive to arise among them about it (More Neochev, par. iii. cap. 45).

THITHER SHALL YE BRING ALL THAT I COMMAND YOU, &C.

All that he mentioned before, ver. 6. This may seem a heavy imposition, that they might not offer them in any place, and at any time; but Maimonides makes this wise reflection upon it; “That God intended to teach them, not to have so high an opinion of sacrifices as of prayer and devotions, and such-like parts of Divine worship (viz. acknowledging his goodness, praising him, and giving him thanks), which are the things God mainly intends, and may be offered everywhere. Whereas sacrifices are not of that account with him; which made him limit them to one place where he should appoint them to be offered; and not suffer any but them to be offered in other places. Those and such-like things were to diminish the value of sacrifices; for which reason the prophets often reprehend men for their too great diligence and zeal in bringing sacrifices, of which God had no need, and did not principally intend as the worship he delighted in; for which he cites 1 Sam. xx. 23. Isa. i. 11. Jer. vii. 22. Sacrifices being appointed, and consecrated for any good in themselves, but only that all idolatry might be abolished, and the belief of the unity of God preserved” (More Neochev, par. iii. cap. 32).

ALL YOUR CHOICE VOWS In the Hebrew the words are as our margin notes, the choices of your vows. So their peace-offerings, which were vows, were called; because they were to be chosen out of those creatures which were perfect, and without the least defect. Whereas these creatures had something superfluous, or lacking in any part, might be accepted for a free-will-offering, which a man was not bound to make, but brought it merely out of good-will. So we read expressively in Lev. xxii. 23.

VER. 12. YE SHALL REMEMBER BEFORE THE LORD YOUR GOD, YE, AND YOUR SONS, AND YOUR DAUGHTERS, AND YOUR MANSERVANTS, AND YOUR MAIDERVANTS, THE DAY THAT YOU ENTRUSTED THESE FEASTS, WHICH WERE KEPT AT GOD’S HOUSE (MORE NEOCHEV, PAR. III. CAP. 31).

14 But in the place which the Lord shall choose... and thou shalt offer thy burnt offerings, and there thou shalt do all that I command thee.

15 Notwithstanding thou mayest kill and eat flesh in all thy gates, whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God which he hath given thee: the unclean and the clean may eat thereof, as of the roebuck, and as of the hart.

Ver. 13. Offer Not Thy Burnt Offerings. Under burnt-offerings are comprehended all the other offerings before mentioned; for these were the chief, and the most usual; and if they might not be offered but at a certain place, much less might any other, as every body might understand, without repeating them all again.

In every place that thou wouldest. To be beautiful, lovely, and inviting, by its situation, and shady trees, and fountains, &c. Such as are mentioned ver. 2.

Which the gentiles chose, perhaps, wherein to sacrifice, because they were more delightful or solemn than other. Wherein Ezekiel, vi. 3., mentions rivers and valleys (together with mountains) where there were fair pastures, and springs of water; which were more pleasant and refreshing in those countries that they compassed the gods delighted in them. So St. Jerome notes upon Jer. vii. that this gentle error, omnes provincias occupavit, &c. “spread itself in all parts of the world,” that they should offer their sacrifices at the heads of fountains and delightful groves.

Ver. 11. But in the place which the Lord shall choose... This he had mentioned before, ver. 5, 6, 11, but repeats it again, because of the great importance of it, to prevent all strange worship. Elijah, indeed, offered upon Mount Carmel, after the temple was built, but it was by prophetical inspiration; and if any one at that time had asked him if they might take that liberty, he would have answered, By no means; but he that offered out of Jerusalem shall be cut off (Lev. xvii. 4.), as for what I do now, it is an extraordinary case, to convince the lying prophets of Baal, &c. Thus Maimonides in Seder Zerain.

There thou shalt do all... Bring their tithes and first-fruits before mentioned, ver. 6, and eat and rejoice before the Lord (ver. 7).

Ver. 15. Thou Mayest Kill and Eat Flesh. For common food.

In All Thy Gates... In any city, town, or house. While they were in the wilderness, indeed, they might not kill their beasts but only at the door of the tabernacle; and, consequently, they ate nothing but peace-offerings, which had been first presented unto God, and part of them burnt at his altar (Lev. xvii. 4., &c.). But when they went into Canaan, and were free indolent to kill their beasts in any place, without bringing any part of them to the altar.

Whatever Thy Soul Lustoth After. Of all sorts of creatures, not prohibited in the eleventh of Leviticus.

Which He Hath Given Thee. Suitable to every man’s estate and condition.

The Unclean and the Clean May Eat Thereof. They who were under any legal uncleanness might not eat of the sacrifices; but of common food, at their ordinary tables, they might, as well as others.

As of the Roebuck, and as of the Hart. He instances in these, because there was great plenty of that country in that as affliction observes in the end of his fifth book; where he saith they were in υπερισκομενα, “in the highest mountains” of Amanus, Libanus, and Carmel. These creatures might not be sacrificed to 16 Only ye shall not eat the blood; ye shall pour it upon the earth as water.

17 If thou mayest not eat within thy gates the tithes of thy corn, or of thy wine, or of thy oil, or the firstlings of thy herd or of thy flock, nor any of thy vows which thou vowest, nor thy freewill offerings, or heave offering of thine hand:

18 But thou must eat them before the Lord thy God in the place which the Lord thy God shall choose, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy manservant, and thy maidservant, and the Levite that is within thy gates; and thou shalt rejoice before the Lord thy God in all that thou puttest thine hands unto.

19 Take heed to thyself that thou forsake not the Levite as long as thou livest upon the earth.

20 ¶ When the Lord thy God shall enlarge thy border, as he hath promised thee, and thou shalt say, I will eat flesh, because thy soul longeth to eat flesh; thou mayest eat flesh, whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, and men freely offered, without any obligation to it, to be spent in this fashion; for he was speaking before of such kind of things; unless we will understand this of the first-fruits of young trees, which might not be eaten in three years after they were planted, but in the fourth year were "to be holy, to praise the Lord wthall" (Lev. xix. 24), which, as Josephus saith, were spent in these sacred feasts (see there).

Ver. 20 See before, ver. 11, 12.

Ver. 19. He gives this caution, lest covetousness should make them defraud the Levites of their tithes, and not let them have convenient habitations, or profaneness make them not invite them to the sacred feasts before spoken of. This is repeated xiv. 27.
